"One night," said Mr. Higginson, "I sat at the opera in Vienna, and watched a black-haired man who was conducting a performance of Aida. His name, I was told, was Wilhelm Gericke." Mr. Higginson decided that he wanted Gericke in Boston. A friend made the proposal to Gericke at once, and returned with his answer, that he would come.

Later Mr. Higginson quoted a remark of Dr. Muck's: "Everybody knows that it is Gericke who made the Boston Symphony Orchestra." This was quite recently. Mr. Higginson wrote Gericke, telling him of the praise of his colleague, praise not always accorded one musician by another.

Gericke came to Major Higginson one day and said, "of course you know we haven't an orchestra, as yet," or words to that effect. Major Higginson asked him what he wanted, and Mr. Gericke said that he wanted some more men. He brought back a number of men with him from Europe the following season.

It was decided one day that the orchestra should play in New York. The hall was engaged, the concert advertised. Gericke came to Higginson one morning and said, "We can't go to New York."

"Why?"

"We're not ready to go."

"But already we've spent $1200. We do not want to throw that money away."

Gericke stuck to his guns. The orchestra could not yet play in the manner he desired. The project was abandoned and the $1200 went into the great beyond.

Major Higginson said that when he engaged a man he made him the master, and saw to it that he had full opportunity to carry out his ideas. "And so when a lady comes to me and wishes this or that thing played I tell her that the matter rests wholly with our conductor."

Gericke, spent with very hard labor, wished to rest. Nikisch followed him. He was a brilliant musician and thinker as well, a gifted conversationalist, a man of magnetism. His disposition was uneven and likewise his performances. Sometimes a wonderful performance was given, sometimes a performance which was not so wonderful, which, in fact, was rather careless. Nikisch became restive, got out of tune and departed.

Richter Breaks Contract

Hans Richter, the great German conductor, was engaged, a contract drawn up and signed. Richter, without any explanation or apology, broke his contract, which is in Major Higginson's desk today.

Emil Paur was head of the orchestra for a term, then Mr. Gericke returned for eight years, and constantly the standard of the orchestra and its performances grew higher. Then Gericke retired.

Dr. Muck came at first on a year's leave of absence, and at the very first concert made a sensation by laying down his baton, while the orchestra continued to play. This was considered a great compliment, and it served to give the players additional confidence in themselves. Dr. Muck obtained from the German Kaiser leave of absence for an additional year. Max Fiedler took his place, and filled it with excellent results for four years. Dr. Muck returned and brought with him an assistant conductor, for he realized the danger of illness or other passing incapacity, and so Otto Urack was given this post.

Deficits Reach $50,000

Major Higginson spoke very earnestly of his desire to have the Symphony Orchestra benefit all of the people. He then quoted some instructive figures. First, that each year there is a deficit at the end of the symphony season; that he had originally reckoned upon a deficit of $30,000 a season, but that there had been seasons when the deficit reached the figure of $50,000; that it was necessary for the

ADVERTISER.

APRIL 12, 1913

MME. CULP SOLOIST AT THE SYMPHONY

WINS MANY RECALLS BY EXCELLENT WORK

Orchestral Parts of This Week's Programme Are "Solid Musical Food."

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Haydn—Symphony in G major, "The Surprise."
Mozart—"Magic Flute Overture."
Schubert—Three Songs with Orchestra.
Soloist, Mme. Julia Culp.
Liszt—Symphonic Poem, "The Battle of the Huns."
Wagner—Song, "Traeume."
Beethoven—Two songs from "Egmont."
Mme. Julia Culp.
Beethoven—"Egmont Overture."

Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, with a little of Liszt as a more highly spiced dish of the concert. But it was all good, solid musical food, without any traces of modern Carnival Ptomaine in it. We have often said that (apart from the latter's last three symphonies) we prefer Haydn to Mozart in symphonic work. He is more naive, simple, and does not aim at dramatic effects which would seem but thin and affected in the atmosphere of the 20th century. And Dr. Muck reads his work in an unaffected and honest fashion that fits well to the Wordsworth of Music.

But in the "Surprise Symphony" our Wordsworth attempts a little simple practical joking. He lulls the audience to almost comatose tranquillity with a soothing Andante, and then suddenly wakes them up with a fortissimo stroke on the kettledrum. How our kettledrummer gave that stroke may be imagined, but we have much stronger cataclysms in music nowadays, and we no longer get startled by any explosions whatever.

We scarcely become enthusiastic over the final rondo of this symphony, but it served to remind us that once upon a time it was customary to end every symphony with at least a semblance of jollity. The Minuet with its Trio also seemed rather formal, so that the sonata-allegro of the first and the variations of the second movement seemed the best parts of the symphony. Nevertheless the audience grew very enthusiastic over the work, and even the orchestra was forced to rise in acknowledgment—which their good work deserved. But Mozart in the "Magic Flute" overture goes far beyond Haydn. What a chattering brightness he manages to give to the strict fugal exposition of the beginning of the overture—after the introduction. Bach had used practically the same fugue subject (same length, same key, etc.) in his seventh fugue in the second volume of the "Well-tempered Clavichord," but he changes the subject into stately canons, wholly different from the spicy treatment accorded it by Mozart.

I am ever out of sympathy with the way in which all the great conductors whip up the speed of this fugue. It is always taken so fast that one gets only the merest outline of its workmanship. I very much doubt, even in the teeth of the famous modern authorities, whether Mozart would have rushed this chief theme in any such helter-skelter fashion. We can at once add that our great string orchestra played it clearly in spite of the pace, but that does not prove that it was necessary. The whole overture seemed too rapid, but Dr. Muck has plenty of authority for this "presto" reading.

Mme. Julia Culp has thoroughly captured America. Seldom have we heard such a poetic Lied-singer. She does not distort or exaggerate, and she never sentimentalizes. We were a little doubtful when we saw the old sugar-plum of an "Ave Maria" upon the programme, but even in this she did not yield to the temptation to grow mawkish. In this number her legate work was remarkably pure and even. Her "missa da voce" (swell of the voice) is perfection. And if "Ave Maria" is a somewhat oversung selection, she made amends by having the two other Schubert numbers far less familiar. We cannot remember to have heard "Raste Krieger" and Jaeger, ruhe von der Jagd," before in a Boston concert. The last-named song has a fine accompaniment of hunting-calls (they were excellently played) which seem put in on the "Lucus a non lucendo" principle for they sound continuously at the words, "Here no bugles sound," but this and the "Ave Maria" were superb performances all the same.

It was also in good taste to precede the "Egmont" overture with two of Claerchen's songs from the same work. Beethoven gives the simple tenderness and the courage of Goethe's heroine with admirable touches, but even in these striking numbers we do not find the master really singable composer.

Nevertheless, when passing over Mme Culp's larynx almost every number becomes vocal and attractive, and these an Wagner's over-rated "Dreams" we greatly applauded. As we felt that Mm Culp's last numbers were rather sel abnegatory we were the more delighted find her win five recalls at the end them.

Liszt's "Battle of the Huns" depends great deal upon the conductor for its fect. Given a Dr. Muck to lead it and becomes a thrilling and most excit work. Give it to a lesser man and it see something artificial. It is interesting note that this was probably the first sical work inspired by a painting. S then Boecklin's paintings have been tu into tones by Weingartner, Rachmani and Huber; Appleton Brown's picture Paine, and Aphrodite's beautiful bus Chadwick.

The idea of having two themes struggle together is not new in music. Beethoven used the effect in his fifth symphony, Mendelssohn in his "Reformation Symphony," and Tschaikowsky used this touch frequently, especially in his "1812" overture. Perhaps the "reductio ad absurdam" of this kind of fight is found in Strauss' "Heldenleben" where the pugilism of several different themes becomes decidedly rough and tumble.

But in this picture of the battle of the ghosts of warriors the two themes are finely contrasted and the old church mode which finally triumphs is grandly wrought up on the organ, the most fitting instrument for its climax. In praising the work of the organ we must not slight the muscular efforts of kettle-drummer and cymbalist. If ever these two artists earned their salary it was on this occasion. The loftiness of the "Crux Fidelis," however, made a worthy climax to a very powerful tone-poem, and, as intimated, the work had a performance that was memorable. Again Dr. Muck had tumultuous recalls and again the orchestra was forced to rise in acknowledgment of the plaudits.

And now, having given us combat and victory a la Liszt, Dr. Muck ended with precisely the same subjects treated by Beethoven. And it was an object lesson to see how much more vivid the triumph was in the simpler score of the "Egmont" overture than in the vast tone-coloring of Liszt. Just a rising crescendo of violins in the high positions, just a few runs on the piccolo, and the coda of the "Egmont" overture becomes the frenzy of victorious Liberty, in a manner that none of the great tone-colorists can ever hope to surpass.

It shows the advance of orchestral technique when we remember that the rising passage for the violins, in the coda, which Beethoven's musicians declared to be "impossible," was played easily and flawlessly by our first violins. In spite of the great success deservedly won by the "Hunnenschlacht," we enjoyed the shorter and more direct "Egmont" overture in a higher degree. The former was the Abbe Liszt delineating the conquering power of his chosen church; the latter was Beethoven giving voice to his great love of Liberty and voicing the triumph of human Freedom. The concert was a fine crescendo, from the peaceful prattle of Haydn at the beginning to the clashes of war by Liszt and Beethoven at the end.

HERALD.

APRIL 12, 1913.

21ST SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Liszt's Symphonic Poem "The Battle of the Huns" Stirs Enthusiasm.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 21st Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mme. Julia Culp sang for the first time with this orchestra in Boston. The program was as follows:

Symphony in G major, "The Surprise".......................Haydn
Overture to "The Magic Flute"....Mozart
Songs with orchestra, "Raste, Krieger," "Jaeger, ruhe von der Jagd," "Ave Maria"........Schubert
Symphonic poem, "The Battle of the Huns"........ ....Liszt Songs with orchestra, "Traeunme". Wagner
"Freudvoll und Leidvole" and "Die Trommel geruehret". Beethoven
Overture to "Egmont"..........Beethoven

Liszt's symphonic poem was stormily applauded. Not within our recollection has any one of Liszt's compositions been so favorably received by an audience in Boston. Was the applause due to the brilliance of the performance? The orchestra played brilliantly throughout the concert. Or was the applause due to the sonority of the last pages, with the roar of the organ, the choir of brass, the beating and clashing of pulsatile instruments?. Surely the battle scene is not exciting. It is lamb-like music in comparison with the section in Strauss's "Heldenleben," or the introduction to Massenet's "La Navarraise." The one salient feature in this scene is the figure which by theme and rhythm brings to mind the chief motive of the "Walkuerenritt."

Wagner sketched the "Walkeuere" in 1854, but the last act was not finished until April 1856, and then Wagner was eager to learn how it would affect Liszt. The latter worked on "The Battle of The Huns" early in 1857. Wagner often helped himself to Liszt's music with both hands. It is not safe to say in this instance that he borrowed from him.

When "The Battle of the Huns" was performed in Vienna in 1875 the critic Hanslick was sorely vexed. He could not understand Liszt's direction to conductors: "The whole coloring should at first be continuously sombre, and all the instruments should sound in a spectral manner." Hanslick objected to the word "coloring" as applied to music. He argued that this coloring would be light or dark, according to the instrumentation; that no conductor could produce a spectral effect unless it were already in the music itself. Thus he, not Liszt, showed a lack of imagination. A matter-of-fact consideration can easily reduce a highly fantastical work to a series of commonplaces.

And Hanslick complained of drumsticks with sponge tips, cymbals struck with wooden drumsticks, the contrast of the choral for the organ with the "battle motive." Operatic effects, unworthy the dignity of a concert hall! Fortunately for his peace of mind, Hanslick died before he was obliged to know ultra-modern systems of harmony, the strange use of familiar instruments, and endeavored to put Kaulbach's picture into music disconcerted him.

Yet the Viennese critic was right when he insisted that the orchestral dress did not conceal poverty in invention, for although a spirited performance may give temporary worth to the Battle scene, and impressive ecclesiastical pomp to the treatment of the hymn "Crux fidelis," the symphonic poem as a whole is not broadly or nobly conceived. The picture of Kaulbach is a mural painting. Liszt's composition is as a garish fresco. The final section, however, when played as it was yesterday, cannot fail to excite an audience. The hearer might well shout with the frantic worshippers of Cybele: "I have eaten of the drum and drank of the cymbals."

Dr. Muck is as fortunate in his reading of Haydn and Mozart as in his interpretation of romantic contemporaries. Mozart said of music that "it should always sound." The symphony and the overture not only "sounded" yesterday; they were played with exquisite clarity; melodies were sung; the rhythm was irresistible; there was no attempt to give undue importance to formulas of the period or to unessential passages; there was no distressing attempt to reestablish an "archaic" spirit. And so there was no endeavor to make something new out of the "Egmont" overture; there was no impertinent "originality" in the reading. We remember Franz Wuellner leading this overture in Berlin many years ago, when to "make an effect" he broke the continuity of the first allegro for the sake of giving dramatic significance to the heavy recurring chords that are supposed by persons restless in their minds to portray the Duke of Alva.

Mme. Culp sang three songs from Schubert's "Lady of the Lake" series. With the exception of the "Ave Maria," this group was interesting chiefly by reason of the singer's admirable art. Schubert said that the first hearers were astonished at the devotion he had thrown into the "Hymn to the Blessed Virgin," and added that he never forced himself into devotion. Mme. Culp might say this of her devotion to art. The orchestration of the accompaniment of "Jaeger, Ruhe," is not beneficial to the melody.

Mme. Culp had already sung the songs from "Egmont" at a recital in Boston. Yesterday Beethoven's orchestral accompaniments, especially that of "Die Trommel geruehret," added greatly to the effect.

The singer's voice showed somewhat the strain of the season, for the upper tones were not quite so fresh as when she first sang here, but with the exception of certain tones that were hard in quality, the voice was a most sympathetic instrument, one to enchant the hearer by its richness and warmth. As before, her amazing management of breath, the beauty and significance of her phrasing, the aesthetic intelligence and taste, the womanly fervor, all worked their spell.

The program of the concerts next week will include Mahler's Symphony No. 5 and three pieces from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust."

BOSTON POST,

APRIL 19, 1913

FUTURE OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Major Higginson Tells of Aims and Endowment Plans

The third and last session of the third annual conference of the National Federation of Music Societies took place last evening under the auspices of the South End Music School in Pembroke street.

Major Henry L. Higginson was the principal speaker, and his speech was a delightful and informal tale of the inception and the development of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The subject developed from Mr. Higginson's complimenting the South End Music School orchestra and its director, Arthur Sheperd, on their excellent efforts. Mr. Higginson also referred warmly to the services of Mr. Clement Lenom as a member of the Symphony Orchestra and as the conductor of excellent performances by the chorus of the South End Music School.

SCHOOL ORCHESTRA PLAYS

There were also addresses by Robert A. Woods, D. Edward Burlingame Hill, David B. Manners, Mrs. Howard Mansfield, president of the National Federation of Music School Societies. The school orchestra played Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, the Prelude to Bizet's First "L'Arlessienne" suite, the waltz from Tschaikowsky's ballet, Dornroschen, which later, at the request of Mr. Higginson, was repeated, and Nicolai's Festival Overture. The chorus sang Mendelssohn's "O Wert Thou in the Cauld, Cauld Blast," an excerpt from Massenet's "[illegible] Magdaleine," Arthur Foote introduced Mr. Higginson, following a performance by the orchestra, saying: "There's one person in this room who knows more about orchestras than anyone else in the world, and he will say a few words to us on the subject."

Major Higginson described his early ambition to found a symphony orchestra for the good of the community. He said that the man who lived for himself and his individual interests only was a poor specimen of a citizen and a patriot, and that he had felt that Boston and America needed the pleasure and uplift which could be provided by a symphony orchestra of high rank. It was first necessary, after the financial vacuum that followed the Civil war, to make the large sum of money necessary for even the beginning of such an enterprise. The sum was finally accumulated. George Henschel, then at the height of his activities as a singer and musician, was engaged as conductor. There were three principal agreements that the men had to stand by, punctuality, presence at every rehearsal desired, no matter what number of rehearsals might prove to be necessary, and absolute obedience. "I happen to know," said Major Higginson later, "that Dr. Muck recently called 13 rehearsals for a single symphony."

At first 20 concerts were given each season. Then, at the request of Harvard University, six concerts were given each winter in Cambridge.

Ultimatum to Players

After three years the men of the orchestra resisted the demand that they give up playing outside engagements and devote themselves solely to the Boston Symphony performances. After a rehearsal one Friday afternoon Major Higginson went back of the stage, and said: "Gentlemen, I have made my proposal and you have refused it. I now withdraw that proposal." For the next three days a stream of players haunted the offices at State street, seeking re-engagement. They were re-engaged under the new condition—all save one foreign musician, who had been brought over at considerable expense, and given considerable headway. He was discharged.

After three years Henschel resigned.

"One night," said Mr. Higginson, "I sat at the opera in Vienna, and watched a black-haired man who was conducting a performance of Aida. His name, I was told, was Wilhelm Gericke." Mr. Higginson decided that he wanted Gericke in Boston. A friend made the proposal to Gericke at once, and returned with his answer, that he would come.

Later Mr. Higginson quoted a remark of Dr. Muck's: "Everybody knows that it is Gericke who made the Boston Symphony Orchestra." This was quite recently. Mr. Higginson wrote Gericke, telling him of the praise of his colleague, praise not always accorded one musician by another.

Gericke came to Major Higginson one day and said, "of course you know we haven't an orchestra, as yet," or words to that effect. Major Higginson asked him what he wanted, and Mr. Gericke said that he wanted some more men. He brought back a number of men with him from Europe the following season.

It was decided one day that the orchestra should play in New York. The hall was engaged, the concert advertised. Gericke came to Higginson one morning and said, "We can't go to New York."

"Why?"

"We're not ready to go."

"But already we've spent $1200. We do not want to throw that money away."

Gericke stuck to his guns. The orchestra could not yet play in the manner he desired. The project was abandoned and the $1200 went into the great beyond.

Major Higginson said that when he engaged a man he made him the master, and saw to it that he had full opportunity to carry out his ideas. "And so when a lady comes to me and wishes this or that thing played I tell her that the matter rests wholly with our conductor."

Gericke, spent with very hard labor, wished to rest. Nikisch followed him. He was a brilliant musician and thinker as well, a gifted conversationalist, a man of magnetism. His disposition was uneven and likewise his performances. Sometimes a wonderful performance was given, sometimes a performance which was not so wonderful, which, in fact, was rather careless. Nikisch became restive, got out of tune and departed.

Richter Breaks Contract

Hans Richter, the great German conductor, was engaged, a contract drawn up and signed. Richter, without any explanation or apology, broke his contract, which is in Major Higginson's desk today.

Emil Paur was head of the orchestra for a term, then Mr. Gericke returned for eight years, and constantly the standard of the orchestra and its performances grew higher. Then Gericke retired.

Dr. Muck came at first on a year's leave of absence, and at the very first concert made a sensation by laying down his baton, while the orchestra continued to play. This was considered a great compliment, and it served to give the players additional confidence in themselves. Dr. Muck obtained from the German Kaiser leave of absence for an additional year. Max Fiedler took his place, and filled it with excellent results for four years. Dr. Muck returned and brought with him an assistant conductor, for he realized the danger of illness or other passing incapacity, and so Otto Urack was given this post.

Deficits Reach $50,000

Major Higginson spoke very earnestly of his desire to have the Symphony Orchestra benefit all of the people. He then quoted some instructive figures. First, that each year there is a deficit at the end of the symphony season; that he had originally reckoned upon a deficit of $20,000 a season, but that there had been seasons when the deficit reached the figure of $50,000; that it was necessary, for the

BOSTON POST.

APRIL 19, 1913

MAHLER'S VAST WORK PLAYED

Symphony Performs His Tremendous Fifth

BY OLIN DOWNES

Gustav Mahler's fifth symphony in C minor was played for the second time in Boston yesterday afternoon at the 22d rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. The work was first heard here under Mr. Gericke's baton in 1906. Like the other vast symphonic works of Mahler, it has created intense discussion wherever it has been given, and it is considered one of Mahler's greatest achievements in the symphonic form.

We in Boston have heard too little of his music. The local Symphony audiences know of him only by the work played yesterday, and that work is anything but familiar, for in addition to its dimensions and the richness of its content, Mr. Gericke, when he conducted and edited it, sand-papered a good many of its salient characteristics away in the process. It may be said at once that the composer had every possible advantage yesterday afternoon. The performance was one of exceeding brilliancy. The audience gave the work a very enthusiastic reception. Dr. Muck was repeatedly recalled at the last, and, as has so often been the case this season, his men were finally obliged to rise and acknowledge the applause with him.

A Vast Rhapsody

This work is tremendous, not only in its dimensions—it took one hour and 10 minutes in performance—but in its thought. It is a vast rhapsody. Mahler himself objected to programmes. He preached a faith which he was hardly capable of carrying out. He believed that music, more capable of declaration and expression than speech, should either unaided, convince the hearer of its intent, or else fail in its purpose. Thus he sided neither with those who believe in music written after a stated programme, or with those who believe music to be an art in itself, which should not be saddled with other arts or ideas. Mahler confesses that as a rule he usually arrives at the place where the word is essential for the impregnation or the embodiment of his thought. For the last movement of his second symphoney, he said, he searched the literature of the world to find the expository word. This information, and much more, is furnished by the admirable notes in the Boston Symphony programme book. Mahler believes then in music with a programme, but within published explanation. He composes on lines sufficiently broad, and he deals, in this fifth symphony at least, with emotions sufficiently general and grandiose to justify his stand on a vexed question of esthetics.

Magnificent Modern Music

The first division of the fifth symphony is a dirge, an agonized lament, less for death, let us say, than for the struggles and the futility of existence. And this movement is nobly planned, and it includes some superb pages. The theme announced by the trumpet is a noble and puissant theme, which cannot always be said of certain complementary phrases which occur in the same movement. Behind the music there is always the idea which has maddened the composer until he has flung himself on music paper; but the calibre of the musical phrase is not always equivalent to the calibre of the musical thought which it seeks to represent. The breadth of the themes, the grandeur of spirit, is the motive power. Had the man composed less violently, we might not listen so respectfully to him. A superhuman will to create is so intense that inherently commonplace phrases take on some of its might and glory.

And, finally, there is the magnificent concluding section. Now the music has collected together, now it floods out, as water would burst through a dam, and how tumultuously and with what glory of counterpoint and instrumentation. These are surely among the most magnificent pages in modern music. And even when the work has been thinnest, there has always been felt the prevailing greatness of the vision. It is as though this movement, with its dark coloring, its vast broodings, its protesting agonies, loomed out over one's head, like great black clouds, like towering immensities of some Egyptian temple. It, too, seems aweful, and antique, in spite of its modernness of accent, in spite of its worst trait, the constantly swollen and noisy instrumentation.

Contrasts Lacking

It is not unjust to say that Mahler triumphs in spite of a somewhat impotent invention and in spite of orchestral coloring which essentially lacks distinctive contrasts. This despite some remarkably original passages. Consider the fantastic conclusion of the first movement. The orchestra is always swearing! It becomes very tiresome to the ear, but still one listens for everything very curiously, because it is apparent that the composer did not do this on account of a desire to shout or astonish; he uses his colossal, laboring orchestra because his thoughts are Cyclopean, because, if he only had it at his command, he would employ for the expression of his imperious will an instrument of twenty times the sonority of the great modern orchestra. He would have nothing else less than cosmos for his canvas.

The second division of the work corresponds to a scherzo. It has many passages in themselves thin and worse than ordinary, lacking at least the explanation which would undoubtedly be furnished by the programme which was the exclusive property of the composer. The opening of the scherzo is much more joyous than what has preceded, and there is a waltz theme with a Viennese swing. The middle section is more savage and introspective, and there are significant recitatives for solo instruments, punctuated by great chords from the full orchestra. The dance is resumed. Always it is as if some giant with his feet in the pit and his head in the galaxy had taken you by the scruff of the neck, bidding you take note of the millions of stars as he swung you around in the spaces of the universe. But the finest movement is the last, and noblest of all the music is the slow introduction. This is indeed Nirvana. The fugue that follows is immensely spirited, full of happiness and humor, and occasionally accumulating over colossal pedal points.

A Virtuoso Performance

Owing to the sudden and regrettable death of Heinrich Schuecker, the harpist, the important passages for the harp were played by Rudolph Nagel, the 'cellist, who also performed on the celesta. The solo trumpeter covered himself with glory in the performance of an extraordinarily difficult part, and other members of the band distinguished themselves in solo and ensemble passages. This was in fact a virtuoso performance of the highest order.

The work should be heard again, and soon. We do not believe at this time that it will remain for a great many years in the current orchestral repertoire. We do believe that such fearless and intrepid scaling of the heights of the air is one of the grandest auguries for the future of the musical art, for those who will take up the work thread laid down by a great man and continue to work and fight for righteousness sake.

JOURNAL—

APRIL 19, 1913.

Dead March Leads Symphony Concert

Dramatic Coincidence When Solemn Music and Death Notices Appear Simultaneously to Surprise Concert Patrons Thursday.

By E. F. Harkins.

With the utmost surprise the Symphony patrons yesterday found in the program a slip announcing the death of Heinrich Schuecker, the orchestra's solo harpist for more than twenty-five years, who succumbed to heart disease soon after the Cecilia concert was over Thursday night, and, by the most dramatic sort of coincidence, yesterday's concert began with the Dead March from Gustav Mahler's "Giant Symphony."

Mr. Schuecker, who was brought over from Vienna by Wilhelm Gericke, the first conductor to give the orchestra a national reputation, was among the Symphony players that assisted the Cecilia Society at Symphony Hall on Thursday. He complained of illness during the concert, was taken home in a carriage, and at 10.15, or only a quarter of an hour after the concert had ended, expired. A master of the harp, even when he first came to Boston, his death leaves a vacancy which it will be difficult to fill. Harpists trained for orchestral work are scarce, and the management is quite in the dark for the present so far as Mr. Schuecker's successor is concerned.

Mahler's colossal fifth symphony in C sharp minor is on the program this week for the first time in seven years. It is a work about whose intrinsic merits there has been vigorous discussion, pro and con, from the first. Mahler was a "born musician," as Julius Epstein said when he received him as a lad of 15 at the Vienna Conservatory, but Dr. Muck, who conducted the "Giant Symphony" yesterday with something like fraternal as well as artistic feeling, having once been associated with Mahler at Prague, has been quoted as saying that the composer was "great in small things." He wrote some beautiful minor works, but this symphony is not well proportioned, nor is the message always clear or to the point. The performance lasts an hour and a quarter, and there are some mighty efforts, as though it were a tone poem depicting titanic strife; but the most affecting parts are simple and lyric and suggestive of the music of the plain people. They might have sprung originally from the countryside or the dance hall.

Dr. Muck himself led the ovation the orchestra received for its splendid performance of the huge and difficult composition. The work was well worth reviving if only for the opportunity it gives the Symphony players to show their unrivaled technical proficiency and beauty of tone; but the symphony cannot be fairly judged after one or two hearings. Another performance before the season is over would enable the public to form a clearer idea of it. Yet perhaps this would appeal only to the minority.

The other numbers on this week's program are three pieces from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust"—the "Menuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps," "The Dance of the Sylphs" and the "Rakoczy March." Here was brilliant music, pure and bright as sunlight, and the performance was worthy of it.

Germaine Schnitzer, the young French pianist, will be the soloist next week, but the program has not yet been made up.

Operatic Concert

Monday night the Carlo Cartica Operatic Company, headed by Mme. May Keon, soprano, will make its first appearance in Boston in what might be called "An old-fashioned opera concert," at Steinert Hall. The singers, all of whom have won success in various opera houses, are May Keon, soprano; Carlo Cartica, tenor; Virginio Capelloni, barytone, and G. Gravina, bass. They will have the assistance of Pietro Vallino, pianist.

A talented young Polish violinist, Ignace Nowicki, will make his Boston debut on this occasion and will play Adamowski's "Bavacarolle" and Wieniawski's "Masurka, No. 2."

Mme. Nordica's Recital

At her only recital in Boston, which will take place in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon, Mme. Nordica will have the assistance of Romayne Simmons, pianist, Miss Hernandez, organist; Franklin Holding, violinist; Mr. J. Keller, 'cellist, G. Heim, trumpet; Liuos Rousseau, reader.

Mme. Nordica will sing Schubert's "An die Musik," Handel's "Let the Bright Seraphim," an aria from Puccini's "Mme. Butterfly," and also songs by Wakefield-Codman, Aronsky, Erich Wolf, Bleichman, Jensen and Schumann. With Mr. Rousseau she will take part in the performance of "La Ballade du Desespere," words by Henri Murger, music by Louis Bemberg.

TRANSCRIPT,

APRIL 19, 1913

ENDOWING THE SYMPHONY

Speaking informally and with unusual openness before the National Federation of Music Schools, Major Higginson made publicly known last evening a purpose that by much private report he has long cherished. He was recalling many memories of his work with the Symphony Orchestra. From its past he turned to its future. Each year there was still a recurring deficit in its receipts. Probably there always would be. If it was to continue in its present place among the orchestras of the world and at its present standards, it must be securely endowed. For its future maintenance, said Mr. Higginson in substance, "I must provide a million dollars in my will." For him to say that he must do a thing for the Symphony Orchestra, is to proceed forthwith to do it.

As open a secret as Major Higginson's purpose is the orchestra's future need. Obviously the annual deficit is now far less than it was in the years when he poured thirty and forty and fifty thousand dollars into its treasury. On the other hand, its expenditure steadily mounts. Conductors and players now receive higher salaries; composers and publishers exact larger and larger royalties; soloists of the first rank—and there should be no others at the Symphony Concerts—demand ampler and ampler fees. More significant still, the earning capacity of the orchestra is now virtually at its maximum. It cannot keep to its standards of preparation and give more concerts in a season than it now undertakes. It cannot prudently increase its scale of prices for its concerts at home or abroad. It can attract no larger audiences, since almost invariably, in large cities and small, they fill the hall. The presumption is that the revenues of the Symphony Orchestra will never, and can never, meet its expenditure, if it is to maintain the standards of personnel, repertory and performance that have made it what it is. To be secure in these, to be safeguarded against the ebb and flow of public favor, which may sometime overtake it, there is need of ample endowment.

So protecting the future of the orchestra, as Mr. Higginson clearly intends to do, he is less endowing it than its standards. He, as little as the Boston of the eighties that first knew it, dreamed that in thirty years it would rank as the foremost orchestra of the world and that it would gain this rank by the sheer virtue of its rising standards and the unswerving accomplishment of all that they implied. Its present rank is a great glory of the Symphony Orchestra. It is its greater glory that it has attained it by no wandering into tempting and factitious by-paths but by sincere and tireless striving and as sure and steady progress along the broad highway of artistic catholicity and of the utmost artistic achievement, be the toil and the reward, the reproach or the plaudits what they may. For the future Mr. Higginson is endowing this progress, these standards. He would make them his just memorial.

BOSTON POST,
APRIL 19, 1913

MAHLER'S VAST WORK PLAYED

Symphony Performs His Tremendous Fifth

BY OLIN DOWNES

Gustav Mahler's fifth symphony in C minor was played for the second time in Boston yesterday afternoon at the 22d rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. The work was first heard here under Mr. Gericke's baton in 1906. Like the other vast symphonic works of Mahler, it has created intense discussion wherever it has been given, and it is considered one of Mahler's greatest achievements in the symphonic form.

We in Boston have heard too little of his music. The local Symphony audiences know of him only by the work played yesterday, and that work is anything but familiar, for in addition to its dimensions and the richness of its content, Mr. Gericke, when he conducted and edited it, sand-papered a good many of its salient characteristics away in the process. It may be said at once that the composer had every possible advantage yesterday afternoon. The performance was one of exceeding brilliancy. The audience gave the work a very enthusiastic reception. Dr. Muck was repeatedly recalled at the last, and, as has so often been the case this season, his men were finally obliged to rise and acknowledge the applause with him.

A Vast Rhapsody

This work is tremendous, not only in its dimensions—it took one hour and 10 minutes in performance—but in its thought. It is a vast rhapsody. Mahler himself objected to programmes. He preached a faith which he was hardly capable of carrying out. He believed that music, more capable of declaration and expression than speech, should either unaided, convince the hearer of its intent, or else fail in its purpose. Thus he sided neither with those who believe in music written after a stated programme, or with those who believe music to be an art in itself, which should not be saddled with other arts or ideas. Mahler confesses that as a rule he usually arrives at the place where the word is essential for the impregnation or the embodiment of his thought. For the last movement of his second symphoney, he said, he searched the literature of the world to find the expository word. This information, and much more, is furnished by the admirable notes in the Boston Symphony programme book. Mahler believes then in music with a programme, but within published explanation. He composes on lines sufficiently broad, and he deals, in this fifth symphony at least, with emotions sufficiently general and grandiose to justify his stand on a vexed question of esthetics.

Magnificent Modern Music

The first division of the fifth symphony is a dirge, an agonized lament, less for death, let us say, than for the struggles and the futility of existence. And this movement is nobly planned, and it includes some superb pages. The theme announced by the trumpet is a noble and puissant theme, which cannot always be said of certain complementary phrases which occur in the same movement. Behind the music there is always the Idea which has maddened the composer until he has flung himself on music paper; but the calibre of the musical phrase is not always equivalent to the calibre of the musical thought which it seeks to represent. The breadth of the themes, the grandeur of spirit, is the motive power. Had the man composed less violently, we might not listen so respectfully to him. A superhuman will to create is so intense that inherently commonplace phrases take on some of its might and glory.

And, finally, there is the magnificent concluding section. Now the music has collected together, now it floods out, as water would burst through a dam, and how tumultuously and with what glory of counterpoint and instrumentation. These are surely among the most magnificent pages in modern music. And even when the work has been thinnest, there has always been felt the prevailing greatness of the vision. It is as though this movement, with its dark coloring, its vast broodings, its protesting agonies, loomed out over one's head, like great black clouds, like towering immensities of some Egyptian temple. It, too, seems aweful, and antique, in spite of its moderuness of accent, in spite of its worst trait, the constantly swollen and noisy instrumentation.

Contrasts Lacking

It is not unjust to say that Mahle triumphs in spite of a somewhat im potent invention and in spite of orches tral coloring which essentially lack distinctive contrasts. This despite som remarkably original passages. Con sider the fantastic conclusion of th first movement. The orchestra is al ways swearing? It becomes very tire some to the ear, but still one listens for everything very curiously, because it is apparent that the composer did not do this on account of a desire to shout or astonish; he uses his colossal, laboring orchestra because his thoughts are Cyclopean, because, if he only had it at his command, he would employ for the expression of his imperious will an instrument of twenty times the sonority of the great modern orchestra. He would have nothing else less than cosmos for his canvas.

The second division of the work corresponds to a scherzo. It has many passages in themselves thin and worse than ordinary, lacking at least the explanation which would undoubtedly be furnished by the programme which was the exclusive property of the composer. The opening of the scherzo is much more joyous than what has preceded, and there is a waltz theme with a Viennese swing. The middle section is more savage and introspective, and there are significant recitatives for solo instruments, punctuated by great chords from the full orchestra. The dance is resumed. Always it is as if some giant with his feet in the pit and his head in the galaxy had taken you by the scruff of the neck, bidding you take note of the millions of stars as he swung you around in the spaces of the universe. But the finest movement is the last, and noblest of all the music is the slow introduction. This is indeed Nirvana. The fugue that follows is immensely spirited, full of happiness and humor, and occasionally accumulating over colossal pedal points.

A Virtuoso Performance

Owing to the sudden and regrettable death of Heinrich Schuecker, the harpist, the important passages for the harp were played by Rudolph Nagel, the 'cellist, who also performed on the celesta. The solo trumpeter covered himself with glory in the performance of an extraordinarily difficult part, and other members of the band distinguished themselves in solo and ensemble passages. This was in fact a virtuoso performance of the highest order.

The work should be heard again, and soon. We do not believe at this time that it will remain for a great many years in the current orchestral repertoire. We do believe that such fearless and intrepid scaling of the heights of the air is one of the grandest auguries for the future of the musical art, for those who will take up the work thread laid down by a great man and continue to work and fight for righteousness sake.

JOURNAL—
APRIL 19, 1913.

Dead March Leads Symphony Concert

Dramatic Coincidence When Solemn Music and Death Notices Appear Simultaneously to Surprise Concert Patrons Thursday.

By E. F. Harkins.

With the utmost surprise the Symphony patrons yesterday found in the program a slip announcing the death of Heinrich Schuecker, the orchestra's solo harpist for more than twenty-five years, who succumbed to heart disease soon after the Cecilia concert was over Thursday night, and, by the most dramatic sort of coincidence, yesterday's concert began with the Dead March from Gustav Mahler's "Giant Symphony."

Mr. Schuecker, who was brought over from Vienna by Wilhelm Gericke, the first conductor to give the orchestra a national reputation; was among the Symphony players that assisted the Cecilia Society at Symphony Hall on Thursday. He complained of illness during the concert, was taken home in a carriage, and at 10.15, or only a quarter of an hour after the concert had ended, expired. A master of the harp, even when he first came to Boston, his death leaves a vacancy which it will be difficult to fill. Harpists trained for orchestral work are scarce, and the management is quite in the dark for the present so far as Mr. Schuecker's successor is concerned.

Mahler's colossal fifth symphony in C sharp minor is on the program this week for the first time in seven years. It is a work about whose intrinsic merits there has been vigorous discussion, pro and con, from the first. Mahler was a "born musician," as Julius Epstein said when he received him as a lad of 15 at the Vienna Conservatory, but Dr. Muck, who conducted the "Giant Symphony" yesterday with something like fraternal as well as artistic feeling, having once been associated with Mahler at Prague, has been quoted as saying that the composer was "great in small things." He wrote some beautiful minor works, but this symphony is not well proportioned, nor is the message always clear or to the point. The performance lasts an hour and a quarter, and there are some mighty efforts, as though it were a tone poem depicting titanic strife; but the most affecting parts are simple and lyric and suggestive of the music of the plain people. They might have sprung originally from the countryside or the dance hall.

Dr. Muck himself led the ovation the orchestra received for its splendid performance of the huge and difficult composition. The work was well worth reviving if only for the opportunity it gives the Symphony players to show their unrivaled technical proficiency and beauty of tone; but the symphony cannot be fairly judged after one or two hearings. Another performance before the season is over would enable the public to form a clearer idea of it. Yet perhaps this would appeal only to the minority.

The other numbers on this week's program are three pieces from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust"—the "Menuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps," "The Dance of the Sylphs" and the "Rakoczy March." Here was brilliant music, pure and bright as sunlight, and the performance was worthy of it.

Germaine Schnitzer, the young French pianist, will be the soloist next week, but the program has not yet been made up.

Operatic Concert

Monday night the Carlo Cartica Operatic Company, headed by Mme. May Keon, soprano, will make its first appearance in Boston in what might be called "An old-fashioned opera concert," at Steinert Hall. The singers, all of whom have won success in various opera houses, are May Keon, soprano; Carlo Cartica, tenor; Virginio Capelloni, barytone, and G. Gravina, bass. They will have the assistance of Pietro Vallino, pianist.

A talented young Polish violinist, Ignace Nowicki, will make his Boston debut on this occasion and will play Adamowski's "Bavacarolle" and Wieniawski's "Masurka, No. 2."

Mme. Nordica's Recital

At her only recital in Boston, which will take place in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon, Mme. Nordica will have the assistance of Romayne Simmons, pianist, Miss Hernandez, organist; Franklin Holding, violinist; Mr. J. Keller, 'cellist, G. Heim, trumpet; Liuos Rousseau, reader.

Mme. Nordica will sing Schubert's "An die Musik," Handel's "Let the Bright Seraphim," an aria from Puccini's "Mme. Butterfly," and also songs by Wakefield-Codman, Aronsky, Erich Wolf, Bleichman, Jensen and Schumann. With Mr. Rousseau she will take part in the performance of "La Ballade du Desespere," words by Henri Murger, music by Louis Bemberg.

TRANSCRIPT,
APRIL 19, 1913

ENDOWING THE SYMPHONY

Speaking informally and with unusual openness before the National Federation of Music Schools, Major Higginson made publicly known last evening a purpose that by much private report he has long cherished. He was recalling many memories of his work with the Symphony Orchestra. From its past he turned to its future. Each year there was still a recurring deficit in its receipts. Probably there always would be. If it was to continue in its present place among the orchestras of the world and at its present standards, it must be securely endowed. For its future maintenance, said Mr. Higginson in substance, "I must provide a million dollars in my will." For him to say that he must do a thing for the Symphony Orchestra, is to proceed forthwith to do it.

As open a secret as Major Higginson's purpose is the orchestra's future need. Obviously the annual deficit is now far less than it was in the years when he poured thirty and forty and fifty thousand dollars into its treasury. On the other hand, its expenditure steadily mounts. Conductors and players now receive higher salaries; composers and publishers exact larger and larger royalties; soloists of the first rank—and there should be no others at the Symphony Concerts—demand ampler and ampler fees. More significant still, the earning capacity of the orchestra is now virtually at its maximum. It cannot keep to its standards of preparation and give more concerts in a season than it now undertakes. It cannot prudently increase its scale of prices for its concerts at home or abroad. It can attract no larger audiences, since almost invariably, in large cities and small, they fill the hall. The presumption is that the revenues of the Symphony Orchestra will never, and can never, meet its expenditure, if it is to maintain the standards of personnel, repertory and performance that have made it what it is. To be secure in these, to be safeguarded against the ebb and flow of public favor, which may sometime overtake it, there is need of ample endowment.

So protecting the future of the orchestra, as Mr. Higginson clearly intends to do, he is less endowing it than its standards. He, as little as the Boston of the eighties that first knew it, dreamed that in thirty years it would rank as the foremost orchestra of the world and that it would gain this rank by the sheer virtue of its rising standards and the unswerving accomplishment of all that they implied. Its present rank is a great glory of the Symphony Orchestra. It is its greater glory that it has attained it by no wandering into tempting and factitious by-paths but by sincere and tireless striving and as sure and steady progress along the broad highway of artistic catholicity and of the utmost artistic achievement, be the toil and the reward, the reproach or the plaudits what they may. For the future Mr. Higginson is endowing this progress, these standards. He would make them his just memorial.

TRANSCRIPT,

, APRIL 19,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MAHLER'S MIGHTY AND MAGNIFICENT MUSIC

His Fifth Symphony for the First Time in Seven Years—A Performance in Which Orchestra and Conductor Surpassed Themselves—The Vastness of the Music in Design, Means, Passion and Power—An Epic Symphony Even in This Twentieth Century

YESTERDAY afternoon, the day of Mahler, long and strangely deferred, eagerly and curiously awaited, seemed at last to have come in the Symphony Concerts. The programme was forbidding. No soloist adorned it; beside Mahler's symphony in C-sharp minor, only the two familiar dances and the yet more familiar march from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" stood upon it. The day was the day before a spring holiday with spring winds and spring sunshine beckoning out of concert-rooms. Yet as usual the audience filled the hall and the barometer of the second balcony stood high. A strange symphony, a hard symphony, a symphony an hour and ten minutes long, daunted neither the elect of the parquet nor the itinerants of the gallery. From beginning to end of the symphony the audience listened alertly and raptly. Clearly it found Mahler's music itself more absorbing than even the record of his life and work in the programme-book. At the end of the first part of the symphony—for Mahler has divided it singularly—came a great burst of applause. Less followed the second part; but in the end the clapping swelled from every quarter of the hall—swelled and endured until Dr. Muck had twice acknowledged it; until he had called the orchestra to its feet; gone again and returned to it still standing. Applause so long and persistent the Symphony Concerts have not heard the season through. Maybe, it echoed to the Elysian Fields and to Mahler's ears, no longer awaiting just fame as a composer, but by many tokens of these recent years the world over, assured of it. Dr. Muck need not hesitate over other symphonies by Mahler in seasons to come. A responsive and seemingly an enthusiastic public awaits them.

Yet no small part of this applause belonged of right to the conductor and his orchestra. Some one in Germany has named this fifth symphony of Mahler—for no very obvious reason—the "Giant Symphony." The performance of it at least, if it is to be such a complete revelation and rise to such heights of power as did that of yesterday, is a gigantic task. The symphony continues for an hour and ten minutes in three parts, each twenty or twenty-five minutes long and in all that time, with the briefest pauses, Mahler is unsparing upon wrists, fingers and lips. He uses his orchestra in great tonal masses, sometimes driving and sustaining each instrument in it at the utmost of power. Or he uses the orchestral choirs and even single instruments in sharply etched and exacting detail. Ever he seeks endless diversity of tonal color and tonal force, and the men producing this tone must supplement out of themselves the notes and even the minute directions that he has written upon the engraved page. Never does he relax his demands upon them. This fifth symphony and all his symphonies are kaleidoscopic, endlessly shifting in tonal color and tonal adjustments, endlessly changeful of rhythm and march, superposing idea upon idea, mass upon mass. The music can be as stark and strong as a tonal skeleton. Then Mahler will clothe it in all the rich flesh of instrumental and harmonic dress and set the blood of rhythm coursing fierily through it. The men of the playing must be Mahlers in little; for he knew the technique of most of their instruments. The men of the Symphony Orchestra seemed such yesterday.

Upon the conductor falls the great task, the great achievement of all these things. He must wield these huge and glowing tonal masses and seem to wield them surely and freely. He must keep this intricate balance of tone, and sometimes in the fifth symphony there are forty parts, all "going" at once and "going" differently, all to be carried in the conductor's mind, all to be sedulously and instantaneously adjusted, not only according to his own ear and imagination, but according to the ceaseless and minute indications with which Mahler—practising conductor himself—has littered the score. The tonal coloring may shift almost in a single measure and the conductor's control over it must be instant and his imagination with it kaleidoscopic. Mahler liked to unfold a melody in its naked extent and stark intensity. It should speak for itself till his hearers rang with it. Of conductors he asks this imparting might. Or he clothes the melody in every richness he may wrap about it, and bids the conductor make frame and vesture seem as integral and unified as they were in his creating imagination. The conductor must "bring off" every vivid and subtle transition, every passage of a melody up and down and through the orchestra, every long unfolding or suddenly upspringing climax. The voice of the music is ceaselessly changing. Through all these means and processes, the conductor must grasp and reveal the vast and sweeping design of the symphony; the great floods of emotion that surge through it; the titantic feats of imagination achieving often as titanic expression. Very seldom does Mahler's music flag, far-flung as it is. The conductor may not flag even then. For he must hide or strengthen these weakening moments. All this Dr. Muck did yesterday. Body and spirit, mind and heart, imagination and emotion, commanding will, ordering intellect, ardent revelation he poured into the symphony. It lived in its

The fifth symphony of Mahler is a vast symphony. Rarest of traits in the music of these days of ours, he had vastness of imagination and vastness of power, and he used them unafraid. Consider for a moment the course of the music—the beginning in trumpet calls that cleave the air and drum beats that smite it. Here is a heroic funeral train in heroic lament. The voice of passionate woe beats against mighty clangors. The lament becomes a frenzy of grief. The music screams and shudders. The clangors become tumult; the tumult wild turmoil. The instrumental voices cut or gleam lurid out of the blackness of the tonal mass. The turmoil dies spent into mournful silence; the heroic train vanishes remote. Yet upon the air linger the accents of grief and woe, fierce, momentarily soothed, wildly breaking forth again. Yet one of them springs at the end the half repressed voice of a great hymn of mournful triumph. Mahler has imagined and written heroic tragedy in tones. The first part of the symphony is done.

The second part—scherzo—runs the gamut of comedy in tones. It releases itself in a burst of hectic music. Hot Vienna blood tingles in the rhythm; for a moment here and there it is the frank rhythm of the waltz. Viennese gayety shines out of the brightness of the harmonic and instrumental coloring. But not for long. Irony steals grimly into the gayety; melancholy dulls and stays the lively rhythm. The voice of the music turns sardonic; there are nervous, titillating pizzicati. The rhythms sway drunkenly. The music is as shifting as the moods of comedy. It runs into robust gayety; it expands gorgeously, passionately It falls away again into empty mirth. It muses pensively and mournfully. It bites ironically, screams out mockingly. Each mood is ardent. Hear the quintessence of the manifold and the bitter-sweet comedy of living the life of man. The second part of the symphony ends.

The third part begins in pure song. Harp and violins spin its filaments. They interweave themselves and coalesce; the song broadens and deepens; rises, falls, rises again; scales the heights, sounds the depths of the orchestra, suffuses the music through and through, turns to ethereal vapors and dies in its own beautiful exhalations upon the air. It is as though Mahler would drench this adagietto in the beauty of mellowed and aspiring tones. The quest is ardent; the attainment rich . . . The horns call as in a flash of light; the woodwinds gleam answer in brilliant fioritura; the strings kindle. The whole music, all the instruments, awake in elation, as though to sing the joy of living. They can hardly wait to release their voices. The pattern of their elation is like a racing tracery upon the air. Joy streams through the orchestra. It gasps in its joyous frenzy. Gathering all its forces the music bursts into a climax, tosses out of it, obeys mighty drum beats, soars in rushing strings; bears to the stars in multitudinous force the great hymn of triumph that tragedy could not still. Mahler has written an epic, almost, of elation. It is a giant symphony.

The vastness of this design, the vastness of these imaginings and emotions demand a like vastness of means and vastness of power in the wielding of them. As Mahler has achieved the design and released the passions, so he invents and commands the means. Recall those long-breathed, full-bodied, far-flung melodic ideas, writing themselves upon the ear, imagination and emotions, vivid and puissant in the mere statement of them. They are of a magnificently fruitful, confident, concentrated power. Recall the formal development that they undergo, and it is as magnificently certain and as magnificently free. Mahler clothes it in the richest and the most glowing harmonic dress, and upon it plays the endless lights and shadows of instrumental color. The fertility, the ease, the certainty, the rage, the mastery of it are as magnificent as the rest. And in these melodic ideas is as mighty propulsive power. Mahler drives them from the heights to the depths of the orchestra and back again. They tear their way through it; they part it by their own beauty, like the naked Istar before the warders of Hades; they cut as with the sudden cleaving of a great and sharpened axe; they uprear themselves in great climaxes, and they seem to do all these things in the magnificence of their own propulsive power.

Yet in all these transformations and all these marchings, these melodies still bear the great passions of tragedy, the manifold moods of comedy, the aspiring and concentrated beauty, the epic elation that Mahler would have them speak. They are the mighty and diversified voices of mighty and various emotions. Ardor, fervent ardor, wings them. The magnificent certainty of them gives them power. They melt all the glow of their vesture into themselves. They melt themselves into great fused masses of flooding tone. The emotion they give forth is as molten as themselves. They say that bystanders watching a flood of molten steel flowing from furnace and crucible, feel sometimes a nearly irresistible desire to plunge into it. Into Mahler's fifth symphony, which is like to such a molten, glowing flood, ear and imagination and emotion may so plunge, and come forth not only unscathed, but stimulated, uplifted, transported, as though they had bathed in the might and the magnificence of music and of passion. Till Mahler wrote—and possibly d'Indy—there have been no epic symphonies since Beethoven. H. T. P.

Major Higginson's Orchestral Memories

An Informal Talk About His Work with the Symphony

AT the general meeting of the National Federation of Music School Societies, yesterday in session here, Mr. Higginson made an informal address devoted largely to reminiscence of the founding and the progress of the Symphony Orchestra. At the end of the recounting of these memories, Mr. Higginson said an important word as to the future of the orchestra and the endowment that, it is an open secret, he purposes to leave for it. A summary of his intimate talk—for it was such rather than a formal address—follows herewith:

Major Higginson described his early ambition to found a symphony orchestra for the good of the community. He said that the man who lived for himself and his individual interests only was a poor specimen of a citizen and a patriot, and that he had felt that Boston and America needed the pleasure which could be provided by a symphony orchestra of high rank. It was first necessary, after the financial vacuum that followed the Civil War, to make the large sum of money necessary for even the beginning of such an enterprise. The sum was finally accumulated. Georg Henschel, then at the height of his activities as a singer and musician, was engaged as conductor. There were three principal agreements that the men had to stand by, punctuality, presence at every rehearsal desired, no matter what number of rehearsals might prove to be necessary, and absolute obedience. "I happen to know," said Major Higginson later, "that Dr. Muck recently called thirteen rehearsals for a single symphony."

At first there were twenty concerts each season. Then, at the request of Harvard University, six concerts were added each winter in Cambridge. After three years the men of the orchestra resisted the demand that they give up playing outside engagements and devote themselves solely to the work of the orchestra. After a rehearsal one Friday afternoon Major Higginson went back of the stage, and said: "Gentlemen, I have made my proposal and you have refused it. I now withdraw that proposal." For the next three days a stream of players haunted his offices at State street, seeking reëngagement. They were reëngaged under the new condition—all save one foreign musician, who had been brought over at considerable expense, and given considerable headway. He was discharged.

After three years Henschel resigned. "One night," said Mr. Higginson, "I sat at the opera in Vienna and watched a black-haired man who was conducting a performance of 'Aida.' His name, I was told, was Wilhelm Gericke." Mr. Higginson decided that he wanted Gericke in Boston. A friend made the proposal to Gericke at once, and returned with his answer, that he would come. Mr. Higginson quoted a recent remark of Dr. Muck: "Everybody knows that it is Gericke who made the Boston Symphony Orchestra." Such praise one conductor does not often bestow upon another.

Gericke came to Major Higginson one day and said: "Of course you know we haven't an orchestra yet." Mr. Higginson asked him what he wanted, and Mr. Gericke said that he wanted some more men. He brought back a number of men with him from Europe the following season. It was decided one day that the orchestra should play in New York. The hall was engaged, the concert advertised. Gericke came to Mr. Higginson one morning, and said: "We can't go to New York." "Why?" "We're not ready to go." "But already we've spent $1200. We do not want to throw that money away." Gericke stuck to his guns. The orchestra could not yet play in the manner he desired. The project was abandoned and the $1200 with it. Major Higginson said that when he engaged a conductor he made him the master, and saw to it that he had full opportunity to carry out his ideas. "And so when a lady comes to me and wishes this or that thing played I tell her that the matter rests wholly with our conductor."

Gericke, spent with very hard labor, wished to rest. Nikisch followed him. He was a brilliant musician and thinker as well, a gifted conversationalist, a man of magnetism. His disposition was uneven and likewise his performances. Sometimes a wonderful performance resulted, sometimes a performance which was not so wonderful, which, in fact, was rather careless. Nikisch became restive, got out of tune and departed.

Richter, the great German conductor, was engaged to succeed him. A contract was drawn up and signed. Richter, without any explanation or apology, broke his contract, which is in Major Higginson's desk today. Emil Paur was head of the orchestra for a term, then Mr. Gericke returned for eight years, and constantly the standard of the orchestra and its performances grew higher. Then Gericke retired. Dr. Muck came at first on a year's leave of absence and at the very first concert made a sensation by laying down his baton, while the orchestra continued to play. This was considered a great compliment, and it served to give the players additional confidence in themselves. Dr. Muck obtained from the German Emperor leave of absence for an additional year. Max Fielder took his place, and filled it with excellent results for four years. Dr. Muck returned and brought with him an assistant conductor for he realized the danger of illness or other passing incapacity and so Otto Urack was given this post.

Major Higginson spoke very earnestly of his desire to have the Symphony Orchestra benefit all the people. He then quoted some instructive figures. First, that each year there is a deficit at the end of the season; that he had originally reckoned upon a deficit of $20,000 a season, but that there had been seasons when the deficit reached the figure of $50,000; that it was necessary, for the maintenance of the orchestra, that Major Higginson procide the sum of $1,000,000 for its maintenance in his will. "Soon I shall be leaving," said Mr. Higginson, [illegible]

ADVERTISER,

APRIL 19,

MAHLER'S FIFTH SYMPHONY GIVEN

BOSTON HEARS WORK IN ITS ENTIRETY

Previous Offerings of This Great Work Have Been Abridged—So Novelty Was Well Appreciated.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Mahler. Symphony in C-sharp minor, No. 5.
Berlioz. Three selections from "The Damnation of Faust."

That looks rather brief to the eye, but when we remember that the first movement of the Mahler symphony alone occupied nearly half-an-hour it will be seen that the auditors did not get short measure,—they got, as almost always, quite the contrary. The concert was purely orchestral and heavily so. Mahler's symphony has not been heard in Boston for lo these many years. It was Gericke who introduced this large work to us for the first and only time, and even he made cuts in it, so that yesterday Boston heard it, in its entirety, for the first time.

We are growing in orchestral toleration each year, and what seemed to us inadmissible seven years ago becomes quite natural after all that we have endured since. But there is one point upon which we have not changed our opinion in the least degree. As Richard Strauss had given himself entirely to programme-music, Mahler, to emphasize his difference from his contemporary, never gave any objective meaning to his orchestral works. But as he is intensely dramatic in almost every phrase, the result is that we get programme music without any programme attached.

Niecks defines all pictorial music as programme-music, but we dissent from this and believe that programme music is instrumental music, which, by its name, explanations upon the programme, or elucidations, written in the music, presents a definite picture, or portrays definite objects. Now when absolute music (which is supposed to do none of these things) gives us a funeral march, and then suddenly grows wild and stormy and vehement, when we hear mysterious, tiptoeing passages suddenly interrupted by fierce explosions, when we have joy, sorrow, wrath, ferocity, tranquility, and other emotions jostling each other in quick succession, one has a right to ask, with Southey's little Peterkin,—

> "Now tell us what 'twas all about."

Absolute music, or pure music, is not built upon this plan. Yet the symphony in its thematic treatment has the logic which belongs to this school, and Mahler's themes are not so ugly or repellant, nor his progressions so vague as is the case in much modern music. But his thematic material is not as great as his skill in treating it.

The symphony starts with tremendous power, and the funeral march is lofty in the highest degree. It may even stand beside the funeral touches of Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," or Beethoven's Heroic symphony. This came with peculiar fitness, for every one, both on the platform and off of it, was thinking of our dead harp player—Heinrich Schuecker. Dr. Muck read this with the loftiest power imaginable, and the men had evidently rehearsed the work thoroughly and were imbued with some enthusiasm. There was brilliant work for the solo trumpet (some of the fanfares reminded of Mendelssohn's wedding march), and Mr. Kloepfel, who played this wonderfully seven years ago, proved that his lips had not lost their cunning.

There were passages of considerable direct beauty following the Dead March, and even melodious sixth progressions were strongly in evidence in an enticing theme. Usually your truly modern composer would rather harmonize a melody in consecutive sevenths than sixths, if he deigned to use a melody at all.

But this gentle mood was but transitory. Our symphonist at once cried Havoc and let slip the dogs of War! Tumult and combat, what Shakespeare would have labelled "Alarums and Excursions," began to convulse the orchestra, and the auditor began to cling to his seat lest he be blown away.

But before this there came a very beautiful melody upon the violoncello. It was a pity that this was only a prelude to much that was fragmentary. The alternate roarings and whisperings of the orchestra were, to say the least, mystifying; such a theatrical demonstration cannot masquerade as "absolute music," it needs a detailed plot and explanation. But one could at least enjoy the skill that was displayed; there was plenty of canon and other kinds of counterpoint, and finally some grand chorale-like effects.

The scherzo which followed this very prolix first part was with two trios, but by no means possessed Schumann's beauty of treatment of this form. There were melodic themes ("For this relief much thanks!"), but they were treated with so much complexity that they lost much of their charm. Again there were the most theatrical contrasts and a degree of intensity that made the Scherzo a very earnest affair. There was a waltz rhythm which gave the idea that the dancers were subject to severe rheumatic twinges. Then came a pensive episode in which the horn was beautifully prominent and excellently played. In the last movement there came a clear, intelligible, and delightful adagietto. An inspiring melody upon the violins was tenderly played and then appeared in augmentation upon the violoncellos. Here was something tangible, something that could be understood without a "programme," really "absolute music" at last.

TRANSCRIPT,

, APRIL 19,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MAHLER'S MIGHTY AND MAGNIFICENT MUSIC

His Fifth Symphony for the First Time in Seven Years—A Performance in Which Orchestra and Conductor Surpassed Themselves—The Vastness of the Music in Design, Means, Passion and Power—An Epic Symphony Even in This Twentieth Century

YESTERDAY afternoon, the day of Mahler, long and strangely deferred, eagerly and curiously awaited, seemed at last to have come in the Symphony Concerts. The programme was forbidding. No soloist adorned it; beside Mahler's symphony in C-sharp minor, only the two familiar dances and the yet more familiar march from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" stood upon it. The day was the day before a spring holiday with spring winds and spring sunshine beckoning out of concert-rooms. Yet as usual the audience filled the hall and the barometer of the second balcony stood high. A strange symphony, a hard symphony, a symphony an hour and ten minutes long, daunted neither the elect of the parquet nor the itinerants of the gallery. From beginning to end of the symphony the audience listened alertly and raptly. Clearly it found Mahler's music itself more absorbing than even the record of his life and work in the programme-book. At the end of the first part of the symphony—for Mahler has divided it singularly—came a great burst of applause. Less followed the second part; but in the end the clapping swelled from every quarter of the hall—swelled and endured until Dr. Muck had twice acknowledged it; until he had called the orchestra to its feet; gone again and returned to it still standing. Applause so long and persistent the Symphony Concerts have not heard the season through. Maybe, it echoed to the Elysian Fields and to Mahler's ears, no longer awaiting just fame as a composer, but by many tokens of these recent years the world over, assured of it. Dr. Muck need not hesitate over other symphonies by Mahler in seasons to come. A responsive and seemingly an enthusiastic public awaits them.

Yet no small part of this applause belonged of right to the conductor and his orchestra. Some one in Germany has named this fifth symphony of Mahler—for no very obvious reason—the "Giant Symphony." The performance of it at least, if it is to be such a complete revelation and rise to such heights of power as did that of yesterday, is a gigantic task. The symphony continues for an hour and ten minutes in three parts, each twenty or twenty-five minutes long and in all that time, with the briefest pauses, Mahler is unsparing upon wrists, fingers and lips. He uses his orchestra in great tonal masses, sometimes driving and sustaining each instrument in it at the utmost of power. Or he uses the orchestral choirs and even single instruments in sharply etched and exacting detail. Ever he seeks endless diversity of tonal color and tonal force, and the men producing this tone must supplement out of themselves the notes and even the minute directions that he has written upon the engraved page. Never does he relax his demands upon them. This fifth symphony and all his symphonies are kaleidoscopic, endlessly shifting in tonal color and tonal adjustments, endlessly changeful of rhythm and march, superposing idea upon idea, mass upon mass. The music can be as stark and strong as a tonal skeleton. Then Mahler will clothe it in all the rich flesh of instrumental and harmonic dress and set the blood of rhythm coursing fierily through it. The men of the playing must be Mahlers in little; for he knew the technique of most of their instruments. The men of the Symphony Orchestra seemed such yesterday.

Upon the conductor falls the great task, the great achievement of all these things. He must wield these huge and glowing tonal masses and seem to wield them surely and freely. He must keep this intricate balance of tone, and sometimes in the fifth symphony there are forty parts, all "going" at once and "going" differently, all to be carried in the conductor's mind, all to be sedulously and instantaneously adjusted, not only according to his own ear and imagination, but according to the ceaseless and minute indications with which Mahler—practising conductor himself—has littered the score. The tonal coloring may shift almost in a single measure and the conductor's control over it must be instant and his imagination with it kaleidoscopic. Mahler liked to unfold a melody in its naked extent and stark intensity. It should speak for itself till his hearers rang with it. Of conductors he asks this imparting might. Or he clothes the melody in every richness he may wrap about it, and bids the conductor make frame and vesture seem as integral and unified as they were in his creating imagination. The conductor must "bring off" every vivid and subtle transition, every passage of a melody up and down and through the orchestra, every long unfolding or suddenly upspringing climax. The voice of the music is ceaselessly changing. Through all these means and processes, the conductor must grasp and reveal the vast and sweeping design of the symphony; the great floods of emotion that surge through it; the titantic feats of imagination achieving often as titanic expression. Very seldom does Mahler's music flag, far-flung as it is. The conductor may not flag even then. For he must hide or strengthen these weakening moments. All this Dr. Muck did yesterday. Body and spirit, mind and heart, imagination and emotion, commanding will, ordering intellect, ardent revelation he poured into the symphony. It lived in its

The fifth symphony of Mahler is a vast symphony. Rarest of traits in the music of these days of ours, he had vastness of imagination and vastness of power, and he used them unafraid. Consider for a moment the course of the music—the beginning in trumpet calls that cleave the air and drum beats that smite it. Here is a heroic funeral train in heroic lament. The voice of passionate woe beats against mighty clangors. The lament becomes a frenzy of grief. The music screams and shudders. The clangors become tumult; the tumult wild turmoil. The instrumental voices cut or gleam lurid out of the blackness of the tonal mass. The turmoil dies spent into mournful silence; the heroic train vanishes remote. Yet upon the air linger the accents of grief and woe, fierce, momentarily soothed, wildly breaking forth again. Yet one of them springs at the end the half repressed voice of a great hymn of mournful triumph. Mahler has imagined and written heroic tragedy in tones. The first part of the symphony is done.

The second part—scherzo—runs the gamut of comedy in tones. It releases itself in a burst of hectic music. Hot Vienna blood tingles in the rhythm; for a moment here and there it is the frank rhythm of the waltz. Viennese gayety shines out of the brightness of the harmonic and instrumental coloring. But not for long. Irony steals grimly into the gayety; melancholy dulls and stays the lively rhythm. The voice of the music turns sardonic; there are nervous, titillating pizzicati. The rhythms sway drunkenly. The music is as shifting as the moods of comedy. It runs into robust gayety; it expands gorgeously, passionately It falls away again into empty mirth. It muses pensively and mournfully. It bites ironically, screams out mockingly. Each mood is ardent. Hear the quintessence of the manifold and the bitter-sweet comedy of living the life of man. The second part of the symphony ends.

The third part begins in pure song. Harp and violins spin its filaments. They interweave themselves and coalesce; the song broadens and deepens; rises, falls, rises again; scales the heights, sounds the depths of the orchestra, suffuses the music through and through, turns to ethereal vapors and dies in its own beautiful exhalations upon the air. It is as though Mahler would drench this adagietto in the beauty of mellowed and aspiring tones. The quest is ardent; the attainment rich . . . The horns call as in a flash of light; the woodwinds gleam answer in brilliant fioritura; the strings kindle. The whole music, all the instruments, awake in elation, as though to sing the joy of living. They can hardly wait to release their voices. The pattern of their elation is like a racing tracery upon the air. Joy streams through the orchestra. It gasps in its joyous frenzy. Gathering all its forces the music bursts into a climax, tosses out of it, obeys mighty drum beats, soars in rushing strings; bears to the stars in multitudinous force the great hymn of triumph that tragedy could not still. Mahler has written an epic, almost, of elation. It is a giant symphony.

The vastness of this design, the vastness of these imaginings and emotions demand a like vastness of means and vastness of power in the wielding of them. As Mahler has achieved the design and released the passions, so he invents and commands the means. Recall those long-breathed, full-bodied, far-flung melodic ideas, writing themselves upon the ear, imagination and emotions, vivid and puissant in the mere statement of them. They are of a magnificently fruitful, confident, concentrated power. Recall the formal development that they undergo, and it is as magnificently certain and as magnificently free. Mahler clothes it in the richest and the most glowing harmonic dress, and upon it plays the endless lights and shadows of instrumental color. The fertility, the ease, the certainty, the rage, the mastery of it are as magnificent as the rest. And in these melodic ideas is as mighty propulsive power. Mahler drives them from the heights to the depths of the orchestra and back again. They tear their way through it; they part it by their own beauty, like the naked Istar before the warders of Hades; they cut as with the sudden cleaving of a great and sharpened axe; they uprear themselves in great climaxes, and they seem to do all these things in the magnificence of their own propulsive power.

Yet in all these transformations and all these marchings, these melodies still bear the great passions of tragedy, the manifold moods of comedy, the aspiring and concentrated beauty, the epic elation that Mahler would have them speak. They are the mighty and diversified voices of mighty and various emotions. Ardor, fervent ardor, wings them. The magnificent certainty of them gives them power. They melt all the glow of their vesture into themselves. They melt themselves into great fused masses of flooding tone. The emotion they give forth is as molten as themselves. They say that bystanders watching a flood of molten steel flowing from furnace and crucible, feel sometimes a nearly irresistible desire to plunge into it. Into Mahler's fifth symphony, which is like to such a molten, glowing flood, ear and imagination and emotion may so plunge, and come forth not only unscathed, but stimulated, uplifted, transported, as though they had bathed in the might and the magnificence of music and of passion. Till Mahler wrote—and possibly d'Indy—there have been no epic symphonies since Beethoven.

H. T. P.

[203]

Major Higginson's Orchestral Memories

An Informal Talk About His Work with the Symphony

AT the general meeting of the National Federation of Music School Societies, yesterday in session here, Mr. Higginson made an informal address devoted largely to reminiscence of the founding and the progress of the Symphony Orchestra. At the end of the recounting of these memories, Mr. Higginson said an important word as to the future of the orchestra and the endowment that, it is an open secret, he purposes to leave for it. A summary of his intimate talk—for it was such rather than a formal address—follows herewith:

Major Higginson described his early ambition to found a symphony orchestra for the good of the community. He said that the man who lived for himself and his individual interests only was a poor specimen of a citizen and a patriot, and that he had felt that Boston and America needed the pleasure which could be provided by a symphony orchestra of high rank. It was first necessary, after the financial vacuum that followed the Civil War, to make the large sum of money necessary for even the beginning of such an enterprise. The sum was finally accumulated. Georg Henschel, then at the height of his activities as a singer and musician, was engaged as conductor. There were three principal agreements that the men had to stand by, punctuality, presence at every rehearsal desired, no matter what number of rehearsals might prove to be necessary, and absolute obedience. "I happen to know," said Major Higginson later, "that Dr. Muck recently called thirteen rehearsals for a single symphony."

At first there were twenty concerts each season. Then, at the request of Harvard University, six concerts were added each winter in Cambridge. After three years the men of the orchestra resisted the demand that they give up playing outside engagements and devote themselves solely to the work of the orchestra. After a rehearsal one Friday afternoon Major Higginson went back of the stage, and said: "Gentlemen, I have made my proposal and you have refused it. I now withdraw that proposal." For the next three days a stream of players haunted his offices at State street, seeking reëngagement. They were reëngaged under the new condition—all save one foreign musician, who had been brought over at considerable expense, and given considerable headway. He was discharged.

After three years Henschel resigned. "One night," said Mr. Higginson, "I sat at the opera in Vienna and watched a black-haired man who was conducting a performance of 'Aida.' His name, I was told, was Wilhelm Gericke." Mr. Higginson decided that he wanted Gericke in Boston. A friend made the proposal to Gericke at once, and returned with his answer, that he would come. Mr. Higginson quoted a recent remark of Dr. Muck: "Everybody knows that it is Gericke who made the Boston Symphony Orchestra." Such praise one conductor does not often bestow upon another.

Gericke came to Major Higginson one day and said: "Of course you know we haven't an orchestra yet." Mr. Higginson asked him what he wanted, and Mr. Gericke said that he wanted some more men. He brought back a number of men with him from Europe the following season. It was decided one day that the orchestra should play in New York. The hall was engaged, the concert advertised. Gericke came to Mr. Higginson one morning, and said: "We can't go to New York." "Why?" "We're not ready to go." "But already we've spent $1200. We do not want to throw that money away." Gericke stuck to his guns. The orchestra could not yet play in the manner he desired. The project was abandoned and the $1200 with it. Major Higginson said that when he engaged a conductor he made him the master, and saw to it that he had full opportunity to carry out his ideas. "And so when a lady comes to me and wishes this or that thing played I tell her that the matter rests wholly with our conductor."

Gericke, spent with very hard labor, wished to rest. Nikisch followed him. He was a brilliant musician and thinker as well, a gifted conversationalist, a man of magnetism. His disposition was uneven and likewise his performances. Sometimes a wonderful performance resulted, sometimes a performance which was not so wonderful, which, in fact, was rather careless. Nikisch became restive, got out of tune and departed.

Richter, the great German conductor, was engaged to succeed him. A contract was drawn up and signed. Richter, without any explanation or apology, broke his contract, which is in Major Higginson's desk today. Emil Paur was head of the orchestra for a term, then Mr. Gericke returned for eight years, and constantly the standard of the orchestra and its performances grew higher. Then Gericke retired. Dr. Muck came at first on a year's leave of absence and at the very first concert made a sensation by laying down his baton, while the orchestra continued to play. This was considered a great compliment, and it served to give the players additional confidence in themselves. Dr. Muck obtained from the German Emperor leave of absence for an additional year. Max Fielder took his place, and filled it with excellent results for four years. Dr. Muck returned and brought with him an assistant conductor for he realized the danger of illness or other passing incapacity and so Otto Urack was given this post.

Major Higginson spoke very earnestly of his desire to have the Symphony Orchestra benefit all the people. He then quoted some instructive figures. First, that each year there is a deficit at the end of the season; that he had originally reckoned upon a deficit of $20,000 a season, but that there had been seasons when the deficit reached the figure of $50,000; that it was necessary, for the maintenance of the orchestra, that Major Higginson procide the sum of $1,000,000 for its maintenance in his will. "Soon I shall be leaving," said Mr. Higginson, [illegible] some younger man will see to it [illegible] orchestra maintains its standard [illegible]

ADVERTISER,

APRIL 19,

MAHLER'S FIFTH SYMPHONY GIVEN

BOSTON HEARS WORK IN ITS ENTIRETY

Previous Offerings of This Great Work Have Been Abridged—So Novelty Was Well Appreciated.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Mahler. Symphony in C-sharp minor, No. 5.
Berlioz. Three selections from "The Damnation of Faust."

That looks rather brief to the eye, but when we remember that the first movement of the Mahler symphony alone occupied nearly half-an-hour it will be seen that the auditors did not get short measure,—they got, as almost always, quite the contrary. The concert was purely orchestral and heavily so. Mahler's symphony has not been heard in Boston for lo these many years. It was Gericke who introduced this large work to us for the first and only time, and even he made cuts in it, so that yesterday Boston heard it, in its entirety, for the first time.

We are growing in orchestral toleration each year, and what seemed to us inadmissible seven years ago becomes quite natural after all that we have endured since. But there is one point upon which we have not changed our opinion in the least degree. As Richard Strauss had given himself entirely to programme-music, Mahler, to emphasize his difference from his contemporary, never gave any objective meaning to his orchestral works. But as he is intensely dramatic in almost every phrase, the result is that we get programme music without any programme attached.

Niecks defines all pictorial music as programme-music, but we dissent from this and believe that programme music is instrumental music, which, by its name, explanations upon the programme, or elucidations written in the music, presents a definite picture or portrays definite objects. Now when absolute music (which is supposed to do none of these things) gives us a funeral march, and then suddenly grows wild and stormy and vehement, when we hear mysterious, tiptoeing passages suddenly interrupted by fierce explosions, when we have joy, sorrow, wrath, ferocity, tranquility, and other emotions jostling each other in quick succession, one has a right to ask, with Southey's little Peterkin,—

> "Now tell us what 'twas all about."

Absolute music, or pure music, is not built upon this plan. Yet the symphony in its thematic treatment has the logic which belongs to this school, and Mahler's themes are not so ugly or repellant, nor his progressions so vague as is the case in much modern music. But his thematic material is not as great as his skill in treating it.

The symphony starts with tremendous power, and the funeral march is lofty in the highest degree. It may even stand beside the funeral touches of Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," or Beethoven's Heroic symphony. This came with peculiar fitness, for every one, both on the platform and off of it, was thinking of our dead harp player—Heinrich Schuecker. Dr. Muck read this with the loftiest power imaginable, and the men had evidently rehearsed the work thoroughly and were imbued with some enthusiasm. There was brilliant work for the solo trumpet (some of the fanfares reminded of Mendelssohn's wedding march), and Mr. Kloepfel, who played this wonderfully seven years ago, proved that his lips had not lost their cunning.

There were passages of considerable direct beauty following the Dead March, and even melodious sixth progressions were strongly in evidence in an enticing theme. Usually your truly modern composer would rather harmonize a melody in consecutive sevenths than sixths, if he deigned to use a melody at all.

But this gentle mood was but transitory. Our symphonist at once cried Havoc and let slip the dogs of War! Tumult and combat, what Shakespeare would have labelled "Alarums and Excursions," began to convulse the orchestra, and the auditor began to cling to his seat lest he be blown away.

But before this there came a very beautiful melody upon the violoncello. It was a pity that this was only a prelude to much that was fragmentary. The alternate roarings and whisperings of the orchestra were, to say the least, mystifying; such a theatrical demonstration cannot masquerade as "absolute music," it needs a detailed plot and explanation. But one could at least enjoy the skill that was displayed; there was plenty of canon and other kinds of counterpoint, and finally some grand chorale-like effects.

The scherzo which followed this very prolix first part was with two trios, but by no means possessed Schumann's beauty of treatment of this form. There were melodic themes ("For this relief much thanks!"), but they were treated with so much complexity that they lost much of their charm. Again there were the most theatrical contrasts and a degree of intensity that made the Scherzo a very earnest affair. There was a waltz rhythm which gave the idea that the dancers were subject to severe rheumatic twinges. Then came a pensive episode in which the horn was beautifully prominent and excellently played. In the last movement there came a clear, intelligible, and delightful adagietto. An inspiring melody upon the violins was tenderly played and then appeared in augmentation upon the violoncellos. Here was something tangible, something that could be understood without a "programme," really "absolute music" at last.

The piano here was very discreetly played, by Mr. R. Nagel, and managed to substitute for the harp better than one would have expected. After this there came a great display of contrapuntal skill which was legitimate in such a finale and had a certain pastoral charm in the midst of all its complexities. There was some fugal work on the strings that became a fine climax to a work which is powerful in spite of its defects.

The performance was something that Dr. Muck and our orchestra may be very proud of. Such a work demands not only accuracy, good phrasing and perfect ensemble to win any success, but its theatrical contrasts demand an abandon that shall be as elastic as the swiftly changing emotions displayed. This it received yesterday afternoon. The great calamity which came so suddenly upon the orchestra, in the death of Heinrich Schuecker, did not make a very marked effect upon the performance. The harp was replaced by piano, and, in the heavy scoring, was not so greatly missed as in the Berlioz numbers, where the sweet harmonics (no one could play them like our lost harpist) were given as well as possible by Celesta, in the Dance of the Sylphs, but had not quite the tone color intended. The Mahler symphony was tremendously applauded.

From this culmination of the modern school of tone-coloring the concert went back to its beginning. Had there been ro Berlioz there might have been no Strauss and Mahler. The three selections from the troubles of the late Mr. Faust were in good contrast of delicacy, sweetness and ferocity. All three works were studies in orchestral "nuance" and the last gave a crescendo that was most impressive. Of course the contrast between the dancing of Sylphs and Will-o'-the Wisps and the marching out to war of the sanguinary Magyars was a very striking one, and one that appealed to Dr. Muck, to the orchestra and to the audience alike. The piccolo was splendidly played in the minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps, although the coda here was taken at unconscionable speed. The Sylph dance was the acme of delicacy, but the Rakoczy March was the glory of it all. It was exciting from start to finish, and the great crescendo with the bass drum strokes, was perfectly and thrillingly given, and the climax was triumph personified; it was a grand ending to a wonderful concert.

But the last three numbers impressed one fact upon us. Mahler was represented by a work of great dignity and of well-sustained power, but there was more originality, more thematic material in any one of the short Berlioz pieces than in the first two parts of the great symphony. Only in the finale was Mahler great in subject matter and in its treatment, and here the contrapuntal work done with a powerful, seven-noted (sometimes four-noted) figure was logical, coherent, masterly. The Mahler work shrivels up Lendvai, and Debussy, and even Bischoff. We should like to hear it again.

TRAVELER HERALD,

APRIL 19,

MAHLER SYMPHONY FINELY PRESENTED

Dr. Muck Gives Great Work for First Time.

By FRANK BERTWALL.

With but two composers represented in this week's Symphony concert, the program at first glance had a rather slim appearance, but when one noted that Mahler's C-sharp minor symphony, which requires something like an hour and 20 minutes for its presentation, was one of the numbers, he realized that there was little room for anything else. The other selection was three pieces by Berlioz from the "Damnation of Faust."

The symphony was given yesterday afternoon for the first time at these concerts in its entirety. It's a mammoth work, often wonderful, at times mediocre. The company calls for the full strength of the orchestra and gives the impression at times that even this was not sufficient to fully express his thoughts. There are flashes in it that will compare with the finest music ever written, but there are also others that show the composer had grander thoughts than he was able to express. In keeping with Mahler's belief that music should speak for itself, there were no program notes, every one was left to his own interpretation of what the composer had in mind.

The symphony was superbly given. There was a finish, and, at the same time, freedom in its interpretation that was simply thrilling. It provided a fine demonstration of the high artistry of the players and well merited the enthusiastic appreciation shown by the audience. Owing to the sudden death of Heinrich Schuecker, harpist of the orchestra, the piano was substituted for the harp with Rudolph Nagel playing.

The Berlioz selections provided a delightful closing and was excellently given, Mr. Nagel playing the celesta in substitution for the harp.

Next week's program will include Beethoven's fourth symphony, Liszt's piano concerto in E flat major, Miss Germaine Schnitzer being the soloist, and other numbers to be announced later.

MONITOR.

APRIL 19,

MAHLER SYMPHONY PLAYED

Presenting the fifth symphony of Gustav Mahler as the principal number, the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor, rehearsed its twenty-second program in Symphony hall Friday afternoon to great applause. In association with the modern piece, was played music of Berlioz, the program being: Mahler, symphony in C sharp minor, No. 5; Berlioz, three pieces from "The Damnation of Faust": "Menuet of Will o' the Wisps," "Dance of the Sylphs," "Hungarian March" (Rakoczy).

The ordinary standards of symphony concert listening will not do when a work like this one of Mahler is on the program. For to begin with, the work far exceeds in tone volume the acoustic limits of the hall in which the Boston orchestra plays. A new standard of sound, therefore, has to be adopted at the outset. It would be beside the point to say that the symphony is too loud. Of course it is. It is meant to be heard in an auditorium of circus dimensions. And furthermore the work in its scheme of expression goes beyond the structure of the four-movement symphony which the nineteenth century composers, culminating in Richard Strauss, set up as the normal form. It would be irrelevant, therefore, to say of the work that it is too long, because it is fundamentally conceived on a double measure plan. To describe this twentieth century symphony as having too great sonority and as taking up more time in performance than a single orchestral number is expected to take, is only to affirm the success of the composer in carrying out his intentions.

This symphony implies festival conditions of listening. It should be played in an auditorium three or four times the size of Symphony hall. It should be played in a community that is stirred to its depths with musical enthusiasm.

Mahler the conductor must be forgotten by the American listener when Mahler the composer is in question. For among the many great European orchestral interpreters who ministered in theater and concert hall in the first decade of the century in the United States, Gustav Mahler did not make his place as the one best understanding the American heart and desire. He had not, perhaps, the necessary patient, pedagogical, humorously indulgent way that is necessary for artistic leadership in a country which purchases but does not produce music. The Mahler who endeavored to persuade a Boston audience with his baton, when directing the Philharmonic Society, in the "Fantastic Symphony" of Berlioz, at a concert in Symphony hall three years ago, is not to be confused with the Mahler who composed the symphony in C sharp minor, which Dr. Muck is presenting at the Symphony concerts this week. The question as to whether Mahler the composer had an understanding of American artistic habits of mind is out of order. The question rather to be answered is whether the American musical public is sufficiently up with the times to give due purchase appreciation to an orchestral work that northern Europe puts on the counter as its latest product.

Dr. Muck and his men performed the symphony with the greatest care. The most casual listener could not fail to observe that the rehearsing has been most painstaking. Of unusual interest was the trumpet playing of Mr. Kloepfel. But there was no detail of solo playing that was not done admirably. And the choir effects and the full orchestral effects were all brought out in the most magnificent manner.

The works to be presented at the twenty-third pair of concerts was not announced in the program book. The soloist was announced to be Miss Germaine Schnitzer, the pianist.

TRANSCRIPT,

APRIL 19,

NEWS OF MUSIC AND PLAYS

Mr. Schuecker and the Symphony Concerts —Mr. Nagel Meets an Emergency—A Lecture for the Drama League—Miss Farrar and Mr. Caruso Make Speeches—Items as They Pass

BY long service and the relatively isolated position in which a harp-player sits in an orchestra, the late Mr. Schuecker was a familiar figure to the audiences of the Symphony Concerts. He interested them, too, in another way. The years came and the years went; yet though they touched his hair lightly, they seemed to set no marks upon the youthfulness of his face. Frequenters of the concerts could easily reckon back to his twenty years and more of service with the orchestra; in cold calculation he must be, as indeed he was, well advanced in his forties; but time could not dull his freshness of aspect or his alertness of bearing. In both senses of the words Mr. Schuecker was a harpist of the first rank. He was a virtuoso of his instrument, though in recent years he has seldom played in public solo or displayful pieces upon it. He also understood thoroughly the place of the harp in orchestral ensemble, appreciating sensitively the quality of its tone in union or in contrast with other instruments, the telling strokes and entrances it had often to make; and the variety of tonal coloring and force of which, within its narrow range, it was capable. Not every virtuoso of the harp is an efficient—much less a distinguished—orchestral harpist, too. Mr. Schuecker was both. He died, too, as many a man may wish to die, in the prime of his powers and in the hour, almost, of the exercise of the profession he adorned.

Meeting an Emergency

The wholly unexpected death of Mr. Schuecker, on the eve of an important pair of concerts, which required a harp in both numbers of the programme, put the orchestra in an emergency from which the ingenuity of Dr. Muck and the readiness and skill of Mr. Nagel rescued it. Mahler uses a harp sparingly but essentially in two movements of his fifth symphony. Berlioz employs it very essentially in his "Dance of the Sylphs." For years, following a mistaken economy such as the orchestra seldom practises,, it has tried "to get along" with one harp, whereas, like almost every other band of its rank and necessities, it should have had two. No second harp stood ready to take Mr. Schuecker's place. None could be speedily found since harpists who are not members of the Musicians' Union and so available for the Symphony Concerts, are exceeding few. In the emergency, Dr. Muck substituted the timbres of the piano, which can be made to approximate those of the harp, in Mahler's symphony and the timbres of the celesta, which Berlioz would certainly have used had the instrument existed in his time, in the "Dance of the Sylphs. Mr. Nagel, at the shortest possible notice, undertook to play the harp parts upon the two instruments and played them with an exceeding skill and sensibility yesterday afternoon, as he will again tonight. Of such are the men in the Orchestra when emergency comes upon it. The moral is written large: the Symphony Orchestra needs imperatively two harps. Next autumn, in all probability, i[illegible] have them at last.

TRANSCRIPT,

APRIL 24,

A Wagner Commemoration After All

Once more the kaleidoscope has shifted and there is to be a commemoration of the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Wagner at the final pair of Symphony Concerts on May 2 and 3. Three of his operas have either an overture or a prelude that requires no harp: the overture to "Rienzi"; the prelude to "Tristan"; and the prelude to "Parsifal." They will fill the second part of the two concerts and they make a trilogy of the Wagner of the early years with "Rienzi"; of full maturity with "Tristan"; and of the last years with "Parsifal." Before them, for the first part of the programme, stands Brahms's symphony in C minor, the music in which seven years ago Boston discovered that Dr. Muck was a conductor of the first rank and that Brahms's music was one thing at his hands and another at the hands of all his predecessors. The juxtaposition of Brahms and Wagner, the two great and somewhat opposed German composers of the last half of the nineteenth century on a semi-commemorative programme for one of them is singular and interesting and the workings of Dr. Muck's mind in programme-making are almost as interesting and stimulating as his conducting itself. It is good, however, to find the Symphony Orchestra, as the foremost orchestra in America, bearing a part in the world-wide celebration of an exceptional anniversary.

From CITIZEN

Address: Brooklyn, N.Y.

Date APR 21 1913

Es 1884

$1,000,000 FOR MUSIC.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Cared For in Higginson Will.

BOSTON, April 21.—Major Henry L. Higginson has made the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he founded, a beneficiary in his will to the extent of $1,000,000 to perpetuate the organization.

This fortune will be held in trust, the income to meet the annual deficit which the Major seems to believe will occur with as much regularity after his demise as it does now.

"It is my desire," Major Higginson said, "to have the orchestra benefit all of the people. That was my early ambition in founding it. I believe that a man who lives for himself and his own individual interests is a poor speciman of a citizen and patriot. Each year there is a deficit at the end of the symphony season. Originally I had reckoned upon a deficit of $20,000 a season, but there have been seasons when the deficit reached $50,000.

From EVENING MAIL

Address: New York

Date APR 21 1913

Major Higginson, of Boston, has given a million dollars to perpetuate the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "I believe," the major says, "that a man who lives for himself and his own individual interests is a poor specimen of a citizen and patriot." But, major, suppose President Navin refuses to pay $15,000 a year? Does a man owe himself and his family nothing?

From TIMES

Address: New York.

Date APR 20 1913

k, 1884

ENDOWS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Major Higginson Intimates Intention to Will Orchestra $1,000,000.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, April 19.—While addressing the National Federation of Music Schools last night, Major Henry L. Higginson, founder and financial supporter of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, indicated his intention of providing a million dollars in his will for the future maintenance of the orchestra at its present high standard.

There always has been an annual deficit. The earning capacity of the orchestra is now at its maximum and the expenses are continually increasing.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE

Address: New York.

Date APR 22 1913

E 1884

$1,000,000 FOR SYMPHONY

Major Higginson to Perpetuate Boston Orchestra.

Boston, April 21.—To perpetuate the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he founded, Major Henry L. Higginson has decided it will be necessary for him to leave $1,000,000 in his will for the maintenance of the orchestra, in view of annual deficits. Major Higginson outlined his plans in a recent address.

"It is my desire," he said, "to have the Symphony Orchestra benefit all of the people. That was my early ambition in founding it, as I believe that a man who lives for himself and his own individual interests is a poor specimen of a citizen and patriot.

"Each year there is a deficit at the end of the Symphony season. Originally I had reckoned upon a deficit of $20,000 a season, but there have been seasons when the deficit reached $50,000."

From EVG. TELEGRAPH

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date APR 21 1913

Estab

ENDOWS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Major Higginson, Founder, Gives It $1,000,000 in His Will.

Boston, Mass., April 21.—Major Henry L. Higginson has made the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he founded, a beneficiary in his will to the extent of $1,000,000 to perpetuate the organization.

This fortune will be held in trust, the income to meet the annual deficit which the Major seems to believe will occur with as much regularity after his demise as it does now.

"It is my desire," Major Higginson said, "to have the orchestra benefit all of the people. That was my early ambition in founding it. I believe that a man who lives for himself and his own individual interests is a poor specimen of a citizen and patriot. Each year there is a deficit at the end of the symphony season. Originally I had reckoned upon a deficit of $20,000 a season, but there have been seasons when the deficit reached $50,000."

The piano here was very discreetly played, by Mr. R. Nagel, and managed to substitute for the harp better than one would have expected. After this there came a great display of contrapuntal skill which was legitimate in such a finale and had a certain pastoral charm in the midst of all its complexities. There was some fugal work on the strings that became a fine climax to a work which is powerful in spite of its defects.

The performance was something that Dr. Muck and our orchestra may be very proud of. Such a work demands not only accuracy, good phrasing and perfect ensemble to win any success, but its theatrical contrasts demand an abandon that shall be as elastic as the swiftly changing emotions displayed. This it received yesterday afternoon. The great calamity which came so suddenly upon the orchestra, in the death of Heinrich Schuecker, did not make a very marked effect upon the performance. The harp was replaced by piano, and, in the heavy scoring, was not so greatly missed as in the Berlioz numbers, where the sweet harmonics (no one could play them like our lost harpist) were given as well as possible by Celesta, in the Dance of the Sylphs, but had not quite the tone color intended. The Mahler symphony was tremendously applauded.

From this culmination of the modern school of tone-coloring the concert went back to its beginning. Had there been no Berlioz there might have been no Strauss and Mahler. The three selections from the troubles of the late Mr. Faust were in good contrast of delicacy, sweetness and ferocity. All three works were studies in orchestral "nuance" and the last gave a crescendo that was most impressive. Of course the contrast between the dancing of Sylphs and Will-o'-the Wisps and the marching out to war of the sanguinary Magyars was a very striking one, and one that appealed to Dr. Muck, to the orchestra and to the audience alike. The piccolo was splendidly played in the minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps, although the coda here was taken at unconscionable speed. The Sylph dance was the acme of delicacy, but the Rakoczy March was the glory of it all. It was exciting from start to finish, and the great crescendo with the bass drum strokes, was perfectly and thrillingly given, and the climax was triumph personified; it was a grand ending to a wonderful concert.

But the last three numbers impressed one fact upon us. Mahler was represented by a work of great dignity and of well-sustained power, but there was more originality, more thematic material in any one of the short Berlioz pieces than in the first two parts of the great symphony. Only in the finale was Mahler great in subject matter and in its treatment, and here the contrapuntal work done with a powerful, seven-noted (sometimes four-noted) figure was logical, coherent, masterly. The Mahler work shrivels up Lendvai, and Debussy, and even Bischoff. We should like to hear it again.

TRAVELER

HERALD,

APRIL 19,

MAHLER SYMPHONY FINELY PRESENTED

Dr. Muck Gives Great Work for First Time.

By FRANK BERTWALL.

With but two composers represented in this week's Symphony concert, the program at first glance had a rather slim appearance, but when one noted that Mahler's C-sharp minor symphony, which requires something like an hour and 20 minutes for its presentation, was one of the numbers, he realized that there was little room for anything else. The other selection was three pieces by Berlioz from the "Damnation of Faust."

The symphony was given yesterday afternoon for the first time at these concerts in its entirety. It's a mammoth work, often wonderful, at times mediocre. The company calls for the full strength of the orchestra and gives the impression at times that even this was not sufficient to fully express his thoughts. There are flashes in it that will compare with the finest music ever written, but there are also others that show the composer had grander thoughts than he was able to express. In keeping with Mahler's belief that music should speak for itself, there were no program notes, every one was left to his own interpretation of what the composer had in mind.

The symphony was superbly given. There was a finish, and, at the same time, freedom in its interpretation that was simply thrilling. It provided a fine demonstration of the high artistry of the players and well merited the enthusiastic appreciation shown by the audience. Owing to the sudden death of Heinrich Schuecker, harpist of the orchestra, the piano was substituted for the harp with Rudolph Nagel playing.

The Berlioz selections provided a delightful closing and was excellently given, Mr. Nagel playing the celesta in substitution for the harp.

Next week's program will include Beethoven's fourth symphony, Liszt's piano concerto in E flat major, Miss Germaine Schnitzer being the soloist, and other numbers to be announced later.

MONITOR,

APRIL 19,

MAHLER SYMPHONY PLAYED

Presenting the fifth symphony of Gustav Mahler as the principal number, the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor, rehearsed its twenty-second program in Symphony hall Friday afternoon to great applause. In association with the modern piece, was played music of Berlioz, the program being: Mahler, symphony in C sharp minor, No. 5; Berlioz, three pieces from "The Damnation of Faust": "Menuet of Will o' the Wisps," "Dance of the Sylphs," "Hungarian March" (Rakoczy).

The ordinary standards of symphony concert listening will not do when a work like this one of Mahler is on the program. For to begin with, the work far exceeds in tone volume the acoustic limits of the hall in which the Boston orchestra plays. A new standard of sound, therefore, has to be adopted at the outset. It would be beside the point to say that the symphony is too loud. Of course it is. It is meant to be heard in an auditorium of circus dimensions. And furthermore the work in its scheme of expression goes beyond the structure of the four-movement symphony which the nineteenth century composers, culminating in Richard Strauss, set up as the normal form. It would be irrelevant, therefore, to say of the work that it is too long, because it is fundamentally conceived on a double measure plan. To describe this twentieth century symphony as having too great sonority and as taking up more time in performance than a single orchestral number is expected to take, is only to affirm the success of the composer in carrying out his intentions.

This symphony implies festival conditions of listening. It should be played in an auditorium three or four times the size of Symphony hall. It should be played in a community that is stirred to its depths with musical enthusiasm.

Mahler the conductor must be forgotten by the American listener when Mahler the composer is in question. For among the many great European orchestral interpreters who ministered in theater and concert hall in the first decade of the century in the United States, Gustav Mahler did not make his place as the one best understanding the American heart and desire. He had not, perhaps, the necessary patient, pedagogical, humorously indulgent way that is necessary for artistic leadership in a country which purchases but does not produce music. The Mahler who endeavored to persuade a Boston audience with his baton, when directing the Philharmonic Society, in the "Fantastic Symphony" of Berlioz, at a concert in Symphony hall three years ago, is not to be confused with the Mahler who composed the symphony in C sharp minor, which Dr. Muck is presenting at the Symphony concerts this week. The question as to whether Mahler the composer had an understanding of American artistic habits of mind is out of order. The question rather to be answered is whether the American musical public is sufficiently up with the times to give due purchase appreciation to an orchestral work that northern Europe puts on the counter as its latest product.

Dr. Muck and his men performed the symphony with the greatest care. The most casual listener could not fail to observe that the rehearsing has been most painstaking. Of unusual interest was the trumpet playing of Mr. Kloepfel. But there was no detail of solo playing that was not done admirably. And the choir effects and the full orchestral effects were all brought out in the most magnificent manner.

The works to be presented at the twenty-third pair of concerts was not announced in the program book. The soloist was announced to be Miss Germaine Schnitzer, the pianist.

TRANSCRIPT,

APRIL 19,

NEWS OF MUSIC AND PLAYS

Mr. Schuecker and the Symphony Concerts —Mr. Nagel Meets an Emergency—A Lecture for the Drama League—Miss Farrar and Mr. Caruso Make Speeches—Items as They Pass

BY long service and the relatively isolated position in which a harp-player sits in an orchestra, the late Mr. Schuecker was a familiar figure to the audiences of the Symphony Concerts. He interested them, too, in another way. The years came and the years went; yet though they touched his hair lightly, they seemed to set no marks upon the youthfulness of his face. Frequenters of the concerts could easily reckon back to his twenty years and more of service with the orchestra; in cold calculation he must be, as indeed he was, well advanced in his forties; but time could not dull his freshness of aspect or his alertness of bearing. In both senses of the words Mr. Schuecker was a harpist of the first rank. He was a virtuoso of his instrument, though in recent years he has seldom played in public solo or displayful pieces upon it. He also understood thoroughly the place of the harp in orchestral ensemble, appreciating sensitively the quality of its tone in union or in contrast with other instruments, the telling strokes and entrances it had often to make; and the variety of tonal coloring and force of which, within its narrow range, it was capable. Not every virtuoso of the harp is an efficient—much less a distinguished—orchestral harpist, too. Mr. Schuecker was both. He died, too, as many a man may wish to die, in the prime of his powers and in the hour, almost, of the exercise of the profession he adorned.

Meeting an Emergency

The wholly unexpected death of Mr. Schuecker, on the eve of an important pair of concerts, which required a harp in both numbers of the programme, put the orchestra in an emergency from which the ingenuity of Dr. Muck and the readiness and skill of Mr. Nagel rescued it. Mahler uses a harp sparingly but essentially in two movements of his fifth symphony. Berlioz employs it very essentially in his "Dance of the Sylphs." For years, following a mistaken economy such as the orchestra seldom practises,, it has tried "to get along" with one harp, whereas, like almost every other band of its rank and necessities, it should have had two. No second harp stood ready to take Mr. Schuecker's place. None could be speedily found since harpists who are not members of the Musicians' Union and so available for the Symphony Concerts, are exceeding few. In the emergency, Dr. Muck substituted the timbres of the piano, which can be made to approximate those of the harp, in Mahler's symphony and the timbres of the celesta, which Berlioz would certainly have used had the instrument existed in his time, in the "Dance of the Sylphs. Mr. Nagel, at the shortest possible notice, undertook to play the harp parts upon the two instruments and played them with an exceeding skill and sensibility yesterday afternoon, as he will again tonight. Of such are the men in the Orchestra when emergency comes upon it. The moral is written large: the Symphony Orchestra needs imperatively two harps. Next autumn, in all probability, it [illegible] have them at last.

TRANSCRIPT,

APRIL 24,

A Wagner Commemoration After All

Once more the kaleidoscope has shifted and there is to be a commemoration of the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Wagner at the final pair of Symphony Concerts on May 2 and 3. Three of his operas have either an overture or a prelude that requires no harp: the overture to "Rienzi"; the prelude to "Tristan"; and the prelude to "Parsifal." They will fill the second part of the two concerts and they make a trilogy of the Wagner of the early years with "Rienzi"; of full maturity with "Tristan"; and of the last years with "Parsifal." Before them, for the first part of the programme, stands Brahms's symphony in C minor, the music in which seven years ago Boston discovered that Dr. Muck was a conductor of the first rank and that Brahms's music was one thing at his hands and another at the hands of all his predecessors. The juxtaposition of Brahms and Wagner, the two great and somewhat opposed German composers of the last half of the nineteenth century on a semi-commemorative programme for one of them is singular and interesting and the workings of Dr. Muck's mind in programme-making are almost as interesting and stimulating as his conducting itself. It is good, however, to find the Symphony Orchestra, as the foremost orchestra in America, bearing a part in the world-wide celebration of an exceptional anniversary.

From CITIZEN

Address: Brooklyn, N.Y.

Date APR 21 1913

$1,000,000 FOR MUSIC.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Cared For in Higginson Will.

BOSTON, April 21.—Major Henry L. Higginson has made the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he founded, a beneficiary in his will to the extent of $1,000,000 to perpetuate the organization.

This fortune will be held in trust, the income to meet the annual deficit which the Major seems to believe will occur with as much regularity after his demise as it does now.

"It is my desire," Major Higginson said; "to have the orchestra benefit all of the people. That was my early ambition in founding it. I believe that a man who lives for himself and his own individual interests is a poor speciman of a citizen and patriot. Each year there is a deficit at the end of the symphony season. Originally I had reckoned upon a deficit of $20,000 a season, but there have been seasons when the deficit reached $50,000.

From EVENING MAIL

Address: New York

Date

Major Higginson, of Boston, has given a million dollars to perpetuate the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "I believe," the major says, "that a man who lives for himself and his own individual interests is a poor specimen of a citizen and patriot." But, major, suppose President Navin refuses to pay $15,000 a year? Does a man owe himself and his family nothing?

From TIMES

Address: New York.

Date

ENDOWS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Major Higginson Intimates Intention to Will Orchestra $1,000,000.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, April 19.—While addressing the National Federation of Music Schools last night, Major Henry L. Higginson, founder and financial supporter of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, indicated his intention of providing a million dollars in his will for the future maintenance of the orchestra at its present high standard.

There always has been an annual deficit. The earning capacity of the orchestra is now at its maximum and the expenses are continually increasing.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE

Address: New York.

Date

$1,000,000 FOR SYMPHONY

Major Higginson to Perpetuate Boston Orchestra.

Boston, April 21.—To perpetuate the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he founded, Major Henry L. Higginson has decided it will be necessary for him to leave $1,000,000 in his will for the maintenance of the orchestra, in view of annual deficits. Major Higginson outlined his plans in a recent address.

"It is my desire," he said, "to have the Symphony Orchestra benefit all of the people. That was my early ambition in founding it, as I believe that a man who lives for himself and his own individual interests is a poor specimen of a citizen and patriot.

"Each year there is a deficit at the end of the Symphony season. Originally I had reckoned upon a deficit of $20,000 a season, but there have been seasons when the deficit reached $50,000."

From EVG. TELEGRAPH

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date APR 21 1913

ENDOWS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Major Higginson, Founder, Gives It $1,000,000 in His Will.

Boston, Mass., April 21.—Major Henry L. Higginson has made the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he founded, a beneficiary in his will to the extent of $1,000,000 to perpetuate the organization.

This fortune will be held in trust, the income to meet the annual deficit which the Major seems to believe will occur with as much regularity after his demise as it does now.

"It is my desire," Major Higginson said, "to have the orchestra benefit all of the people. That was my early ambition in founding it. I believe that a man who lives for himself and his own individual interests is a poor specimen of a citizen and patriot. Each year there is a deficit at the end of the symphony season. Originally I had reckoned upon a deficit of $20,000 a season, but there have been seasons when the deficit reached $50,000."

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York
Date APR 21 191

$1,000,000 FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Major Higginson, Founder, Endows It in His Will.

BOSTON, April 21.—Major Henry L. Higginson has made the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he founded, a beneficiary in his will to the extent of $1,000,000 to perpetuate the organization.

This fortune will be held in trust, the income to meet the annual deficit which the Major seems to believe will occur with as much regularity after his demise at it does now.

"It is my desire," Major Higginson said, "to have the orchestra benefit all of the people. That was my early ambition in founding it. I believe that a man who lives for himself and his own individual interests is a poor specimen of a citizen and patriot. Each year there is a deficit at the end of the symphony season. Originally I had reckoned upon a deficit of $20,000 a season, but there have been seasons when the deficit reached $50,000."

Es 884

the World

From SUN
Address: New York
Date APR 21 1913

$1,000,000 FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Major Higginson, Founder, Endows It in His Will.

BOSTON, April 20.—Major Henry L. Higginson has made the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he founded, a beneficiary in his will to the extent of $1,000,000 to perpetuate the organization.

This fortune will be held in trust, the income to meet the annual deficit which the Major seems to believe will occur with as much regularity after his demise at it does now.

"It is my desire," Major Higginson said, "to have the orchestra benefit all of the people. That was my early ambition in founding it. I believe that a man who lives for himself and his own individual interests is a poor specimen of a citizen and patriot. Each year there is a deficit at the end of the symphony season. Originally I had reckoned upon a deficit of $20,000 a season, but there have been seasons when the deficit reached $50,000."

Esta

and Most Complete per Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York
Date APR 21 191

WILL LEAVE $1,000,000 TO PERPETUATE ORCHESTRA

Boston, Mass., Monday.—In order that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he founded, shall be perpetuated after his death, Major Henry L. Higginson has decided that it will be necessary for him to leave $1,000,000 in his will for the maintenance of the orchestra, in view of annual deficits. In a recent address Major Higginson outlined some of the schemes for the future of the orchestra.

"It is my desire," Major Higginson said, "to have the Symphony Orchestra benefit all of the people. That was my early ambition in founding it, as I believe that a man who lives for himself and his own individual interests is a poor specimen of a citizen and patriot. Each year there is a deficit at the end of the symphony season. Originally I had reckoned upon a deficit of $20,000 a season, but there have been seasons when the deficit reached $50,000."

Esta 84

From CALL
Address: New York City
Date APR 21 19

BIG BOSTON ORCHESTRA BEQUEATHED A MILLION

BOSTON, April 20.—In order to perpetuate the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he founded, Maj. Henry L. Higginson, of this city, has made that organization a beneficiary in his will to the extent of $1,000,000.

This fortune will be held in trust, the income to be used to meet the annual deficits which the major seems to believe are bound to occur with as much regularity after his demise as they do now.

"It is my desire," Major Higginson said, "to have the orchestra benefit all of the people. That was my early ambition in founding it, as I believe that a man who lives for himself and his own in-

---

in the World

From ULLE
Address PHILADELPH
Date APR 21 1913

$1,000,000 BOSTON SYMPHONY

Major Higginson, ounder, Endows It in His Wi

Boston, Mass., April 21.—Ma Henry L. Higginson has made the Boston S phony Orchestra, which he founded, a beneficiary in his will to the extent of $1,000,000 to perpetuate the organization.

This fortune will be held in trust, the income to meet the annual deficit which the Major seems to believe will occur with as much regularity after his demise as it does now.

"It is my desire," Major Higginson said, "to have the orchestra benefit all of the people. That was my early ambition in founding it. I believe that a man who lives for himself and his own individual interests is a poor specimen of a citizen and patriot. Each year there is a deficit at the end of the symphony season. Originally I had reckoned upon a deficit o $20,000 a season, but there have been se sons when the deficit reached $50,000.

BOSTON HERALD.

APRIL 26, 1913.

23D SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Miss Germaine Schnitzer the Pianist at Afternoon Performance.

BACH WORK IN E FLAT GIVEN

Eloquent Execution of Beethoven Composition—Impressive Opening.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 23d public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted and Miss Germaine Schnitzer was the pianist. The program was as follows:

Symphony in B flat major, No. 4.....Beethoven
Symphony in E flat major, No. 2..C. P. E. Bach
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 1............Liszt
Overture to "The Sold Bride"........Smetana

Emanuel Bach's little symphony has not been played here since Dr. Muck brought it out for the first time five years ago this month. The three movements are closely connected. The first has a lively pomp that we are accustomed to associate with Handel. It shows the composer's independence of the contemporary formulas and there is a free use of the wind instruments. The allegretto has Mozartian grace, but the third is conventional and perfunctory. What Vincent d'Indy has said of Emanuel Bach's piano sonatas might be said of the better pages of this symphony: "If his melody is sometimes lacking in variety and distinction, the unforeseen in rhythm and harmony gives to his compositions a most particular flavor."

The performance of Beethoven's symphony was eloquent. The introduction was impressive, significant in its mood of anticipation. The famous cantilena of the second movement was sung with purity of expression. The nobility was preserved, whereas some conductors here fall into sentimentalism in the endeavor to be expressive. But the salient feature of the performance was the masterly reading of the Finale, strongly rhythmed, sparkling with life, finely proportioned.

Smetana's vivacious, chattering overture, charged with high spirits, was brilliantly played.

Miss Schnitzer has many excellent qualities as a pianist. When she first visited Boston she rioted in her technical proficiency. Her teacher, Raoul Pugno, played faster than any one we have heard, except possibly Eugen D'Albert and Mark Hambourg in their salad days, when they lacked judgment. Some still remember the mad race between Mr. Willy Hess, the violinist, and Mr. Pugno in Cesar Franck's violin sonata—of all pieces in the world! Their race might have been called "The Chase After Applause." At her recital here this season the admirers of Miss Schnitzer thought that she had matured in her art; that she had broadened her style; that she had acquired repose, and could be meditative and emotional when the music called for these moods.

Her performance yesterday was brilliant in technical display. It seemed as though Miss Schnitzer had said to herself: "Come now, I'll see if I cannot outstrip Pugno." Her performance was exciting, but the excessive speed did harm to Liszt's concerto, for too often the structural beauty was concealed. The concerto itself is defiant in its brilliance; there is the "panache" of the romanticists; there is a challenge to the old concerto formula. Over half a century old, the music is still intoxicating. But there is more in it than Miss Schnitzer revealed. There are passages of rare beauty, fleeting but exquisite measures of melodic ideas, sustained and tender melody; charming arabesques.

These were not fully brought out. The performance was one long, dazzling flash, the tour de force of a virtuoso. The poetical

[205]

ADVERTISER,

APRIL 26,

BEETHOVEN'S FOURTH SYMPHONY

JUDICIOUS READING OF MEDIOCRE WORK

Miss Germaine Schnitzer, Piano Soloist, Recipient of Spontaneous Outburst of Enthusiasm.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven—Fourth Symphony.
Ph. Emanuel Bach—Symphony in E flat.
Liszt—Piano Concerto in E flat.
Soloist—Miss Germaine Schnitzer.
Smetana—"The Bartered Bride" Overture.

We not only mourn over the death of Mr. Schuecker, but we are vividly reminded of the loss to Boston's music by the changes of programme made necessary by his decease. The two last programmes must be made up of such pieces as do not use the harp. A final, entirely Wagner, programme is made impossible. There are other harpists in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, and Boston, but these belong to the Musician's union, and we must remember that our orchestra is not affiliated with that organization. Any one of its members playing with the Boston Symphony orchestra would be heavily fined. It is probable that the successor to the position will come from abroad.

The absence of harp does not shut out any Beethoven score, for that composer only used the harp once, in some ballet-music connected with the little-played "Prometheus" numbers. By the time that Erard brought in his concert-harp, with double-acting pedals, in 1810, Beethoven was too deaf to venture any experiments with an instrument that he was not familiar with.

The fourth symphony has enough to say for itself, even with the small scoring which we call the "classical orchestra." It was radical enough to start the critics in full cry. Among other things there was the extension of the scherzo, by repeating its trio and its chief theme, after the regular form had been completed. We do not think that this mode of extension by repetition was a good idea, and we hope that some time a conductor will arise who will have the courage to cut out the repeats. Then there was the bold treatment of the contra-basses in the coda of the finale, at the very end. Never before had contra-basses played such violin-like passages. It was practically the liberation of this instrument from its single-note playing of a fundamental bass.

Weber attacked the work root and branch. He not only said, "Beethoven is now quite ready for the mad-house," but he wrote a satirical article in the "Cecilia," in which he pictured the contra-basses holding an indignation meeting and only desisting in terror when threatened with another symphony from the same pen. Poor Beethoven could only swear, in return, but his real answer was a still more difficult passage for the contra-basses in the fifth symphony. Our contra-basses not only took the passages at full speed but played them more clearly, probably, than Beethoven ever heard them.

The reading of the entire symphony was a well-balanced and judicious one. All the repeats were faithfully made. The horns played well in the trio of the scherzo, (although, by the way, Beethoven miscalled this a "minuet") and the finale was wonderfully read and played. Dr. Muck was twice recalled at the end of the work and the orchestra was made to rise. But for all that, if we were called upon to state which of Beethoven's symphonies we care for least, or which seems to have the least inspiration, we would unhesitatingly reply, "The Fourth!"

In a music dictionary in the possession of the present writer (the first one in the English language, 1724), there is this definition:—

> "Symphony, by which is to be understood airs, in two, three, or four parts, for instruments of any kind; or the instrumental parts of songs, operas, or concertos are so called."

That was before Haydn made the symphony an orchestral sonata. Bach's three part inventions were published as "symphonies." It was a symphony of the old type that followed the Beethoven work. Therefore it would be unjust to call this a concert with two symphonies. The Bach symphony was a delightful contrast, a bit of the serene old, melody, which we love to hear "in these most brisk and giddy-paced times."

The work was stronger than many a Mozart or Haydn selection that we have had, in spite of its old-fashioned repetitions. Of course the effects of the strings were somewhat magnified from the original meaning, but they were effective nevertheless. The trills which abounded in the string parts were especially striking and excellently played. The work was far less contrapuntal than one might have expected, and there was considerable unison playing in it.

It is about four years since Miss Germaine Schnitzer last played the Liszt E-flat concerto in Boston, at these same concerts. She was a brilliant artist then. She is still greater now. We do not object to the fact that Miss Schnitzer is, like history, repeating herself, for her exuberant style suits excellently to this dashing composition and the work itself is one that bears frequent hearing very well. It is genuine and sincere. Only the pedant will complain that it is rather free for a concerto, that it is a Hungarian rhapsodie in disguise. Let it be so; Liszt was very great in his Hungarian rhapsodies.

The prominent seven-noted figure is so constantly and variedly treated that Liszt was asked by an intention-finder what it really meant, whereupon the composer sang to its notes: "Das versteh't ihr alle nicht!"—"That you cannot understand!" If this work had no harp, it had a triangle, and it is possibly the only concerto piece in the world in which that humble and toneless instrument has a temporary solo.

We cannot imagine the work better interpreted than it was yesterday afternoon by Miss Schnitzer. There was abandon, fire, fury and triumph in her playing of it. There was technique without end, but also artistic insight. Hanslick once said that this work will be remembered when Liszt's vast church compositions are forgotten, and he may be right. It was an exciting performance from first to last, and the power displayed was most virile, if it be allowed to give that adjective to a female. The pianist was deservedly recalled over and over again with the most spontaneous and hearty enthusiasm. It was a triumph of which Miss Schnitzer may be very proud.

The concert ended with Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture. It is a work both melodic and contrapuntal, it exhibits both learning and spontaneity, and it was superbly performed. At first it seemed as if Dr. Muck took the chief theme too softly, but soon one saw that this was to give room for a sweeping crescendo. And seldom have we heard as inspiring a crescendo effect. The fugal work was very clear and well-balanced. The folk-song style was made the most of with appropriate heartiness, and all the spice that kettle-drums and piccolo are capable of was added to the dish. It was a very brilliant ending to a very brilliant concert which was more interesting in its second than in its first part.

JOURNAL

APRIL 26, 1913.

MISS SCHNITZER IS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Plays the Listz Concerto in E Flat and Makes Good Impression.

CLOSE OF SEASON COMES NEXT WEEK

Pop Concerts to Begin Monday Evening, May 5, With Larger Orchestra Than Ever.

Germaine Alice Schnitzer, the young Frenchwoman who won a first prize at the Paris Conservatory when she was only 14 years old, is the soloist at the Symphony concerts this week. There were four prize winners that year, but Miss Schnitzer is the only one of them who has become famous. She made her debut as a Symphony soloist four years ago. Yesterday she returned to play the Listz concerto in E flat, and, as before, she made a most favorable impression with her fluent, highly-polished technique and her artistic feeling.

The other numbers on this week's program are Beethoven's fourth symphony, Carl Philip Emanuel Bach's seldom heard symphony in E flat major and the overture to Smetana's "Sold Bride."

The final concerts of the season will be given next week. At the request of many of the patrons of the concerts Dr. Muck has decided to make his last program in commemoration of the centenary of Richard Wagner's birth. The death of Mr. Schuecker, the harpist of the orchestra, has compelled him to make certain changes in his plans, but the second half of the program will be devoted to Wagner. The Wagner numbers will be the "Rienzi" overture, the prelude to "Tristan and Isobel" and the prelude to "Parsifal." Dr. Muck points out these three works represent most significantly the beginning, the middle and the end of Wagner's creative career.

The symphony to lead the program will be Brahms's in C Minor, No. 1. When Dr. Muck came to Boston in the fall of 1906 it was his performance of this Symphony that first revealed him to the musical public here as one of the greatest conductors of the day. It has been asked for many times during the past winter.

Pops Open May 5

With the close of the Symphony season next Saturday night, Symphony Hall will undergo its annual spring transformation in preparation for the Pop concerts, which begin on the following Monday evening, May 5. The orchestra will be considerably larger than it has ever been. Instead of fifty-five men it will have sixty-six. Two new conductors will also appear. These are Otto Urack, assistant conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, and Mr. Clement Lenom. Mr. Maquarre, who has become a great favorite in the last few years, will have the larger share. Mr. Urack will be the conductor of the first three weeks.

Reservations are now being taken for tables and balcony seats for any part of the season. There will be the usual number of special college nights.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

... irst Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York
Date APR 21 191

$1,000,000 FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Major Higginson, Founder, Endows It in His Will.

BOSTON, April 21.—Major Henry L. Higginson has made the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he founded, a beneficiary in his will to the extent of $1,000,000 to perpetuate the organization.

This fortune will be held in trust, the income to meet the annual deficit which the Major seems to believe will occur with as much regularity after his demise at it does now.

"It is my desire," Major Higginson said, "to have the orchestra benefit all of the people. That was my early ambition in founding it. I believe that a man who lives for himself and his own individual interests is a poor specimen of a citizen and patriot. Each year there is a deficit at the end of the symphony season. Originally I had reckoned upon a deficit of $20,000 a season, but there have been seasons when the deficit reached $50,000."

... the World

From SUN
Address: New York
Date

$1,000,000 FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Major Higginson, Founder, Endows It in His Will.

BOSTON, April 20.—Major Henry L. Higginson has made the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he founded, a beneficiary in his will to the extent of $1,000,000 to perpetuate the organization.

This fortune will be held in trust, the income to meet the annual deficit which the Major seems to believe will occur with as much regularity after his demise at it does now.

"It is my desire," Major Higginson said, "to have the orchestra benefit all of the people. That was my early ambition in founding it. I believe that a man who lives for himself and his own individual interests is a poor specimen of a citizen and patriot. Each year there is a deficit at the end of the symphony season. Originally I had reckoned upon a deficit of $20,000 a season, but there have been seasons when the deficit reached $50,000."

... and Most Complete
... per Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York
Date

WILL LEAVE $1,000,000 TO PERPETUATE ORCHESTRA

BOSTON, Mass., Monday.—In order that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he founded, shall be perpetuated after his death, Major Henry L. Higginson has decided that it will be necessary for him to leave $1,000,000 in his will for the maintenance of the orchestra, in view of annual deficits. In a recent address Major Higginson outlined some of the schemes for the future of the orchestra.

"It is my desire," Major Higginson said, "to have the Symphony Orchestra benefit all of the people. That was my early ambition in founding it, as I believe that a man who lives for himself and his own individual interests is a poor specimen of a citizen and patriot. Each year there is a deficit at the end of the symphony season. Originally I had reckoned upon a deficit of $20,000 a season, but there have been seasons when the deficit reached $50,000."

CALL

From
Address: New York City
Date APR 21 19

BIG BOSTON ORCHESTRA BEQUEATHED A MILLION

BOSTON, April 20.—In order to perpetuate the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he founded, Maj. Henry L. Higginson, of this city, has made that organization a beneficiary in his will to the extent of $1,000,000.

This fortune will be held in trust, the income to be used to meet the annual deficits which the major seems to believe are bound to occur with as much regularity after his demise as they do now.

"It is my desire," Major Higginson said, "to have the orchestra benefit all of the people. That was my early ambition in founding it, as I believe that a man who lives for himself and his own individual

---

... Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Fr ULLET
Address PHILADELP
Date APR 21 1913

$1,000,000 ... R BOSTON SYMPHONY

Major Higginson, Founder, Endows It in His Will.

Boston, Mass., April 21.—Major Henry L. Higginson has made the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he founded, a beneficiary in his will to the extent of $1,000,000 to perpetuate the organization.

This fortune will be held in trust, the income to meet the annual deficit which the Major seems to believe will occur with as much regularity after his demise as it does now.

"It is my desire," Major Higginson said, "to have the orchestra benefit all of the people. That was my early ambition in founding it. I believe that a man who lives for himself and his own individual interests is a poor specimen of a citizen and patriot. Each year there is a deficit at the end of the symphony season. Originally I had reckoned upon a defict of $20,000 a season, but there have been seasons when the deficit reached $50,000.

BOSTON HERALD.

APRIL 26, 1913.

23D SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Miss Germaine Schnitzer the Pianist at Afternoon Performance.

BACH WORK IN E FLAT GIVEN

Eloquent Execution of Beethoven Composition—Impressive Opening.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 23d public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted and Miss Germaine Schnitzer was the pianist. The program was as follows:

Symphony in B flat major, No. 4.....Beethoven
Symphony in E flat major, No. 2..C. P. E. Bach
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 1............Liszt
Overture to "The Sold Bride"........Smetana

Emanuel Bach's little symphony has not been played here since Dr. Muck brought it out for the first time five years ago this month. The three movements are closely connected. The first has a lively pomp that we are accustomed to associate with Handel. It shows the composer's independence of the contemporary formulas and there is a free use of the wind instruments. The allegretto has Mozartian grace, but the third is conventional and perfunctory. What Vincent d'Indy has said of Emanuel Bach's piano sonatas might be said of the better pages of this symphony: "If his melody is sometimes lacking in variety and distinction, the unforeseen in rhythm and harmony gives to his compositions a most particular flavor."

The performance of Beethoven's symphony was eloquent. The introduction was impressive, significant in its mood of anticipation. The famous cantilena of the second movement was sung with purity of expression. The nobility was preserved, whereas some conductors here fall into sentimentalism in the endeavor to be expressive. But the salient feature of the performance was the masterly reading of the Finale, strongly rhythmed, sparkling with life, finely proportioned.

Smetana's vivacious, chattering overture, charged with high spirits, was brilliantly played.

Miss Schnitzer has many excellent qualities as a pianist. When she first visited Boston she rioted in her tachnical proficiency. Her teacher, Raoul Pugno, played faster than any one we have heard, except possibly Eugen D'Albert and Mark Hambourg in their salad days, when they lacked judgment. Some still remember the mad race between Mr. Willy Hess, the violinist, and Mr. Pugno in Cesar Franck's violin sonata—of all pieces in the world! Their race might have been called "The Chase After Applause." At her recital here this season the admirers of Miss Schnitzer thought that she had matured in her art; that she had broadened her style; that she had acquired repose, and could be meditative and emotional when the music called for these moods.

Her performance yesterday was brilliant in technical display. It seemed as though Miss Schnitzer had said to herself: "Come now, I'll see if I cannot outstrip Pugno." Her performance was exciting, but the excessive speed did harm to Listz's concerto, for too often the structural beauty was concealed. The concerto itself is defiant in its brilliance; there is the "panache" of the romanticists; there is a challenge to the old concerto formula. Over half a century old, the music is still intoxicating. But there is more in it than Miss Schnitzer revealed. There are passages of rare beauty, fleeting but exquisite measures of melodic ideas, sustained and tender melody; charming arabesques.

These were not fully brought out. The performance was one long, dazzling flash, the tour de force of a virtuoso. The poetical

[205]

ADVERTISER,

APR L 26.

BEETHOVEN'S FOURTH SYMPHONY

JUDICIOUS READING OF MEDIOCRE WORK

Miss Germaine Schnitzer, Piano Soloist, Recipient of Spontaneous Outburst of Enthusiasm.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.
Beethoven—Fourth Symphony.
Ph. Emanuel Bach—Symphony in E flat.
Liszt—Piano Concerto in E flat.
Soloist—Miss Germaine Schnitzer.
Smetana—"The Bartered Bride" Overture.

We not only mourn over the death of Mr. Schuecker, but we are vividly reminded of the loss to Boston's music by the changes of programme made necessary by his decease. The two last programmes must be made up of such pieces as do not use the harp. A final, entirely Wagner, programme is made impossible. There are other harpists in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, and Boston, but these belong to the Musician's union, and we must remember that our orchestra is not affiliated with that organization. Any one of its members playing with the Boston Symphony orchestra would be heavily fined. It is probable that the successor to the position will come from abroad.

The absence of harp does not shut out any Beethoven score, for that composer only used the harp once, in some ballet-music connected with the little-played "Prometheus" numbers. By the time that Erard brought in his concert-harp, with double-acting pedals, in 1810, Beethoven was too deaf to venture any experiments with an instrument that he was not familiar with.

The fourth symphony has enough to say for itself, even with the small scoring which we call the "classical orchestra." It was radical enough to start the critics in full cry. Among other things there was the extension of the scherzo, by repeating its trio and its chief theme, after the regular form had been completed. We do not think that this mode of extension by repetition was a good idea, and we hope that some time a conductor will arise who will have the courage to cut out the repeats. Then there was the bold treatment of the contra-basses in the coda of the finale, at the very end. Never before had contra-basses played such violin-like passages. It was practically the liberation of this instrument from its single-note playing of a fundamental bass.

Weber attacked the work root and branch. He not only said, "Beethoven is now quite ready for the mad-house," but he wrote a satirical article in the "Cecilia," in which he pictured the contra-basses holding an indignation meeting and only desisting in terror when threatened with another symphony from the same pen. Poor Beethoven could only swear, in return, but his real answer was a still more difficult passage for the contra-basses in the fifth symphony. Our contra-basses not only took the passages at full speed but played them more clearly, probably, than Beethoven ever heard them.

The reading of the entire symphony was a well-balanced and judicious one. All the repeats were faithfully made. The horns played well in the trio of the scherzo, (although, by the way, Beethoven miscalled this a "minuet") and the finale was wonderfully read and played. Dr. Muck was twice recalled at the end of the work and the orchestra was made to rise. But for all that, if we were called upon to state which of Beethoven's symphonies we care for least, or which seems to have the least inspiration, we would unhesitatingly reply, "The Fourth!"

In a music dictionary in the possession of the present writer (the first one in the English language, 1724), there is this definition:—

> "Symphony, by which is to be understood airs, in two, three, or four parts, for instruments of any kind; or the instrumental parts of songs, operas, or concertos are so called."

That was before Haydn made the symphony an orchestral sonata. Bach's three part inventions were published as "symphonies." It was a symphony of the old type that followed the Beethoven work. Therefore it would be unjust to call this a concert with two symphonies. The Bach symphony was a delightful contrast, a bit of the serene old, melody, which we love to hear "in these most brisk and giddy-paced times."

The work was stronger than many a Mozart or Haydn selection that we have had, in spite of its old-fashioned repetitions. Of course the effects of the strings were somewhat magnified from the original meaning, but they were effective nevertheless. The trills which abounded in the string parts were especially striking and excellently played. The work was far less contrapuntal than one might have expected, and there was considerable unison playing in it.

It is about four years since Miss Germaine Schnitzer last played the Liszt E-flat concerto in Boston, at these same concerts. She was a brilliant artist then. She is still greater now. We do not object to the fact that Miss Schnitzer is, like history, repeating herself, for her exuberant style suits excellently to this dashing composition and the work itself is one that bears frequent hearing very well. It is genuine and sincere. Only the pedant will complain that it is rather free for a concerto, that it is a Hungarian rhapsodie in disguise. Let it be so; Liszt was very great in his Hungarian rhapsodies.

The prominent seven-noted figure is so constantly and variedly treated that Liszt was asked by an intention-finder what it really meant, whereupon the composer sang to its notes: "Das versteh't ihr alle nicht!"—"That you cannot understand!" If this work had no harp, it had a triangle, and it is possibly the only concerto piece in the world in which that humble and toneless instrument has a temporary solo.

We cannot imagine the work better interpreted than it was yesterday afternoon by Miss Schnitzer. There was abandon, fire, fury and triumph in her playing of it. There was technique without end, but also artistic insight. Hanslick once said that this work will be remembered when Liszt's vast church compositions are forgotten, and he may be right. It was an exciting performance from first to last, and the power displayed was most virile, if it be allowed to give that adjective to a female. The pianist was deservedly recalled over and over again with the most spontaneous and hearty enthusiasm. It was a triumph of which Miss Schnitzer may be very proud.

The concert ended with Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture. It is a work both melodic and contrapuntal, it exhibits both learning and spontaneity, and it was superbly performed. At first it seemed as if Dr. Muck took the chief theme too softly, but soon one saw that this was to give room for a sweeping crescendo. And seldom have we heard as inspiring a crescendo effect. The fugal work was very clear and well-balanced. The folk-song style was made the most of with appropriate heartiness, and all the spice that kettle-drums and piccolo are capable of was added to the dish. It was a very brilliant ending to a very brilliant concert which was more interesting in its second than in its first part.

JOURNAL

APRIL 26, 1913.

MISS SCHNITZER IS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Plays the Listz Concerto in E Flat and Makes Good Impression.

CLOSE OF SEASON COMES NEXT WEEK

Pop Concerts to Begin Monday Evening, May 5, With Larger Orchestra Than Ever.

Germaine Alice Schnitzer, the young Frenchwoman who won a first prize at the Paris Conservatory when she was only 14 years old, is the soloist at the Symphony concerts this week. There were four prize winners that year, but Miss Schnitzer is the only one of them who has become famous. She made her debut as a Symphony soloist four years ago. Yesterday she returned to play the Listz concerto in E flat, and, as before, she made a most favorable impression with her fluent, highly-polished technique and her artistic feeling.

The other numbers on this week's program are Beethoven's fourth symphony, Carl Philip Emanuel Bach's seldom heard symphony in E flat major and the overture to Smetana's "Sold Bride."

The final concerts of the season will be given next week. At the request of many of the patrons of the concerts Dr. Muck has decided to make his last program in commemoration of the centenary of Richard Wagner's birth. The death of Mr. Schuecker, the harpist of the orchestra, has compelled him to make certain changes in his plans, but the second half of the program will be devoted to Wagner. The Wagner numbers will be the "Rienzi" overture, the prelude to "Tristan and Isobel" and the prelude to "Parsifal." Dr. Muck points out these three works represent most significantly the beginning, the middle and the end of Wagner's creative career.

The symphony to lead the program will be Brahms's in C Minor, No. 1. When Dr. Muck came to Boston in the fall of 1906 it was his performance of this Symphony that first revealed him to the musical public here as one of the greatest conductors of the day. It has been asked for many times during the past winter.

Pops Open May 5

With the close of the Symphony season next Saturday night, Symphony Hall will undergo its annual spring transformation in preparation for the Pop concerts, which begin on the following Monday evening, May 5. The orchestra will be considerably larger than it has ever been. Instead of fifty-five men it will have sixty-six. Two new conductors will also appear. These are Otto Urack, assistant conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, and Mr. Clement Lenom. Mr. Maquarre, who has become a great favorite in the last few years, will have the larger share. Mr. Urack will be the conductor of the first three weeks.

Reservations are now being taken for tables and balcony seats for any part of the season. There will be the usual number of special college nights.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

POST.

APRIL 26, 1913

Woman Electrifies Symphony Audience

Miss Schnitzer Gives Remarkable Demonstration of Virtuosity in Liszt's E Flat Concerto

BY OLIN DOWNES

Yesterday afternoon a Boston Symphony audience in Symphony Hall was treated to the legitimate pleasures of Dr. Muck's masterly interpretation of Beethoven's fourth symphony and the quite unhallowed joy which was consequent upon the performance of Liszt's E flat piano concerto by Miss Germaine Schnitzer. Miss Schnitner, a strong-looking young lady, with arms quite out of proportion to the Mme. Recamier gown which she had elected to wear, walked, or loped, upon the stage, and in the course of 15 or 20 minutes provided the patrons of these concerts with more sensations than they had experienced, probably, in as many months.

And this was one of the few occasions when a brutally overplayed composition received its due. Only one performance of the E flat concerto, out of the dozens which have been given in this city of late years, is to be ranked at all with the performance of yesterday afternoon. This was in 1906, the year in which Miss Shcnitzer first appeared in Boston, when Dr. Muck and Moritz Rosenthal, twin souls that they were, played the concerto together and electrified their audiences.

Overwhelms Audience

That sensation was, if anything, eclipsed by the effect of yesterday. Not on account of a finer interpretation, for in interpreting this concerto Mr. Rosenthal is surely without a peer. We speak rather of the tremendously contagious quality of Miss Schnitzer's playing. She is at the period in lif when emotions, sensations, are mos contagious. She is apparently a virtuoso by temperament as well as equipment—a virtuoso in the best and th most complete sense of the word. Mor than musicianship, more than technica equipment, or deep-seated sincerity, necessary for this. MacDowell sai that in every virtuoso there was something of the rope dancer. He coul have added, that in every great virtuos there is a flash of sheer creative geniu and the vital personal force whic makes an audience, whether it wills o no, the inspired accomplice of the performer. It is a sqark of this spir which has preserved the concerto itsel to us, and dictated one of the mos original themes in all music—the opening phase of mockery and defianc Lacking this quality on the part of th interpretive artist, the work is no heard at its full value. Fortunatel for her, Miss Schnitzer has at her disposal a technic which is entirely commensurate to the ordinate demand that she makes upon it. She has a excess if anything, of nervous energ and temperament. With Dr. Muck enthusiastic assistance, she simpl overwhelmed her auditors.

In Her 26th Year

Miss Schnitzer is now in her 26t year. Her present tour in the Unite States is her third. She is an Austria by birth, a pupil of Pugno and Sauer She first played in Chickering Hal Dec. 13, 1906, and at that time sh showed undisputable talent and individuality, although her performances the were uneven, and only indicative of th capacities for such a performance yesterday's. Nor did her performanc of this concerto at Boston Symphon concerts in 1909 leave any enduring in pression. Probably her performance will continue to be somewhat uneven their quality, for she appears to be u usually temperamental. A girl who 26 can give a performance of Liszt concerto such as she gave yesterday a girl to whom the future should mea very great things.

Dr. Much, sensitive as he is, adop an orchestral accompaniment wonde fully to the equipment and the inter tions of his soloists. The private rehea sal of Thursday morning had doubtle shown him whom he had to deal wit and to those acquainted with this co certo, it was evident from the first t measures of orchestral introduction th something unusual was to come. Bo conductor and soloist, apparently, we somewhat excited from the beginnin and there was a passage or two in t first part of the concerto which b trayed something of the tremor th came from tense nerves which had n yet received their relief through actio These moments were rather to be f than heard, although it is probable th the performance this evening will the better for a final adjustment of v ses.

High Tension for Finale

At any rate, the splendid old pie never seemed so stirring, so insti with all-compassing genius. The ly cal phrases were sung a little m languorously than usual, and sur in this the thought of the compos was fulfilled. Nothing more insidio than the crooning clarinet! The sl division of the concerto was less e grossing and organic than it mig have been, and this was surely on a count of the nervous tension and t suspense felt by both performers before that finale which Nor is there anything in music mo ingenious than the device, accursed Liszt's contemporaries, of the tappi of the triangle which ushers in t piquant passage that leads in turn the conclusion. It is the device of master virtuoso. It imparts the la nervous twinge necessary to stimul to their utmost sensibility the ner of an audience.

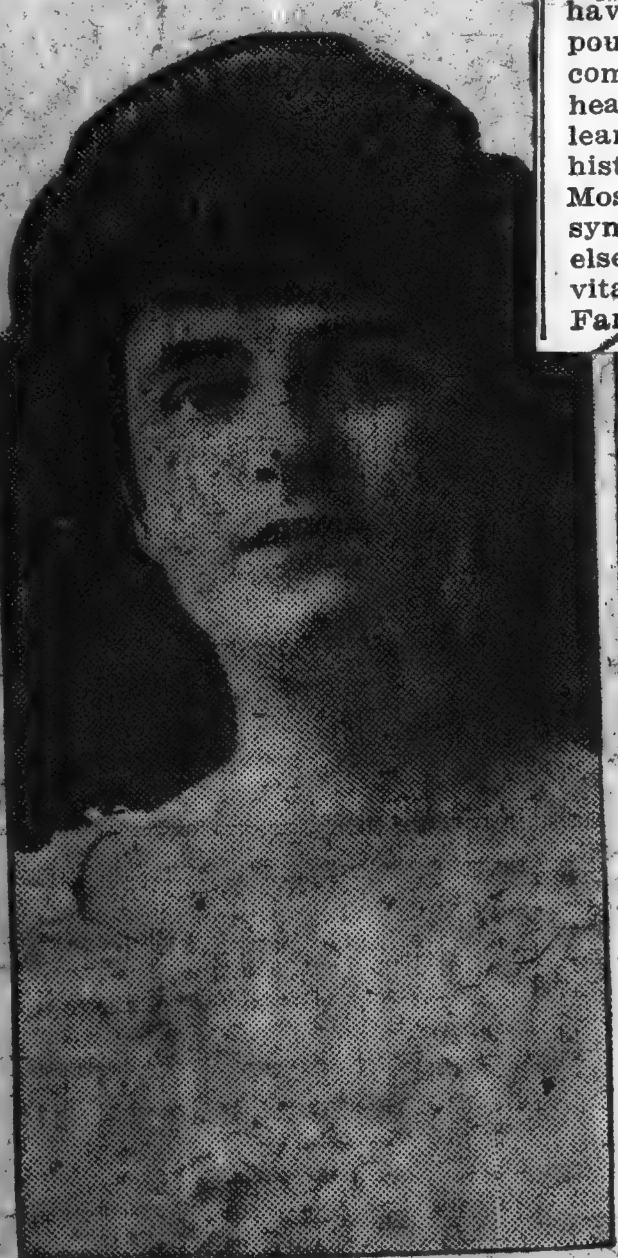
Played Like a Demon

From here on the performance w really incredible. The pace taken, ev so early, was alarming, because it w difficult to foresee how it would end. But Miss Schnitzer's technic w equal to the occasion, and Miss Schn zer played like a demon! And this the way the concerto ought to played; the way in which not th performers have been heard to play at least in many years, in this city.

Much of the effect was due to t orchestral accompaniment. Dr. Mu conducted as though his life hung the issue, and the way the orches flung out the devil-may-care mot which is the motto at once of the c certo and of the triumphal career Franz Liszt was something to reme ber for a long time and relish in memory. There can be few pleasu granted the soloist who performs w orchestra equal to the pleasure of pl ing with this conductor when he spects his artist. The other extre is another story.

The orchestra was a second sol in this performance, and it was an applauding band which shou "Bravo! bravo!" after each period the piano solo. It thundered on victory, and once more there was in the land, and none recked whether Liszt was as great Beethoven, or whether the appearance of a soloist, considered from the truly esthetic standpoint, should be tolerated in the midst of an orchestral programme, or of any of the other considerations which should afflict a serious symphony audience when partaking of spiritual nourishment. A young woman with the arms of a swimmer had appeared in a most incongruous Mme. Racamier gown, and had made an amazing sensation.



MISS GERMAINE SCHNITZER, Austrian pianist, who played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday.

Beethoven and Younger Bach

In the light of these enjoyments, it seems almost sacrilege to refer to Beethoven symphony and the symphony of Ph. E. Bach in any but the most distant and respectful terms. The fourth symphony is indeed a work of a colossal genius. It is one of the least of Beethoven's efforts in this form. It is as bucolic in its sentiment as the more famous pastoral symphony. It was providentially appropriate to the sunshine and the blue sky without. It was one of the few compositions which could hold up its head beneath that sky and that sunshine. Emmanuel Bach's symphony, as played yesterday, is heavily and objectionably overorchestrated. The counterpoint is not as richly woven as the counterpoint of Emmanuel Bach's celebrated predecessor of the same name, but it is too rich to be played by a full orchestra of the modern dimensions of the Boston Symphony. By consequence the entrance of a solo flute or clarinet [illegible] too light and insignificant

---

TRANSCRIPT,

APRIL 26, 1913

The Symphony Concert

An Afternoon of Exciting Virtuosity

By H. T. P.

To a Symphony Concert of rare and mighty music last week succeeded yesterday a Symphony Concert of rare and high viruosity. Three of the pieces that it served were familiar—Beethoven's fourth symphony, in B-flat; Smetana's overture to his opera, "The Bartered Bride," and Liszt's concerto for pianoforte in E-flat. All three pass for classics; all three, in spite of many repetitions, are presumed to be perennially interesting in their kind. They were so, at any rate, in the performance that they received yesterday. The fourth item of the programme, Emanuel Bach's little eighteenth-century symphony in E-flat, may have more interest historically than it has intrinsically, however perfect the playing of it. The piece came out of Hamburg in 1776 and Hamburg was a long way from the musical capitals of those days like Vienna and Paris. It made free, as the eighteenth-century idiom ran, with the academic symphonic forms of the time; for even so early in music form had become an orthodoxy. It anticipated curiously some of the ways and the moods of later symphonic writing. Emanuel Bach actually made his music move in contrasting masses in the mild eighteenth-century sense of that now formidable word. He had a "modern" feeling for the projected and telling phrase and for the coloring that the wood-wind choir may lend. There is a certain modern cut and contrast in some of his melodies while his music has a full and yet a light body, much more imaginative than the stately or striding pomps of Händel.

For this and many another reason, the historians and the pedagogues of music make much of the symphonies of Emanuel Bach. Had Dr. Muck been Mr. Damrosch—which, fortunately, he is not—he would have doubtless turned on his stand and expounded to the audience historically and comparatively the music it was about to hear. Instead, he left them and the learned "programmist" to establish their historical backgrounds for themselves. Most of them, accordingly, heard the little symphony for its own sake and nothing else, and it still has its pleasant little vitality and amiable little pungency. Fancy plays invitingly through it. The music runs in the delight of truant freedom. Eighteenth-century melancholy and grace touch it here and there; eighteenth-century mechanics seldom dull it; details bring agreeable little surprises; clearly Emanuel Bach was a lively and ingratiating spirit.

In conductor and men virtuosity played through the performance of this little symphony in the light, clear brilliance of the orchestral tone; in sensitive elasticity of pace and accent; in luminous definition of the principal melodies; in graceful weaving of the attendant arabesques; in quick feeling for all Bach's daring strokes (as daring went in 1776) and in a pervading voice of spirited and fanciful elegance. Of course the music sounded a little inflated in a big concert-room with a big modern orchestra playing it, but within this magnifying Dr. Muck kept adroitly to the original proportions and shadings. We know our eighteenth-century music so narrowly through the elder Bach, Mozart and Haydn that it was pleasant and stimulating to hear another piece, and here and there of another kind, from a contemporary hand. Perhaps eighteenth-century "collections" deserve more exploration by conductors than they receive.

A like and a different virtuosity glorified the performance of Beethoven's fourth symphony. Dr. Muck played it religiously note for note, without even a cut in the extended scherzo. He played it also with that minute care of detail fused into large, foreseeing and flowing design that is his way with the lighter classic symphonies. The analytical conductor may seek to illuminate and accent every phrase, and so make such a symphony as this fourth of Beethoven seem like a highly polished mosaic in tones. The orotund conductor bent on large and sweeping "effects" may make these phrases like a vague and clouded smear across them. Dr. Muck has in astute balance the sense of both large things and small, of whole design and of incidental detail, of the vitalizing trunk as well as of the branches and the leafage of a symphony. It was mental and emotional excitement yesterday to hear him ordering the long crescendo of the first movement in adroit ascent and expansion. It was hardly less such to hear him make each rhythmic detail of the scherzo tingle with its little stroke, or round each phrase of the slow movement till it glowed in soft beauty and yet kept flowing part in a richly sustained song. The finale ran with rhythmic passion; the orchestra flung out the music in sparkling jets or stayed it to pound out a sudden and commanding chord; but through all this racing and leaping exuberance there were the melodies and there were the accompanying and the incidental voices as clearly differentiated as they had been in the graver pace and mood of the slow movement.

Above all, the performance teemed with rhythmic vitality, for rhythm is the life of music as Dr. Muck plays it. And melody is its body and songfulness its voice as he fashions and releases it. He has the melodic divination that is an essential attribute to a conductor. He feels no less the richness of expanding song, and he persuades his men to like divination and feeling. Exactness of accent never becomes rigidity. His tonal and rhythmic and modulatory shading is of an exquisite sensibility. By this time and in these classic symphonies, his men play in his own image with a euphony of tone that is half of them and half of him and with a melting, a sparkling or a swelling beauty of voice that is most of themselves. As the season ends the orchestra seems to draw nearer and nearer to Dr. Muck's many-sided ideal. Contrast the mighty eloquence of its performance of Mahler's symphony a week ago with the ceaseless and plastic beauty of its routine Beethoven yesterday.

Yet another sort of virtuosity entered the concert in the playing of Liszt's concerto and of Smetana's overture—virtuosity in the narrower sense of brilliant and nervously stimulating achievement. Our opera house, hard put as it is for operas that shall be novel, light and amusing, has never—the more the pity!—pitched upon "The Bartered Bride." Very few that heard the overture, yesterday afternoon, had heard the opera aforetime, and could have their retrospective thoughts of the prelude as image and epitome of what was to come. As few knew or cared whether the music was truly and nationally Czech, though to make it so was one of Smetana's dearest ambitions. To most of us the music was only a brilliant and familiar overture that Dr. Muck and his men made to sound triply brilliant. The long crescendo began in quivering whispers of song; stirred, rose, leapt, mounted, expanded and finally shivered as upon itself in sparkling showers of excited and exciting tone. The fugue rang with its own elation, clear as the tone of a bell, clean-cut as Mr. Roosevelt's hound's tooth. Orchestra and conductor ran forward in gay rushes and jubilant repetitions, suspensive here, concentrated there. As elastic as air, the music opened to the singing-voice of the oboe and then sped to the close, racing with its own exuberance, glinting with its own gaiety. Even a fugue may kindle tonal fire—with a Czech to blow at it—in such a performance. The fumes of Smetana's pungent melodies seemed to smack through the instrumental tone. The Symphony Concerts—and at the end of the season—are actually turning heady.

excitingly upon each other in the gay frenzy of the overture, and Smetana's music upon both, so in Liszt's concerto Miss Schnitzer played upon them and they upon her, while the piece itself was like titillating champagne to all three. Admittedly there are other ways in which to play this concerto. The pianist and the conductor may expose lucidly and eloquently the march of its form, the succession and the "binding-together," as Liszt called it, of its themes. Or the pianist and the conductor may make it sound as music of large romantic pomp, and high romantic exaltation. Yet again they may play as it were in little, with elegant proportioning, grace of phrase and ornament and charm of suggestion. It is doubtful whether Liszt, the large-voiced and the fiery-spirited, ever intended it so; but fearful and wonderful are the ways of pianists with individualities—and also limitations. It is certain, at any rate, that he did not write or intend it to be played as a dry exercise in transcendental technique. The hackneyed old concerto, as youngsters already bored with it, like to call it, still glows with the fire of his imagination, the ardor of his creating spirit, the rhapsody of his technique. Even the dullest of pianists cannot long enchain such comet-like music.

And the concerto can also be played as so much nervous tonal excitement. It was so that Dr. Muck and still more Miss Schnitzer elected to play it yesterday. In aspect she is one of the most innocent of pianists—youthful almost to girlishness, poised as in the utmost tranquillity of spirit. Out of an old portrait in her maroon velvet, she seemed to come to the piano. Dr. Muck regarded her a little benignantly, a little quizzically as he does most of the "soloists." Respectfully, as the English like to say, she regarded him. They began the concerto, and straightway the air tingled with the music. They flung out the opening measures of the concerto in brilliant tone, with excited energy of accent, with impinging declamatory force. They proclaimed in its strength less than they sang in its beauty, the defiantly dominating melody. Between them, they swept it forward into the slow section, large, declamatory, masterful. The strings sang it with full voice. Miss Schnitzer still chose to proclaim it. Once and again she softened and the piano part gleamed through the iridescent veils that the orchestra cast about it. Oftener, however, it was as though she would disperse them and bear forward the song in large and florid strength. Out of power on the stage sprang excitement in the audience.

The triangle tinkled; in orchestra and piano the allegretto began low-voiced, light-voiced but still quiveringly nervous to be set free. Miss Schnitzer wrought this scherzo in brilliant bravura; Dr. Muck showered glinting orchestral sparks upon it. The comet-like music gleamed through its own glowing dust. It gathered pace, too, and body and energy and ardor. Faster and faster, harder and harder Miss Schnitzer drove her piano and herself. Faster and faster, harder and harder Dr. Muck whipped himself and his men. They flung smashing chords into the tonal mass. Miss Schnitzer answered with fiery bravura and racing passage-work. Now she seemed to goad and drive the orchestra before her. Now it caught her into itself and swept them both forward. Miss Schnitzer played like a Bacchante whose wine was the technique of the piano. Her fellow Bacchantes of the orchestra raced and almost screamed about her. The end was a delirium of frenzied tone. The audience answered with applause that sounded almost wild in the excitement of the moment. Some say that Liszt was a master-romantic. Yesterday he was a master-neurotic, too. Dr. Muck—and Miss Schnitzer, also—has a certain genius with his music.

POST.
APRIL 26, 1913

Woman Electrifies Symphony Audience

Miss Schnitzer Gives Remarkable Demonstration of Virtuosity in Liszt's E Flat Concerto

BY OLIN DOWNES

Yesterday afternoon a Boston Symphony audience in Symphony Hall was treated to the legitimate pleasures of Dr. Muck's masterly interpretation of Beethoven's fourth symphony and the quite unhallowed joy which was consequent upon the performance of Liszt's E flat piano concerto by Miss Germaine Schnitzer. Miss Schnitner, a strong-looking young lady, with arms quite out of proportion to the Mme. Recamier gown which she had elected to wear, walked, or loped, upon the stage, and in the course of 15 or 20 minutes provided the patrons of these concerts with more sensations than they had experienced, probably, in as many months.

And this was one of the few occasions when a brutally overplayed composition received its due. Only one performance of the E flat concerto, out of the dozens which have been given in this city of late years, is to be ranked at all with the performance of yesterday afternoon. This was in 1906, the year in which Miss Shcnitzer first appeared in Boston, when Dr. Muck and Moritz Rosenthal, twin souls that they were, played the concerto together and electrified their audiences.

Overwhelms Audience

That sensation was, if anything, eclipsed by the effect of yesterday. Not on account of a finer interpretation, for in interpreting this concerto Mr. Rosenthal is surely without a peer. We speak rather of the tremendously contagious quality of Miss Schnitzer's playing. She is at the period in life when emotions, sensations, are mos contagious. She is apparently a virtuoso by temperament as well as equipment—a virtuoso in the best and th most complete sense of the word. Mor than musicianship, more than technica equipment, or deep-seated sincerity, necessary for this. MacDowell sai that in every virtuoso there was something of the rope dancer. He coul have added, that in every great virtuos there is a flash of sheer creative geniu and the vital personal force whic makes an audience, whether it wills o no, the inspired accomplice of the pe former. It is a sqark of this spir which has preserved the concerto itse to us, and dictated one of the mos original themes in all music—the opening phase of mockery and defianc Lacking this quality on the part of th interpretive artist, the work is no heard at its full value. Fortunatel for her, Miss Schnitzer has at her disposal a technic which is entirely commensurate to the ordinate demand that she makes upon it. She has a excess if anything, of nervous energ and temperament. With Dr. Muck enthusiastic assistance, she simp overwhelmed her auditors.

In Her 26th Year

Miss Schnitzer is now in her 26t year. Her present tour in the Unite States is her third. She is an Austria by birth, a pupil of Pugno and Saue She first played in Chickering Hal Dec. 13, 1906, and at that time sh showed undisputable talent and individuality, although her performances the were uneven, and only indicative of th capacities for such a performance a yesterday's. Nor did her performanc of this concerto at Boston Sympho concerts in 1909 leave any enduring impression. Probably her performance will continue to be somewhat uneven i their quality, for she appears to be u usually temperamental. A girl who a 26 can give a performance of Liszt concerto such as she gave yesterday a girl to whom the future should mea very great things.

Dr. Much, sensitive as he is, adop an orchestral accompaniment wonde fully to the equipment and the inte tions of his soloists. The private rehea sal of Thursday morning had doubtle shown him whom he had to deal wit and to those acquainted with this co certo, it was evident from the first t measures of orchestral introduction th something unusual was to come. Bo conductor and soloist, apparently, we somewhat excited from the beginnin and there was a passage or two in t first part of the concerto which b trayed something of the tremor th came from tense nerves which had n yet received their relief through actio These moments were rather to be f than heard, although it is probable t the performance this evening will the better for a final adjustment of va ues.

High Tension for Finale

At any rate, the splendid old pie never seemed so stirring, so instin with all-compassing genius. The ly cal phrases were sung a little m languorously than usual, and sure in this the thought of the compos was fulfilled. Nothing more insidio than the crooning clarinet! The sl division of the concerto was less e grossing and organic than it mig have been, and this was surely on a count of the nervous tension and t suspense, felt by both performers a before that finale which [illegible] like a top Nor is there anything in music m ingenious than the device, accursed Liszt's contemporaries, of the tappi of the triangle which ushers in t piquant passage that leads in turn the conclusion. It is the device of master virtuoso. It imparts the la nervous twinge necessary to stimul to their utmost sensibility the ner of an audience.

Played Like a Demon

From here on the performance w really incredible. The pace taken, ev so early, was alarming, because it w difficult to foresee how it would end. But Miss Schnitzer's technic w equal to the occasion, and Miss Schn zer played like a demon! And this the way the concerto ought to played; the way in which not th performers have been heard to play at least in many years, in this city.

Much of the effect was due to t orchestral accompaniment. Dr. Mu conducted as though his life hung the issue, and the way the orches flung out the devil-may-care mot which is the motto at once of the c certo and of the triumphal career Franz Liszt was something to reme ber for a long time and relish in memory. There can be few pleasu granted the soloist who performs w orchestra equal to the pleasure of pl ing with this conductor when he spects his artist. The other extre is another story.

The orchestra was a second sol in this performance, and it was an applauding band which shou "Bravo! bravo!" after each period the piano solo. It thundered on victory, and once more there was in the land, and none recked whether Liszt was as great Beethoven, or whether the appearance of a soloist, considered from the truly esthetic standpoint, should be tolerated in the midst of an orchestral programme, or of any of the other considerations which should afflict a serious symphony audience when partaking of spiritual nourishment. A young woman with the arms of a swimmer had appeared in a most incongruous Mme. Racamier gown, and had made an amazing sensation.

MISS GERMAINE SCHNITZER,
Austrian pianist, who played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday.

Beethoven and Younger Bach

In the light of these enjoyments, it seems almost sacrilege to refer to Beethoven symphony and the symphony of Ph. E. Bach in any but the most distant and respectful terms. The fourth symphony is indeed a work of a colossal genius. It is one of the least of Beethoven's efforts in this form. It is as bucolic in its sentiment as the more famous pastoral symphony. It was providentially appropriate to the sunshine and the blue sky without. It was one of the few compositions which could hold up its head beneath that sky and that sunshine. Emmanuel Bach's symphony, as played yesterday, is heavily and objectionably overorchestrated. The counterpoint is not as richly woven as the counterpoint of Emmanuel Bach's celebrated predecessor of the same name, but it is too rich to be played by a full orchestra of the modern dimensions of the Boston Symphony. By consequence, the entrance of a solo flute or clarinet seemed far too light and insignificant.

TRANSCRIPT.
APRIL 26, 1913

The Symphony Concert

An Afternoon of Exciting Virtuosity

By H. T. P.

To a Symphony Concert of rare and mighty music last week succeeded yesterday a Symphony Concert of rare and high viruosity. Three of the pieces that it served were familiar — Beethoven's fourth symphony, in B-flat; Smetana's overture to his opera, "The Bartered Bride," and Liszt's concerto for pianoforte in E-flat. All three pass for classics; all three, in spite of many repetitions, are presumed to be perennially interesting in their kind. They were so, at any rate, in the performance that they received yesterday. The fourth item of the programme, Emanuel Bach's little eighteenth-century symphony in E-flat, may have more interest historically than it has intrinsically, however perfect the playing of it. The piece came out of Hamburg in 1776 and Hamburg was a long way from the musical capitals of those days like Vienna and Paris. It made free, as the eighteenth-century idiom ran, with the academic symphonic forms of the time; for even so early in music form had become an orthodoxy. It anticipated curiously some of the ways and the moods of later symphonic writing. Emanuel Bach actually made his music move in contrasting masses in the mild eighteenth-century sense of that now formidable word. He had a "modern" feeling for the projected and telling phrase and for the coloring that the wood-wind choir may lend. There is a certain modern cut and contrast in some of his melodies while his music has a full and yet a light body, much more imaginative than the stately or striding pomps of Händel.

For this and many another reason, the historians and the pedagogues of music make much of the symphonies of Emanuel Bach. Had Dr. Muck been Mr. Damrosch—which, fortunately, he is not—he would have doubtless turned on his stand and expounded to the audience historically and comparatively the music it was about to hear. Instead, he left them and the learned "programmist" to establish their historical backgrounds for themselves. Most of them, accordingly, heard the little symphony for its own sake and nothing else, and it still has its pleasant little vitality and amiable little pungency. Fancy plays invitingly through it. The music runs in the delight of truant freedom. Eighteenth-century melancholy and grace touch it here and there; eighteenth-century mechanics seldom dull it; details bring agreeable little surprises; clearly Emanuel Bach was a lively and ingratiating spirit.

In conductor and men virtuosity played through the performance of this little symphony in the light, clear brilliance of the orchestral tone; in sensitive elasticity of pace and accent; in luminous definition of the principal melodies; in graceful weaving of the attendant arabesques; in quick feeling for all Bach's daring strokes (as daring went in 1776) and in a pervading voice of spirited and fanciful elegance. Of course the music sounded a little inflated in a big concert-room with a big modern orchestra playing it, but within this magnifying Dr. Muck kept adroitly to the original proportions and shadings. We know our eighteenth-century music so narrowly through the elder Bach, Mozart and Haydn that it was pleasant and stimulating to hear another piece, and here and there of another kind, from a contemporary hand. Perhaps eighteenth-century "collections" deserve more exploration by conductors than they receive.

A like and a different virtuosity glorified the performance of Beethoven's fourth symphony. Dr. Muck played it religiously note for note, without even a cut in the extended scherzo. He played it also with that minute care of detail fused into large, foreseeing and flowing design that is his way with the lighter classic symphonies. The analytical conductor may seek to illuminate and accent every phrase, and so make such a symphony as this fourth of Beethoven seem like a highly polished mosaic in tones. The orotund conductor bent on large and sweeping "effects" may make these phrases like a vague and clouded smear across them. Dr. Muck has in astute balance the sense of both large things and small, of whole design and of incidental detail, of the vitalizing trunk as well as of the branches and the leafage of a symphony. It was mental and emotional excitement yesterday to hear him ordering the long crescendo of the first movement in adroit ascent and expansion. It was hardly less such to hear him make each rhythmic detail of the scherzo tingle with its little stroke, or round each phrase of the slow movement till it glowed in soft beauty and yet kept flowing part in a richly sustained song. The finale ran with rhythmic passion; the orchestra flung out the music in sparkling jets or stayed it to pound out a sudden and commanding chord; but through all this racing and leaping exuberance there were the melodies and there were the accompanying and the incidental voices as clearly differentiated as they had been in the graver pace and mood of the slow movement.

Above all, the performance teemed with rhythmic vitality, for rhythm is the life of music as Dr. Muck plays it. And melody is its body and songfulness its voice as it fashions and releases it. He has the melodic divination that is an essential attribute to a conductor. He feels no less the richness of expanding song, and he persuades his men to like divination and feeling. Exactness of accent never becomes rigidity. His tonal and rhythmic and modulatory shading is of an exquisite sensibility. By this time and in these classic symphonies, his men play in his own image with a euphony of tone that is half of them and half of him and with a melting, a sparkling or a swelling beauty of voice that is most of themselves. As the season ends the orchestra seems to draw nearer and nearer to Dr. Muck's many-sided ideal. Contrast the mighty eloquence of its performance of Mahler's symphony a week ago with the ceaseless and plastic beauty of its routine Beethoven yesterday.

Yet another sort of virtuosity enter the concert in the playing of Liszt's c certo and of Smetana's overture—virtuos in the narrower sense of brilliant a nervously stimulating achievement. O opera house, hard put as it is for operas that shall be novel, light and amusing, has never—the more the pity!—pitched upon "The Bartered Bride." Very few that heard the overture, yesterday afternoon, had heard the opera aforetime, and could have their retrospective thoughts of the prelude as image and epitome of what was to come. As few knew or cared whether the music was truly and nationally Czech, though to make it so was one of Smetana's dearest ambitions. To most of us the music was only a brilliant and familiar overture that Dr. Muck and his men made to sound triply brilliant. The long crescendo began in quivering whispers of song; stirred, rose, leapt, mounted, expanded and finally shivered as upon itself in sparkling showers of excited and exciting tone. The fugue rang with its own elation, clear as the tone of a bell, clean-cut as Mr. Roosevelt's hound's tooth. Orchestra and conductor ran forward in gay rushes and jubilant repetitions, suspensive here, concentrated there. As elastic as air, the music opened to the singing-voice of the oboe, and then sped to the close, racing with its own exuberance, glinting with its own gaiety. Even a fugue may kindle tonal fire—with a Czech to blow at it—in such a performance. The fumes of Smetana's pungent melodies seemed to smack through the instrumental tone. The Symphony Concerts—and at the end of the season—are actually turning heady.

excitingly upon each other in the gay frenzy of the overture, and Smetana's music upon both, so in Liszt's concerto Miss Schnitzer played upon them and they upon her, while the piece itself was like titillating champagne to all three. Admittedly there are other ways in which to play this concerto. The pianist and the conductor may expose lucidly and eloquently the march of its form, the succession and the "binding-together," as Liszt called it, of its themes. Or the pianist and the conductor may make it sound as music of large romantic pomp, and high romantic exaltation. Yet again they may play as it were in little, with elegant proportioning, grace of phrase and ornament and charm of suggestion. It is doubtful whether Liszt, the large-voiced and the fiery-spirited, ever intended it so; but fearful and wonderful are the ways of pianists with individualities—and also limitations. It is certain, at any rate, that he did not write or intend it to be played as a dry exercise in transcendental technique. The hackneyed old concerto, as youngsters already bored with it, like to call it, still glows with the fire of his imagination, the ardor of his creating spirit, the rhapsody of his technique. Even the dullest of pianists cannot long enchain such comet-like music.

And the concerto can also be played as so much nervous tonal excitement. It was so that Dr. Muck and still more Miss Schnitzer elected to play it yesterday. In aspect she is one of the most innocent of pianists—youthful almost to girlishness, poised as in the utmost tranquillity of spirit. Out of an old portrait in her marroon velvet, she seemed to come to the piano. Dr. Muck regarded her a little benignantly, a little quizzically as he does most of the "soloists." Respectfully, as the English like to say, she regarded him. They began the concerto, and straightway the air tingled with the music. They flung out the opening measures of the concerto in brilliant tone, with excited energy of accent, with impinging declamatory force. They proclaimed in its strength less than they sang in its beauty, the defiantly dominating melody. Between them, they swept it forward into the slow section, large, declamatory, masterful. The strings sang it with full voice. Miss Schnitzer still chose to proclaim it. Once and again she softened and the piano part gleamed through the iridescent veils that the orchestra cast about it. Oftener, however, it was as though she would disperse them and bear forward the song in large and florid strength. Out of power on the stage sprang excitement in the audience.

The triangle tinkled; in orchestra and piano the allegretto began low-voiced, light-voiced but still quiveringly nervous to be set free. Miss Schnitzer wrought this scherzo in brilliant bravura; Dr. Muck showered glinting orchestral sparks upon it. The comet-like music gleamed through its own glowing dust. It gathered pace, too, and body and energy and ardor. Faster and faster, harder and harder Miss Schnitzer drove her piano and herself. Faster and faster, harder and harder Dr. Muck whipped himself and his men. They flung smashing chords into the tonal mass. Miss Schnitzer answered with fiery bravura and racing passage-work. Now she seemed to goad and drive the orchestra before her. Now it caught her into itself and swept them both forward. Miss Schnitzer played like a Bacchante whose wine was the technique of the piano. Her fellow Bacchantes of the orchestra raced and almost screamed about her. The end was a delirium of frenzied tone. The audience answered with applause that sounded almost wild in the excitement of the moment. Some say that Liszt was a master-romantic. Yesterday he was a master-neurotic, too. Dr. Muck—and Miss Schnitzer, also—has a certain genius with his music.

TIGHT BINDING

APRIL 26,

TRANSCRIP

NEWS OF MUSIC AND P

The Pops Again

ON Monday, May 5, the Pop
begin once more in Symph
to continue every evening ex
day for eight weeks and a half Thursday, July 3. This year, the has been increased by a fifth of bers. Hitherto for many season men from the Symphony Orche composed it. This spring ther sixty-six, two-thirds of the Symp chestra at its full strength. H again, two conductors have divided ing—one through May; the othe
June. This year there will be
Urack from May 5 through May Maquarre best-liked of all the re
ductors of The Pops, from May 2
June 18; and Mr. Lenom from through July 3. Mr. Urack and M
come new to such work here;
Urack has already proved his ab
a conductor in the weeks in w
Muck was too ill to take the regu
phony Concerts and Mr. Lenom—t obee of the orchestra—is of capa experience in such concerts.

Otherwise The Pops will run th
that they have run these many the recurring pleasure of the tow
music will make the programmes overtures, new and old; popular potpourris from operas, operettas
sical plays; Viennese waltzes; ball amiable trifles; and stoutly r marches. Extra pieces will su
the twelve regular numbers of e gramme; the organ will be used fre
the quality and spirit of performa
be kept at the standard of recen
Tables, of course, will replace the
the floor; and there the audien smoke at will and eat and drink
the buffet and the cellars yield. T balcony will be kept as heretofore who would avoid the smoke, and have their restaurant hard by. To minded and light-mannered will the way of The Pops. For mor than it is easy to count, the town
them so.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDA

Dr. Muck's Programme-Making

New and Old Tendencies in the Outcome

By H. T. P.

THROUGH the two years during which Dr. Muck first served as the conductor of the Symphony Concerts, the controversy over his programmes was endless. It began within a month after his coming; it continued even after his departure; since through the first two years of Mr. Fiedler's succeeding term, the pleased and the displeased liked to contrast his programmes with Dr. Muck's The controversy ran the usual diversified and contradictory course of such disputes. Dr. Muck's programmes suffered from an excess of classic pieces; or they were overladen with contemporary music. They contained far too many familiar items; or they were cumbered with far too many "novelties." They overlooked the new Parisians, or Strauss and his followers, or the "national" Russians. Why had Schubert no larger share in them? Or Schumann? Or Dvořák? The programmes were too long and exacting; or they were too short and too little diversified. The perturbed wrote protesting letters to the management and the newspapers and complained, as men and women in æsthetic pain and chagrin, over dinner tables and in the corners of clubs. The protests were many voiced and divergent. "In a multitude of counsellors there is safety." In this multitude there was safety—for Dr. Muck. He went his own way tranquilly and to the end of his term chose and arranged his programmes, according to his own lights.

A Change and a Contrast

Returning to his post last autumn Dr. Muck also resumed programme-making, and now at the end of April, he has finished his twenty-fourth and final programme of the season. In all the intervening seven months, the voices of complaint and protest have been relatively few and feeble. Rarely have grumbling subscribers addressed the management of the concerts; still more rarely have they lamented aloud in the newspapers. Yet the programmes have been open in more or less degree to nearly every objection urged against them through Dr. Muck's first term. Neither in theory nor in practice has the conductor much diverged from his former standards and procedure with them. In one respect, indeed they have been very singular, but no one has much heeded it.

As few have asked whether the programmes were "unified" according to the theory upon which Dr. Muck is presumed to pick and arrange his lists. No more have found them over-crowded with classic and familiar pieces or neglectful of contemporary and novel music. The Debussyites have seldom lifted wailing voices; the Straussites are still heavy with the satiety of Mr. Fiedler's final years. The ears of the ultra-moderns have tingled to Reger's, Lendvai's, Holbrooke's, Mraczek's and Loeffler's music. The devotees of American composers have heard their Chadwick and their Macdowell. The Brucknerites and the Mahlerites have had each their symphony. The classicists have had their fill of Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven. Hearing Borodin and Rimsky-Korskoff in unfamiliar pieces, those that crave the Russians have not heeded the relative absence of Tschaikowsky. The length of the concets, when they were long, has seemingly vexed few.

Thus the champions of Dr. Muck's programmes have rested on their arms in the pervading tranquility, while even those who used to scrutinize the list of pieces each week to find new opportunity for cavil, have quite overlooked a singularity that of old they would have rolled upon their tongues. Concertos and other solo pieces aside, seventy-two items have filled Dr. Muck's programmes this season. Of those items fifty-one are pieces that stood on the programmes of the concerts of his first term. In other words a little more than two-thirds of his numbers have been music that he had already played with the Symphony Orchestra. What a neglected opportunity! What crowning proof that Dr. Muck's programmes are taken for granted now!

Lengthened Concerts

To the advantage of the concerts, Dr. Muck has continued a change that Mr. Fiedler made first and steadily upheld. How the precedent arose in Mr. Gericke's day that the Symphony Concerts should be only an hour and a half long, no one now seems quite able to say. When conductor and custom so fixed their length, deduction of the intermission and of the minutes consumed in applause and recalls, especially when there was a soloist to acclaim, usually left seventy minutes at most for the actual performance of music. Thirty-five or forty of them might fall to the chosen symphony, to say nothing of a soloist's concerto. Such a tacit limitation of time cribbed the conductor in the choice of his pieces and narrowed the scope of the concerts; while it was hard to believe that the receptive faculties of the audiences were benumbed at the end of an hour and a half. Little by little, Mr. Fiedler lengthened the concerts to an hour and forty-five minutes or on occasion to two hours. Dr. Muck has quietly anl wisely adhered to the change. The advantages to the conductor in his programme-making; to the audience in the variety of pieces that they hear; and to the range and interest of the concerts in general, speak for themselves. Moreover, as in Mr. Fiedler's time, the public has shown no impatience under the new custom. Departures in the course of the concert were more numerous in Dr. Muck's first term, when his programmes were short, than they have been this season, when they were often long. A long programme will hold the audience, if it is interesting. A short programme will not, if that same audience finds it dull. Thus by the practice of two conductors the Symphony Concerts have been definitively lengthened. On that score they accord better now with similar concerts elsewhere in Europe and in America.

Two More Innovations

In two respects, besides, Dr. Muck, whose mind will work logically, has been quietly bringing rule and custom into the programmes of the Symphony Concerts. One is a relatively minor ordnance. Under his predecessors, an assisting singer might, if she chose, sing songs to piano accompaniment for one or more of her appointed numbers. The singers of the year now ending have indeed sung songs, but always orchestrated songs. A piano has stood upon the stage only when the score added it to the orchestra or a virtuoso was to play a concerto upon it. As the purists say in a council of perfection to which none but them has attained, a singing voice is a disconcerting anomaly in a symphony concert. By wider agreement, a song sung to a piano accompaniment, while an idle orchestra sits listening by, certainly is. Songs with piano belong to the relative intimacy of the recital in a small hall to a limited audience. Songs may have their place in symphony concerts; but they must be scaled to an orchestral accompaniment, lest they be swallowed in the extent and magnitude of their surroundings, and seem still more an interruption to the sequence of orchestral pieces. Dr. Muck has done well to sanction only orchestrated songs for the singing soloists.

The other systematizing step is of larger moment. Almost steadily throughout the year, Dr. Muck has balanced a modern symphony, or tone-poem (which is its contemporary equivalent), with a classic symphony. He began the first concert with a symphony by Beethoven; the second with a symphony by Sgambati; the third with a symphony by Bischoff; the fourth with another symphony by Beethoven. A light symphony by Hadyn at one concert preceded a long and mighty symphony by Mahler at the next. And so forth, almost from concert to concert not only in the balancing of classic and modern symphonies, but of symphonies that were exacting to hear with symphonies that came and went in easy pleasure. Out of this quiet wisdom have come a succession of symphonies at which neither the devoted classicists nor the insistent modernists could reasonably grumble, and a soothing diversity of impression to those that used to complain that Dr. Muck's programmes were monotonous. Yet in all this Dr. Muck has avoided hard-and-fast systematizing. He has kept his balancing and his alternating elastic. He has not imposed a symphony on every concert. He has not made his alternations an invariable rule. He has neither humored nor overburdened his audiences. He has not forgotten that in a long series of concerts the unexpected is an essential element. Dr. Muck still "unifies" his programmes: that is to say he will not let music of one distinctive style stifle or cloud music of another, less able to bear the strain of contiguity. No more will he jumble unrelated items into a single programme that each may tickle the hearers' ears with a new and pungent sensation. But he is less rigid and theoretical in his "unification" than he once was. It is so pliant now that often it has been hardly more than a clear and reasonable coördination.

Exploring the Library

Yet again, Dr. Muck has brought a new and fruitful procedure into his programme-making. Certain classics must inevitably have their recurring place on his or any other conductor's programmes—the symphonies of Beethoven, Schumann, Schubert, Mozart, Haydn; the "standard overtures" and many another established piece. They are ever-present, as it were, in the mind of a conductor when he sits down to programme-making. He has only to distribute them advisedly through his concerts. At his elbow also, and similarly present for the time in his mind, are sundry novel pieces, deserving performance. This or that new tone-poem has made a stir in Europe and warrants repetition in Boston. One and another new piece has obvious individuality and achievement that the conductor would fain publish to his audiences. Again he has only to distribute as many of these as he may through his programmes as shrewdly as he sprinkled them with his classics. Between both he may almost fill his lists for the year.

Yet waiting on the shelves of the library of the orchestra lie in tens and twenties and almost in fifties, pieces that the conductor might well scrutinize and reproduce. Many of them were once "novelties." In their time, they were played, applauded, discussed, and then laid to perpetual repose in their pigeon-hole. Not a few deserve to be performed again, to become, under the passing years, "novelties" once more. Others are overlooked classics, outside the routine that conductors take with established composers, yet little less deserving than the rest of their music. The season through, Dr. Muck has been a diligent and discovering explorer in the library of the Symphony Orchestra. From it he has drawn forth Sgambati's Bischoff's, Sinding's, Sibelius's and many another neglected symphony. In it he has found this or that available miscellaneous piece. From the shelves on which they had long gathered dust came Charpentier's "Italian Impressions," Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," Debussy's "The Sea," Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" and Mahler's mighty symphony of last week. By meticulous record not one of these was new in 1912-13 to the Symphony Concerts. By actual impression upon hearers, almost every one was as novel as though it had come fresh from composers and publishers. Count these as "novelties," as they really were, and the number of the new pieces of the year is more than doubled. With these reproductions truly classified, it rises as high as any just expectation could demand.

"Novelties" and Information

Almost without exception the novel pieces on Dr. Muck's programmes in the strict sense of the words have deserved their place there. Lendvai's new symphony was music of uncommon individuality and of no little power. "Max and Moritz" was at least an amusing orchestral feat. Holbrooke's "Queen Mab" brought a composer of unusual imagination into the repertory

Continued on Page Thirteen

of the Symphony Concerts. The high place of Reger among contemporary composers warrants the performance of each new orchestral piece, like the "Concerto in the Olden Style," from his hand. Mr. Chadwick's "Aphrodite" was above the average of the music of American composers. Dr. Muck's novelties, again in the strict sense of the word, so bore witness to the discrimination with which he chose them. Yet, as some say openly or under their breaths, there might have been more of them to the gratification of lively musical curiosities. Probably there will be another season. For half at least of the current musical year Dr. Muck sought before all else to raise the orchestra to his standards of performance, alike in range of technical accomplishment and of imparting eloquence. Such schooling of an orchestra is best done, not with the newest "novelties," however exacting, but with established classics and repertory pieces that can be quite as exacting in their kind as well. Dr. Muck has lifted the orchestra to these standards; he may make it a more varied but hardly a more sensitive instrument than it has now become. Another year he may play upon it what he will, as he will.

Then those who now complain that the season through we have heard no new French music from the young and rising Parisian composers may protest more justly at what they choose to call narrowness and oversight. Then also those that are fain to hear the music of Schönberg or Korngold may more forcibly ply their arguments for the inclusion of one or another specimen of it in Dr. Muck's programmes. As they make their plea, there is a measure of validity in it. The music of Schönberg, for example may not fall as music upon Dr. Muck's ears. It may deserve the denunciation and the derision that have been heaped upon it. But it is also music that is making lively stir and causing hot debate in the world. For the information of the public of the Symphony Concerts, it should be played at them that it may hear and judge for itself. Catholicity, one of the chief and enduring glories of the concerts, demands that even Schönberg should have at least his passing place on the programmes. The secondary Parisians—Ravel or Roussel, Schmitt or Roger-Ducasse—may be only imitating Debussy, as Dr. Muck contends, but may we not hear and judge the nature and the extent of this imitation for ourselves? By common consent, the Symphony Orchestra has its obligation to be musically informing.

BOSTON GLOBE—

APRIL 26. 1

23D REHEARSAL.

Beethoven's Fourth Symphony Brilliantly Played.

Miss Germaine Schnitzer Performs Liszt Concerto With Dash.

The twenty-third Symphony rehearsal, Dr Muck conducted. Miss Germaine Schnitzer was the soloist. The program:

Beethoven..............Fourth Symphony
C. P. Emanuel Bach..Second Symphony
Liszt...............Piano Concerto No. 1
Smetana..Overture to "The Sold Bride"

This symphony by the greatest of the great Bach's sons is interesting since it is hardly a symphony at all, but an extended suite. This clearly and logically ordered old music shows the process of evolution of the symphonies of Mozart, which again are in part reechoed in form and style in the fourth of Beethoven.

Bach's symphony with its stately insistence upon the principal themes, their innocence of thematic development as Beethoven enriched and perfected it and the monotony in color, particularly the grey woodwind, all tend to give it a meager character to modern ears, but not without the cast of nobility. The themes have a profile; they are differentiated so that the masculinity of a chief subject and the feminity of a contrasting one are unmistakable. There are abrupt contrasts in dynamics, and there is considerable freedom in modulation. As one of the foundations out of which Haydn continued to build up a symphonic basis for Mozart and Beethoven, this symphony is of interest.

The Beethoven was played with a scholarly grasp of thye interpretative devices that give orchestral music character. To say that Dr Muck's readings have crystal clarity and the proportion of a piece of architecture resplendent in its majesty and beauty is repetition. But how he illumined every measure and period yesterday. There was plasticity of phrase; there was unerring judgment in the balance between the predominating and accompanying voices, and in the graduation of the long ascent to a climax; there Smetana's overture, which reflects the lusty peasant jollity which the whole opera brews, was played with extraordinary brilliance. The string choirs went scurrying after each other in the tempestuous fugue like runners waiting impatient to be off. The whole overture was infectious with full-blooded, brawny humor. It was one of the most spontaneous performances Dr Muck has given.

Miss Schnitzer plausibly may have excited the demonstrative applause. As a pianist she is both fiery and muscular and her technic permits her to play very fast and very loud. She took the scherzo at a pace which caused the men some amusement to follow. All this is stimulating and diverting. But there are other qualities which have their place. Miss Schnitzer's performance was not characterized for a bravura of patrician elegance, or for an arrogant abandon in passages of declamation; nor was she always mindful of a vocal tone or of flexibility of nuance in the passages which should be sung. There was a dash in her playing which always excites wonder and transport, and there was also the touch of the commonplace.

For the concerts next week, the last of the season, Dr Muck has chosen a program to honor the centenary of Wagner's birth. The overture to "Rienzi," the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" and the prelude to "Parsifal" will be played. The symphony will be Brahms' No. 1.

TIGHT BINDING

APRIL 26.

TRANSCRIP

NEWS OF MUSIC AND P

The Pops Again

ON Monday, May 5, the Pop
begin once more in Symph
to continue every evening ex
day for eight weeks and a half Thursday, July 3. This year, the has been increased by a fifth o
bers. Hitherto for many season
men from the Symphony Orche composed it. This spring there sixty-six, two-thirds of the Symp
chestra at its full strength. H
again, two conductors have divided ing—one through May; the other June. This year there will be t
Urack from May 5 through May
Maquarre best-liked of all the re
ductors of The Pops, from May 2
June 18; and Mr. Lenom from through July 3. Mr. Urack and M
come new to such work here;
Urack has already proved his ab
a conductor in the weeks in w
Muck was too ill to take the regu
phony Concerts and Mr. Lenom—t
obee of the orchestra—is of capa
experience in such concerts.

Otherwise The Pops will run th
that they have run these many
the recurring pleasure of the tow
music will make the programmes overtures, new and old; popular potpourris from operas, operettas
sical plays; Viennese waltzes; ball
amiable trifles; and stoutly r marches. Extra pieces will su
the twelve regular numbers of e gramme; the organ will be used fr
the quality and spirit of performa
be kept at the standard of recen
Tables, of course, will replace the
the floor; and there the audien
smoke at will and eat and drink
the buffet and the cellars yield. T balcony will be kept as heretofore
who would avoid the smoke, and have their restaurant hard by. To minded and light-mannered will the way of The Pops. For more than it is easy to count, the town
them so.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDA

Dr. Muck's Programme-Making

New and Old Tendencies in the Outcome

By H. T. P.

THROUGH the two years during which Dr. Muck first served as the conductor of the Symphony Concerts, the controversy over his programmes was endless. It began within a month after his coming; it continued even after his departure; since through the first two years of Mr. Fiedler's succeeding term, the pleased and the displeased liked to contrast his programmes with Dr. Muck's The controversy ran the usual diversified and contradictory course of such disputes. Dr. Muck's programmes suffered from an excess of classic pieces; or they were overladen with contemporary music. They contained far too many familiar items; or they were cumbered with far too many "novelties." They overlooked the new Parisians, or Strauss and his followers, or the "national" Russians. Why had Schubert no larger share in them? Or Schumann? Or Dvorák? The programmes were too long and exacting; or they were too short and too little diversified. The perturbed wrote protesting letters to the management and the newspapers and complained, as men and women in æsthetic pain and chagrin, over dinner tables and in the corners of clubs. The protests were many voiced and divergent. "In a multitude of counsellors there is safety." In this multitude there was safety—for Dr. Muck. He went his own way tranquilly and to the end of his term chose and arranged his programmes, according to his own lights.

A Change and a Contrast

Returning to his post last autumn Dr. Muck also resumed programme-making, and now at the end of April, he has finished his twenty-fourth and final programme of the season. In all the intervening seven months, the voices of complaint and protest have been relatively few and feeble. Rarely have grumbling subscribers addressed the management of the concerts; still more rarely have they lamented aloud in the newspapers. Yet the programmes have been open in more or less degree to nearly every objection urged against them through Dr. Muck's first term. Neither in theory nor in practice has the conductor much diverged from his former standards and procedure with them. In one respect, indeed they have been very singular, but no one has much heeded it.

As few have asked whether the programmes were "unified" according to the theory upon which Dr. Muck is presumed to pick and arrange his lists. No more have found them over-crowded with classic and familiar pieces or neglectful of contemporary and novel music. The Debussyites have seldom lifted wailing voices; the Straussites are still heavy with the satiety of Mr. Fiedler's final years. The ears of the ultra-moderns have tingled to Reger's, Lendvai's, Holbrooke's, Mraczek's and Loeffler's music. The devotees of American composers have heard their Chadwick and their Macdowell. The Brucknerites and the Mahlerites have had each their symphony. The classicists have had their fill of Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven. Hearing Borodin and Rimsky-Korskoff in unfamiliar pieces, those that crave the Russians have not heeded the relative absence of Tschaikowsky. The length of the concets, when they were long, has seemingly vexed few.

Thus the champions of Dr. Muck's programmes have rested on their arms in the pervading tranquility, while even those who used to scrutinize the list of pieces each week to find new opportunity for cavil, have quite overlooked a singularity that of old they would have rolled upon their tongues, Concertos and other solo pieces aside, seventy-two items have filled Dr. Muck's programmes this season. Of those items fifty-one are pieces that stood on the programmes of the concerts of his first term. In other words a little more than two-thirds of his numbers have been music that he had already played with the Symphony Orchestra. What a neglected opportunity! What crowning proof that Dr. Muck's programmes are taken for granted now!

Lengthened Concerts

To the advantage of the concerts, Dr. Muck has continued a change that Mr. Fiedler made first and steadily upheld. How the precedent arose in Mr. Gericke's day that the Symphony Concerts should be only an hour and a half long, no one now seems quite able to say. When conductor and custom so fixed their length, deduction of the intermission and of the minutes consumed in applause and recalls, especially when there was a soloist to acclaim, usually left seventy minutes at most for the actual performance of music. Thirty-five or forty of them might fall to the chosen symphony, to say nothing of a soloist's concerto. Such a tacit limitation of time cribbed the conductor in the choice of his pieces and narrowed the scope of the concerts; while it was hard to believe that the receptive faculties of the audiences were benumbed at the end of an hour and a half. Little by little, Mr. Fiedler lengthened the concerts to an hour and forty-five minutes or on occasion to two hours. Dr. Muck has quietly anl wisely adhered to the change. The advantages to the conductor in his programme-making; to the audience in the variety of pieces that they hear; and to the range and interest of the concerts in general, speak for themselves. Moreover, as in Mr. Fiedler's time, the public has shown no impatience under the new custom. Departures in the course of the concert were more numerous in Dr. Muck's first term, when his programmes were short, than they have been this season, when they were often long. A long programme will hold the audience, if it is interesting. A short programme will not, if that same audience finds it dull. Thus by the practice of two conductors the Symphony Concerts have been definitively lengthened. On that score they accord better now with similar concerts elsewhere in Europe and in America.

Two More Innovations

In two respects, besides, Dr. Muck, whose mind will work logically, has been quietly bringing rule and custom into the programmes of the Symphony Concerts. One is a relatively minor ordnance. Under his predecessors, an assisting singer might, if she chose, sing songs to piano accompaniment for one or more of her appointed numbers. The singers of the year now ending have indeed sung songs, but always orchestrated songs. A piano has stood upon the stage only when the score added it to the orchestra or a virtuoso was to play a concerto upon it. As the purists say in a council of perfection to which none but them has attained, a singing voice is a disconcerting anomaly in a symphony concert. By wider agreement, a song sung to a piano accompaniment, while an idle orchestra sits listening by, certainly is. Songs with piano belong to the relative intimacy of the recital in a small hall to a limited audience. Songs may have their place in symphony concerts; but they must be scaled to an orchestral accompaniment, lest they be swallowed in the extent and magnitude of their surroundings, and seem still more an interruption to the sequence of orchestral pieces. Dr. Muck has done well to sanction only orchestrated songs for the singing soloists.

The other systematizing step is of larger moment. Almost steadily throughout the year, Dr. Muck has balanced a modern symphony, or tone-poem (which is its contemporary equivalent), with a classic symphony. He began the first concert with a symphony by Beethoven; the second with a symphony by Sgambati; the third with a symphony by Bischoff; the fourth with another symphony by Beethoven. A light symphony by Hadyn at one concert preceded a long and mighty symphony by Mahler at the next. And so forth, almost from concert to concert not only in the balancing of classic and modern symphonies, but of symphonies that were exacting to hear with symphonies that came and went in easy pleasure. Out of this quiet wisdom have come a succession of symphonies at which neither the devoted classicists nor the insistent modernists could reasonably grumble, and a soothing diversity of impression to those that used to complain that Dr. Muck's programmes were monotonous. Yet in all this Dr. Muck has avoided hard-and-fast systematizing. He has kept his balancing and his alternating elastic. He has not imposed a symphony on every concert. He has not made his alternations an invariable rule. He has neither humored nor overburdened his audiences. He has not forgotten that in a long series of concerts the unexpected is an essential element. Dr. Muck still "unifies" his programmes: that is to say he will not let music of one distinctive style stifle or cloud music of another, less able to bear the strain of contiguity. No more will he jumble unrelated items into a single programme that each may tickle the hearers' ears with a new and pungent sensation. But he is less rigid and theoretical in his "unification" than he once was. It is so pliant now that often it has been hardly more than a clear and reasonable coördination.

Exploring the Library

Yet again, Dr. Muck has brought a new and fruitful procedure into his programme-making. Certain classics must inevitably have their recurring place on his or any other conductor's programmes—the symphonies of Beethoven, Schumann, Schubert, Mozart, Haydn; the "standard overtures" and many another established piece. They are ever-present, as it were, in the mind of a conductor when he sits down to programme-making. He has only to distribute them advisedly through his concerts. At his elbow also, and similarly present for the time in his mind, are sundry novel pieces, deserving performance. This or that new tone-poem has made a stir in Europe and warrants repetition in Boston. One and another new piece has obvious individuality and achievement that the conductor would fain publish to his audiences. Again he has only to distribute as many of these as he may through his programmes as shrewdly as he sprinkled them with his classics. Between both he may almost fill his lists for the year.

Yet waiting on the shelves of the library of the orchestra lie in tens and twenties and almost in fifties, pieces that the conductor might well scrutinize and reproduce. Many of them were once "novelties." In their time, they were played, applauded, discussed, and then laid to perpetual repose in their pigeon-hole. Not a few deserve to be performed again, to become, under the passing years, "novelties" once more. Others are overlooked classics, outside the routine that conductors take with established composers, yet little less deserving than the rest of their music. The season through, Dr. Muck has been a diligent and discovering explorer in the library of the Symphony Orchestra. From it he has drawn forth Sgambati's Bischoff's, Sinding's, Sibelius's and many another neglected symphony. In it he has found this or that available miscellaneous piece. From the shelves on which they had long gathered dust came Charpentier's "Italian Impressions," Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," Debussy's "The Sea," Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" and Mahler's mighty symphony of last week. By meticulous record not one of these was new in 1912-13 to the Symphony Concerts. By actual impression upon hearers, almost every one was as novel as though it had come fresh from composers and publishers. Count these as "novelties," as they really were, and the number of the new pieces of the year is more than doubled. With these reproductions truly classified, it rises as high as any just expectation could demand.

"Novelties" and Information

Almost without exception the novel pieces on Dr. Muck's programmes in the strict sense of the words have deserved their place there. Lendvai's new symphony was music of uncommon individuality and of no little power. "Max and Moritz" was at least an amusing orchestral feat. Holbrooke's "Queen Mab" brought a composer of unusual imagination into the repertory

Continued on Page Thirteen

of the Symphony Concerts. The high place of Reger among contemporary composers warrants the performance of each new orchestral piece, like the "Concerto in the Olden Style," from his hand. Mr. Chadwick's "Aphrodite" was above the average of the music of American composers. Dr. Muck's novelties, again in the strict sense of the word, so bore witness to the discrimination with which he chose them. Yet, as some say openly or under their breaths, there might have been more of them to the gratification of lively musical curiosities. Probably there will be another season. For half at least of the current musical year Dr. Muck sought before all else to raise the orchestra to his standards of performance, alike in range of technical accomplishment and of imparting eloquence. Such schooling of an orchestra is best done, not with the newest "novelties," however exacting, but with established classics and repertory pieces that can be quite as exacting in their kind as well. Dr. Muck has lifted the orchestra to these standards; he may make it a more varied but hardly a more sensitive instrument than it has now become. Another year he may play upon it what he will, as he will.

Then those who now complain that the season through we have heard no new French music from the young and rising Parisian composers may protest more justly at what they choose to call narrowness and oversight. Then also those that are fain to hear the music of Schönberg or Korngold may more forcibly ply their arguments for the inclusion of one or another specimen of it in Dr. Muck's programmes. As they make their plea, there is a measure of validity in it. The music of Schönberg, for example may not fall as music upon Dr. Muck's ears. It may deserve the denunciation and the derision that have been heaped upon it. But it is also music that is making lively stir and causing hot debate in the world. For the information of the public of the Symphony Concerts, it should be played at them that it may hear and judge for itself. Catholicity, one of the chief and enduring glories of the concerts, demands that even Schönberg should have at least his passing place on the programmes. The secondary Parisians—Ravel or Roussel, Schmitt or Roger-Ducasse—may be only imitating Debussy, as Dr. Muck contends, but may we not hear and judge the nature and the extent of this imitation for ourselves? By common consent, the Symphony Orchestra has its obligation to be musically informing.

BOSTON GLOBE

APRIL 26. 1

23D REHEARSAL.

Beethoven's Fourth Symphony Brilliantly Played.

Miss Germaine Schnitzer Performs Liszt Concerto With Dash.

The twenty-third Symphony rehearsal, Dr Muck conducted. Miss Germaine Schnitzer was the soloist. The program:

Beethoven.............Fourth Symphony
C. P. Emanuel Bach..Second Symphony
Liszt...............Piano Concerto No. 1
Smetana..Overture to "The Sold Bride"

This symphony by the greatest of the great Bach's sons is interesting since it is hardly a symphony at all, but an extended suite. This clearly and logically ordered old music shows the process of evolution of the symphonies of Mozart, which again are in part reechoed in form and style in the fourth of Beethoven.

Bach's symphony with its stately insistence upon the principal themes, their innocence of thematic development as Beethoven enriched and perfected it and the monotony in color, particularly the grey woodwind, all tend to give it a meager character to modern ears, but not without the cast of nobility. The themes have a profile; they are differentiated so that the masculinity of a chief subject and the feminity of a contrasting one are unmistakable. There are abrupt contrasts in dynamics, and there is considerable freedom in modulation. As one of the foundations out of which Haydn continued to build up a symphonic basis for Mozart and Beethoven, this symphony is of interest.

The Beethoven was played with a scholarly grasp of thye interpretative devices that give orchestral music character. To say that Dr Muck's readings have crystal clarity and the proportion of a piece of architecture resplendent in its majesty and beauty is repetition. But how he illumined every measure and period yesterday. There was plasticity of phrase; there was unerring judgment in the balance between the predominating and accompanying voices, and in the graduation of the long ascent to a climax; there Smetana's overture, which reflects the lusty peasant jollity which the whole opera brews, was played with extraordinary brilliance. The string choirs went scurrying after each other in the tempestuous fugue like runners waiting impatient to be off. The whole overture was infectious with full-blooded, brawny humor. It was one of the most spontaneous performances Dr Muck has given.

Miss Schnitzer plausibly may have excited the demonstrative applause. As a pianist she is both fiery and muscular and her technic permits her to play very fast and very loud. She took the scherzo at a pace which caused the men some amusement to follow. All this is stimulating and diverting. But there are other qualities which have their place. Miss Schnitzer's performance was not characterized for a bravura of patrician elegance, or for an arrogant abandon in passages of declamation; nor was she always mindful of a vocal tone or of flexibility of nuance in the passages which should be sung. There was a dash in her playing which always excites wonder and transport, and there was also the touch of the commonplace.

For the concerts next week, the last of the season, Dr Muck has chosen a program to honor the centenary of Wagner's birth. The overture to "Rienzi," the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" and the prelude to "Parsifal" will be played. The symphony will be Brahms' No. 1.

TIGHT BINDING

APRIL 26.

TRANSCRIPT.

NEWS OF MUSIC AND PLAYS

The Pops Again

On Monday, May 5, the Pop Concerts begin once more in Symphony Hall, to continue every evening except Sunday for eight weeks and a half through Thursday, July 3. This year, the orchestra has been increased by a fifth of its numbers. Hitherto for many seasons fifty-five men from the Symphony Orchestra have composed it. This spring there will be sixty-six, two-thirds of the Symphony Orchestra at its full strength. Heretofore, again, two conductors have divided the leading—one through May; the other through June. This year there will be three: Mr. Urack from May 5 through May 24; Mr. Maquarre best-liked of all the recent conductors of The Pops, from May 26 through June 18; and Mr. Lenom from June 19 through July 3. Mr. Urack and Mr. Lenom come new to such work here; but Mr. Urack has already proved his abilities as a conductor in the weeks in which Dr. Muck was too ill to take the regular Symphony Concerts and Mr. Lenom—the second obee of the orchestra—is of capacity and experience in such concerts.

Otherwise The Pops will run the course that they have run these many years to the recurring pleasure of the town. Light music will make the programmes—favorite overtures, new and old; popular classics; potpourris from operas, operettas and musical plays; Viennese waltzes; ballet tunes; amiable trifles; and stoutly rhythmed marches. Extra pieces will supplement the twelve regular numbers of each programme; the organ will be used frequently; the quality and spirit of performance will be kept at the standard of recent years. Tables, of course, will replace the chairs of the floor; and there the audience may smoke at will and eat and drink whatever the buffet and the cellars yield. The lower balcony will be kept as heretofore for those who would avoid the smoke, and they will have their restaurant hard by. To be light-minded and light-mannered will again be the way of The Pops. For more springs than it is easy to count, the town has liked them so.

---

history, which l lovers of the "Vestiges of the book, and e, has allowed r themselves, arrative from British in 1640 century. He e insurrection d Winter; the town of San De la Haye; ge by Count
ath of Lord Hyder Ali in elations with t Orme, the ndia between

S HS like tion and ling and yed
net.
& CO.
D ay

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDA

uck's Programme - Making dencies in me

P.

o years during first served as the Symphony ontroversy over s was endless.
h after his com-after his deparfirst two years ding term, the ed liked to conwith Dr. Muck's
e usual diversified rse of such disogrammes suffered sic pieces; or they contemporary mu-far too many fa-were cumbered with lties." They over-ians, or Strauss and
"national" Russians.
no larger share in ? Or Dvořák? The
o long and exacting;
rt and too little dirbed wrote protest-management and the plained, as men and pain and chagrin, and in the corners protests were many voiced a multitude of counafety." In this multiafety—for Dr. Muck. He y tranquilly and to the chose and arranged his ording to his own lights.

a Contrast

o his post last autumn Dr.
resumed programme-making,
e end of April, he has finished ourth and final programme of
In all the intervening seven e voices of complaint and pro-been relatively few and feeble.
ave grumbling subscribers ade management of the concerts;
stil e rarely have they lamented aloud in the newspapers. Yet the programmes have been open in more or less degree to nearly every objection urged against them through Dr. Muck's first term. Neither in theory nor in practice has the conductor much diverged from his former standards and procedure with them. In one respect, indeed they have been very singular, but no one has much heeded it.

As few have asked whether the programmes were "unified" according to the theory upon which Dr. Muck is presumed to pick and arrange his lists. No more have found them over-crowded with classic and familiar pieces or neglectful of contemporary and novel music. The Debussyites have seldom lifted wailing voices; the Straussites are still heavy with the satiety of Mr. Fiedler's final years. The ears of the ultra-moderns have tingled to Reger's, Lendvai's, Holbrooke's, Mraczek's and Loeffler's music. The devotees of American composers have heard their Chadwick and their Macdowell. The Brucknerites and the Mahlerites have had each their symphony. The classicists have had their fill of Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven. Hearing Borodin and Rimsky-Korskoff in unfamiliar pieces, those that crave the Russians have not heeded the relative absence of Tschaikowsky. The length of the concets, when they were long, has seemingly vexed few.

Thus the champions of Dr. Muck's programmes have rested on their arms in the pervading tranquility, while even those who used to scrutinize the list of pieces each week to find new opportunity for cavil, have quite overlooked a singularity that of old they would have rolled upon their tongues. Concertos and other solo pieces aside, seventy-two items have filled Dr. Muck's programmes this season. Of those items fifty-one are pieces that stood on the programmes of the concerts of his first term. In other words a little more than two-thirds of his numbers have been music that he had already played with the Symphony Orchestra. What a neglected opportunity! What crowning proof that Dr. Muck's programmes are taken for granted now!

Lengthened Concerts

To the advantage of the concerts, Dr. Muck has continued a change that Mr. Fiedler made first and steadily upheld. How the precedent arose in Mr. Gericke's day that the Symphony Concerts should be only an hour and a half long, no one now seems quite able to say. When conductor and custom so fixed their length, deduction of the intermission and of the minutes consumed in applause and recalls, especially when there was a soloist to acclaim, usually left seventy minutes at most for the actual performance of music. Thirty-five or forty of them might fall to the chosen symphony, to say nothing of a soloist's concerto. Such a tacit limitation of time cribbed the conductor in the choice of his pieces and narrowed the scope of the concerts; while it was hard to believe that the receptive faculties of the audiences were benumbed at the end of an hour and a half. Little by little, Mr. Fiedler lengthened the concerts to an hour and forty-five minutes or on occasion to two hours. Dr. Muck has quietly anl wisely adhered to the change. The advantages to the conductor in his programme-making; to the audience in the variety of pieces that they hear; and to the range and interest of the concerts in general, speak for themselves. Moreover, as in Mr. Fiedler's time, the public has shown no impatience under the new custom. Departures in the course of the concert were more numerous in Dr. Muck's first term, when his programmes were short, than they have been this season, when they were often long. A long programme will hold the audience, if it is interesting. A short programme will not, if that same audience finds it dull. Thus by the practice of two conductors the Symphony Concerts have been definitively lengthened. On that score they accord better now with similar concerts elsewhere in Europe and in America.

Two More Innovations

In two respects, besides, Dr. Muck, whose mind will work logically, has been quietly bringing rule and custom into the programmes of the Symphony Concerts. One is a relatively minor ordnance. Under his predecessors, an assisting singer might, if she chose, sing songs to piano accompaniment for one or more of her appointed numbers. The singers of the year now ending have indeed sung songs, but always orchestrated songs. A piano has stood upon the stage only when the score added it to the orchestra or a virtuoso was to play a concerto upon it. As the purists say in a council of perfection to which none but them has attained, a singing voice is a disconcerting anomaly in a symphony concert. By wider agreement, a song sung to a piano accompaniment, while an idle orchestra sits listening by, certainly is. Songs with piano belong to the relative intimacy of the recital in a small hall to a limited audience. Songs may have their place in symphony concerts; but they must be scaled to an orchestral accompaniment, lest they be swallowed in the extent and magnitude of their surroundings, and seem still more an interruption to the sequence of orchestral pieces. Dr. Muck has done well to sanction only orchestrated songs for the singing soloists.

The other systematizing step is of larger moment. Almost steadily throughout the year, Dr. Muck has balanced a modern symphony, or tone-poem (which is its contemporary equivalent), with a classic symphony. He began the first concert with a symphony by Beethoven; the second with a symphony by Sgambati; the third with a symphony by Bischoff; the fourth with another symphony by Beethoven. A light symphony by Hadyn at one concert preceded a long and mighty symphony by Mahler at the next. And so forth, almost from concert to concert not only in the balancing of classic and modern symphonies, but of symphonies that were exacting to hear with symphonies that came and went in easy pleasure. Out of this quiet wisdom have come a succession of symphonies at which neither the devoted classicists nor the insistent modernists could reasonably grumble, and a soothing diversity of impression to those that used to complain that Dr. Muck's programmes were monotonous. Yet in all this Dr. Muck has avoided hard-and-fast systematizing. He has kept his balancing and his alternating elastic. He has not imposed a symphony on every concert. He has not made his alternations an invariable rule. He has neither humored nor overburdened his audiences. He has not forgotten that in a long series of concerts the unexpected is an essential element. Dr. Muck still "unifies" his programmes: that is to say he will not let music of one distinctive style stifle or cloud music of another, less able to bear the strain of contiguity. No more will he jumble unrelated items into a single programme that each may tickle the hearers' ears with a new and pungent sensation. But he is less rigid and theoretical in his "unification" than he once was. It is so pliant now that often it has been hardly more than a clear and reasonable coördination.

Exploring the Library

Yet again, Dr. Muck has brought a new and fruitful procedure into his programme-making. Certain classics must inevitably have their recurring place on his or any other conductor's programmes—the symphonies of Beethoven, Schumann, Schubert, Mozart, Haydn; the "standard overtures" and many another established piece. They are ever-present, as it were, in the mind of a conductor when he sits down to programme-making. He has only to distribute them advisedly through his concerts. At his elbow also, and similarly present for the time in his mind, are sundry novel pieces, deserving performance. This or that new tone-poem has made a stir in Europe and warrants repetition in Boston. One and another new piece has obvious individuality and achievement that the conductor would fain publish to his audiences. Again he has only to distribute as many of these as he may through his programmes as shrewdly as he sprinkled them with his classics. Between both he may almost fill his lists for the year.

Yet waiting on the shelves of the library of the orchestra lie in tens and twenties and almost in fifties, pieces that the conductor might well scrutinize and reproduce. Many of them were once "novelties." In their time, they were played, applauded, discussed, and then laid to perpetual repose in their pigeon-hole. Not a few deserve to be performed again, to become, under the passing years, "novelties" once more. Others are overlooked classics, outside the routine that conductors take with established composers, yet little less deserving than the rest of their music. The season through, Dr. Muck has been a diligent and discovering explorer in the library of the Symphony Orchestra. From it he has drawn forth Sgambati's Bischoff's, Sinding's, Sibelius's and many another neglected symphony. In it he has found this or that available miscellaneous piece. From the shelves on which they had long gathered dust came Charpentier's "Italian Impressions," Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," Debussy's "The Sea," Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" and Mahler's mighty symphony of last week. By meticulous record not one of these was new in 1912-13 to the Symphony Concerts. By actual impression upon hearers, almost every one was as novel as though it had come fresh from composers and publishers. Count these as "novelties," as they really were, and the number of the new pieces of the year is more than doubled. With these reproductions truly classified, it rises as high as any just expectation could demand.

"Novelties" and Information

Almost without exception the novel pieces on Dr. Muck's programmes in the strict sense of the words have deserved their place there. Lendvai's new symphony was music of uncommon individuality and of no little power. "Max and Moritz" was at least an amusing orchestral feat. Holbrooke's "Queen Mab" brought a composer of unusual imagination into the repertory

Continued on Page Thirteen

of the Symphony Concerts. The high place of Reger among contemporary composers warrants the performance of each new orchestral piece, like the "Concerto in the Olden Style," from his hand. Mr. Chadwick's "Aphrodite" was above the average of the music of American composers. Dr. Muck's novelties, again in the strict sense of the word, so bore witness to the discrimination with which he chose them. Yet, as some say openly or under their breaths, there might have been more of them to the gratification of lively musical curiosities. Probably there will be another season. For half at least of the current musical year Dr. Muck sought before all else to raise the orchestra to his standards of performance, alike in range of technical accomplishment and of imparting eloquence. Such schooling of an orchestra is best done, not with the newest "novelties," however exacting, but with established classics and repertory pieces that can be quite as exacting in their kind as well. Dr. Muck has lifted the orchestra to these standards; he may make it a more varied but hardly a more sensitive instrument than it has now become. Another year he may play upon it what he will, as he will.

Then those who now complain that the season through we have heard no new French music from the young and rising Parisian composers may protest more justly at what they choose to call narrowness and oversight. Then also those that are fain to hear the music of Schönberg or Korngold may more forcibly ply their arguments for the inclusion of one or another specimen of it in Dr. Muck's programmes. As they make their plea, there is a measure of validity in it. The music of Schönberg, for example may not fall as music upon Dr. Muck's ears. It may deserve the denunciation and the derision that have been heaped upon it. But it is also music that is making lively stir and causing hot debate in the world. For the information of the public of the Symphony Concerts, it should be played at them that it may hear and judge for itself. Catholicity, one of the chief and enduring glories of the concerts, demands that even Schönberg should have at least his passing place on the programmes. The secondary Parisians—Ravel or Roussel, Schmitt or Roger-Ducasse—may be only imitating Debussy, as Dr. Muck contends, but may we not hear and judge the nature and the extent of this imitation for ourselves? By common consent, the Symphony Orchestra has its obligation to be musically informing.

BOSTON GLOBE—
APRIL 26. 1

23D REHEARSAL.

Beethoven's Fourth Symphony Brilliantly Played.

Miss Germaine Schnitzer Performs Liszt Concerto With Dash.

The twenty-third Symphony rehearsal, Dr Muck conducted. Miss Germaine Schnitzer was the soloist. The program:

Beethoven	Fourth Symphony
C. P. Emanuel Bach	Second Symphony
Liszt	Piano Concerto No. 1
Smetana	Overture to "The Sold Bride"

This symphony by the greatest of the great Bach's sons is interesting since it is hardly a symphony at all, but an extended suite. This clearly and logically ordered old music shows the process of evolution of the symphonies of Mozart, which again are in part re-echoed in form and style in the fourth of Beethoven.

Bach's symphony with its stately insistence upon the principal themes, their innocence of thematic development as Beethoven enriched and perfected it and the monotony in color, particularly the grey woodwind, all tend to give it a meager character to modern ears, but not without the cast of nobility. The themes have a profile; they are differentiated so that the masculinity of a chief subject and the feminity of a contrasting one are unmistakable. There are abrupt contrasts in dynamics, and there is considerable freedom in modulation. As one of the foundations out of which Haydn continued to build up a symphonic basis for Mozart and Beethoven, this symphony is of interest.

The Beethoven was played with a scholarly grasp of thye interpretative devices that give orchestral music character. To say that Dr Muck's readings have crystal clarity and the proportion of a piece of architecture resplendent in its majesty and beauty is repetition. But how he illumined every measure and period yesterday. There was plasticity of phrase; there was unerring judgment in the balance between the predominating and accompanying voices, and in the graduation of the long ascent to a climax; there Smetana's overture, which reflects the lusty peasant jollity which the whole opera brews, was played with extraordinary brilliance. The string choirs went scurrying after each other in the tempestuous fugue like runners waiting impatient to be off. The whole overture was infectious with full-blooded, brawny humor. It was one of the most spontaneous performances Dr Muck has given.

Miss Schnitzer plausibly may have excited the demonstrative applause. As a pianist she is both fiery and muscular and her technic permits her to play very fast and very loud. She took the scherzo at a pace which caused the men some amusement to follow. All this is stimulating and diverting. But there are other qualities which have their place. Miss Schnitzer's performance was not characterized for a bravura of patrician elegance, or for an arrogant abandon in passages of declamation; nor was she always mindful of a vocal tone or of flexibility of nuance in the passages which should be sung. There was a dash in her playing which always excites wonder and transport, and there was also the touch of the commonplace.

For the concerts next week, the last of the season, Dr Muck has chosen a program to honor the centenary of Wagner's birth. The overture to "Rienzi," the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" and the prelude to "Parsifal" will be played. The symphony will be Brahms' No. 1.

"Contemporary Classics"

As Dr. Muck's programmes may reasonably bring more new pieces next season, so they may reasonably give more place to what may fairly be called contemporary classics. There are old-established classics, like many a symphony of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven and Schumann and Dr. Muck gives them just and recurring room in the Symphony Concerts. There are modern classics as well—the symphonies of Brahms, the overtures and the preludes of Wagner, sundry symphonic poems of Liszt, various Russian pieces—and again Dr. Muck has put them justly and recurringly on his lists. Are there not also, and by clear and fair title pieces that may rank as contemporary classics and be entitled to all the emoluments of their position? By this time, for example, are not the tone-poems of Strauss from "Don Juan" through the "Symphonia Domestica" sufficiently established in the orchestral repertory the world over and sufficiently grateful to many sorts of hearers to warrant the performance of two or three or four of them in alternate years as the symphonies of Beethoven are alternated from season to season? Is not much of the music of Debussy and d'Indy of like deserts? Do not these contemporary classics tighten their hold upon their hearers by each new repetition, and so become modern classics of unquestioned right to their recurring place in symphony concerts. Dr. Muck is a conductor of will and courage. It takes relatively little of both so to "recognize" Strauss or Debussy. Dr. Muck is also a man who reasons, and reason seems all on the side of such recognition.

TRANSCRIPT,
APRIL 26, 1913

Symphony Hall—Symphony Concerts

The hundredth anniversary of the bir of Wagner, now less than a month away will be celebrated next Friday and Satur day at the final pair of Symphony Con certs, so far in hampering circumstanc conductor, orchestra and management ca note it. The death of Mr. Schuecker de prived the orchestra of its only harpist none was obtainable for a fortnight outside the Musicians' Union. Hence no music of Wagner that requires a harp can be played. Conductor and management wished an eminent singer, tenor or soprano, that certain fragments of Wagner's music-dramas might be sung. So late in the season none was obtainable. Consequently the commemoration has declined into the performance of one of Wagner's overtures and two of his preludes; the overture to "Rienzi" for an example of his early music; the prelude to "Tristan" out of the music of his maturity and the prelude to "Parsifal" from the music of his final years. Each piece at least is representative and together the three make a significant sequence. By curious juxtaposition, from Brahms comes the first half of the programme. While he lived and wrote not a few of his followers set his symphonic music in rivalry and contrast with Wagner's music of opera. Now that both are dead, they rank as the two most illustrious German composers of the last half of the nineteenth century. The chosen piece is Brahms's first symphony in C minor. In his first term here Dr. Muck put it early on his programmes, and the performance was a revelation both of the eloquence of the music and the eloquence of the conductor. He may well now take leave in it.

POST, APRIL 27,

Dr. Muck's Season

Rare Qualities of Performances of Past Winter—A Conductor Especially Fitted for His Post—Programmes That Have Not Always Pleased—News of the Week—The Pop Conerts

The public rehearsal and concert of the next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will represent the 24th and last pair of concerts to be given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. One week from tomorrow night the chaste auditorium of Symphony Hall will be transformed by means of tables, bottles, an unceremonious patronage, and smoke. Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be perceived, occasionally, in the hazy distance, and now and then it will be observed that they are performing among themselves. This will be the opening night of the new season of the "Pop" concerts, of which there is a more extended announcement in another column.

The past season now coming to an end has been among the most successful in the history of the Boston Symphony. The performances of an orchestra long and justly famous for its standards have been, if anything, more remarkable than ever. This is said without any intended reflection upon the excellent services of Mr. Fiedler and of his predecessors. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has developed with its conductors. It is not invidious to say that Dr. Muck, returning to Boston for his second term, returns a greater conductor than he appeared when he first stepped upon the stage of Symphony Hall, a little more than six years ago.

Then his distinguishing gifts made his appearances memorable. Today his is a splendid maturity. The personality and the art of the man—and the personality and art of Dr. Muck are not easily separated—are at their ripest. And no leader is more fitted for the performance of the duties which are Dr. Muck's. The demands of his position are more than taxing. It is one thing for a celebrated conductor, in these days fast assuming the importance and the prerogatives of a petted prima donna, to travel as a "guest" conductor, from city to city, from Europe to America and back again, to receive everywhere the plaudits of the crowd, and the "tusch" of an expectant orchestra, and then conduct brilliantly. But to secure from an orchestra the finest results through a season which entails so many performances in Boston and other cities, is a task which may well dismay the most gifted and industrious of leaders. The ability to secure constant, unflagging response from the players, and to make each concert a fresh experience for the subscriber to the series of 24, is surely one of the supreme tests of the musician who directs, and, the test successfully passed, the most convincing testimony to his greatness. Dr. Muck has ever stood a little aside from the flare of the limelight. From the beginning of his career he has worked steadily and persistently with one end in view: the conductor's duty to his music and his audiences. This attitude has greatly enriched his capacities as a musician. For it hardly matters what the music is; whether it is or is not of the highest quality; whether or not it meets the personal taste of the conductor. Dr. Muck interprets the composition as though it were his own, as though he were directing it in the heat of a first enthusiasm. And his is the perfectly proportioned art of a master musician, and the magnetism of a leader of men.

His interpretations are more consistent than his tastes, or at least than his remarks, as published, concerning various music and various composers. It is a curious thing, for instance, for a man to condemn as unworthy the disciples and imitators of Strauss, and then give a splendid performance of such a work as Mraczek's orchestral burleske, "Max und Moritz," a piece so patently after the manner of Strauss that American critics are still in the dark as to whether the work was intended for serious consideration, in itself, or whether it was the intention of the composer to parody the manner of Strauss. In other words, whether critics should laugh at the composer, or with him! On this profound problem America is still in the dark. At the result of this particular inconsistency Dr. Muck can well afford a laugh.

And yet infinite plans were spent on a memorable performance of a memorably empty work, the symphony in E major of Bischoff, a work that struggles vainly to throw off the mantle of Richard the second, a work which is, in addition, inexcusably empty, swollen, lengthy without cause or excuse. For this work, indeed, there seems little apology. It is by an imitator of Strauss, and neither the two performances of the symphony which Dr. Muck gave when he first visited Boston, nor the really wonderful performance given under him this season, have met with any kindling response, from either public or press.

It is perhaps justifiable for a conductor to remark that of contemporaneous Frenchmen, Debussy only seems an original and strongly marked individuality. There is a certain composer named Vincent D'Indy, not unknown to music lovers of this city. He has composed works very significant, and strongly contrasted with the tendencies of Debussy, and his attitude in composition, as well as the unquestionable value of much of his music, make it seem fitting that he should not go without presentation in a season of orchestral concerts in Boston. There is a galaxy of younger men about Debussy. There are young Russian composers of whom the public is curious. These men may be disciples or imitators, but they have been taken seriously abroad, and Boston Symphony audiences would like an opportunity of deciding upon their value for themselves. The local public has a proverbial curiosity about new music, a curiosity which is at once eager and intelligent, and there is in Symphony Hall a splendid library of scores, regularly and often increased by contributions from publishing firms of Europe. There is an orchestra capable of performing any music that is composed. This orchestra, this library, these many composers who are progressing, deserve hearing, and, especially, such hearing as can be accorded by a conductor who surely ranks among the three or four greatest conductors of this day.

There is also plenty of room for discussion of the theories attributed to Dr. Muck in the matter of programmes. He is quoted as stating that works of certain periods and schools should be heard together; that pictures of conflicting periods and styles would not look well side by side on a wall, etc. No one disputes this. Nor does anyone dispute the fact that nothing in the world is likely to be so dull as a room full of pictures by one artist, however great or small. We become fatigued with a programme of Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven. And on the other hand our ears are easily and quickly surfeited with the color and sonority of a programme, which embraces works of Glazounoff, Tschaikowsky, Sibelius and Chabrier.

We believe nothing is more dampening to the enthusiasm than such uncolored programmes as these; and it is surely obvious that well-conceived contrast and balance in a programme—if possible, the contrast of music of various schools and manners—is likely to sustain the attention and interest of the hearer, far more than a less variegated list. A well-balanced programme, like a well-ordered dinner, or anything else artistic, consists of unity which embraces contrast and variety. Not all of the pogrammes of the winter past have had these qualities. Usually the lists have skipped from the very respectable past to the very extreme future. But there has arisen since the holy days of Wagner and his various contemporaries, as Brahms, Liszt, etc., a whole intermediate repertoire of good orchestral music, now practically standardized, known and liked by the vast majority of concert goers. There are enough riches in the library of Symphony Hall to make every concert a Golconda of discoveries for the average music lover, to offer material for the conductor to construct a programme which shall contain at least one classic, a modern composition of marked importance, and frequently an interesting novelty. All of these factors should be present on the programmes of one of the three greatest orchestras in the world. Let us hope that all of them will, as Dr. Muck becomes the more acquainted with his library and his audiences.

What has drawn audiences of increasing size through the season has been the quality of the performances, and of them no praise can be too high. Whether the music be old or new, it has been revitalized under the baton of Dr. Muck; it has had new values, new marvels for the musician as well as the neophyte. A conductor worthy of the performers; and performers that merits such a leader. Concerts which furnish a new ideal on the part of the hearer as well as the performers, which communicate a new conception of music and its eloquence, and of the unlimited capacities of the greatest instrument that the world has yet known, the modern orchestra.

The Pops

With the close of the Symphony season next Saturday night Symphony Hall will undergo its annual spring transformation in preparation for the Pop concerts, which begin on the following Monday evening, May 5. The false floor of the hall will be taken out and the formal seats replaced by tables and chairs. The chorus room at the end of the south corridor will become, as in past years, a pleasant refreshment room for the patrons of the balconies. Formality will disappear until the beginning of July.

The Pops this season will run eight weeks and a half, from Monday evening, May 5, until Thursday evening, July 3. In other essentials they will be the same as they have been for the past few years. One important fact, however, should be noted. The orchestra will be considerably larger than it has ever been. Instead of 55 men it will have 66. Moreover, interest will be increased greatly by the appearance of two new conductors. These are Mr. Otto Urack, the assistant conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, and Mr. Clement Lenom, one of the oboes of the Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Maquarre, who has become a great favorite in the last few years, will have the largest share.

Mr. Urack will begin and will be the conductor of the first three weeks. Mr. Urack, as is generally [illegible] came to this country last fall as [illegible] of the principal 'cellists of the orchestra and assistant conductor, and during the illness of Dr. Muck during the winter he conducted the Symphony concerts here and in many cities with much success. He is making an admirable set of programmes and his success seems already assured. The next three weeks and a half Mr. Maquarre will have charge of the orchestra. This will be Mr. Maquarre's fourth season in this place. His high spirited interpretations and his beautiful programmes have given him a unique place among the various men who have conducted these concerts.

Mr. Lenom, who will conduct the last two weeks, is one of the most eminent musicians of the orchestra. He is a man of great experience and much is expected of him.

Reservations are now being taken for tables and balcony seats for any part of the season. There will be the usual number of special college nights. Amherst College will celebrate May 14. Brown University will have its first

---

GLOBE—APRIL 27,

New Conductors This Season at "Pop" Concerts

With the close of the Symphony season next Saturday night Symphony Hall will undergo its annual Spring transformation in preparation for the pop concerts which begin on the following Monday evening, May 5. The false floor of the hall will be taken out and the formal seats replaced by tables and chairs. The chorus room at the end of the south corridor will become, as in past years, a pleasant refreshment room for the patrons of the balconies. Formality will disappear until the beginning of July.

The Pops this season will run eight weeks and a half, from Monday evening, May 5, until Thursday evening, July 3. In other essentials they will be the same as they have been for the past few years. One important fact, however, should be noted. The orchestra will be considerably larger than it has ever been. Instead of 55 men it will have 66. Moreover, interest will be increased greatly by the appearance of two new conductors. These are Otto Urack, Dr Muck's assistant conductor, and Clement Lenom, one of the oboes of the orchestra. Mr Maquarre, who has become a great favorite in the last few years, will have the largest share.

Mr Urack will begin and will be the conductor of the first three weeks. Mr Urack, as is generally known, came to this country last Fall as one of the principal cellists of the orchestra and assistant conductor, and during the illness of Dr Muck during the Winter, he conducted the Symphony concerts here and in many cities with much success. He is making an admirable set of programs and his success seems already assured. The next three weeks and a half Mr Maquarre will have charge of the orchestra. This will be Mr Maquarre's fourth season in this place. His high-spirited interpretations and his attractive programs have given him a unique place among the various men who have conducted these concerts.

Mr Lenom, who will conduct the last two weeks, is one of the most eminent musicians of the orchestra. He is a man of great experience and much is expected of him.

Reservations are now being taken for tables and balcony seats for any part of the season. There will be the usual number of special college nights. Amherst College will celebrate May 14. Brown University will have its first night on May 28. Williams, which has come to be one of the most popular nights of the season, comes on June 3. The Harvard Club has the hall June 19, and other special nights will be announced later.

Dr Muck to Honor Richard Wagner's Centenary

The 32d season of the Symphony Orchestra will end next Saturday evening, May 3. The season from every point of view has been most successful. The general opinion is that under Dr Muck the orchestra has been restored to its old-time virtuosity, and certain it is that the past Winter has seen some of the most brilliant concerts in the history of Boston. From the other important point of view, the financial, the Winter has been all that could be wished for.

The orchestra has played to practically "capacity houses" since it began its work last October. Already subscriptions are being taken for the outside cities where it gives a series of concerts, and these are far ahead of the corresponding date of a year ago. This means that next season will be at least as successful as the one just ended.

At the request of many of the patrons of the Symphony concerts Dr Muck has determined to make his last program in commemoration of the centenary of Richard Wagner's birth. The death of Mr Schuecker, for 26 years harpist of the orchestra, compelled him to make certain changes in his plans, but the second half of the program will be given to Wagner. He will play three pieces, the "Rienzi" overture, the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" and the prelude to "Parsifal." As Dr Muck points out, these three works represent most significantly the beginning, the middle and the end of Wagner's creative career.

The symphony which will lead the program will be Brahms' in C minor, No. 1. When Dr Muck came to Boston in the Fall of 1906 it was his performance of this symphony which first revealed him to the musical public of this city as one of the greatest conductors of our time. It has been asked for many times during the past Winter.

[208]

TRANSCRIPT, APRIL 26, 1913

Symphony Hall—Symphony Concerts

The hundredth anniversary of the bir of Wagner, now less than a month awa will be celebrated next Friday and Satur day at the final pair of Symphony Co certs, so far in hampering circumstanc conductor, orchestra and management ca note it. The death of Mr. Schuecker de prived the orchestra of its only harpist none was obtainable for a fortnight outside the Musicians' Union. Hence n music of Wagner that requires a har can be played. Conductor and management wished an eminent singer, tenor o soprano, that certain fragments of Wagner's music-dramas might be sung. So late in the season none was obtainable. Consequently the commemoration has declined into the performance of one of Wagner's overtures and two of his preludes; the overture to "Rienzi" for an example of his early music; the prelude to "Tristan" out of the music of his maturity and the prelude to "Parsifal" from the music of his final years. Each piece at least is representative and together the three make a significant sequence. By curious juxtaposition, from Brahms comes the first half of the programme. While he lived and wrote not a few of his followers set his symphonic music in rivalry and contrast with Wagner's music of opera. Now that both are dead, they rank as the two most illustrious German composers of the last half of the nineteenth century. The chosen piece is Brahms's first symphony in C minor. In his first term here Dr. Muck put it early on his programmes, and the performance was a revelation both of the eloquence of the music and the eloquence of the conductor. He may well now take leave in it.

POST, APRIL 27,

Dr. Muck's Season

Rare Qualities of Performances of Past Winter—A Conductor Especially Fitted for His Post—Programmes That Have Not Always Pleased—News of the Week—The Pop Conerts

The public rehearsal and concert of the next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will represent the 24th and last pair of concerts to be given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. One week from tomorrow night the chaste auditorium of Symphony Hall will be transformed by means of tables, bottles, an unceremonious patronage, and smoke. Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be perceived, occasionally, in the hazy distance, and now and then it will be observed that they are performing among themselves. This will be the opening night of the new season of the "Pop" concerts, of which there is a more extended announcement in another column.

The past season now coming to an end has been among the most successful in the history of the Boston Symphony. The performances of an orchestra long and justly famous for its standards have been, if anything, more remarkable than ever. This is said without any intended reflection upon the excellent services of Mr. Fiedler and of his predecessors. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has developed with its conductors. It is not invidious to say that Dr. Muck, returning to Boston for his second term, returns a greater conductor than he appeared when he first stepped upon the stage of Symphony Hall, a little more than six years ago.

Then his distinguishing gifts made his appearances memorable. Today his is a splendid maturity. The personality and the art of the man—and the personality and art of Dr. Muck are not easily separated—are at their ripest. And no leader is more fitted for the performance of the duties which are Dr. Muck's. The demands of his position are more than taxing. It is one thing for a celebrated conductor, in these days fast assuming the importance and the prerogatives of a petted prima donna, to travel as a "guest" conductor, from city to city, from Europe to America and back again, to receive everywhere the plaudits of the crowd, and the "tusch" of an expectant orchestra, and then conduct brilliantly. But to secure from an orchestra the finest results through a season which entails so many performances in Boston and other cities, is a task which may well dismay the most gifted and industrious of leaders. The ability to secure constant, unflagging response from the players, and to make each concert a fresh experience for the subscriber to the series of 24, is surely one of the supreme tests of the musician who directs, and, the test successfully passed, the most convincing testimony to his greatness. Dr. Muck has ever stood a little aside from the flare of the limelight. From the beginning of his career he has worked steadily and persistently with one end in view: the conductor's duty to his music and his audiences. This attitude has greatly enriched his capacities as a musician. For it hardly matters what the music is; whether it is or is not of the highest quality; whether or not it meets the personal taste of the conductor. Dr. Muck interprets the composition as though it were his own, as though he were directing it in the heat of a first enthusiasm. And his is the perfectly proportioned art of a master musician, and the magnetism of a leader of men.

His interpretations are more consistent than his tastes, or at least than his remarks, as published, concerning various music and various composers. It is a curious thing, for instance, for a man to condemn as unworthy the disciples and imitators of Strauss, and then give a splendid performance of such a work as Mraczek's orchestral burleske, "Max und Moritz," a piece so patently after the manner of Strauss that American critics are still in the dark as to whether the work was intended for serious consideration, in itself, or whether it was the intention of the composer to parody the manner of Strauss. In other words, whether critics should laugh at the composer, or with him! On this profound problem America is still in the dark. At the result of this particular inconsistency Dr. Muck can well afford a laugh.

And yet infinite plans were spent on a memorable performance of a memorably empty work, the symphony in E major of Bischoff, a work that struggles vainly to throw off the mantle of Richard the second, a work which is, in addition, inexcusably empty, swollen, lengthy without cause or excuse. For this work, indeed, there seems little apology. It is by an imitator of Strauss, and neither the two performances of the symphony which Dr. Muck gave when he first visited Boston, nor the really wonderful performance given under him this season, have met with any kindling response, from either public or press.

It is perhaps justifiable for a conductor to remark that of contemporaneous Frenchmen, Debussy only seems an original and strongly marked individuality. There is a certain composer named Vincent D'Indy, not unknown to music lovers of this city. He has composed works very significant, and strongly contrasted with the tendencies of Debussy, and his attitude in composition, as well as the unquestionable value of much of his music, make it seem fitting that he should not go without presentation in a season of orchestral concerts in Boston. There is a galaxy of younger men about Debussy. There are young Russian composers of whom the public is curious. These men may be disciples or imitators, but they have been taken seriously abroad, and Boston Symphony audiences would like an opportunity of deciding upon their value for themselves. The local public has a proverbial curiosity about new music, a curiosity which is at once eager and intelligent, and there is in Symphony Hall a splendid library of scores, regularly and often increased by contributions from publishing firms of Europe. There is an orchestra capable of performing any music that is composed. This orchestra, this library, these many composers who are progressing, deserve hearing, and, especially, such hearing as can be accorded by a conductor who surely ranks among the three or four greatest conductors of this day.

There is also plenty of room for discussion of the theories attributed to Dr. Muck in the matter of programmes. He is quoted as stating that works of certain periods and schools should be heard together; that pictures of conflicting periods and styles would not look well side by side on a wall, etc. No one disputes this. Nor does anyone dispute the fact that nothing in the world is likely to be so dull as a room full of pictures by one artist, however great or small. We become fatigued with a programme of Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven. And on the other hand our ears are easily and quickly surfeited with the color and sonority of a programme, which embraces works of Glazounoff, Tschaikowsky, Sibelius and Chabrier.

We believe nothing is more dampening to the enthusiasm than such unicolored programmes as these; and it is surely obvious that well-conceived contrast and balance in a programme—if possible, the contrast of music of various schools and manners—is likely to sustain the attention and interest of the hearer, far more than a less variegated list. A well-balanced programme, like a well-ordered dinner, or anything else artistic, consists of unity which embraces contrast and variety. Not all of the pogrammes of the winter past have had these qualities. Usually the lists have skipped from the very respectable past to the very extreme future. But there has arisen since the holy days of Wagner and his various contemporaries, as Brahms, Liszt, etc., a whole intermediate repertoire of good orchestral music, now practically standardized, known and liked by the vast majority of concert goers. There are enough riches in the library of Symphony Hall to make every concert a Golconda of discoveries for the average music lover, to offer material for the conductor to construct a programme which shall contain at least one classic, a modern composition of marked importance, and frequently an interesting novelty. All of these factors should be present on the programmes of one of the three greatest orchestras in the world. Let us hope that all of them will, as Dr. Muck becomes the more acquainted with his library and his audiences.

What has drawn audiences of increasing size through the season has been the quality of the performances, and of them no praise can be too high. Whether the music be old or new, it has been revitalized under the baton of Dr. Muck; it has had new values, new marvels for the musician as well as the neophyte. A conductor worthy of the performers; and performers that merits such a leader. Concerts which furnish a new ideal on the part of the hearer as well as the performers, which communicate a new conception of music and its eloquence, and of the unlimited capacities of the greatest instrument that the world has yet known, the modern orchestra.

"Contemporary Classics"

As Dr. Muck's programmes may reasonably bring more new pieces next season, so they may reasonably give more place to what may fairly be called contemporary classics. There are old-established classics, like many a symphony of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven and Schumann and Dr. Muck gives them just and recurring room in the Symphony Concerts. There are modern classics as well—the symphonies of Brahms, the overtures and the preludes of Wagner, sundry symphonic poems of Liszt, various Russian pieces—and again Dr. Muck has put them justly and recurringly on his lists. Are there not also, and by clear and fair title pieces that may rank as contemporary classics and be entitled to all the emoluments of their position? By this time, for example, are not the tone-poems of Strauss from "Don Juan" through the "Symphonia Domestica" sufficiently established in the orchestral repertory the world over and sufficiently grateful to many sorts of hearers to warrant the performance of two or three or four of them in alternate years as the symphonies of Beethoven are alternated from season to season? Is not much of the music of Debussy and d'Indy of like deserts? Do not these contemporary classics tighten their hold upon their hearers by each new repetition, and so become modern classics of unquestioned right to their recurring place in symphony concerts. Dr. Muck is a conductor of will and courage. It takes relatively little of both so to "recognize" Strauss or Debussy. Dr. Muck is also a man who reasons, and reason seems all on the side of such recognition,

The Pops

With the close of the Symphony season next Saturday night Symphony Hall will undergo its annual spring transformation in preparation for the Pop concerts, which begin on the following Monday evening, May 5. The false floor of the hall will be taken out and the formal seats replaced by tables and chairs. The chorus room at the end of the south corridor will become, as in past years, a pleasant refreshment room for the patrons of the balconies. Formality will disappear until the beginning of July.

The Pops this season will run eight weeks and a half, from Monday evening, May 5, until Thursday evening, July 3. In other essentials they will be the same as they have been for the past few years. One important fact, however, should be noted. The orchestra will be considerably larger than it has ever been. Instead of 55 men it will have 66. Moreover, interest will be increased greatly by the appearance of two new conductors. These are Mr. Otto Urack, the assistant conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, and Mr. Clement Lenom, one of the oboes of the Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Maquarre, who has become a great favorite in the last few years, will have the largest share.

Mr. Urack will begin and will be the conductor of the first three weeks. Mr. Urack, as is generally known, came to this country last fall as one of the principal 'cellists of the orchestra and assistant conductor, and during the illness of Dr. Muck during the winter he conducted the Symphony concerts here and in many cities with much success. He is making an admirable set of programmes and his success seems already assured. The next three weeks and a half Mr. Maquarre will have charge of the orchestra. This will be Mr. Maquarre's fourth season in this place. His high spirited interpretations and his beautiful programmes have given him a unique place among the various men who have conducted these concerts.

Mr. Lenom, who will conduct the last two weeks, is one of the most eminent musicians of the orchestra. He is a man of great experience and much is expected of him.

Reservations are now being taken for tables and balcony seats for any part of the season. There will be the usual number of special college nights. Amherst College will celebrate May 14. Brown University will have its first night on May 28.

GLOBE—APRIL 27,

ew Conductors This Season at "Pop" Concerts

With the close of the Symphony season next Saturday night Symphony Hall will undergo its annual Spring transformation in preparation for the pop concerts which begin on the following Monday evening, May 5. The false floor of the hall will be taken out and the formal seats replaced by tables and chairs. The chorus room at the end of the south corridor will become, as in past years, a pleasant refreshment room for the patrons of the balconies. Formality will disappear until the beginning of July.

The Pops this season will run eight weeks and a half, from Monday evening, May 5, until Thursday evening, July 3. In other essentials they will be the same as they have been for the past few years. One important fact, however, should be noted. The orchestra will be considerably larger than it has ever been. Instead of 55 men it will have 66. Moreover, interest will be increased greatly by the appearance of two new conductors. These are Otto Urack, Dr Muck's assistant conductor, and Clement Lenom, one of the oboes of the orchestra. Mr Maquarre, who has become a great favorite in the last few years, will have the largest share.

Mr Urack will begin and will be the conductor of the first three weeks. Mr Urack, as is generally known, came to this country last Fall as one of the principal cellists of the orchestra and assistant conductor, and during the illness of Dr Muck during the Winter, he conducted the Symphony concerts here and in many cities with much success. He is making an admirable set of programs and his success seems already assured. The next three weeks and a half Mr Maquarre will have charge of the orchestra. This will be Mr Maquarre's fourth season in this place. His high-spirited interpretations and his attractive programs have given him a unique place among the various men who have conducted these concerts.

Mr Lenom, who will conduct the last two weeks, is one of the most eminent musicians of the orchestra. He is a man of great experience and much is expected of him.

Reservations are now being taken for tables and balcony seats for any part of the season. There will be the usual number of special college nights. Amherst College will celebrate May 14. Brown University will have its first night on May 28. Williams, which has come to be one of the most popular nights of the season, comes on June 3. The Harvard Club has the hall June 19, and other special nights will be announced later.

Dr Muck to Honor Richard Wagner's Centenary

The 32d season of the Symphony Orchestra will end next Saturday evening, May 3. The season from every point of view has been most successful. The general opinion is that under Dr Muck the orchestra has been restored to its old-time virtuosity, and certain it is that the past Winter has seen some of the most brilliant concerts in the history of Boston. From the other important point of view, the financial, the Winter has been all that could be wished for.

The orchestra has played to practically "capacity houses" since it began its work last October. Already subscriptions are being taken for the outside cities where it gives a series of concerts, and these are far ahead of the corresponding date of a year ago. This means that next season will be at least as successful as the one just ended.

At the request of many of the patrons of the Symphony concerts Dr Muck has determined to make his last program in commemoration of the centenary of Richard Wagner's birth. The death of Mr Schuecker, for 26 years harpist of the orchestra, compelled him to make certain changes in his plans, but the second half of the program will be given to Wagner. He will play three pieces, the "Rienzi" overture, the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" and the prelude to "Parsifal." As Dr Muck points out, these three works represent most significantly the beginning, the middle and the end of Wagner's creative career.

The symphony which will lead the program will be Brahms' in C minor, No. 1. When Dr Muck came to Boston in the Fall of 1906 it was his performance of this symphony which first revealed him to the musical public of this city as one of the greatest conductors of our time. It has been asked for many times during the past Winter.

[208]

MONITOR,

APRIL 26, 1913

MISS SCHNITZER PLAYS LISZT

With Miss Germaine Schnitzer as soloist, the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor, rehearsed its twenty-third program in Symphony hall on Friday afternoon to the usual applause. The program was as follows: Beethoven, symphony No. 4, in B flat major, op. 60; C. P. E. Bach, symphony in E flat major, No. 2; Liszt, concerto No. 1, E flat major, for piano and orchestra; Smetana, overture to the opera, "The Sold Bride."

There are occasions when the Symphony orchestra just plays, when it calls in a soloist to assist and does little itself but present a praiseworthy, respectable background for the work of the visiting artist. Such an occasion was the twenty-third rehearsal. In the last month of the season Dr. Muck has handled his program on the fortnightly basis, alternating a master performance with a routine performance. And in so doing he has maintained the balance of previous months, when the tour to the cities of the southern circuit came in as a respite from the labors of preparation. Dr. Muck is not the sort of conductor that will venture giving a difficult work without long advance study. The better part of two weeks must be spent in practising the individual choirs of the orchestra, when the selection is of the first technical and interpretive demand. Hence the Symphony subscribers must permit a program of the simpler repertory pieces to intervene between Mahler week and Brahms week.

Dr. Muck shrewdly plots his scheme of emphasis both by months and by seasons. He makes skilful use of his soloists to save labor for himself and to give fair opportunity for them. Artistic economy and conservation have distinguished his administration. His adjustment of his programs to his resources and his attention to the human element of his great tonal mechanism have been in large measure, no doubt, the cause of his extraordinary success.

The symphony of Beethoven was not played remarkably well, nor was it played with conspicuous disregard of its possibilities. It was given what was sufficient for the purposes of the day, an educational reading. Symphony listeners must not be permitted to forget their Beethoven. And if they can hear the fourth symphony with an easy-going, expository sort of presentation, that will do very well to get them ready for the Brahms symphony in C minor. Comparative listening is no small part of the delight of those who attend a series of orchestral concerts. Its purpose is well served in a performance like that of Friday afternoon. Historically the selection by C. P. E. Bach could not but be valuable in a listener's experience. Both this piece and the fourth symphony on an off week ought to be studied with diligent reference to the notes in the program book.

Miss Schnitzer gave an admirable reading of the Liszt concerto, admirable because of a brilliant yet unforced telling of the ideas. Here was modern interpretation applied to Liszt, but only with intent to make Liszt's thought more intelligible and more appealing to our times, not with intent of compelling it out of its epoch. Dr. Muck here, as in all solo performances in which he has a hand, was the real interpreter. Not that he restrained the artist at the piano and made her say what she did not believe herself. Rather he was a guiding force that began to be effectual when the artist prepared the work. Performers who are wise know in advance that an appointment to play a concerto with Dr. Muck implies studying the work in the light of Dr. Muck's general interpretive method. Miss Schnitzer has the wisdom of such performers. Fritz Kreisler has it. That is why the appearances of these artists have been among the solo successes of the season.

As usual the last number of the program contained something worth the time of everybody to stay to the end of the concert for. The "Sold Bride" overture had the theatrical quality, the dramatic impulsion that prepares us for the curtain to rise on the play. It had, too, its folk color, its comedy surprise.

ADVERTISER,

MAY 3.

SYMPHONY CONCERT SEASON ENDED

CLOSING PROGRAMME A BRILLIANT ONE

Its Feature Was an Unusually Brilliant Performance of Brahms' First Symphony.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Brahms, First Symphony. C minor.
Wagner, "Rienzi" Overture.
Wagner, Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde."
Wagner, Prelude to "Parsifal."

The programme was entirely orchestral, a fitting close to a season in which our great musical organization has won such marked instrumental successes. The public showed in an unmistakable manner that they were grateful to Dr. Muck and to his men. Applause at the beginning and yet more at the end gave hearty thanks for benefits received. It has been a triumphant season in almost every particular. Among the most important points of it we may recall the following:—

A striking performance of the Bischoff symphony, which grew stronger on better acquaintance. A rather bitter Reger concerto "in ancient style," which, however, was conducted by Mr. Urack. Lendvai's vague, but heavily scored, symphony, which could not be understood upon a single hearing, and we do not care much to hear it again. Debussy's "La Mer," upon which we do not care to make many voyages. Sinding's symphony in D minor, which made a noble impression.

Mraczek's "Max and Moritz" in which the public were allowed to hear clucking hens in a poultry yard, the sizzling of a frying-pan, the explosion of the schoolmaster's pipe which had been filled with gunpowder, the clacking of the mill which ground the two wicked boys to minute fragments, and all were very happy in tracing these things, even if the music was not very wonderful. Give the auditor a picture to follow and he is supremely content, providing that he can identify it.

Chadwick's "Aphrodite," perhaps his noblest work, and an important addition to the modern repertoire. And Mahler's Fifth symphony, which was wonderfully interpreted. But the most significant point to be noted in this season was the fact that there was a good deal of Beethoven, Brahms, Haydn, Mozart and Weber given, and these works of the masters never failed to arouse great enthusiasm. That was a very healthy sign. It may have been also a protest. Perhaps the temporary madness of Art is passing, and we may yet see the meaningless dissonances and unheard-of progressions, placed with the Cubist pictures and Futurist sculptures in the curiosity shop of the 20th century.

We thank Dr. Muck for keeping the classics well alongside of the freaks so that the comparison might teach a lesson to those who are still normal.

The concert of yesterday afternoon was also very sane and comprehensible. The great symphony of Brahms needed no pictures and stories to enhance its power. It was an appeal to the intellect as well as to the emotions, and the dignity of its themes and the tremendous skill of its figure treatment had a sympathetic interpreter in Dr. Muck. No one can forget his great success with this same work, in Boston, a few years ago. It was then almost a revelation. The performance of yesterday did not come as such a surprise as at that time, but it was a great and memorable interpretation all the same. Dr. Muck manages to give the work as much color as if it were a Mahler symphony, and if poor Hugo Wolf had hear the final coda as our fiery conductor gav it, he would have had no more doubts as to Brahms' ability "to exult." Four r calls followed the end, and the orchestr was obliged to rise, amidst the wildes enthusiasm. But the great power of th work actually made the rest of the concert seem an anti-climax.

It is to be noted that even Wagnerian do not ride Wagner's hobby-horses nowadays. Wagner utterly disowned "Rienzi, but, in spite of its occasional blatancy portions of it remain in the repertoir Wagner wanted to abolish the "Tannhauser" overture, but the modern co ductors and audiences cling to it all th same. Composers ought to learn that th best efforts do not destroy their less ones; a great school does not obliterate a little one; champagne does not abolish beer.

Therefore we found some pleasure in the trumpet blasts that brought in the last of the Tribunes, and we enjoyed the broad melody of the prayer for what it was worth, and did not inquire if it was as great as Isolde's "Liebestod." And, after all, if one scans closely he will find bombast in "Parsifal" and its prelude too. If auditors could only secularize their thoughts in this matter they might form a fairer estimate of this latter work. Perhaps a little study of Nietsche and a recollection of the fact that Wagner did not believe in his own libretto, might help to a fairer judgment of "Parsifal." But Wagner's second-best is better than the very best of any composer now living.

The "Tristan and Isolde" prelude was in too vivid contrast with "Rienzi" (perhaps this was intentional) and "Parsifal" did not make a very thrilling end to the concert, but Dr. Muck was applauded vehemently at the end, all the same. A word of especial praise ought to be added for the horn, trombone and pizzicato string work in the symphony.

At the beginning of the concert the slow [illegible] from Beethoven's Seventh sym-

---

GLOBE—SATURDAY.

MAY 3, 1913.

CLOSING REHEARSAL.

Dr Muck and Orchestra in Extraordinary Concert.

Wagner's Centenary Observed and Brahms' Metamorphosed.

Dr Muck and the orchestra gave the last public rehearsal of the Symphony season yesterday afternoon. Various interests converged in the program. The second movement of Beethoven's seventh symphony were played in memory of John Pierpont Morgan, which, despite the sufficient dignity of its purpose and its performance, seemed but so much preluding to the real business of the afternoon. As usual with such tributes, there were the restless souls who must applaud as a sheer reflex of habit.

The latter half of the program, also in memoriam, denoted the near approach of the centenary of the birth of Richard Wagner, and consisted of three exerpts from the music dramas—the overture to "Rienzi," representative of the beginnings of the composer's art, the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" standing for its noonday, and the prelude to "Parsifal" in completion of the span of his creative work.

Above interest in the program as music or as commemoration arose the consciousness that this was the last Friday afternoon of this first season of Dr Muck's renewed conductorship of the orchestra. It was in the air as he came to his place with his usual quiet poise of manner. It returned after the symphony, when both conductor and players twice acknowledged applause—a habitual and democratic courtesy of Dr Muck. After the group of Wagner numbers it made the demonstration it is true something more than ordinary. Dr Muck was twice recalled and a few plainly desired to prolong a moment which indeed was unusual, but the applause quickly and perfunctorily subsided, and the accustomed rush for carriages and cars began.

There was cause for various meditations yesterday in a concert of inspired and sovereign musicianship on the part both of conductor and orchestra, a concert which might be duplicated again rarely, if ever, except by the same participants. Did those who listened remember back one year, and recall the condition of the orchestra; a state of ensemble in which the signs of disintegration were insidiously perhaps, but none the less surely, appearing? And did they compare yesterday the splendid unanimity of the band, a glorious instrument, sensitive and puissant, with a precision leavened with the plasticity of Nature's rhythms and sonorous euphony which is golden? This spiritual alchemy has been the work of a master refiner, who yesterday, in the Brahms and in the "Tristan," perhaps as never before, brought forth metal of a wondrous purity.

Again thinking back just a year. There was a visit to Boston of a certain celebrated orchestra held to be the most representative British organization. There were compromising phases of the playing which to many were a surprise, an indisputable lack of absolute precision, an inferior tonal quality in the upper strings and particularly in the woodwind. There was a conductor of world-wide eminence, but these deficiencies were inherent and beyond his control.

The orchestra played this same symphony. There were emotional moments in the reading that are recalled with inspiration, but what of the players as a body of individual and collective artists? What was the comparison when Mr Longy and Mr Grisez sang with incomparable art the melodies and the arabesques of the slow movement. A year ago one wished Brahms had given them to the strings. What was the comparison between the whole body of strings as heard then and that of the mellow, vibrant tone heard yesterday?

The manner in which Brahms' symphony was played deserves all praise. Had the composer been present he should have led out the conductor before him. The reading was masterful in its clarity, its exquisite proportion, in the emotional import infused within it while in no way infringing upon the sanity or the fine fibred intellectuality which supposedly characterizes it.

The dominating musical idea was always singing in the ear, and others which clustered about, and which with other conductors have engulfed it, were suppressed. The proverbial muddiness of portions of it became as crystal. Here was much more than Brahms to the fore. Again the recognition to Dr Muck that is his due. What fluidity of shading, what elasticity of rhythm, what eloquence in accentuation. May his summer be a reposeful one, and may his centenary find him full of vigor as of days and of good works.

BOSTON POST,

MAY 3, 1913

SYMPHONY PAYS TRIBUTE

Honors Morgan's Memory at Final Rehearsal

BY OLIN DOWNES

The last public rehearsal of the 32d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The concert this evening will bring to an end the first term of Dr. Muck's present engagement. The programme, which had been previously announced, was prefaced by the performance of the second movement of Beethoven's seventh symphony, in observance of the death of John Pierpont Morgan, who was thus remembered by his close friend, Mr. Higginson. The music was applauded by some, and those who applauded could hardly be blamed for their appreciation.

When Dr. Muck entered the applause was continued for several minutes. It came as the spontaneous tribute of an audience that has grown more enthusiastic at each of the concerts of the winter past.

The main body of the programme, in addition to Beethoven's music, consisted of the Brahms C minor symphony and three overtures or preludes of Wagner, intended as a partial observance of the Wagner centenary: the overture to "Rienzi," the preludes to "Tristan and Isolde" and "Parsifal." The symphony is one of the few works in the grand and heroic mould which have appeared since the time of Beethoven, and its rich, musical context and tremendous emotional force will make it endure as one of the masterpieces of the period that is now called the "modern" period in music. The symphony, like the period, could be called not only "modern" but "romantic," for in this work, written in respectful accordance with the canons of the classic composers, Brahms is a red-hot romanticist, and his romanticism becomes the crowning glory of an artistic mastery that is truly colossal—music that uplifts and rewards humanity, deep in its sufferings and its dreams.

Dr. Muck's performance was equally fortunate in its avoidance of the respectful pedantry of some conductors we have known, or of the sensationalism which is practised with this well known work by Mr. Nikisch, for instance. The symphony was heard as Brahms wrote and concieved it. That is great enough for anyone. And here there sensed that experience of life, that self-command which equips a few men to stand by the side of a great composer and speak for him. Muck accomplished wonders.

The Wagner excerpts, too, were heard at their greatest, and as for the Parsifal prelude, it was played as by a mystic in a temple. Seldom, indeed, has that music been so impressive and so evoked its rapt mood in a bare-walled concert hall.

And proceeding from this latest product of Wagner's pen to one of his earliest writings—the vitality of the "Rienzi" overture—is simply amazing! This music, somewhat after the manner of Meyerbeer, yet modern in a degree that Meyerbeer never came within miles of, is furiously dramatic; and side by side with atrocious solecisms, there are hints even at the very late discoveries of the master. There is heard the love sigh of Tristan, with the characteristic downward drop of the shortened seventh; there are orchestral combinations unheard of in 1840, and the very basis of the orchestral style of today. And when in the "Tristan" prelude, Wagner commences to speak of love and of death—then others may well be silent.

The past season, financially, artistically, has been one of the most successful in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The technical standard of the orchestral performances has never been higher. The programmes have been discussed ere this in the Post. They have disappointed some; but if they had been the poorest programmes in the world, they would have attracted their audiences. A finer series of performances, at the hands of any conductor, it is difficult to conceive.

Certain men, with the character and the ideality to sustain them, grow continually greater in their art, until the moment arrives when all the fruit of long experience, reflection, and the precious enthusiasm which has made them untiring in their pursuit of a high aim is offered the public. Dr. Muck is one of those men, and the audiences of the Boston Symphony concerts are the fortunate recipients of his art.

[209]

MONITOR,

APRIL 26, 1913

MISS SCHNITZER PLAYS LISZT

With Miss Germaine Schnitzer as soloist, the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor, rehearsed its twenty-third program in Symphony hall on Friday afternoon to the usual applause. The program was as follows: Beethoven, symphony No. 4, in B flat major, op. 60; C. P. E. Bach, symphony in E flat major, No. 2; Liszt, concerto No. 1, E flat major, for piano and orchestra; Smetana, overture to the opera, "The Sold Bride."

There are occasions when the Symphony orchestra just plays, when it calls in a soloist to assist and does little itself but present a praiseworthy, respectable background for the work of the visiting artist. Such an occasion was the twenty-third rehearsal. In the last month of the season Dr. Muck has handled his program on the fortnightly basis, alternating a master performance with a routine performance. And in so doing he has maintained the balance of previous months, when the tour to the cities of the southern circuit came in as a respite from the labors of preparation. Dr. Muck is not the sort of conductor that will venture giving a difficult work without long advance study. The better part of two weeks must be spent in practising the individual choirs of the orchestra, when the selection is of the first technical and interpretive demand. Hence the Symphony subscribers must permit a program of the simpler repertory pieces to intervene between Mahler week and Brahms week.

Dr. Muck shrewdly plots his scheme of emphasis both by months and by seasons. He makes skilful use of his soloists to save labor for himself and to give fair opportunity for them. Artistic economy and conservation have distinguished his administration. His adjustment of his programs to his resources and his attention to the human element of his great tonal mechanism have been in large measure, no doubt, the cause of his extraordinary success.

The symphony of Beethoven was not played remarkably well, nor was it played with conspicuous disregard of its possibilities. It was given what was sufficient for the purposes of the day, an educational reading. Symphony listeners must not be permitted to forget their Beethoven. And if they can hear the fourth symphony with an easy-going, expository sort of presentation, that will do very well to get them ready for the Brahms symphony in C minor. Comparative listening is no small part of the delight of those who attend a series of orchestral concerts. Its purpose is well served in a performance like that of Friday afternoon. Historically the selection by C. P. E. Bach could not but be valuable in a listener's experience. Both this piece and the fourth symphony on an off week ought to be studied with diligent reference to the notes in the program book.

Miss Schnitzer gave an admirable reading of the Liszt concerto, admirable because of a brilliant yet unforced telling of the ideas. Here was modern interpretation applied to Liszt, but only with intent to make Liszt's thought more intelligible and more appealing to our times, not with intent of compelling it out of its epoch. Dr. Muck here, as in all solo performances in which he has a hand, was the real interpreter. Not that he restrained the artist at the piano and made her say what she did not believe herself. Rather he was a guiding force that began to be effectual when the artist prepared the work. Performers who are wise know in advance that an appointment to play a concerto with Dr. Muck implies studying the work in the light of Dr. Muck's general interpretive method. Miss Schnitzer has the wisdom of such performers. Fritz Kreisler has it. That is why the appearances of these artists have been among the solo successes of the season.

As usual the last number of the program contained something worth the time of everybody to stay to the end of the concert for. The "Sold Bride" overture had the theatrical quality, the dramatic impulsion that prepares us for the curtain to rise on the play. It had, too, its folk color, its comedy surprise.

ADVERTISER,

MAY 3.

SYMPHONY CONCERT SEASON ENDED

CLOSING PROGRAMME A BRILLIANT ONE

Its Feature Was an Unusually Brilliant Performance of Brahms' First Symphony.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Brahms, First Symphony. C minor.
Wagner, "Rienzi" Overture.
Wagner, Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde."
Wagner, Prelude to "Parsifal."

The programme was entirely orchestral, a fitting close to a season in which our great musical organization has won such marked instrumental successes. The public showed in an unmistakable manner that they were grateful to Dr. Muck and to his men. Applause at the beginning and yet more at the end gave hearty thanks for benefits received. It has been a triumphant season in almost every particular. Among the most important points of it we may recall the following:—

A striking performance of the Bischoff symphony, which grew stronger on better acquaintance. A rather bitter Reger concerto "in ancient style," which, however, was conducted by Mr. Urack. Lendvai's vague, but heavily scored, symphony, which could not be understood upon a single hearing, and we do not care much to hear it again. Debussy's "La Mer," upon which we do not care to make many voyages. Sinding's symphony in D minor, which made a noble impression.

Mraczek's "Max and Moritz" in which the public were allowed to hear clucking hens in a poultry yard, the sizzling of a frying-pan, the explosion of the schoolmaster's pipe which had been filled with gunpowder, the clacking of the mill which ground the two wicked boys to minute fragments, and all were very happy in tracing these things, even if the music was not very wonderful. Give the auditor a picture to follow and he is supremely content, providing that he can identify it.

Chadwick's "Aphrodite," perhaps his noblest work, and an important addition to the modern repertoire. And Mahler's Fifth symphony, which was wonderfully interpreted. But the most significant point to be noted in this season was the fact that there was a good deal of Beethoven, Brahms, Haydn, Mozart and Weber given, and these works of the masters never failed to arouse great enthusiasm. That was a very healthy sign. It may have been also a protest. Perhaps the temporary madness of Art is passing, and we may yet see the meaningless dissonances and unheard-of progressions, placed with the Cubist pictures and Futurist sculptures in the curiosity shop of the 20th century.

We thank Dr. Muck for keeping the classics well alongside of the freaks so that the comparison might teach a lesson to those who are still normal.

The concert of yesterday afternoon was also very sane and comprehensible. The great symphony of Brahms needed no pictures and stories to enhance its power. It was an appeal to the intellect as well as to the emotions, and the dignity of its themes and the tremendous skill of its figure treatment had a sympathetic interpreter in Dr. Muck. No one can forget his great success with this same work, in Boston, a few years ago. It was then almost a revelation. The performance of yesterday did not come as such a surprise as at that time, but it was a great and memorable interpretation all the same Dr. Muck manages to give the work as much color as if it were a Mahler symphony, and if poor Hugo Wolf had hear the final coda as our fiery conductor gav it, he would have had no more doubts as to Brahms' ability "to exult." Four r calls followed the end, and the orchestr was obliged to rise, amidst the wildes enthusiasm. But the great power of th work actually made the rest of the concert seem an anti-climax.

It is to be noted that even Wagnerian do not ride Wagner's hobby-horses nowadays. Wagner utterly disowned "Rienzi, but, in spite of its occasional blatancy portions of it remain in the repertoire Wagner wanted to abolish the "Tannhauser" overture, but the modern conductors and audiences cling to it all th same. Composers ought to learn that the best efforts do not destroy their less ones; a great school does not obliterate a little one; champagne does not abolish beer.

Therefore we found some pleasure in the trumpet blasts that brought in the last of the Tribunes, and we enjoyed the broad melody of the prayer for what it was worth, and did not inquire if it was as great as Isolde's "Liebestod." And, after all, if one scans closely he will find bombast in "Parsifal" and its prelude too. If auditors could only secularize their thoughts in this matter they might form a fairer estimate of this latter work. Perhaps a little study of Nietsche and a recollection of the fact that Wagner did not believe in his own libretto, might help to a fairer judgment of "Parsifal." But Wagner's second-best is better than the very best of any composer now living.

The "Tristan and Isolde" prelude was in too vivid contrast with "Rienzi" (perhaps this was intentional) and "Parsifal" did not make a very thrilling end to the concert, but Dr. Muck was applauded vehemently at the end, all the same. A word of especial praise ought to be added for the horn, trombone and pizzicato string work in the symphony.

At the beginning of the concert the slow

GLOBE—SATURDAY.

MAY 3, 1913.

CLOSING REHEARSAL.

Dr Muck and Orchestra in Extraordinary Concert.

Wagner's Centenary Observed and Brahms' Metamorphosed.

Dr Muck and the orchestra gave the last public rehearsal of the Symphony season yesterday afternoon. Various interests converged in the program. The second movement of Beethoven's seventh symphony were played in memory of John Pierpont Morgan, which, despite the sufficient dignity of its purpose and its performance, seemed but so much preluding to the real business of the afternoon. As usual with such tributes, there were the restless souls who must applaud as a sheer reflex of habit.

The latter half of the program, also in memoriam, denoted the near approach of the centenary of the birth of Richard Wagner, and consisted of three exerpts from the music dramas—the overture to "Rienzi," representative of the beginnings of the composer's art, the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" standing for its noonday, and the prelude to "Parsifal" in completion of the span of his creative work.

Above interest in the program as music or as commemoration arose the consciousness that this was the last Friday afternoon of this first season of Dr Muck's renewed conductorship of the orchestra. It was in the air as he came to his place with his usual quiet poise of manner. It returned after the symphony, when both conductor and players twice acknowledged applause—a habitual and democratic courtesy of Dr Muck. After the group of Wagner numbers it made the demonstration it is true something more than ordinary. Dr Muck was twice recalled and a few plainly desired to prolong a moment which indeed was unusual, but the applause quickly and perfunctorily subsided, and the accustomed rush for carriages and cars began.

There was cause for various meditations yesterday in a concert of inspired and sovereign musicianship on the part both of conductor and orchestra, a concert which might be duplicated again rarely, if ever, except by the same participants. Did those who listened remember back one year, and recall the condition of the orchestra; a state of ensemble in which the signs of disintegration were insidiously perhaps, but none the less surely, appearing? And did they compare yesterday the splendid unanimity of the band, a glorious instrument, sensitive and puissant, with a precision leavened with the plasticity of Nature's rhythms and sonorous euphony which is golden? This spiritual alchemy has been the work of a master refiner, who yesterday, in the Brahms and in the "Tristan," perhaps as never before, brought forth metal of a wondrous purity.

Again thinking back just a year. There was a visit to Boston of a certain celebrated orchestra held to be the most representative British organization. There were compromising phases of the playing which to many were a surprise, an indisputable lack of absolute precision, an inferior tonal quality in the upper strings and particularly in the woodwind. There was a conductor of world-wide eminence, but these deficiencies were inherent and beyond his control.

The orchestra played this same symphony. There were emotional moments in the reading that are recalled with inspiration, but what of the players as a body of individual and collective artists? What was the comparison when Mr Longy and Mr Grisez sang with incomparable art the melodies and the arabesques of the slow movement. A year ago one wished Brahms had given them to the strings. What was the comparison between the whole body of strings as heard then and that of the mellow, vibrant tone heard yesterday?

The manner in which Brahms' symphony was played deserves all praise. Had the composer been present he should have led out the conductor before him. The reading was masterful in its clarity, its exquisite proportion, in the emotional import infused within it while in no way infringing upon the sanity or the fine fibred intellectuality which supposedly characterizes it.

The dominating musical idea was always singing in the ear, and others which clustered about, and which with other conductors have engulfed it, were suppressed. The proverbial muddiness of portions of it became as crystal. Here was much more than Brahms to the fore. Again the recognition to Dr Muck that is his due. What fluidity of shading, what elasticity of rhythm, what eloquence in accentuation. May his summer be a reposeful one, and may his centenary find him full of vigor as of days and of good works.

BOSTON POST,

MAY 3, 1913

SYMPHONY PAYS TRIBUTE

Honors Morgan's Memory at Final Rehearsal

BY OLIN DOWNES

The last public rehearsal of the 32d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The concert this evening will bring to an end the first term of Dr. Muck's present engagement. The programme, which had been previously announced, was prefaced by the performance of the second movement of Beethoven's seventh symphony, in observance of the death of John Pierpont Morgan, who was thus remembered by his close friend, Mr. Higginson. The music was applauded by some, and those who applauded could hardly be blamed for their appreciation.

When Dr. Muck entered the applause was continued for several minutes. It came as the spontaneous tribute of an audience that has grown more enthusiastic at each of the concerts of the winter past.

The main body of the programme, in addition to Beethoven's music, consisted of the Brahms C minor symphony and three overtures or preludes of Wagner, intended as a partial observance of the Wagner centenary: the overture to "Rienzi," the preludes to "Tristan and Isolde" and "Parsifal." The symphony is one of the few works in the grand and heroic mould which have appeared since the time of Beethoven, and its rich, musical context and tremendous emotional force will make it endure as one of the masterpieces of the period that is now called the "modern" period in music. The symphony, like the period, could be called not only "modern" but "romantic," for in this work, written in respectful accordance with the canons of the classic composers, Brahms is a red-hot romanticist, and his romanticism becomes the crowning glory of an artistic mastery that is truly colossal—music that uplifts and rewards humanity, deep in its sufferings and its dreams.

Dr. Muck's performance was equally fortunate in its avoidance of the respectful pedantry of some conductors we have known, or of the sensationalism which is practised with this well known work by Mr. Nikisch, for instance. The symphony was heard as Brahms wrote and concieved it. That is great enough for anyone. And here there sensed that experience of life, that self-command which equips a few men to stand by the side of a great composer and speak for him. Muck accomplished wonders.

The Wagner excerpts, too, were heard at their greatest, and as for the Parsifal prelude, it was played as by a mystic in a temple. Seldom, indeed, has that music been so impressive and so evoked its rapt mood in a bare-walled concert hall.

And proceeding from this latest product of Wagner's pen to one of his earliest writings—the vitality of the "Rienzi" overture—is simply amazing! This music, somewhat after the manner of Meyerbeer, yet modern in a degree that Meyerbeer never came within miles of, is furiously dramatic; and side by side with atrocious solecisms, there are hints even at the very late discoveries of the master. There is heard the love sigh of Tristan, with the characteristic downward drop of the shortened seventh; there are orchestral combinations unheard of in 1840, and the very basis of the orchestral style of today. And when in the "Tristan" prelude, Wagner commences to speak of love and of death—then others may well be silent.

The past season, financially, artistically, has been one of the most successful in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The technical standard of the orchestral performances has never been higher. The programmes have been discussed ere this in the Post. They have disappointed some; but if they had been the poorest programmes in the world, they would have attracted their audiences. A finer series of performances, at the hands of any conductor, it is difficult to conceive.

Certain men, with the character and the ideality to sustain them, grow continually greater in their art, until the moment arrives when all the fruit of long experience, reflection, and the precious enthusiasm which has made them untiring in their pursuit of a high aim is offered the public. Dr. Muck is one of those men, and the audiences of the Boston Symphony concerts are the fortunate recipients of his art.

[209]

MONITOR,
APRIL 26, 1913

MISS SCHNITZER PLAYS LISZT

With Miss Germaine Schnitzer as soloist, the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor, rehearsed its twenty-third program in Symphony hall on Friday afternoon to the usual applause. The program was as follows: Beethoven, symphony No. 4, in B flat major, op. 60; C. P. E. Bach, symphony in E flat major, No. 2; Liszt, concerto No. 1, E flat major, for piano and orchestra; Smetana, overture to the opera, "The Sold Bride."

There are occasions when the Symphony orchestra just plays, when it calls in a soloist to assist and does little itself but present a praiseworthy, respectable background for the work of the visiting artist. Such an occasion was the twenty-third rehearsal. In the last month of the season Dr. Muck has handled his program on the fortnightly basis, alternating a master performance with a routine performance. And in so doing he has maintained the balance of previous months, when the tour to the cities of the southern circuit came in as a respite from the labors of preparation. Dr. Muck is not the sort of conductor that will venture giving a difficult work without long advance study. The better part of two weeks must be spent in practising the individual choirs of the orchestra, when the selection is of the first technical and interpretive demand. Hence the Symphony subscribers must permit a program of the simpler repertory pieces to intervene between Mahler week and Brahms week.

Dr. Muck shrewdly plots his scheme of emphasis both by months and by seasons. He makes skilful use of his soloists to save labor for himself and to give fair opportunity for them. Artistic economy and conservation have distinguished his administration. His adjustment of his programs to his resources and his attention to the human element of his great tonal mechanism have been in large measure, no doubt, the cause of his extraordinary success.

The symphony of Beethoven was not played remarkably well, nor was it played with conspicuous disregard of its possibilities. It was given what was sufficient for the purposes of the day, an educational reading. Symphony listeners must not be permitted to forget their Beethoven. And if they can hear the fourth symphony with an easy-going, expository sort of presentation, that will do very well to get them ready for the Brahms symphony in C minor. Comparative listening is no small part of the delight of those who attend a series of orchestral concerts. Its purpose is well served in a performance like that of Friday afternoon. Historically the selection by C. P. E. Bach could not but be valuable in a listener's experience. Both this piece and the fourth symphony on an off week ought to be studied with diligent reference to the notes in the program book.

Miss Schnitzer gave an admirable reading of the Liszt concerto, admirable because of a brilliant yet unforced telling of the ideas. Here was modern interpretation applied to Liszt, but only with intent to make Liszt's thought more intelligible and more appealing to our times, not with intent of compelling it out of its epoch. Dr. Muck here, as in all solo performances in which he has a hand, was the real interpreter. Not that he restrained the artist at the piano and made her say what she did not believe herself. Rather he was a guiding force that began to be effectual when the artist prepared the work. Performers who are wise know in advance that an appointment to play a concerto with Dr. Muck implies studying the work in the light of Dr. Muck's general interpretive method. Miss Schnitzer has the wisdom of such performers. Fritz Kreisler has it. That is why the appearances of these artists have been among the solo successes of the season.

As usual the last number of the program contained something worth the time of everybody to stay to the end of the concert for. The "Sold Bride" overture had the theatrical quality, the dramatic impulsion that prepares us for the curtain to rise on the play. It had, too, its folk color, its comedy surprise.

ADVERTISER,
MAY 3.

SYMPHONY CONCERT SEASON ENDED

CLOSING PROGRAMME A BRILLIANT ONE

Its Feature Was an Unusually Brilliant Performance of Brahms' First Symphony.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Brahms, First Symphony. C minor.
Wagner, "Rienzi" Overture.
Wagner, Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde."
Wagner, Prelude to "Parsifal."

The programme was entirely orchestral, a fitting close to a season in which our great musical organization has won such marked instrumental successes. The public showed in an unmistakable manner that they were grateful to Dr. Muck and to his men. Applause at the beginning and yet more at the end gave hearty thanks for benefits received. It has been a triumphant season in almost every particular. Among the most important points of it we may recall the following:—

A striking performance of the Bischoff symphony, which grew stronger on better acquaintance. A rather bitter Reger concerto "in ancient style," which, however, was conducted by Mr. Urack. Lendval's vague, but heavily scored, symphony, which could not be understood upon a single hearing, and we do not care much to hear it again. Debussy's "La Mer," upon which we do not care to make many voyages. Sinding's symphony in D minor, which made a noble impression.

Mraczek's "Max and Moritz" in which the public were allowed to hear clucking hens in a poultry yard, the sizzling of a frying-pan, the explosion of the schoolmaster's pipe which had been filled with gunpowder, the clacking of the mill which ground the two wicked boys to minute fragments, and all were very happy in tracing these things, even if the music was not very wonderful. Give the auditor a picture to follow and he is supremely content, providing that he can identify it.

Chadwick's "Aphrodite," perhaps his noblest work, and an important addition to the modern repertoire. And Mahler's Fifth symphony, which was wonderfully interpreted. But the most significant point to be noted in this season was the fact that there was a good deal of Beethoven, Brahms, Haydn, Mozart and Weber given, and these works of the masters never failed to arouse great enthusiasm. That was a very healthy sign. It may have been also a protest. Perhaps the temporary madness of Art is passing, and we may yet see the meaningless dissonances and unheard-of progressions, placed with the Cubist pictures and Futurist sculptures in the curiosity shop of the 20th century.

We thank Dr. Muck for keeping the classics well alongside of the freaks so that the comparison might teach a lesson to those who are still normal.

The concert of yesterday afternoon was also very sane and comprehensible. The great symphony of Brahms needed no pictures and stories to enhance its power. It was an appeal to the intellect as well as to the emotions, and the dignity of its themes and the tremendous skill of its figure treatment had a sympathetic interpreter in Dr. Muck. No one can forget his great success with this same work, in Boston, a few years ago. It was then almost a revelation. The performance of yesterday did not come as such a surprise as at that time, but it was a great and memorable interpretation all the same. Dr. Muck manages to give the work as much color as if it were a Mahler symphony, and if poor Hugo Wolf had heard the final coda as our fiery conductor gave it, he would have had no more doubts as to Brahms' ability "to exult." Four recalls followed the end, and the orchestra was obliged to rise, amidst the wildest enthusiasm. But the great power of the work actually made the rest of the concert seem an anti-climax.

It is to be noted that even Wagnerians do not ride Wagner's hobby-horses nowadays. Wagner utterly disowned "Rienzi," but, in spite of its occasional blatancy, portions of it remain in the repertoire. Wagner wanted to abolish the "Tannhauser" overture, but the modern conductors and audiences cling to it all the same. Composers ought to learn that their best efforts do not destroy their lesser ones; a great school does not obliterate a little one; champagne does not abolish beer.

Therefore we found some pleasure in the trumpet blasts that brought in the last of the Tribunes, and we enjoyed the broad melody of the prayer for what it was worth, and did not inquire if it was as great as Isolde's "Liebestod." And, after all, if one scans closely he will find bombast in "Parsifal" and its prelude too. If auditors could only secularize their thoughts in this matter they might form a fairer estimate of this latter work. Perhaps a little study of Nietsche and a recollection of the fact that Wagner did not believe in his own libretto, might help to a fairer judgment of "Parsifal." But Wagner's second-best is better than the very best of any composer now living.

The "Tristan and Isolde" prelude was in too vivid contrast with "Rienzi" (perhaps this was intentional) and "Parsifal" did not make a very thrilling end to the concert, but Dr. Muck was applauded vehemently at the end, all the same. A word of especial praise ought to be added for the horn, trombone and pizzicato string work in the symphony.

At the beginning of the concert the slow [illegible] Beethoven's Seventh sym-

---

GLOBE—SATURDAY.
MAY 3, 1913.

CLOSING REHEARSAL.

Dr Muck and Orchestra in Extraordinary Concert.

Wagner's Centenary Observed and Brahms' Metamorphosed.

Dr Muck and the orchestra gave the last public rehearsal of the Symphony season yesterday afternoon. Various interests converged in the program. The second movement of Beethoven's seventh symphony were played in memory of John Pierpont Morgan, which, despite the sufficient dignity of its purpose and its performance, seemed but so much preluding to the real business of the afternoon. As usual with such tributes, there were the restless souls who must applaud as a sheer reflex of habit.

The latter half of the program, also in memoriam, denoted the near approach of the centenary of the birth of Richard Wagner, and consisted of three exerpts from the music dramas—the overture to "Rienzi," representative of the beginnings of the composer's art, the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" standing for its noonday, and the prelude to "Parsifal" in completion of the span of his creative work.

Above interest in the program as music or as commemoration arose the consciousness that this was the last Friday afternoon of this first season of Dr Muck's renewed conductorship of the orchestra. It was in the air as he came to his place with his usual quiet poise of manner. It returned after the symphony, when both conductor and players twice acknowledged applause—a habitual and democratic courtesy of Dr Muck. After the group of Wagner numbers it made the demonstration it is true something more than ordinary. Dr Muck was twice recalled and a few plainly desired to prolong a moment which indeed was unusual, but the applause quickly and perfunctorily subsided, and the accustomed rush for carriages and cars began.

There was cause for various meditations yesterday in a concert of inspired and sovereign musicianship on the part both of conductor and orchestra, a concert which might be duplicated again rarely, if ever, except by the same participants. Did those who listened remember back one year, and recall the condition of the orchestra; a state of ensemble in which the signs of disintegration were insidiously perhaps, but none the less surely, appearing? And did they compare yesterday the splendid unanimity of the band, a glorious instrument, sensitive and puissant, with a precision leavened with the plasticity of Nature's rhythms and sonorous euphony which is golden? This spiritual alchemy has been the work of a master refiner, who yesterday, in the Brahms and in the "Tristan," perhaps as never before, brought forth metal of a wondrous purity.

Again thinking back just a year. There was a visit to Boston of a certain celebrated orchestra held to be the most representative British organization. There were compromising phases of the playing which to many were a surprise, an indisputable lack of absolute precision, an inferior tonal quality in the upper strings and particularly in the woodwind. There was a conductor of world-wide eminence, but these deficiencies were inherent and beyond his control.

The orchestra played this same symphony. There were emotional moments in the reading that are recalled with inspiration, but what of the players as a body of individual and collective artists? What was the comparison when Mr Longy and Mr Grisez sang with incomparable art the melodies and the arabesques of the slow movement. A year ago one wished Brahms had given them to the strings. What was the comparison between the whole body of strings as heard then and that of the mellow, vibrant tone heard yesterday?

[illegible]he manner in which Brahms' symphony was played deserves all praise. [illegible] the composer been present he [illegible]d have led out the conductor be[illegible]him. The reading was masterful [illegible] clarity, its exquisite proportion, [illegible] emotional import infused within [illegible] in no way infringing upon the [illegible]r the fine fibred intellectuality [illegible] supposedly characterizes it. [illegible]minating musical idea was al[illegible]ging in the ear, and others [illegible]ustered about, and which with [illegible]nductors have engulfed it, [illegible]pressed. The proverbial mud[illegible] portions of it became as crys[illegible]re was much more than [illegible]o the fore. Again the recog[illegible] Dr Muck that is his due. [illegible]idity of shading, what elas[illegible] rhythm, what eloquence in [illegible]on. May his summer be a [illegible]one, and may his centenary [illegible]ull of vigor as of days and [illegible]rks.

BOSTON POST.
MAY 3, 1913

SYMPHONY PAYS TRIBUTE

Honors Morgan's Memory at Final Rehearsal

BY OLIN DOWNES

The last public rehearsal of the 32d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The concert this evening will bring to an end the first term of Dr. Muck's present engagement. The programme, which had been previously announced, was prefaced by the performance of the second movement of Beethoven's seventh symphony, in observance of the death of John Pierpont Morgan, who was thus remembered by his close friend, Mr. Higginson. The music was applauded by some, and those who applauded could hardly be blamed for their appreciation.

When Dr. Muck entered the applause was continued for several minutes. It came as the spontaneous tribute of an audience that has grown more enthusiastic at each of the concerts of the winter past.

The main body of the programme, in addition to Beethoven's music, consisted of the Brahms C minor symphony and three overtures or preludes of Wagner, intended as a partial observance of the Wagner centenary: the overture to "Rienzi," the preludes to "Tristan and Isolde" and "Parsifal." The symphony is one of the few works in the grand and heroic mould which have appeared since the time of Beethoven, and its rich, musical context and tremendous emotional force will make it endure as one of the masterpieces of the period that is now called the "modern" period in music. The symphony, like the period, could be called not only "modern" but "romantic," for in this work, written in respectful accordance with the canons of the classic composers, Brahms is a red-hot romanticist, and his romanticism becomes the crowning glory of an artistic mastery that is truly colossal—music that uplifts and rewards humanity, deep in its sufferings and its dreams.

Dr. Muck's performance was equally fortunate in its avoidance of the respectful pedantry of some conductors we have known, or of the sensationalism which is practised with this well known work by Mr. Nikisch, for instance. The symphony was heard as Brahms wrote and concieved it. That is great enough for anyone. And here there sensed that experience of life, that self-command which equips a few men to stand by the side of a great composer and speak for him. Muck accomplished wonders.

The Wagner excerpts, too, were heard at their greatest, and as for the Parsifal prelude, it was played as by a mystic in a temple. Seldom, indeed, has that music been so impressive and so evoked its rapt mood in a bare-walled concert hall.

And proceeding from this latest product of Wagner's pen to one of his earliest writings—the vitality of the "Rienzi" overture—is simply amazing! This music, somewhat after the manner of Meyerbeer, yet modern in a degree that Meyerbeer never came within miles of, is furiously dramatic; and side by side with atrocious solecisms, there are hints even at the very late discoveries of the master. There is heard the love sigh of Tristan, with the characteristic downward drop of the shortened seventh; there are orchestral combinations unheard of in 1840, and the very basis of the orchestral style of today. And when in the "Tristan" prelude, Wagner commences to speak of love and of death—then others may well be silent.

The past season, financially, artistically, has been one of the most successful in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The technical standard of the orchestral performances has never been higher. The programmes have been discussed ere this in the Post. They have disappointed some; but if they had been the poorest programmes in the world, they would have attracted their audiences. A finer series of performances, at the hands of any conductor, it is difficult to conceive.

Certain men, with the character and the ideality to sustain them, grow continually greater in their art, until the moment arrives when all the fruit of long experience, reflection, and the precious enthusiasm which has made them untiring in their pursuit of a high aim is offered the public. Dr. Muck is one of those men, and the audiences of the Boston Symphony concerts are the fortunate recipients of his art.

JOURNAL— SATURDAY,

MAY 3, 1913.

TRIBUTE TO MORGAN AT THE SYMPHONY

Maj. Higginson, Founder of Orchestra, Pays Homage to Deeds of Friend.

By E. F. Harkins.

Yesterday's final Friday afternoon Symphony concert opened unexpectedly with a tribute to the late J. Pierpont Morgan in the form of an "In memoriam" movement from one of the Beethoven symphonies. The founder of the orchestra, Maj. Higginson, who was present as usual, took this occasion to pay homage to the deeds of a friend whose integrity in matters of business and intense devotion to art alike attracted his admiration and respect.

Dr. Muck was warmly greeted as he came out to conduct this last matinee of the season. This first part of his present five-year engagement here has renewed the old-time brilliancy of the orchestra and increased the number of patrons not only in Boston, but in the cities visited from month to month. Yesterday, for instance, the hall was completely sold out, notwithstanding the extra fine weather, and the same complimentary conditions will prevail tonight.

The Morgan memorial number comes first on the program. Then follows the Brahms symphony No. 1, in C minor, and the conclusion is made up of three numbers offered in celebration of the Wagner centennial and selected to illustrate the first, the middle and the last stage of the composer's career. There is the "Rienzi" overture, dated 1840; the "Tristan and Isolde" prelude, dated 1859, and the "Parsifal" prelude dated 1877. The performance yesterday was superlatively fine from beginning to end. After the Brahms number the orchestra was honored with one of those stirring ovations which have been so frequent this season.

The special number added to this twenty-fourth program increases the long lead Beethoven's compositions have taken during the season. There have been no less than fourteen Beethoven numbers. Wagner stands second, with nine to his credit. Brahms and Mozart share third place, with five. Liszt, Weber, Richard Strauss and Schubert were each represented four times, while J. S. Bach, Berlioz, Dvorak and Schumann have had three representations. Ten of the 102 numbers were new to Boston, and two, the Lendval symphony and Holbrooke's tone poem, "Queen Mab," were performed for the first time in America.

AMERICAN, SUNDAY, MAY 4, 1913.

FINAL SYMPHONY A MUCK FAREWELL

Famous Orchestra Also Renders Beethoven Selection as Morgan Memorial.

An "in memoriam" for J. Pierpont Morgan and a farewell to Dr. Karl Muck, marked the final concert of the season last night of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Much was given an ovation.

The "in memoriam" was the first number on the program. In memory of the dead financier the orchestra played the second movement from Beethoven's seventh symphony.

The other selections were Brahm's symphony No. 1, in C minor, opus 68, and Wagner's overture to "Rienzi," prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" and the prelude to "Parsifal."

Dr. Muck was encored again and again. He was presented a large bouquet of flowers and at the end of the Brahms symphony, Major Henry L. Higginson walked to the orchestra platform and congratulated the conductor and at the same time bade him "godspeed" with a hearty handshake. At the close of the "Parsifal" prelude, Dr. Muck was forced to appear and reappear three times, but he modestly refrained from making a speech.

Dr. Muck's salary for the season of 109 performances is $28,000. For the first time in twenty years the famous conductor plans to take a long vacation. He will remain in Boston until the last of this month when he will sail for Europe. He will spend the Summer at his country place at Doblebad, Austria.

SUNDAY GLOBE MAY 4, 1913.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Season's Concert Review

The concert season of 1912-1913 came to an end last night, according to the custom which makes it begin and end with the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Men singers and women singers have stood before us, and players upon instruments have come to us across weary miles; have sat down to Bach, Beethoven and Brahms, and have taken in the empty seats in the house with one eye, while counting up the deadheads with the other.

The influx of would-be artists continues. Each of them may have something to deserve praise. Few of them so combine natural gifts and those qualities of mind and heart that they make the convincing, the authoritive interpreter. But one or two of them in an epoch so combines these things as to become a recreator, a seer, one who speaks thoughts of imperishable beauty.

No season or decade is ever prolific in them. Their song is to be treasured the more, because it comes as the song of an exotic bird of the night. The voices of others are as silence with what discrimination may seem plausible and even inevitable after all the miscellaneous coming and going of those who would be and those who are not in concert affairs, two artists above all others have left this public with nobler ideals of emotional beauty than it could have had without them. This may be Mr Ysaye's last visit to this country; if so it will be a memorable one to the thousands who have heard him once more in the full glory of his powers.

Miss Culp who came as a stranger well heralded, but others before whom foreign trumpets were blown had proved of common clay. In her we beheld a phenomenon; a beautiful voice, rare intelligence, deep poetic insight and a womanly sincerity. The fates rarely bring to a focus such gifts or the possibilities of such attainments, and her fullest maturity is yet to come. With Miss Culp, as with Ysaye, the hearer was conscious of an individuality, of a source of creature power which exceeded mere interpretation, which clothed the author's thoughts in such garments as he may have conceived of, but hardly could portray, and there were moments in which his art was wholly eclipsed in the recreation of player or singer. When these two were in the mood the thought of technical means seemed an extraneous and impertinent thing. Life was sung with a spontaneity that was unprovisational.

Dr Muck a Big Factor.

With these stands another interpreter, a name that shall have all praise for a season which it has illumined. Dr Muck has shown in particularly exacting numbers from week to week that he has restored the orchestra to its traditional vertuosity and perfection of ensemble, an ensemble which combines plasticity and precision, and in all knows a golden euphony and sonority. There were three concerts, or rather five, which stand out above the others, the two of the fifth symphony and the violin concerto of Beethoven, Mr Kreisler soloist; the two of the Fahler fifth symphony, and the first concert of the Pension Fund with the Wagner program, than which a more noble tribute hardly could have been offered in the concert room in this season of Wagner's centenary. To these should be added the closing concerts of Friday and yesterday.

There has been debate of Dr Muck's programs. A man of definite and unswerving purpose, he has a plan which governs their building. There were novelties that obviously required an arduous preparation unwarranted by their merits. The standard orchestral literature which comprises Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, and to which Brahms may be added, has not been neglected. More of Strauss, d'Indy, Tschaikowsky, Rimsky Korsakoff would have been heard with pleasure, and there are younger men, such as Florent Schmitt, who are French by education and sympathy, if not always by birth, who arouse curious interest, as there are also young members of the Russian school, like Stravinsky, who are coming or have come into notice.

Concert Novelties of the Season.

A new feature of musical life in Boston was to be found in the two series of Sunday afternoon concerts given at the Boston Opera House and at Symphony Hall. Here was abundant proof of the interest in good music on the part of a great public.

Here follows a list of the season's new concert music. * denotes a first performance (in case of a composer, a first representation) in Boston,  in America and  anywhere. B. S. O. stands for Boston Symphony Orchestra and B. O. H. for Boston Opera House.

Alfano, Franco,* Romantic Suite, B. O. H. Jan 12.

Aubert, Louis, "The Dream" (Little Red Riding Hood), from second act "The Blue Forest," sung March 6  by Mrs Marie Sundelius at a concert of the Longy Club.

Bemberg, music to Muerger's "The Ballad of the Despairing One," performed at Mme Nordica's concert April 20.*

Bizet, incidental music to Daudet's drama "L'Arlesienne" performed B. O. H. March 6, with Paul Marcel French players, Mr Caplet conducting.

Borodine, Polovsian choruses from "Prince Igor," B. O. H. Dec 1.* Song, "Sleeping Princess," sung at the same concert by Mr Marcoux. First performance in Boston with orchestra. Symphony No. 2, Dec 13,* B. S. O.

Bright, Dora, music to ballet "La Camargo," performed by Mme Genee, B. O. H. Nov 16.*

Carpenter, John Alden, songs: "Il pleure" and "Looking Glass River," Mrs Hunt's recital Nov 22;* "When the Misty Shadows Glide," "Dansons la gigue," Miss Bullard's recital April 3.* Sonata in G major for violin and piano, David and Clara Mannes, Feb 4.*

Chadwick, Symphonic Fantasie, "Aphrodite," B. S. O. April 4.*

Debussy, setting of the ballade made by Francois Villon as a prayer to the virgin, sung by Miss Sundelius at a concert of the Longy Club March 6.*

Elgar, "The Music Makers," the Cecilia Society April 17.*

Foote, part song for women's voices, "Through the Rushes by the River," Musical Art Club, Arthur Shepherd conductor, April 10.

Holbrooke, Joseph,* "Queen Mab," B. S. O. Jan 3.*

Humiston, William H. "Iphigenia, dramatic cantata," People's Choral Union Jan 26.

Klughardt, August, concerto for 'cello and orchestra, op. 59, B. S. O., Mr Warnke soloist, Dec 20.*

Lendvai, Erwin,* Symphony in D major, B. S. O. Feb 14.

Moussorgsky, excerpts from Act 2 of "Boris Godonov," B. O. H. Dec 1. Song, Siege of Kazan from saem opera at same concert, sung by Mr Marcoux; first time here with orchestra; Mr Denghausen sang it with piano at his recital Nov 15.

Mraczek, Joseph,* Symphonic Burlesque "Max and Moritz," B. S. O. March 14.*

Palmer, Courtlandt, "Song of the Nile," sung by Geo. Harris Jr at recital with Mme Rider-Possart March 18.*

Parelli, Attilio,* song, Invocation, Miss Teyte's recital Jan 31.

Ravel, Pavane for a dead Infanta, B. O. H. Jan 5; first performance here with orchestra.

Reger, Concerto in ancient style for orchestra, op. 123, B. S. O. Dec 13.*

Ropartz, Guy, part song for women's voices, "Dimanche," Musical Art Club, April 10.*

Rubner, Cornelius, song, "Mondnacht," Katherine Lincoln at her recital Nov 14.

Rubner, Dagmar de, "Pierrot" for piano, played by composer at Miss Lincoln's recital.

San Martini, "Sonata a tre," Flonzaley Quartet concert March 13, probably first time in Boston.

Schmitt, Florent, Songs for Four Voices and four hands piano, sung by Misses Fisher, Gauthier, Messrs Diaz, Sampieri, B. O. H. Jan 5. Lied and Scherzo, op. 54, principal horn and nine wind instruments, Longy Club, Jan 23.*

Scott, Cyril, Irish Song and Dance for violin, Mr Zimbalist's recital March 17.*

Stojowski, Sigismund, Symphonic Rhapsody, played by composer, B. O. H. Jan 26.*

Strauss, Richard, Suite in B flat major for 13 wind instruments, Longy Club, Dec 17.*

Strube, Gustav, two symphonic poems, "Narcissus and Echo" and "Die Loreley," B. S. O. Jan 24.

Weingartner, quintet in G minor, op. 50 Longy Club, Jan 23.* Songs with orchestra sung by Mme Weingartner-Marcel B. O. H. Feb 9* and 16.* Merry Overture, B. O. H. Feb 16,* composer conducting.

Wolff, Erich,* songs, Alle dinge habe sprache, Knabe und Veilchen, Du bist so jung, Faeden, Die Krone Gerichtet, sung by Miss Gerhardt at her recital, Jordan Hall Feb 27, and all for the first time in Boston. The composer accompanied.

Zandonai, Riccardo,* medieval serenade for 'cello and small orchestra, Mr Britt soloist, B. O. H. Jan 12.*

The Cecilia Society, Arthur Mees conductor, gave a concert Feb 20, at which new and unfamiliar music was sung. The performance of Mr Grainger's Irish Tune appears to have been the first in America; that of the other pieces the first in Boston.

Bantock, Granville, part songs for mixed voices, "I would not be a king," "Awake, awake," and the old part song "Sumer is icumen in."

Gevaert, F. A., Old French Christmas Carol, "Le Petit Jesus."

Grainger, Percy, Irish Tune without words.

Moussorgsky, Biblical cantata, "Joshua."

Vogt, A. S., An Indian Lullaby for women's voices.

Holbrook and Erich Wolff.

Out of this considerable list little appeared to be of great consequence or of enduring value. Of the composers heard for the first time in Boston, Josef Holbrooke, the young Englishman, looms large with promise. His "Queen Mab" was the most engrossing novelty on Dr Muck's programs. It disclosed uncommon originality, a virile imagination and the technic and gifts for clear and forceful expression. The songs of Erich Wolff, the lamented young composer and accompanist, were quite as unusual as he and Miss Gerhardt interpreted them, songs born of a rare spirituality and vision combined with a fine workmanship. Less can be said of other composers who came to a first hearing in Boston—Lendral with his swollen symphony, and Mraczek with his fatuous requisition of a symphony orchestra to a feat better done by a comic supplement.

Debussy's setting of the ballad of Francois Villon, which the poet wrote as a prayer to the Virgin at his mother's request, was published with two accompanying ballads. They are preferably to be sung by a man. When first performed March 5, 1911, at the Mariguy Theatre, Paris, Charles W. Clark, the American baritone, sang them. It was he who soon after first sang them in New York.

Mr Carpenter, a young American composer now living in Chicago had a good deal to say which was interesting and admirable in his sonata. The songs did not make so good an impression. Florent Schmitt's songs had undeniable originality. They are not vocal in structure, but had rhythmic vitality and differentiation in character. Cyril Scott's music showed a piquant sense of color. Moussorgsky's "Joshua" has been done in New York impressively. It is not to be heard fairly without orchestra. Elgar's "The Music Makers," the most pretentious choral novelty, contained expressive moments in praise of the poet and those who sweep the lyre, but these are reborn not to sing, and amid a vast deal of contrapuntal travail.

Practically of not actually a novelty, Mahlyer's symphony created a profound and reverent regard for a man who wrote indisputably with the majesty and sheer conviction of genius, if at times with its inevitable proneness to excess.

Symphony Soloists.

At the Symphony concerts there have been 17 soloists. Three of these made their first appearance in Boston: Mr Urack, Nov 29; Max Pauer, Feb 14; Norman Wilks, March 28. Miss Teyte (Jan 24) and Miss Culp (April 11) sang for the first time at these concerts. Mr Urack was found to be a well-equipped 'cellist and proved his mettle as an able and promising young conductor in Dr Muck's illness. Mr Pauer gave great pleasure by the grace and beauty of his art in a faded piano concerto. The program of his recital was disappointing. Miss Teyte showed ripening powers of voice and interpretation with the orchestra and in recital her singing was that of an artist. Mr Wilks proved harmless and may be forgotten with no needless obsequies.

Mr Kreisler was again the sterling artist. Ysaye alone excepted, there was none like unto him. Mr Godowsky played with a suave touch and with polished, impeccable mechanism, but left the hearer unmoved. Miss Gerhardt may be forgiven the irregularities as of breathing which at times mar her sing-

Symphony Hall "Pops" Begin Tomorrow Evening

The 28th season of promenade concerts by the Symphony Orchestra will open at Symphony Hall tomorrow evening, and from then on the concerts will be given every evening except Sunday until Thursday, July 3, when the season will be brought to an end with a patriotic program appropriate to the day which follows. This year a much more extensive orchestra will be used, the Symphony Orchestra having control of its members for a longer period of time than was formerly the custom.

Otto Urack, who will conduct the first three weeks, will have an orchestra of 66 men, which is as large as many Symphony orchestras of this country and of much finer quality. During the first half of the season Jacques Hoffmann will be concert master and in the second half Julius Theodorowicz, who succeeds William Krafft. Again this year, as in past seasons, the great organ of the hall will be used several times a week, with John P. Marshall as organist.

Mr Urack, the assistant conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, who begins the season, will be followed for three weeks and a half by Andre Maquarre, one of the best-liked conductors of recent years, and the last fortnight of the concerts will bring forward as conductor Clement Lenom of the orchestra.

There will be the usual "College Nights," the first being Amherst, May 14, and the usual nights devoted to special programs. Mr Urack's first special night will be Monday, May 12, for which he has prepared a program devoted largely to Wagnerian music.

The selections tomorrow evening will be as follows:

Entrance of Guests into the Wartburg, "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Organ, Mr. Marshall.
Overture, "Jubilee" .... Weber
Organ, Mr. Marshall.
Waltz, "Legends from the Vienna Woods" .... Strauss
Selection, "Madame Butterfly" .... Puccini
Overture, "Der Freischutz" .... Weber
Suite, "L'Arlesienne" .... Bizet
(a) Prelude. (b) Adagietto.
Wotan's Farewell and Magic Fire Scene, "Die Walkure" .... Wagner
Rhapsody, "Espana" .... Chabrier
Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor" .... Nicolai
"Evening Song" .... Schumann
Selection from "The Mikado" .... Sullivan
March, "Stars and Stripes" .... Sousa

SUNDAY POST,

MAY 4, 1913

POP CONCERTS

The 28th season of the promenade concerts, commonly known as the Pops, will open at Symphony Hall next Monday evening, May 5, and from then on the concerts will be given every evening except Sunday until Thursday, July 3, when the season will be brought to an end with a grand patriotic programme appropriate to the day which follows.

The season this year will be better than ever, if only because a much more extensive orchestra will be used. The Symphony Orchestra, having control of its members for a longer period of time than was formerly the custom, is thus able to make the Pop concerts most elaborate. Mr. Urack, who will conduct the first three weeks, will have an orchestra of 66 men, which is as large as many symphony orchestras of this country, and it goes without saying, of much finer quality. During the first half of the season Mr. Jacques Hoffmann will be concert-master, and in the second half Mr. Julius Theodorowicz, who succeeds Mr. William Krafft. Again this year, as in past seasons, the great organ of the hall will be used several times a week, with Mr. John P. Marshall as organist. "Organ Nights" at the Pops have become among the most popular.

Mr. Urack, the assistant conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, who begins the season, will be followed for three weeks and a half by Mr. Andre Maquarre, one of the best liked conductors of recent years, and the last fortnight of the concerts will bring forwards as conductor Mr. Clement Lenom of the orchestra. As already announced, there will be the usual college nights, the first being Amherst, on May 14, and the usual nights devoted to special programmes. Mr. Urack's first special night will be on Monday, May 12, for which he has prepared a most interesting programme devoted largely to Wagnerian music. This will be the first Wagner night of the season. The programme for the opening night next Monday is as follows:

Entrance of guests into the Wartburg, "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Organ, Mr. Marshall.
Overture, "Jubilee" .... Weber
Organ, Mr. Marshall.
Waltz, "Legende from the Vienna Woods" .... Strauss
Selection, "Madame Butterfly" .... Puccini
Overture, "Der Freischutz" .... Weber
Suite, "L'Arlesienne" (prelude and adagietta) .... Bizet
Wotan's farewell and magic fire scene, "Die Walkure" .... Wagner
Rhapsody, "Espana" .... Chabrier
Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor" .... Nicolai
"Evening Song" .... Schumann
Selection from "The Mikado" .... Sullivan
March, "Stars and Stripes" .... Sousa

[210]

JOURNAL— SATURDAY.

MAY 3, 1913.

TRIBUTE TO MORGAN AT THE SYMPHONY

Maj. Higginson, Founder of Orchestra, Pays Homage to Deeds of Friend.

By E. F. Harkins.

Yesterday's final Friday afternoon Symphony concert opened unexpectedly with a tribute to the late J. Pierpont Morgan in the form of an "In memoriam" movement from one of the Beethoven symphonies. The founder of the orchestra, Maj. Higginson, who was present as usual, took this occasion to pay homage to the deeds of a friend whose integrity in matters of business and intense devotion to art alike attracted his admiration and respect.

Dr. Muck was warmly greeted as he came out to conduct this last matinee of the season. This first part of his present five-year engagement here has renewed the old-time brilliancy of the orchestra and increased the number of patrons not only in Boston, but in the cities visited from month to month. Yesterday, for instance, the hall was completely sold out, notwithstanding the extra fine weather, and the same complimentary conditions will prevail tonight.

The Morgan memorial number comes first on the program. Then follows the Brahms symphony No. 1, in C minor, and the conclusion is made up of three numbers offered in celebration of the Wagner centennial and selected to illustrate the first, the middle and the last stage of the composer's career. There is the "Rienzi" overture, dated 1840; the "Tristan and Isolde" prelude, dated 1859, and the "Parsifal" prelude dated 1877. The performance yesterday was superlatively fine from beginning to end. After the Brahms number the orchestra was honored with one of those stirring ovations which have been so frequent this season.

The special number added to this twenty-fourth program increases the long lead Beethoven's compositions have taken during the season. There have been no less than fourteen Beethoven numbers. Wagner stands second, with nine to his credit. Brahms and Mozart share third place, with five. Liszt, Weber, Richard Strauss and Schubert were each represented four times, while J. S. Bach, Berlioz, Dvorak and Schumann have had three representations. Ten of the 102 numbers were new to Boston, and two, the Lendvai symphony and Holbrooke's tone poem, "Queen Mab," were performed for the first time in America.

AMERICAN, SUNDAY, MAY 4, 1913.

FINAL SYMPHONY A MUCK FAREWELL

Famous Orchestra Also Renders Beethoven Selection as Morgan Memorial.

An "in memoriam" for J. Pierpont Morgan and a farewell to Dr. Karl Muck, marked the final concert of the season last night of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Much was given an ovation.

The "in memoriam" was the first number on the program. In memory of the dead financier the orchestra played the second movement from Beethoven's seventh symphony.

The other selections were Brahm's symphony No. 1, in C minor, opus 68, and Wagner's overture to "Rienzi," prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" and the prelude to "Parsifal."

Dr. Muck was encored again and again. He was presented a large bouquet of flowers and at the end of the Brahms symphony, Major Henry L. Higginson walked to the orchestra platform and congratulated the conductor and at the same time bade him "godspeed" with a hearty handshake. At the close of the "Parsifal" prelude, Dr. Muck was forced to appear and reappear three times, but he modestly refrained from making a speech.

Dr. Muck's salary for the season of 109 performances is $28,000. For the first time in twenty years the famous conductor plans to take a long vacation. He will remain in Boston until the last of this month when he will sail for Europe. He will spend the Summer at his country place at Doblebad, Austria.

SUNDAY GLOB MAY 4, 1913.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Season's Concert Review

The concert season of 1912-1913 came to an end last night, according to the custom which makes it begin and end with the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Men singers and women singers have stood before us, and players upon instruments have come to us across weary miles; have sat down to Bach, Beethoven and Brahms, and have taken in the empty seats in the house with one eye, while counting up the deadheads with the other.

The influx of would-be artists continues. Each of them may have something to deserve praise. Few of them so combine natural gifts and those qualities of mind and heart that they make the convincing, the authoritive interpreter. But one or two of them in an epoch so combines these things as to become a recreator, a seer, one who speaks thoughts of imperishable beauty.

No season or decade is ever prolific in them. Their song is to be treasured the more, because it comes as the song of an exotic bird of the night. The voices of others are as silence with what discrimination may seem plausible and even inevitable after all the miscellaneous coming and going of those who would be and those who are not in concert affairs, two artists above all others have left this public with nobler ideals of emotional beauty than it could have had without them. This may be Mr Ysaye's last visit to this country; if so it will be a memorable one to the thousands who have heard him once more in the full glory of his powers.

Miss Culp who came as a stranger well heralded, but others before whom foreign trumpets were blown had proved of common clay. In her we beheld a phenomenon; a beautiful voice, rare intelligence, deep poetic insight and a womanly sincerity. The fates rarely bring to a focus such gifts or the possibilities of such attainments, and her fullest maturity is yet to come. With Miss Culp, as with Ysaye, the hearer was conscious of an individuality, of a source of creature power which exceeded mere interpretation, which clothed the author's thoughts in such garments as he may have conceived of, but hardly could portray, and there were moments in which his art was wholly eclipsed in the recreation of player or singer. When these two were in the mood the thought of technical means seemed an extraneous and impertinent thing. Life was sung with a spontaneity that was unprovisational.

Dr Muck a Big Factor.

With these stands another interpreter, a name that shall have all praise for a season which it has illumined. Dr Muck has shown in particularly exacting numbers from week to week that he has restored the orchestra to its traditional vertuosity and perfection of ensemble, an ensemble which combines plasticity and precision, and in all knows a golden euphony and sonority. There were three concerts, or rather five, which stand out above the others, the two of the fifth symphony and the violin concerto of Beethoven, Mr Kreisler soloist; the two of the Fahler fifth symphony, and the first concert of the Pension Fund with the Wagner program, than which a more noble tribute hardly could have been offered in the concert room in this season of Wagner's centenary. To these should be added the closing concerts of Friday and yesterday.

There has been debate of Dr Muck's programs. A man of definite and unswerving purpose, he has a plan which governs their building. There were novelties that obviously required an arducus preparation unwarranted by their merits. The standard orchestral literature which comprises Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, and to which Brahms may be added, has not been neglected. More of Strauss, d'Indy, Tschaikowsky, Rimsky Korsakoff would have been heard with pleasure, and there are younger men, such as Florent Schmitt, who are French by education and sympathy, if not always by birth, who arouse curious interest, as there are also young members of the Russian school, like Stravinsky, who are coming or have come into notice.

Concert Novelties of the Season.

A new feature of musical life in Boston was to be found in the two series of Sunday afternoon concerts given at the Boston Opera House and at Symphony Hall. Here was abundant proof of the interest in good music on the part of a great public.

Here follows a list of the season's new concert music. * denotes a first performance (in case of a composer, a first representation) in Boston,  in America and  anywhere. B. S. O. stands for Boston Symphony Orchestra and B. O. H. for Boston Opera House.

Alfano, Franco,* Romantic Suite, B. O. H. Jan 12.

Aubert, Louis, "The Dream" (Little Red Riding Hood), from second act "The Blue Forest," sung March 6  by Mrs Marie Sundelius at a concert of the Longy Club.

Bemberg, music to Muerger's "The Ballad of the Despairing One," performed at Mme Nordica's concert April 20.*

Bizet, incidental music to Daudet's drama "L'Arlesienne" performed B. O. H. March 6, with Paul Marcel French players, Mr Caplet conducting.

Borodine, Polovsian choruses from "Prince Igor," B. O. H. Dec 1.* Song, "Sleeping Princess," sung at the same concert by Mr Marcoux. First performance in Boston with orchestra. Symphony No. 2, Dec 13,* B. S. O.

Bright, Dora, music to ballet "La Camargo," performed by Mme Genee, B. O. H. Nov 16.*

Carpenter, John Alden, songs: "Il pleure" and "Looking Glass River," Mrs Hunt's recital Nov 22;* "When the Misty Shadows Glide," "Dansons la gigue," Miss Bullard's recital April 3.* Sonata in G major for violin and piano, David and Clara Mannes, Feb 4.*

Chadwick, Symphonic Fantasie, "Aphrodite," B. S. O. April 4.*

Debussy, setting of the ballade made by Francois Villon as a prayer to the virgin, sung by Miss Sundelius at a concert of the Longy Club March 6.*

Elgar, "The Music Makers," the Cecilia Society April 17.*

Foote, part song for women's voices, "Through the Rushes by the River," Musical Art Club, Arthur Shepherd conductor, April 10.

Holbrooke, Joseph,* "Queen Mab," B. S. O. Jan 3.*

Humiston, William H. "Iphigenia, dramatic cantata," People's Choral Union Jan 26.

Klughardt, August, concerto for 'cello and orchestra, op. 59, B. S. O., Mr Warnke soloist, Dec 20.*

Lendvai, Erwin,* Symphony in D major, B. S. O. Feb 14.

Moussorgsky, excerpts from Act 2 of "Boris Godonov," B. O. H. Dec 1. Song, Siege of Kazan from saem opera at same concert, sung by Mr Marcoux; first time here with orchestra; Mr Denghausen sang it with piano at his recital Nov 15.

Mraczek, Joseph,* Symphonic Burlesque "Max and Moritz," B. S. O. March 14.*

Palmer, Courtlandt, "Song of the Nile," sung by Geo. Harris Jr at recital with Mme Rider-Possart March 13.*

Parelli, Attilio,* song, Invocation, Miss Teyte's recital Jan 31.

Ravel, Pavane for a dead Infanta, B. O. H. Jan 5; first performance here with orchestra.

Reger, Concerto in ancient style for orchestra, op. 123, B. S. O. Dec 13.*

Ropartz, Guy, part song for women's voices, "Dimanche," Musical Art Club, April 10.*

Rubner, Cornelius, song, "Mondnacht," Katherine Lincoln at her recital Nov 14.

Rubner, Dagmar de, "Pierrot" for piano, played by composer at Miss Lincoln's recital.

San Martini, "Sonata a tre," Flonzaley Quartet concert March 13, probably first time in Boston.

Schmitt, Florent, Songs for Four Voices and four hands piano, sung by Misses Fisher, Gauthier, Messrs Diaz, Sampieri, B. O. H. Jan 5. Lied and Scherzo, op. 54, principal horn and nine wind instruments, Longy Club, Jan 23.*

Scott, Cyril, Irish Song and Dance for violin, Mr Zimbalist's recital March 17.*

Stojowski, Sigismund, Symphonic Rhapsody, played by composer, B. O. H. Jan 26.*

Strauss, Richard, Suite in B flat major for 13 wind instruments, Longy Club, Dec 17.*

Strube, Gustav, two symphonic poems, "Narcissus and Echo" and "Die Loreley, B. S. O. Jan 24.

Weingartner, quintet in G minor, op. 50 Longy Club, Jan 23.* Songs with orchestra sung by Mme Weingartner-Marcel B. O. H. Feb 9* and 16.* Merry Overture, B. O. H. Feb 16,* composer conducting.

Wolff, Erich,* songs, Alle dinge habe sprache, Knabe und Veilchen, Du bist s jung, Faeden, Die Krone Gerichtet, sung by Miss Gerhardt at her recital, Jordan Hall Feb 27, and all for the first time in Boston. The composer accompanied.

Zandonai, Riccardo,* medieval serenade for 'cello and small orchestra, Mr Britt soloist, B. O. H. Jan 12.*

The Cecilia Society, Arthur Mees conductor, gave a concert Feb 20, at which new and unfamiliar music was sung. The performance of Mr Grainger's Irish Tune appears to have been the first in America; that of the other pieces the first in Boston.

Bantock, Granville, part songs for mixed voices, "I would not be a king," "Awake, awake," and the old part song "Sumer is icumen in."

Gevaert, F. A., Old French Christmas Carol, "Le Petit Jesus."

Grainger, Percy, Irish Tune without words.

Moussorgsky, Biblical cantata, "Joshua."

Vogt, A. S., An Indian Lullaby for women's voices.

Holbrook and Erich Wolff.

Out of this considerable list little appeared to be of great consequence or of enduring value. Of the composers heard for the first time in Boston, Josef Holbrooke, the young Englishman, looms large with promise. His "Queen Mab" was the most engrossing novelty on Dr Muck's programs. It disclosed uncommon originality, a virile imagination and the technic and gifts for clear and forceful expression. The songs of Erich Wolff, the lamented young composer and accompanist, were quite as unusual as he and Miss Gerhardt interpreted them, songs born of a rare spirituality and vision combined with a fine workmanship. Less can be said of other composers who came to a first hearing in Boston—Lendrai with his swollen symphony, and Mraczek with his fatuous requisition of a symphony orchestra to a feat better done by a comic supplement.

Debussy's setting of the ballad of Francois Villon, which the poet wrote as a prayer to the Virgin at his mother's request, was published with two accompanying ballads. They are preferably to be sung by a man. When first performed March 5, 1911, at the Mariguy Theatre, Paris, Charles W. Clark, the American baritone, sang them. It was he who soon after first sang them in New York.

Mr Carpenter, a young American composer now living in Chicago had a good deal to say which was interesting and admirable in his sonata. The songs did not make so good an impression. Florent Schmitt's songs had undeniable originality. They are not vocal in structure, but had rhythmic vitality and differentiation in character. Cyril Scott's music showed a piquant sense of color. Moussorgsky's "Joshua" has been done in New York impressively. It is not to be heard fairly without orchestra. Elgar's "The Music Makers," the most pretentious choral novcity, contained expressive moments in praise of the poet and those who sweep the lyre, but these are reborn not to sing, and amid a vast deal of contrapuntal travail.

Practically of not actually a novelty, Mahlyer's symphony created a profound and reverent regard for a man who wrote indisputably with the majesty and sheer conviction of genius, if at times with its inevitable proneness to excess.

Symphony Soloists.

At the Symphony concerts there have been 17 soloists. Three of these so made their first appearance in Boston: Mr Urack, Nov 29; Max Pauer, Feb 14; Norman Wilks, March 28. Miss Teyte (Jan 24) and Miss Culp (April 11) sang for the first time at these concerts. Mr Urack was found to be a well-equipped 'cellist and proved his mettle as an able and promising young conductor in Dr Muck's illness. Mr Pauer gave great pleasure by the grace and beauty of his art in a faded piano concerto. The program of his recital was disappointing. Miss Teyte showed ripening powers of voice and interpretation with the orchestra and in recital her singing was that of an artist. Mr Wilks proved harmless and may be forgotten with no needless obsequies.

Mr Kreisler was again the sterling artist. Ysaye alone excepted, there was none like unto him. Mr Godowsky played with a suave touch and with polished, impeccable mechanism, but left the hearer unmoved. Miss Gerhardt may be forgiven the irregularities as of breathing which at times mar her sing-

Symphony Hall "Pops" Begin Tomorrow Evening

The 28th season of promenade concerts by the Symphony Orchestra will open at Symphony Hall tomorrow evening, and from then on the concerts will be given every evening except Sunday until Thursday, July 3, when the season will be brought to an end with a patriotic program appropriate to the day which follows. This year a much more extensive orchestra will be used, the Symphony Orchestra having control of its members for a longer period of time than was formerly the custom.

Otto Urack, who will conduct the first three weeks, will have an orchestra of 66 men, which is as large as many Symphony orchestras of this country and of much finer quality. During the first half of the season Jacques Hoffmann will be concert master and in the second half Julius Theodorowicz, who succeeds William Krafft. Again this year, as in past seasons, the great organ of the hall will be used several times a week, with John P. Marshall as organist.

Mr Urack, the assistant conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, who begins the season, will be followed for three weeks and a half by Andre Maquarre, one of the best-liked conductors of recent years, and the last fortnight of the concerts will bring forward as conductor Clement Lenom of the orchestra.

There will be the usual "College Nights," the first being Amherst, May 14, and the usual nights devoted to special programs. Mr Urack's first special night will be Monday, May 12, for which he has prepared a program devoted largely to Wagnerian music.

The selections tomorrow evening will be as follows:

Entrance of Guests into the Wartburg, "Tannhauser" ....Wagner
Organ, Mr. Marshall.
Overture, "Jubilee" ....Weber
Organ, Mr. Marshall.
Waltz, "Legends from the Vienna Woods" Strauss
Selection, "Madame Butterfly".......Puccini
Overture, "Der Freischutz"...........Weber
Suite, "L'Arlesienne"..................Bizet
(a) Prelude. (b) Adagietto.
Wotan's Farewell and Magic Fire Scene, "Die Walkure" ....Wagner
Rhapsody, "Espana"................Chabrier
Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor" Nicolai
"Evening Song"....................Schumann
Selection from "The Mikado"........Sullivan
March, "Stars and Stripes"...........Sousa

SUNDAY POST,

MAY 4, 1913

POP CONCERTS

The 28th season of the promenade concerts, commonly known as the Pops, will open at Symphony Hall next Monday evening, May 5, and from then on the concerts will be given every evening except Sunday until Thursday, July 3, when the season will be brought to an end with a grand patriotic programme appropriate to the day which follows.

The season this year will be better than ever, if only because a much more extensive orchestra will be used. The Symphony Orchestra, having control of its members for a longer period of time than was formerly the custom, is thus able to make the Pop concerts most elaborate. Mr. Urack, who will conduct the first three weeks, will have an orchestra of 66 men, which is as large as many symphony orchestras of this country, and it goes without saying, of much finer quality. During the first half of the season Mr. Jacques Hoffmann will be concert-master, and in the second half Mr. Julius Theodorowicz, who succeeds Mr. William Krafft. Again this year, as in past seasons, the great organ of the hall will be used several times a week, with Mr. John P. Marshall as organist. "Organ Nights" at the Pops have become among the most popular.

Mr. Urack, the assistant conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, who begins the season, will be followed for three weeks and a half by Mr. Andre Maquarre, one of the best liked conductors of recent years, and the last fortnight of the concerts will bring forwards as conductor Mr. Clement Lenom of the orchestra. As already announced, there will be the usual college nights, the first being Amherst, on May 14, and the usual nights devoted to special programmes. Mr. Urack's first special night will be on Monday, May 12, for which he has prepared a most interesting programme devoted largely to Wagnerian music. This will be the first Wagner night of the season. The programme for the opening night next Monday is as follows:

Entrance of guests into the Wartburg, "Tannhauser" ....Wagner
Organ, Mr. Marshall.
Overture, "Jubilee" ....Weber
Organ, Mr. Marshall.
Waltz, "Legends from the Vienna Woods" Strauss
Selection, "Madama Butterfly".........Puccini
Overture, "Der Freischutz"...............Weber
Suite, "L'Arlesienne" (prelude and adagietta) ....Bizet
Wotan's farewell and magic fire scene, "Die Walkure" ....Wagner
Rhapsody, "Espana"....................Chabrier
Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor"....................Nicolai
"Evening Song"....................Schumann
Selection from "The Mikado"..........Sullivan
March, "Stars and Stripes"...........Sousa

[210]

MAY 3, 1913.

EVENING HERALD,

SYMPHONY CLOSES GREATEST SEASON

Brahms's Symphony, Tribute to J. P. Morgan and Wagner Numbers the Program.

By FRANK BERTWALL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its 32d season, so far as the Friday afternoon public rehearsals are concerned, yesterday afternoon. The program was Brahms's C minor symphony, and three Wagner selections, the overture to "Rienzi," and preludes to "Tristan" and "Parsifal." The concert opened with the second movement from Beethoven's seventh symphony, given as a tribute to the memory of John Pierpont Morgan.

Dr. Muck could fairly rest the season on his reading of Brahms's great symphony. It is a grand work, and was most eloquently interpreted. It affords fine opportunities to hear the soloists of the orchestra at their best, and that best is something ever to be treasured. Its close was followed by an outburst of enthusiasm that even overshadowed the applause which greeted Dr. Muck at the opening of the concert, and that applause spoke volumes of the place Dr. Muck holds in the hearts of music lovers. Of course, the orchestra shared in the approval. Dr. Muck and the audience ever will have it so.

The Wagner selections, given in observance of the centenary of the composer, afforded still further opportunities for the audience to congratulate itself upon the merit of the conductor and the orchestra. They were given flawlessly, fitly closing the greatest and most successful season in the orchestra's history. Pleasant, indeed, is the thought that there are still four years more of Dr. Muck's peerless leadership.

TRANSCRIPT,

MAY 3, 1913

"THE POPS" TO BEGIN

Monday Evening Opens Them with Mr. Urack as a New Conductor

BETWEEN the end of the final Symphony Concert this evening and the beginning of the first "Pop" Concert on Monday evening, Symphony Hall will undergo its annual transformation. Little tables will replace the ranked seats on the floor. The chorus-room adjoining the first balcony will become a restaurant in miniature. Somewhere on the outskirts, a bar will dispense light and mild liquors. Somewhere else a buffet will feed the hungry. Somewhere else still, cigars may be had for the paying. Finally on the stage will sit sixty-six men—two-thirds of the Symphony Orchestra—to play music of many kinds—potpourris from operas, operettas and musical plays, Viennese waltzes, "favorite" overtures, sentimental melodies, and once and again a fragment of Wagner's music-dramas or a classic piece. On Monday and for three weeks to come, Mr. Urack, the new assistant conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, will lead this band, and at the Symphony Concerts themselves, he has already proved his fitness for his job. So will "The Pops" begin their spring round once more, changed here and there in a detail but remaining essentially the institution for light pleasure—in spite of the seeming paradox—that they have been these many years after the "regular season" in Boston is done. For their continuing public, they need no lush. A new public that annually finds them out, is pleasurably surprised at its own discoveries. Here is the first programme:

Entrance of Guests into the Wartburg, from "Tannhäuser" (Organ, Mr. Marshall.)	Wagner
Overture, "Jubilee" (Organ, Mr. Marshall.)	Weber
Waltz, "Legends from the Vienna Woods"	Strauss
Selection, "Madama Butterfly"	Puccini
Overture, "Der Freischütz"	Weber
Suite, "L'Arlésienne" (Prelude, Adagietto.)	Bizet
Wotan's Farewell and Fire Scene from "Die Walkure"	Wagner
Rhapsody, "España"	Chabrier
Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor"	Nicolai
Evening Song	Schumann
Selection, "The Mikado"	Sullivan
March, "Stars and Stripes"	Sousa

TRANSCRIPT,

MAY 3, 1913

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

THE END CROWNS DR. MUCK'S WORK

The Goal That He Set Himself in October Becomes the Goal That He Has Achieved in May—The Orchestra Now at Its Highest Pitch of Attainment and the Conductor in the Fulness of His Powers—Released Brahms and Commemorative Wagner—Enthusiastic Leave-Takings

EVEN with three numbers of the programme commemorating the centenary of the birth of Wagner, with Brahms's most eloquent symphony besides, and with a curiously obtruded and somewhat belated memorial piece—the andante of Beethoven's seventh symphony—to the late Mr. Morgan, the final Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon brought most thought of Dr. Muck and the orchestra and of the sum of their work for the year. Of course, there was applause in plenty for both—the general, sincere and hearty applause by which the Friday audience has now become much the more responsive and reciprocating of the two companies that weekly hear the Symphony Concerts. Memorial or no memorial to Mr. Morgan, clapping cheerfully and warmly welcomed Dr. Muck when he came to his place; swelled between each movement of Brahms's symphony; at the close called the conductor back, set the orchestra on its feet and summoned him yet a third time; waxed again after each piece of Wagner; and would not cease, even when a long concert was done, until Dr. Muck had once and twice taken modest but unusually smiling leave.

All this was more than token of the general appreciation and admiration. It was the outward and audible sign that now at the beginning of May the end has crowned the work which the conductor set himself six months ago. He returned to his post resolved above all else to make the Symphony Orchestra as perfect an instrument as he could compass. He would not have it merely more eloquent than other orchestras; for that, however high the standard, was relatively a common criterion. He would have it eloquent with the rare and ideal eloquence in which fulfilment almost matches vision. To that end Dr. Muck shaped his programmes and ordered his rehearsals. For that end he lavished all his powers tirelessly and stimulated all the powers of his men. They have answered as though they knew and felt his end. Together they have gained it. At the close of Dr. Muck's first year—and four years more of his conducting are still to come—the Symphony Orchestra seemingly stands at the apogee of attainment. More than ever before it is as perfect an instrument as a human instrument can well be. Here and there, it can be bettered in an individual voice and the player upon it, as it was bettered the other day with a new tuba. Doubtless it will be so bettered as Dr. Muck may discover and will. But these are details—often heeded only by the expert—in the sum of the whole effect.

That effect, by merely human standards, is now almost perfect—perfect in the quality of tone in the several choirs and in most of the sharply individualized instruments; perfect in the range, the balance, the euphony, the elasticity and the sensibility of the blended tonal mass; perfect in its luminous utterance of music, in the manifold force of voice that it gives it, in the diverse richness of its coloring of it, in the variety of its march through it, in its rhythmic suppleness and felicity, in its manifold eloquence of mood and passion, image and suggestion, poetry and drama. The Symphony Orchestra is now, as never before, a virtuoso orchestra in the highest, amplest and finest sense of the words. It is more than a virtuoso orchestra because it warms its virtuosity with glowing beauty and wings it with the multifold strength of ordered and sensitive power. It delights the ear; it transports the imagination; its voice is an emotion in itself. They say that the old and dying Vieuxtemps sent for the young Ysaye that he might hear the slow movement of one of his violin concertos played as he had imagined it. So more than one composer, of old or newly dead, might be fain to summon the Symphony Orchestra into the Elysian Fields to hear it play his music. The fortunate living may come and hear for themselves and depart rejoicing. In their hearts they may even say: "Did I really write so?"

The men themselves have helped to work these signs and wonders; but they could not have wrought them without their conductor to be the leader and so the guiding, stimulating, ordering and achieving force in the deed. Dr. Muck may or may not be unmatched among the conductors of the first rank in our immediate time. It is perilous to bear a measuring rule into the orchestral Olympus. But none of them seems to assemble more of the attributes of a great conductor or to hold them in juster balance. His industry is as tireless as it is unobtrusive; he holds all his faculties in even and ready command; the first and the deepest interest of his life is the practice of his profession and his art. Servans servorum Dei—the servant of the servants of God—the early Popes used proudly to name themselves. So Dr. Muck might call himself, and as proudly, the servant of the composers whose music he plays. He transmits it to us who hear in the living image of its form and substance, in the unclouded and undiminished eloquence of its own voice, in the emotion, as it seems, in which it wa created. Divining [illegible] imparts, Imparting, he [illegible]

For in Dr. Muck is that faculty of divination and that quality of impartment which differentiate the great conductor from the merely able practitioner of his art. The psychologists—and what a field conducting opens to them—may analyze such divination into this and that attribute of intellect imagination and emotion. What it yields is sufficient for us who listen through twenty-four or forty-eight concerts in a season to its play. Out of it in Dr. Muck spring the pace, the accent, the rhythm, the tonal color that reveal each piece of music that he chooses, that give to it in mass and detail its integrity and individuality, its appropriate eloquence, its animating and recreating life. It does not merely sound in its own image; it sounds in that image made alive, penetrating, commanding. What Wagner called the melos and bade the conductor find is the soul of the music. Dr. Muck finds it. Akin to this divination, if not a part of it, is the sensitiveness of his ear to the euphony, the force, the quality of tone that he draws from his orchestra. It extends from the finest gossamer delicacies to the largest multitudinous sweeps. Akin again is his superlative sensitiveness to rhythm and his adroit command of it. Of this divination seems his range and mastery of contrast, of proportioning and of repose. His sense of unfolding and cumulating design, his fore knowledge of the end from the beginning, however far-flung, may pass for intellectual faculty. Yet it is of imagination, too. By clear imagination, which is also divination, Dr. Muck seems to enter into the very mind and spirit of the composer. The composer wrote in emotion, sometimes in an emotion that the music hardly embodied and released. Divining, penetrating, Dr. Muck enters into this emotion, transmits it, and sometimes releases and heightens it as though he were freeing that, which from sheer intensity of feeling, held the composer almost tongue-tied. As widely as these composers range, so ranges Dr. Muck's divination. Now to do and to be these things is to be a very great conductor in the fulness of his powers. Recall for the climax of the year the last four or five concerts. Fortunate the orchestra and the conductor who could match them.

As many of these attributes and attainments of men and master as the music of yesterday asked shone through their performance. The symphony in C minor of Brahms began in magnificently projecting and propelling eloquence that made the music almost Straussian in its power. The "slow" introduction advanced in streaming harmonies to the rhythm of its drum beats. The allegro ran its course now in tossing tumults of tone; now in shadowed and blended under voices; again in large sweeps of sound; again in nervous energy; and yet again in grave, rich depth of sustained song. When has it sounded so various of voice, so rich of emotion? It was as though the conductor was releasing the passion of tone that Brahms had hidden in reticence, as though his fire had melted the composer's reflection into outpouring. The slow movement, with the orchestra singing almost always in half voice, went its way from shadowed beauty to shadowed beauty, grave, poignant. Sometimes this beauty seemed to suffuse the whole orchestra, the whole song. Or it lingered in some long-held phrase or harmonically it underwent almost Wagnerian transfiguration. The gradients of quiet color were endlessly subtle; the mellow gravity never hardened into austerity.

The little scherzo was bright with rhythm and aglow with warm instrumental song. The famous transition into the finale, that conductors can make into the veriest artifice and even into neurotic trickery, began in a moment of quiet and intense declamation. The instrumental voices ran low; the tonal tints were dark. The goading pizzicati swept through the strings; the horns sounded their wondrous melody; the flute warmed it into beauty; the trombones mellowed it. It was as though the music was issuing from a brimming heart about to outpour its song of joy. The song came in its expanding and propelling elation, flooded the music, drove it and the orchestra forward in streaming energy, rose into gorgeous tumult, ended elate and breathless in its own intensity. Not Brahms emotionalized—for the music is intrinsically emotional—but Brahms almost passionately released.

The rest was Wagner—the young Wagner of the overture to "Rienzi" which Dr. Muck made as sonorous and flamboyant as the theatrical romanticism that inspired and fashioned it; the passionate, the puissant, sensuous and flaming Wagner of the golden prime of the prelude to "Tristan," and Dr. Muck wove his aching phrases into the mounting song of desire, wrenching itself out of fate to feed upon itself till it falls and dies of its own satiety; and last, the prelude to "Parsifal" of the final years wherein Wagner wrote the music of anguish, of pity, of hope and of mystic ecstacy as no man had written it before or has written it since. They tell how the old composer, conducting it almost by chance in one of the final rehearsals at Baireuth, made it pierce the hearts of those that heard. It is hard to believe that Dr. Muck yesterday did less than he. At moments as he stood intent and in profile, he was uncannily like the portraits of Wagner himself.

H. T. P.

MAY 3, 1913.

EVENING HERALD,

SYMPHONY CLOSES GREATEST SEASON

Brahms's Symphony, Tribute to J. P. Morgan and Wagner Numbers the Program.

By FRANK BERTWALL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its 32d season, so far as the Friday afternoon public rehearsals are concerned, yesterday afternoon. The program was Brahms's C minor symphony, and three Wagner selections, the overture to "Rienzi," and preludes to "Tristan" and "Parsifal." The concert opened with the second movement from Beethoven's seventh symphony, given as a tribute to the memory of John Pierpont Morgan.

Dr. Muck could fairly rest the season on his reading of Brahms's great symphony. It is a grand work, and was most eloquently interpreted. It affords fine opportunities to hear the soloists of the orchestra at their best, and that best is something ever to be treasured. Its close was followed by an outburst of enthusiasm that even overshadowed the applause which greeted Dr. Muck at the opening of the concert, and that applause spoke volumes of the place Dr. Muck holds in the hearts of music lovers. Of course, the orchestra shared in the approval. Dr. Muck and the audience ever will have it so.

The Wagner selections, given in observance of the centenary of the composer, afforded still further opportunities for the audience to congratulate itself upon the merit of the conductor and the orchestra. They were given flawlessly, fitly closing the greatest and most successful season in the orchestra's history. Pleasant, indeed, is the thought that there are still four years more of Dr. Muck's peerless leadership.

TRANSCRIPT,

MAY 3, 1913

"THE POPS" TO BEGIN

Monday Evening Opens Them with Mr. Urack as a New Conductor

BETWEEN the end of the final Symphony Concert this evening and the beginning of the first "Pop" Concert on Monday evening, Symphony Hall will undergo its annual transformation. Little tables will replace the ranked seats on the floor. The chorus-room adjoining the first balcony will become a restaurant in miniature. Somewhere on the outskirts, a bar will dispense light and mild liquors. Somewhere else a buffet will feed the hungry. Somewhere else still, cigars may be had for the paying. Finally on the stage will sit sixty-six men—two-thirds of the Symphony Orchestra—to play music of many kinds—potpourris from operas, operettas and musical plays, Viennese waltzes, "favorite" overtures, sentimental melodies, and once and again a fragment of Wagner's music-dramas or a classic piece. On Monday and for three weeks to come, Mr. Urack, the new assistant conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, will lead this band, and at the Symphony Concerts themselves, he has already proved his fitness for his job. So will "The Pops" begin their spring round once more, changed here and there in a detail but remaining essentially the institution for light pleasure—in spite of the seeming paradox—that they have been these many years after the "regular season" in Boston is done. For their continuing public, they need no lush. A new public that annually finds them out, is pleasurably surprised at its own discoveries. Here is the first programme:

Entrance of Guests into the Wartburg, from "Tannhäuser" (Organ, Mr. Marshall.)	Wagner
Overture, "Jubilee" (Organ, Mr. Marshall.)	Weber
Waltz, "Legends from the Vienna Woods"	Strauss
Selection, "Madama Butterfly"	Puccini
Overture, "Der Freischütz"	Weber
Suite, "L'Arlésienne" (Prelude, Adagietto.)	Bizet
Wotan's Farewell and Fire Scene from "Die Walküre"	Wagner
Rhapsody, "España"	Chabrier
Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor"	Nicolai
Evening Song	Schumann
Selection, "The Mikado"	Sullivan
March, "Stars and Stripes"	Sousa

TRANSCRIPT,

MAY 3, 1913

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

THE END CROWNS DR. MUCK'S WORK

The Goal That He Set Himself in October Becomes the Goal That He Has Achieved in May—The Orchestra Now at Its Highest Pitch of Attainment and the Conductor in the Fulness of His Powers—Released Brahms and Commemorative Wagner—Enthusiastic Leave-Takings

EVEN with three numbers of the programme commemorating the centenary of the birth of Wagner, with Brahms's most eloquent symphony besides, and with a curiously obtruded and somewhat belated memorial piece—the andante of Beethoven's seventh symphony—to the late Mr. Morgan, the final Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon brought most thought of Dr. Muck and the orchestra and of the sum of their work for the year. Of course, there was applause in plenty for both—the general, sincere and hearty applause by which the Friday audience has now become much the more responsive and reciprocating of the two companies that weekly hear the Symphony Concerts. Memorial or no memorial to Mr. Morgan, clapping cheerfully and warmly welcomed Dr. Muck when he came to his place; swelled between each movement of Brahms's symphony; at the close called the conductor back, set the orchestra on its feet and summoned him yet a third time; waxed again after each piece of Wagner; and would not cease, even when a long concert was done, until Dr. Muck had once and twice taken modest but unusually smiling leave.

All this was more than token of the general appreciation and admiration. It was the outward and audible sign that now at the beginning of May the end has crowned the work which the conductor set himself six months ago. He returned to his post resolved above all else to make the Symphony Orchestra as perfect an instrument as he could compass. He would not have it merely more eloquent than other orchestras; for that, however high the standard, was relatively a common criterion. He would have it eloquent with the rare and ideal eloquence in which fulfilment almost matches vision. To that end Dr. Muck shaped his programmes and ordered his rehearsals. For that end he lavished all his powers tirelessly and stimulated all the powers of his men. They have answered as though they knew and felt his end. Together they have gained it. At the close of Dr. Muck's first year—and four years more of his conducting are still to come—the Symphony Orchestra seemingly stands at the apogee of attainment. More than ever before it is as perfect an instrument as a human instrument can well be. Here and there, it can be bettered in an individual voice and the player upon it, as it was bettered the other day with a new tuba. Doubtless it will be so bettered as Dr. Muck may discover and will. But these are details—often heeded only by the expert—in the sum of the whole effect.

That effect, by merely human standards, is now almost perfect—perfect in the quality of tone in the several choirs and in most of the sharply individualized instruments; perfect in the range, the balance, the euphony, the elasticity and the sensibility of the blended tonal mass; perfect in its luminous utterance of music, in the manifold force of voice that it gives it, in the diverse richness of its coloring of it, in the variety of its march through it, in its rhythmic suppleness and felicity, in its manifold eloquence of mood and passion, image and suggestion, poetry and drama. The Symphony Orchestra is now, as never before, a virtuoso orchestra in the highest, amplest and finest sense of the words. It is more than a virtuoso orchestra because it warms its virtuosity with glowing beauty and wings it with the multifold strength of ordered and sensitive power. It delights the ear; it transports the imagination; its voice is an emotion in itself. They say that the old and dying Vieuxtemps sent for the young Ysaye that he might hear the slow movement of one of his violin concertos played as he had imagined it. So more than one composer, of old or newly dead, might be fain to summon the Symphony Orchestra into the Elysian Fields to hear it play his music. The fortunate living may come and hear for themselves and depart rejoicing. In their hearts they may even say: "Did I really write so?"

The men themselves have helped to work these signs and wonders; but they could not have wrought them without their conductor to be the leader and so the guiding, stimulating, ordering and achieving force in the deed. Dr. Muck may or may not be unmatched among the conductors of the first rank in our immediate time. It is perilous to bear a measuring rule into the orchestral Olympus. But none of them seems to assemble more of the attributes of a great conductor or to hold them in juster balance. His industry is as tireless as it is unobtrusive; he holds all his faculties in even and ready command; the first and the deepest interest of his life is the practice of his profession and his art. Servans servorum Dei—the servant of the servants of God—the early Popes used proudly to name themselves. So Dr. Muck might call himself, and as proudly, the servant of the composers whose music he plays. He transmits it to us who hear in the living image of its form and substance, in the unclouded and undiminished eloquence of its own voice, in the emotion, as it seems, in which it wa created. Divin[illegible] imparts, [illegible]

For in Dr. Muck is that faculty of divination and that quality of impartment which differentiate the great conductor from the merely able practitioner of his art. The psychologists—and what a field conducting opens to them—may analyze such divination into this and that attribute of intellect imagination and emotion. What it yields is sufficient for us who listen through twenty-four or forty-eight concerts in a season to its play. Out of it in Dr. Muck spring the pace, the accent, the rhythm, the tonal color that reveal each piece of music that he chooses, that give to it in mass and detail its integrity and individuality, its appropriate eloquence, its animating and recreating life. It does not merely sound in its own image; it sounds in that image made alive, penetrating, commanding. What Wagner called the melos and bade the conductor find is the soul of the music. Dr. Muck finds it. Akin to this divination, if not a part of it, is the sensitiveness of his ear to the euphony, the force, the quality of tone that he draws from his orchestra. It extends from the finest gossamer delicacies to the largest multitudinous sweeps. Akin again is his superlative sensitiveness to rhythm and his adroit command of it. Of this divination seems his range and mastery of contrast, of proportioning and of repose. His sense of unfolding and cumulating design, his fore knowledge of the end from the beginning, however far-flung, may pass for intellectual faculty. Yet it is of imagination, too. By clear imagination, which is also divination, Dr. Muck seems to enter into the very mind and spirit of the composer. The composer wrote in emotion, sometimes in an emotion that the music hardly embodied and released. Divining, penetrating, Dr. Muck enters into this emotion, transmits it, and sometimes releases and heightens it as though he were freeing that, which from sheer intensity of feeling, held the composer almost tongue-tied. As widely as these composers range, so ranges Dr. Muck's divination. Now to do and to be these things is to be a very great conductor in the fulness of his powers. Recall for the climax of the year the last four or five concerts. Fortunate the orchestra and the conductor who could match them.

As many of these attributes and attainments of men and master as the music of yesterday asked shone through their performance. The symphony in C minor of Brahms began in magnificently projecting and propelling eloquence that made the music almost Straussian in its power. The "slow" introduction advanced in streaming harmonies to the rhythm of its drum beats. The allegro ran its course now in tossing tumults of tone; now in shadowed and blended under voices; again in large sweeps of sound; again in nervous energy; and yet again in grave, rich depth of sustained song. When has it sounded so various of voice, so rich of emotion? It was as though the conductor was releasing the passion of tone that Brahms had hidden in reticence, as though his fire had melted the composer's reflection into outpouring. The slow movement, with the orchestra singing almost always in half voice, went its way from shadowed beauty to shadowed beauty, grave, poignant. Sometimes this beauty seemed to suffuse the whole orchestra, the whole song. Or it lingered in some long-held phrase or harmonically it underwent almost Wagnerian transfiguration. The gradients of quiet color were endlessly subtle; the mellow gravity never hardened into austerity.

The little scherzo was bright with rhythm and aglow with warm instrumental song. The famous transition into the finale, that conductors can make into the veriest artifice and even into neurotic trickery, began in a moment of quiet and intense declamation. The instrumental voices ran low; the tonal tints were dark. The goading pizzicati swept through the strings; the horns sounded their wondrous melody; the flute warmed it into beauty; the trombones mellowed it. It was as though the music was issuing from a brimming heart about to outpour its song of joy. The song came in its expanding and propelling elation, flooded the music, drove it and the orchestra forward in streaming energy, rose into gorgeous tumult, ended elate and breathless in its own intensity. Not Brahms emotionalized—for the music is intrinsically emotional—but Brahms almost passionately released.

The rest was Wagner—the young Wagner of the overture to "Rienzi" which Dr. Muck made as sonorous and flamboyant as the theatrical romanticism that inspired and fashioned it; the passionate, the puissant, sensuous and flaming Wagner of the golden prime of the prelude to "Tristan," and Dr. Muck wove his aching phrases into the mounting song of desire, wrenching itself out of fate to feed upon itself till it falls and dies of its own satiety; and last, the prelude to "Parsifal" of the final years wherein Wagner wrote the music of anguish, of pity, of hope and of mystic ecstacy as no man had written it before or has written it since. They tell how the old composer, conducting it almost by chance in one of the final rehearsals at Baireuth, made it pierce the hearts of those that heard. It is hard to believe that Dr. Muck yesterday did less than he. At moments as he stood intent and in profile, he was uncannily like the portraits of Wagner himself.

H. T. P.

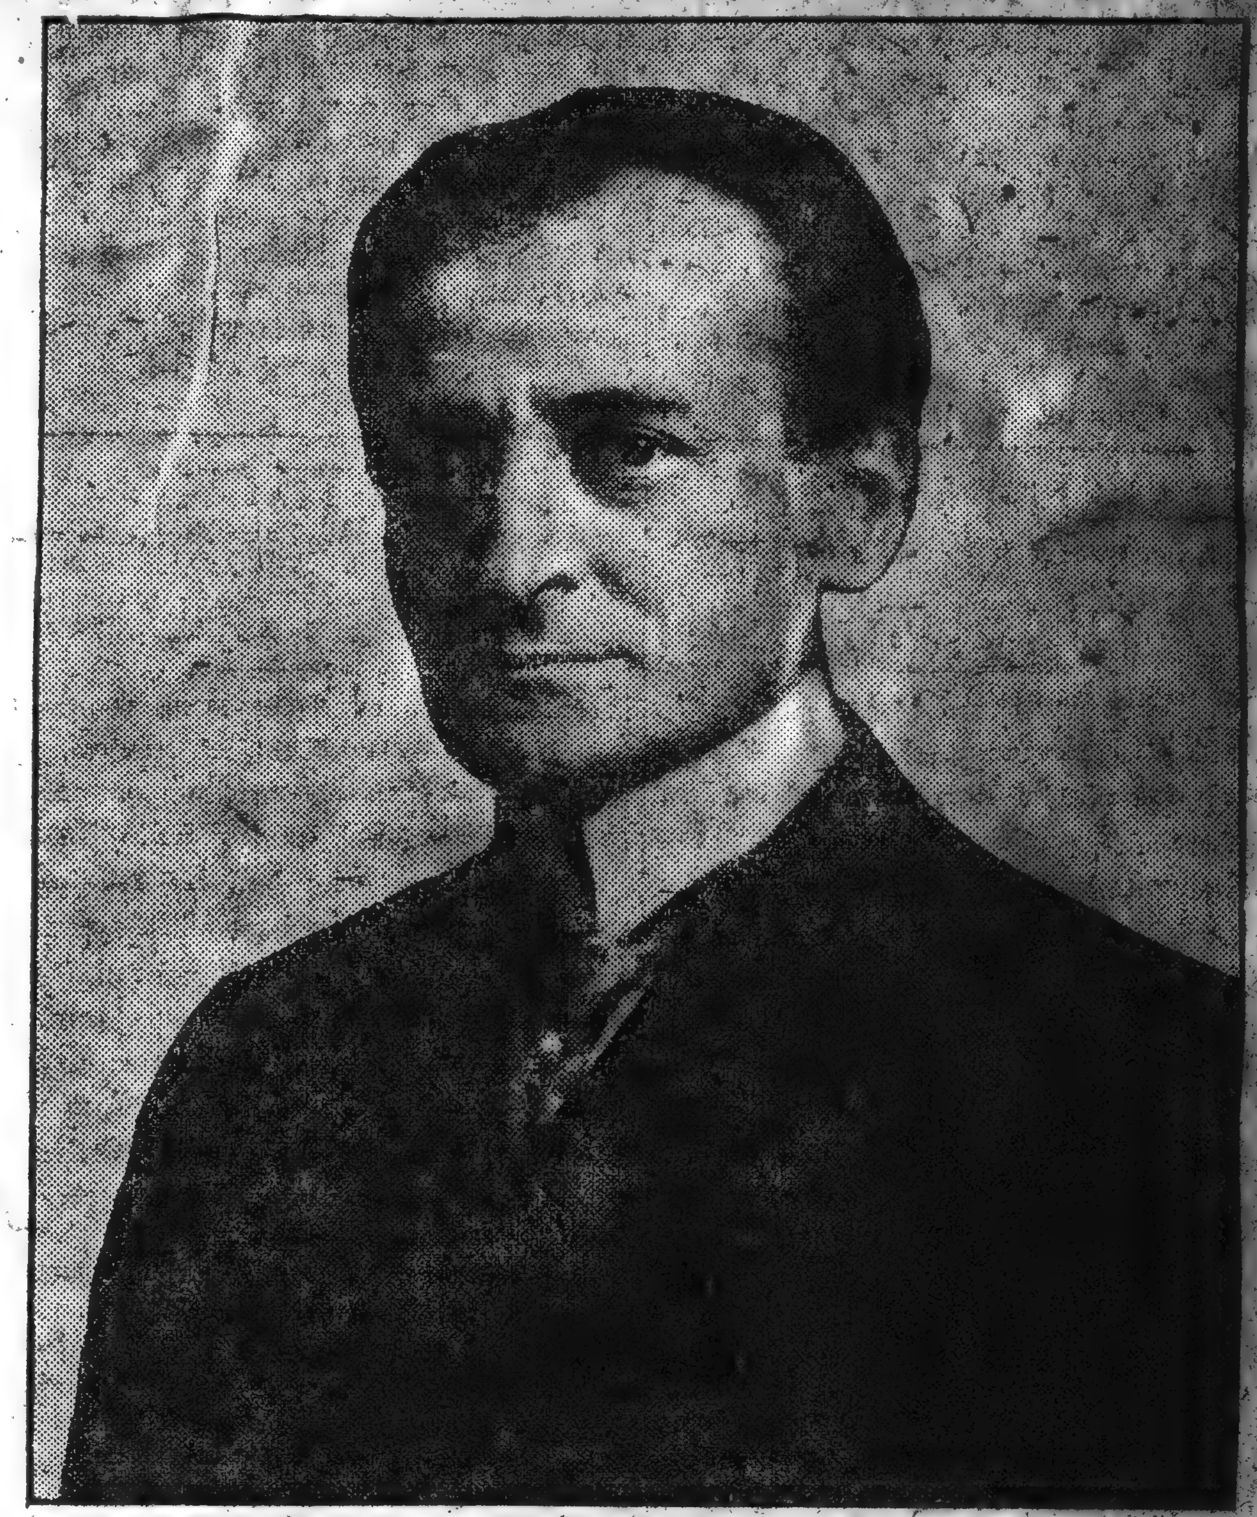
[211]

MONITOR, BOSTON, MASS., SATURDAY, MAY 3, 1913

CHOICE OF WORKS FOUND IMPARTIAL

Year of Orchestral Concerts Shown to Have Equalized Classic and Modern Periods and to Have Improved Position of Soloists

RANGE OF PROGRAMS BROADENED



(Photo by Garo, Boston)

Karl Muck applauded in music of all nationalities

UNDER the musical direction of Karl Muck, the Boston Symphony orchestra, which closes tonight, has brought conservatives and radical listeners into happy relations. Once more those who think that the classic epoch of Mozart, Haydn and Beethoven represents the greatest that has been thought or that can be thought in music, stand on an equality in argument with those who think that the epoch of Strauss, Sibelius and Mahler represents essential advance over the past. If you have made up your mind that Schubert's B minor symphony contains all there is to be said in the cyclic form of compostion for string, wood and brass choirs, barring the loss from the record of inspiration of that passage which is the cause of the work having the designation "Unfinished," you have had a fair chance during the past winter with the Strauss enthusiast who holds that the "Domestic Symphony" is the consummation of tone-thinking. Dr. Muck's fair presentation of masters of all schools, of all countries and of all dates has made the ground solid under everybody's feet. Partizan of whatever camp you may be, you have been able to bring the best of evidence to support your views from the Symphony concerts themselves. Dr. Muck, except that he follows the general policy of the institution of which he is musical director of putting German music in the foreground, is absolutely impartial in his selection of composers.

Practise Diligent

Historic values in the first year of Dr. Muck's return engagement have been equalized. Early and late periods of composition have been shown to have a common purpose. Musical expression has been proved to be on the whole permanent in its aims. Its mechanical means may improve, its structural opportunities may enlarge and its subject matter may grow richer with every decade; yet its appeal is precisely the same thing today that it was two centuries ago. Dr. Muck admits the complexity of the big symphony and accordingly he prepares his modern programs on a plan of choir-unit efficiency and of time economy. His routine rehearsals are called models of administration and of discipline. He sends his men home on the noon of rehearsal days satisfied that they have done a morning's work that will count and sure of their mastery of the program. And the conductor while recognizing the technical vastness of present day compositions, has always maintained that these compositions are human. He has freed symphony listeners from the idea that because the twentieth century tone builder does things on a large plan he is therefore pretentious and aloof.

Americans Recognized

Evidence of broad program method and of interpretative generosity has been found in the conductor's willingness to include American compositions in his offerings and to devote himself earnestly to their rehearsal. Dr. Muck's hospitality to the American composer has not been merely diplomatic. It has not been in the least condescending. It may perhaps be said to represent concessions to certain local artistic interests, since the composers have all been of the Boston school. Yet his entertainment of the names of Strube, MacDowell, Loeffler and Chadwick on his programs has had the purpose of revealing the talent of the new world, not of making a joke of it.

The solo scheme of the season, judged by the number of visiting artists who sang and played, has been more restricted than usual. But judged by the care with which the solo numbers have been presented as works for orchestra and principal artist working together, judged by standards of complete, rather than of one-sided interpretation, the scheme has been remarkably liberal. Dr. Muck, so far from trying to win away Symphony listeners from their habitual fondness for a program with soloist, has worked toward persuading them to a new and better appreciation of the idea. He has reaffirmed the value of visiting pianist, violinist and singer in the concert routine.

Dr. Muck may be regarded as having spent his year in preparing the orchestra to do great things rather in making it do them. So far as external performance goes, his season has been consistently brilliant, but with respect to interpretation it has been so only on occasion.

At the outset the conductor was faced with two disadvantages, and there was nothing for him to do but to get rid of them, even to spend an entire year in getting rid of them. The first disadvantage was on the side of technique, the second on the side of repertory.

To consider these one at a time, it may be said that Dr. Muck's predecessor in the Symphony conductorship left the players' resources of execution in ruins. For Max Fiedler's four years of reading of the big modern scores took the last breath and scrape of tone reserve out of the orchestra. In his presentations of the tone poems of Strauss and of symphonies of Bruckner he drove all the instrumental choirs to their utmost. He nearly disorganized the tone blend of the octet of French horns. He developed a harshness in the heavy brass section, the trumpets, trombones and tuba, which the auditorium became at last too small for. Then the former conductor rushed the men in their execution, especially the violinists, until delicacy of phrasing began to be a thing of the past.

An interesting type of orchestral reading indeed, was developed by the use of the full tone and the rapid articulation of themes. It must be admitted that Mr. Fiedler proclaimed the importance of a principle of interpretation which is likely to be universally accepted some day, the principle of the larger rhythm. The Fiedler style had the good effect of giving a great present-day work coherence and compactness, because it pointed out the important ideas and let the unimportant ones go with only casual notice. It was extraordinarily successful in balancing climax and in declaring the leading thought of the composer so that it stayed in memory. But it lost to the orchestra itself the power of giving strict outline to melodies and of accurately expounding every incidental phrase.

The accurate lesser rhythm, the kind that is admirable in the symphonies of the classic epoch, was long ago established as the standard in Boston, under the directorship of Mr. Gericke. And the regaining of the lost lesser rhythm has been the chief work of Dr. Muck in the first year of his return engagement.

The second disadvantage has balked Dr. Muck constantly in his selection of work, and it has given cause for the persistence of the criticism, recently revived in a New York season review, that he is not a great program-maker. For Mr. Fiedler besides overdriving his players, overplied the modern repertory. He presented so many works of the most interesting man of the modern German school, Richard Strauss, that he made it impossible for Dr. Muck to bring this composer regularly forward.

Mr. Fiedler played the Strauss compositions to exhaustion, and there was nothing for Dr. Muck to do but to leave them on the shelf for a season. Two Strauss pieces, the "Till Eulenspiegel" and the "Don Juan" tone poems, he did offer, but from the composer's large works he was compelled to give symphony listeners a recess. Bruckner he introduced into his programs in the E major symphony, but under such restrictions for practise time that the work was not interpreted with characteristic results.

The greatest service of Dr. Muck has without doubt been his restoration of the classic composers to a position of honor in the Symphony programs. Though there are probably few listeners who would declare against progress in orchestral endeavor, and though everybody is of course glad to welcome any new music that has a message, yet few Bostonians are ready to have the works of the late eighteenth century and of the early nineteenth either neglected or carelessly interpreted. The idea almost took root in the musical community during the administration of Mr. Fiedler that a group of instrumental players could not reasonably be expected to keep themselves in trim for both classic and modern compositions. The sentiment came near prevailing that the orchestra had outgrown Haydn and Beethoven. Dr. Muck set to work to correct that impression in the first month of the season, giving a performance in conservative mood of the Beethoven "Eroica" symphony at his opening concert and one in radically modern vein of the Bischoff E major symphony at his third concert. He has adhered to this policy right to the end and has proved it entirely successful. As he put Beethoven and Bischoff in agreement in October, so he did Haydn and Mahler in April.

To name important symphonies not yet mentioned to which Dr. Muck has given distinguished interpretation, there were the Sibelius symphony in E minor, the Beethoven fifth and the Lendavi in D major; works on the tone poem order strikingly well presented were Macdowell's "Indian" suite, Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," Chadwick's "Aphrodite," Mraczek's "Max and Moritz," Dukas's "Apprentice," and Charpenter's "Italy." First among the solo works which had remarkable treatment, considered from the orchestral as well as from the virtuoso standpoint, was Beethoven's violin concerto, with Fritz Greisler as soloist. Arias from operas of the old school with Herbert Witherspoon and Miss Gerhardt as soloists were an all around success. All overtures were carefully studied, and as a rule their position on the program was at the end, where they might have been with some excuse cursorily performed. Dr. Muck has made it worth while for listeners to stay to the close of all his concerts.

Two admirable pension fund concerts were given, the first bringing forward a Wagner program, which was on the whole the most brilliant performance Dr. Muck gave during the entire year, the second reviving Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony to great acclaim.

Admirable solo work was done by Messrs. Witek, Noack and Warnke, when they were given their opportunity to come forward from the ranks and present a concerto. Excellent readings of repertory numbers of the lesser technical demand were given by Otto Urack when as assistant conductor he substituted for Dr. Muck.

Incidental solo work of the most praiseworthy kind, the kind that contributes to the orchestra's high reputation, was done by Mr. Longy, oboist; Mr. Maquarre, flutist; Mr. Sadony, bassoonist; Mr. Ferir, viola player and Mr. Keim, trumpeter.

The orchestra has added to the musical record of the year in Boston outside of its 24 pairs of Symphony concerts by furnishing accompaniments to the concerts of the Cecilia Society and to the performance in Symphony hall of Verdi's "Requiem" by the Somerville high school chorus under the direction of S. Henry Hadley. In these choral concerts the orchestra has been reduced in size by omitting certain of the leading performers. The concert master has been Jaques Hoffmann.

BRAHMS INTERPRETED

In Symphony hall Friday afternoon Karl Muck rehearsed the last program of the Symphony orchestra season, presenting the following works: Brahms, symphony No. 1, in C minor, op. 68; Wagner, overture to the opera "Rienzi," prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," prelude to "Parsifal." The program was introduced by the second movement of Beethoven's seventh symphony, in memoriam John Pierpont Morgan.

According to the avowed intention of the managers a few weeks ago, the program was to have been entirely Wagnerian, with distinguished singers of the Metropolitan Opera company assisting. But the steamship agents anticipated the concert agents and the artists got booked for passage to Europe instead of for appearance in Symphony hall. So the Wagner centenary in Boston turned out a pretty tame affair. The three overtures represented the composer well in his characteristic styles as an orchestral score-maker and they were well played; but of course they told an incomplete story about Wagner as a builder of music drama.

It is said that Dr. Muck is contented to be known in America solely by his work as a symphony reader. His talent for interpreting opera, so acclaimed in Germany, he is willing to hide from his Boston public. The uneconomical artistic situation exists in the community of an opera house at one corner of the street lacking a Wagnerian conductor and of an orchestral institution at another corner, possessing the first of Wagnerian conductors and of holding him to exclusive service in symphonies, tone poems and overtures. The opera house director has given out that he is searching Europe for a man to take the place of Mr. Weingartner as German conductor and to interpret productions of "Meistersinger," and "Lohengrin" next season. The Symphony orchestra manager has given out that Karl Muck has at least four years more to stay in Boston.

A little adjustment of resources to needs would bring about equilibrium here. Symphony hall has its traditions. The pride of the place is that these traditions are almost never broken. The idea persists there that high standards and changeless tradition go together. But artistic emphasis has shifted since the early eighties, when the orchestra was founded. The orchestra itself introduced Wagner, the orchestral writer, to Boston. The work begun under Nikisch in the early nineties would only have its just realization if the Symphony management should grant the community its present high desire, and join in presenting Wagner, the maker of lyric drama.

A strong interpretation was given to the Brahms C minor symphony at the rehearsal. The work was perhaps developed too precisely in detail, but the action was maintained strongly from the opening movement to the chanting climax of the closing one. The tone of the orchestra was never richer and the phrasing was never more elegant than it was in this symphony.

[212]

BOSTON AMERICAN.

MAY 6, 1913.

"Pops" Open 28th Season; Orchestra Enlarged to 66

"The Pops" are with us again, the twenty-eighth season having opened at Symphony Hall with the medley of music and mirth for which they are famous.

The orchestra has been increased this year from fifty-five to sixty-six men, which gives the strings greater body and sonority. Conductor Urack has a splendid organization at his command and the orchestra was given many encores.

The program at the pop concert this evening is as follows:

March, "The Flag of Victory" ....Blon
Overture, "The Barber of Seville" .....Rossini
Waltz, "Roses from the South" ....Strauss
Selection from "Carmen" ....Bizet
Overture, "The Bat" ....Strauss
Introduction and Waltz ....Urack
(a) Dance Duet ....
(b) Plotters' Trio ....
(c) Song of the Man-o'-war's men of the U. S. Fleet } Urack
Intermezzo, "The Jewels of the Madonna" Wolf-Ferrari
Overture, "Mignon" ....Thomas
Largo ....Handel
Violin, Mr. Hoffman; Organ, Mr. Marshall. Harp.
Selection, "The Girl in the Train" ....Lehar
March, "Kaiser Wilhelm" ....Nagel

NSCRIPT, TUESDAY

MAY 6, 1913

THE POPS AGAIN

Opening the Twenty-Eighth Season with Wagner for Welcome, Cubist Scarves for Decoration, Mr. Urack's Conducting for Novelty, and Quiet for Astonishment

A look of mirth from underneath the brow,
A stein of beer, a plate of pretzels, thou,
Beside me, list'ning to "Die Fledermaus," Ah, summer's Pops are Symphony enou'.

THE wrench is terrible at first. Through the classic doorways the balconies leap upward at a mad new angle. Out from under their shadows swirls a sea of red wooden tables and waiters. And this is Symphony Hall in the madness of spring! Shade of the immortal Beethoven whose name decorates its proscenium!

But even the truest of true Bostonians is over the edge of the pool in a moment, dabbling timorous toes in the aforesaid seas and then striking out boldly and hilariously for the sodawater-kissed tables that float beyond. Immortal shade, this time of Wagner!—in the centenary of his birth and the thirtieth year of his immortality, he welcomes you in to a new season of music and nectar with his "Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg."

Something besides Wagner, something besides cubist scarves and Bulgar blouses, something besides the omission of pretzels from the official and vital programme that doesn't change with the night, made last evening the beginning of a new season at the Pops. There was an orchestra of sixty-six men instead of the fifty-five that all previous conductors have had; and with them at his back a new leader drew more from Wagner, Puccini and Weber than any before him. Perhaps he drew a little too much from Weber; for his "Jubilee" seemed nearer the Sousa of brass band and "The Stars and Stripes Forever."

But Mr. Urack was the real novelty. Of course the decrease from the regular numbers of the Symphony Orchestra put him at still more of a disadvantage with "classic" pieces than he seemed when Dr. Muck's illness thrust the leadership of the band upon him in midwinter. On the other hand, here were three orchestras for operetta all rolled into one, and an orchestra of such players as Sullivan, Straus and Herbert never had. And if Mr. Urack has shortcomings as a conductor of symphonies, he, too, becomes a glorified prodigy when the lighter stuff of the Pops is in hand. In Germany he had conducted principally opera. The signs of his expertness there were plain. He carried "Madame Butterfly" with a sensuous sweep and a rich and beautiful curve that the Opera House seldom gives it. He whirled through "The Mikado" and lent it a hundred new touches of color, beauty and whimsy. And he swung into "The Blue Danube" with a swirl of rhythm and a volley of time that seemed to sweep that orchestra off its gray platform and round and round the hall with the fury of the dance.

But, oh, Mr. Urack, if you bring novelty to the opening season, you bring with it the deep, the direful ignorance of the newcomer. When has a conductor at the Pops dared tap an audience into silence for anything less majestic than Wagner? When has a conductor dared seat himself in protest until the great unwatered of the balconies clapped the floor into silence? And when has anyone expected anything but a ripple of conversation and a clink of ice for an undertone to Weber's "Jubilee" or Straus's "Vienna Woods"? No, Mr. Urack, the motto of the Pops is Miltonic, as you will learn, and it is concerned with putting melancholy in its proper place for the summer.

K. M.

NEWS OF MUSIC

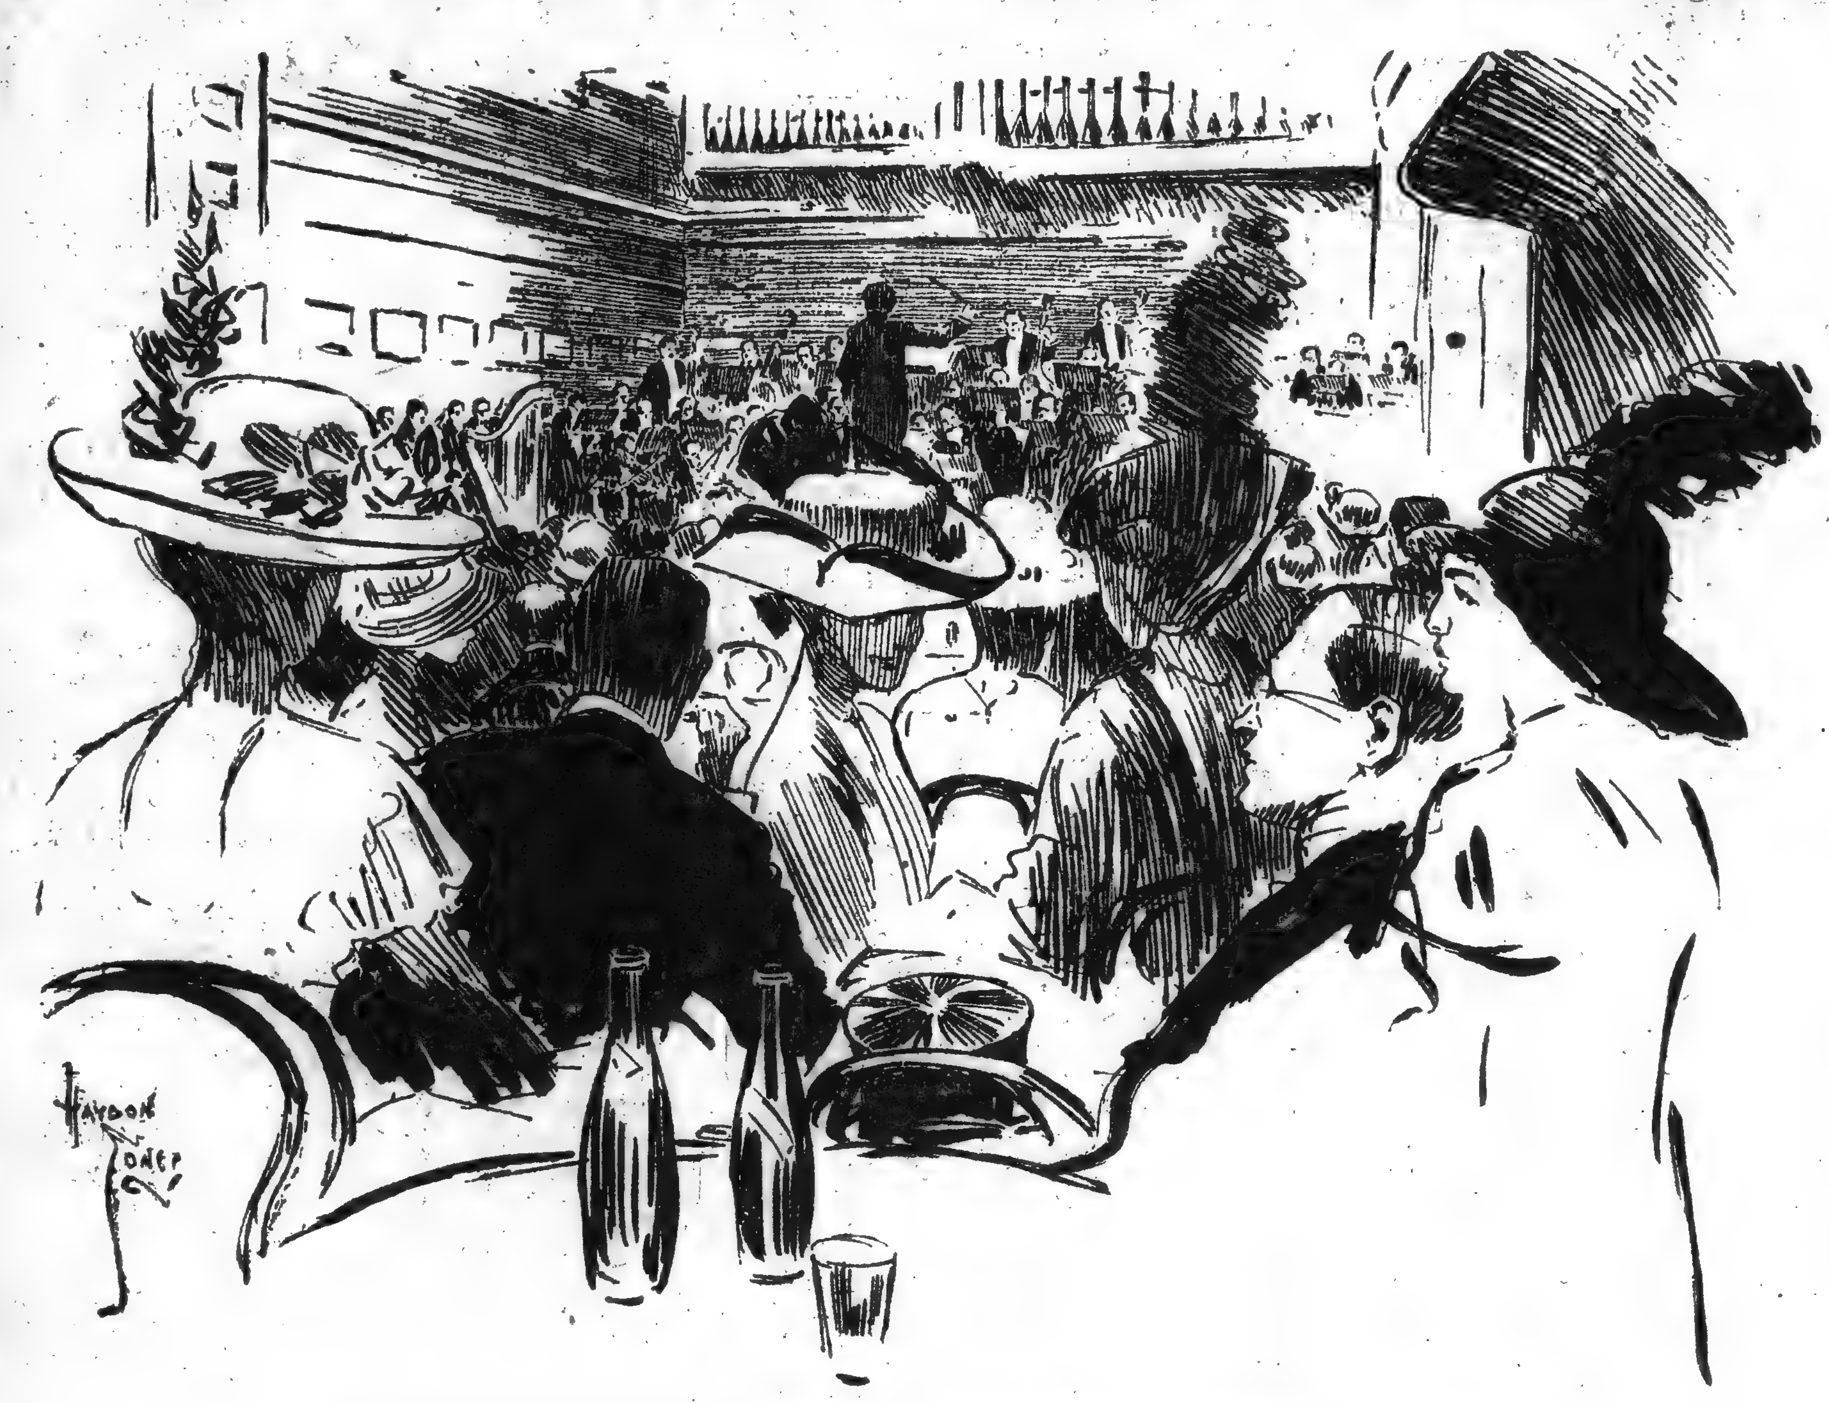
Items of the Day

Mr. Urack is making speed to introduce his own music into The Pops, and four fragments of it stand on the programme for the second concert at Symphony Hall

---

THE BOSTON HERALD, TUESDAY, MAY 6, 19

SYMPHONY HALL CROWDED FOR OPENING OF THE POP CONCERTS



Opening Night at Pop Concert in Symphony Hall. Crowd on Main Floor.

Season Has an Auspicious Start—Program Much Enjoyed.

If Symphony Hall last evening, with every seat upstairs and down taken, and men standing in groups that extended back through the entrances to the auditorium and out into the corridors, be an augury, the "Pops" are to enjoy a popularity this year not exceeded by that of even the most prosperous of the 27 preceding seasons.

Not only was the audience at the opening concert last evening big, but it was happy. Every selection rendered by the 66 members of the Symphony orchestra was enthusiastically applauded, and Otto Urack, this year's conductor, was generous in his responses to encores. To those who had attended the later concerts of the regular Symphony season, which ended Saturday night, Mr. Urack had already demonstrated his adaptability for the work of leadership he took up last night. To those who for the first time last night heard the results of his leadership, the work of his musicians was perfectly satisfactory.

One familiar with the Pop concert crowds for the last decade could recognize in last evening's audience scores and perhaps hundreds of the regular devotees to the peculiarly Bostonian institution of light musical pleasure, and he could see, also, enough new faces to substantiate the assertion that a new public seems annually to find out these popular musical treats and, finding them, is delighted by the discovery and becomes regularly attached.

As usual, the gayer part of the audience last evening was at the tables, and the waiters had little time to loiter. In the galleries the more serious folk sat and gave close attention to the program, for they were without those things that naturally on occasions diverted the attention of those at the tables below.

Mr. Urack had arranged a well balanced program for the opening night, beginning with a selection from Tannhauser and closing with Sousa's swinging march, "Stars and Stripes." Mr. J. P. Marshall was at the organ.

The program follows:

Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg (Tannhauser)...................Wagner
Overture, "Jubilee"...................Weber
Waltz, "Legends from the Vienna Woods" ....Strauss
Selection, "Madama Butterfly"..........Puccini
Overture, "Der Freischutz"..............Weber
Suite, "L'Arlesienne"...................Bizet
a. Prelude.
b. Adagietto.
Wotan's Farewell and Magic-Fire Scene (Die Walkure)...................Wagner
Rhapsody, "Espana"...................Chabrier
Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor" ....Nicolai
Evening Song...................Schumann
Selection from "The Mikado"..........Sullivan
March, "Stars and Stripes"...............Sousa

The program at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall this evening is as follows:

March, "The Flag of Victory".......Blon
Overture, "The Barber of Seville"..Rossini
Waltz "Roses from the South"....Strauss
Selection from "Carmen"...........Bizet
Overture, "The Bat"..............Strauss
Introduction and waltz............Urack
(a) Dance Duet...................
(b) Plotters' Trio...................
(c) Song of the Man-of-war's men of the U. S. Fleet.... } Urack
Intermezzo, "The Jewels of the Madonna"............Wolf-Ferrari
Overture, "Mignon"..............Thomas
Largo.............................Handel
Violin, Mr. Hoffmann; organ, Mr. Marshall.
Selection, "The Girl in the Train"...Lehar
March, Kaiser Wilhelm"...........Nagel

ADVERTISER,

MAY 6, 1913

SPLENDID START FOR "POP" SEASON

BIG THRONG ATTENDS SYMPHONY HALL

Otto Urack Conducted in His Usual Capable Manner — First Programme Enjoyable.

At Symphony hall last evening the first "Pop" concert of the 28th season was given by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Otto Urack conducted and Mr. Marshall was organist. The programme was:—

Entrance of Guests into the Wartburg (Tannhauser) ....Wagner
Organ, Mr. Marshall.
Overture, "Jubilee"..........................Weber
Organ, Mr. Marshall.
Waltz, "Legends from the Vienna Woods" Strauss
Selection, "Madame Butterfly"...........Puccini
Overture, "Der Freischutz"...............Weber
Suite, "L'Arlesienne"......................Bizet
a) Prelude. b) Adagietto.
Wotan's Farewell & Magic Fire Scene (Die Walkure) ....Wagner
Rhapsody, "Espana"..................Chabrier
Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor"...Nicolai
Evening Song..........................Schumann
Selection from "The Mikado"............Sullivan
March, "Stars and Stripes"..............Sousa

POPERWOCKY.

(With apologies to Lewis Carroll.)

'Twas Urack and the Ellis band
Did Mudgett Longy in their lair;
All Grisez was the sarabande
And Sauerquell for Phair.

"Beware the Poperwock, my son!
The dreamy waltz, the Sousa march!
Beware the Gietzen bird, and shun
The Akeroyd Ribarsch."

He took his Jaeger sword in hand;
Long time the Seydel foe he sought;
So rested he by the Pilsener tree
And stood awhile in thought.

And as in Noack thought he stood,

Ein, zwei, drei beer and through and through
The Waruke blade went snicker-snack!
He left it dead and with its head
He Anton Witeked Bak.

"And hast thou slain the Poperwock?
Come to my arms my Kloepfel boy.
O Wagner! Muck! Debussy, too!"
He Regered in his joy.

'Twas Urack and the Ellis band
Did Mudgett Longy in their lair;
All Grisez was the sarabande
And Sauerquell for Phair.

The "Pops" is an established institution, and, like Santa Claus and mosquitoes, peculiar to a certain season of the year. It is one of the harbingers of summer and fills the gap in the social calendar between juggling a snow shovel and mobilizing fishing tackle. In the musical world the Pops mark the gradual letting down from the extreme classical forms to the lighter musical diet of the torrid months.

By the removal of the monotonous rows of seats on the floor and substituting tables, Symphony hall has been relieved of its austere aspect and has donned its annual festive appearance. Last night the "Pops" were auspiciously opened, christened and otherwise fittingly launched on a several weeks' cruise. The hall was filled to capacity with witnesses to this fact. The audience was a brilliant one and the sartorial display was well nigh dazzling. It was a riot of color. The spirit of jovial care-free hilarity was in the air. Even the statues beamed with radiance and seemingly it was with great difficulty that they restrained the impulse to step down from their respective pedestals and join the merry throng below. We could easily have imagined Anacreon beckoning across the hall to his friend Sophocles and exclaiming "Soph, old top, let's go down and have a little something." And Diana, gazing with longing eyes on Apollo, speculating the while on the possibility of the latter's breaking the long drouth with an invitation to join him.

The man who goes to the Saturday Evening Concerts under protest gladly buys season tickets for the Pops. As a rule the music played at these concerts holds no terrors for the man who dreads "high brow" music per se. For here the siphonic hiss has displaced the symphonic poem. Although the programme last night was not exactly ultra-popular, still one might have been unable to explain the difference between a semi-quaver and a piccolo and yet have greatly enjoyed it. Here were no harmonic problems to solve nor musical mazes to grope through. The music was familiar, tuneful, obvious—qualities which make a quick and pleas-

We have no data at hand to show the connection between music and digestion. That music bears some relation to the gustatory habits of bipeds is borne out by the song, "Gee, I love music with my meals." The liquid tones and flowing melodies of last night did not seem to be especially conducive to hunger. For, except for the fact that a few rheumatic pretzels would now and again be corralled and annihilated, the consumption of food was not alarming.

A glance at the programme will reveal the inherent worth of the compositions selected by Mr. Urack. He conducted with spirit and the performance of the entire programme was in all respect up to the symphony standard and all that this implies.

In addition to the music scheduled, there were other sounds heard—sounds not regulated by printed signs nor as rich or colorful, perhaps, yet highly suggestive, as when the gurgling of a siphon and the popping of a cork would eloquently portray the fact that some wayfarer's parched throat would soon be laved with a beatific beverage brewed on high Olympus. What reams of paper and sea of notes would be required to so adequately convey this impression.

Altogether the concert was a pleasurable event. The audience was genuinely enthusiastic and applausive, a condition refreshing as well as inspiring to the members of the orchestra and its conductor.

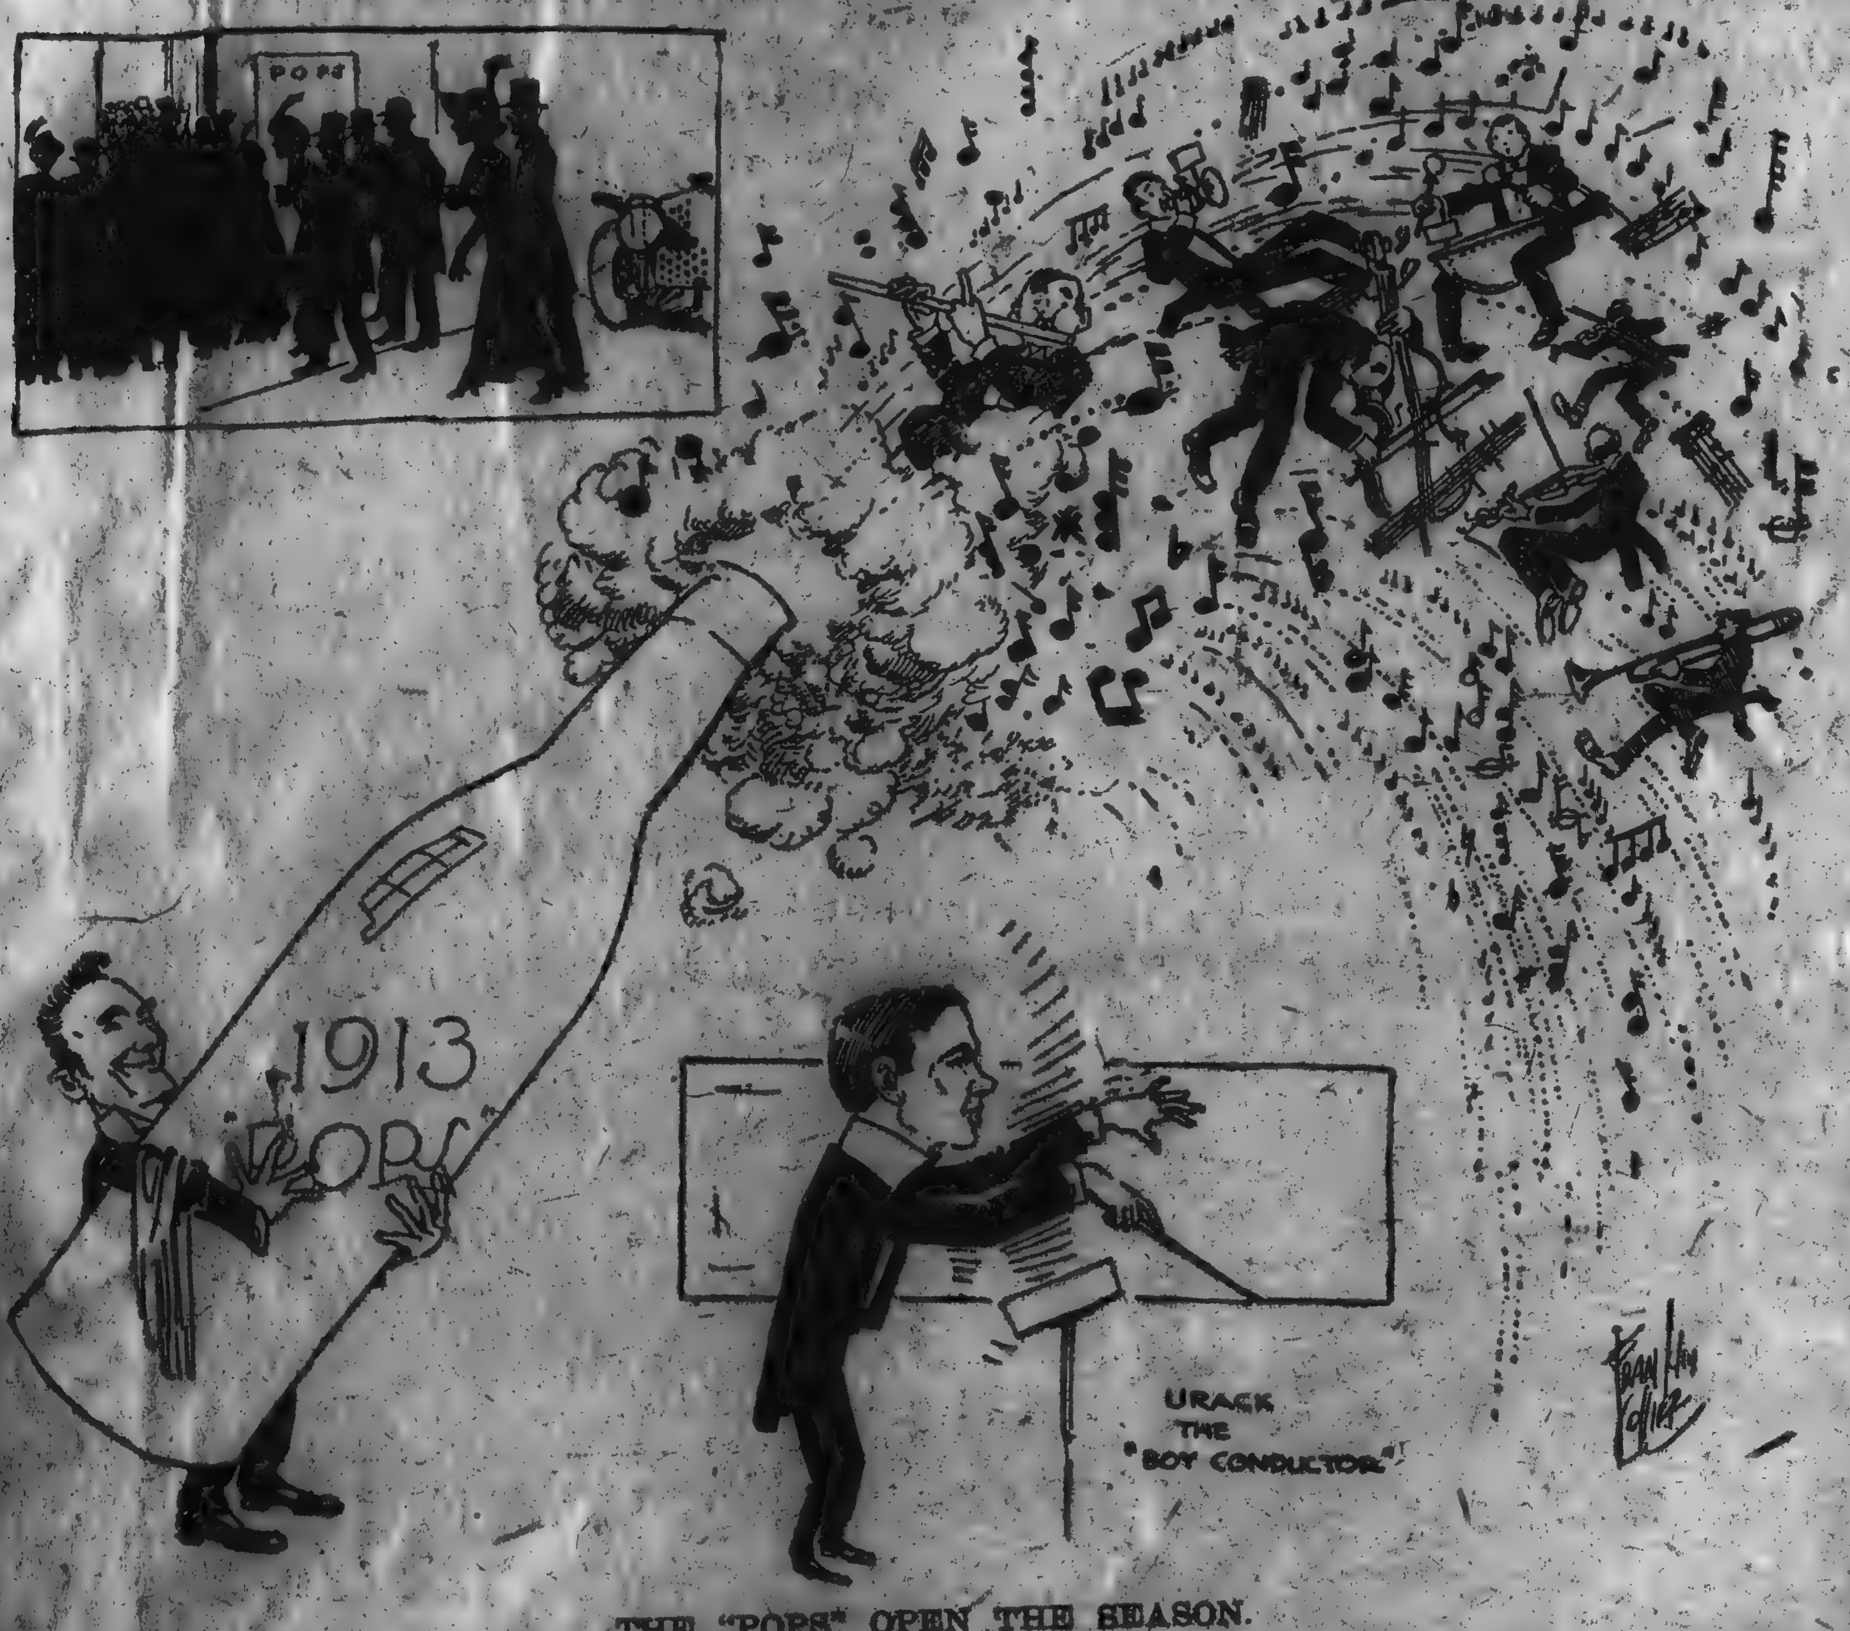
F. M. W.

GLOBE—

MAY 6, 1913.

"POPS" OPEN THEIR ANNUAL ENGAGEMENT.

Return of Concerts, at Which Fine Music Lends Aid to Digestion, Warmly Greeted at Symphony Hall.



THE "POPS" OPEN THE SEASON.

Warmly greeted by all who still associate music and pleasure, the "Pops" arrive.

Music has spent an arduous season of research in the ethereal altitudes of the soul, and has caused debates between sworn friends waxing to blows. Once more the heavenly maid descends to her true and noble function as a first aid to digestion and a gentle stimulant to harmless persiflage.

This Springtime session over the glasses is the friend to the honest man, the man who cordially abominates music that never will keep time with his feet, and admits it without shame; the man who could not tell a chief theme from a double bassoon. But did you watch him last night, while Mr Urack and his enlarged orchestra were doing a waltz by the lesser Strauss?

He blew rings of smoke with a marvelous sense of rhythm across a tall goblet. They floated above a face done prettily in smiles, roses and deep blue, crowned with imposing millinery of the beckoning arm, until it became a wholly irrelevant thing what kind of a tariff the Senate may put on wool.

How sweet is the unblemished beauty of true candor. Come now, let us tell the truth. After all, how many are not profoundly bored by a symphony, the high and mightiness, or the pyschic unfathomability of it, and upon occasion would not rejoice to hear a rattling good two-step in its place, exuding ozone, bass drum and cymbals at every bar. But the guise of respectability must be worn.

Even a woman now and then confesses. A naive young creature, with the usual modish and nodding headgear, with patent leather pumps and silver buckles carrying an embossed monogram, with a silk skirt fetchingly slashed directoire, and a badly cut up heartline in her hand, remarked warmly to her escort:

"Now isn't that just divine, and Mr Urack is so graceful. Why don't Dr Muck play pieces like that once in a while, I wonder?"

What a miracle a little illusion works. Mr Urack, the brilliant young assistant conductor of the orchestra, who last night made his first appearance here at the "pop" concerts, had arranged a program which in reality was of quite a pretentious nature, with the opening march of the knights and guests of the tournament of song in "Tannhauser," and including the magic fire scene from "The Valkyrie," as well two overtures of Weber's, "Jubile and Der Freischuetz," excerpts fro Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" music, and selection from "Mme Butterfly."

But there was the festive air of ea ing, drinking and talk. There was eve sign of pleasurable relaxation, and t audience filled the house.

The orchestra has been increased t year from 55 to 66 men, which gives strings greater body and sonority. Urack has a splendid organization his command. He found favor la night with his audience and will fi more by humoring the usual and prop demands for lighter numbers as e cores, pieces which are doubly effect to follow upon the heels of the p gram selection that has gone befor

Tonight the program will include f of Mr Urack's compositions evider in the lighter vein. The ever-popu "Largo" will be played by Mr Hoff mann as solo violinist with Mr Mar shall at the organ and Mr Rogers a harpist. There will be "The Barber o Seville" and "Mignon" overtures and selection from "Carmen."

Two special evenings are already announced—Wagner night, next Monday, and Amherst night, Wednesday, May 14.

JOURNAL—

MAY 6, 1913.

RIOT OF COLOR AT OPENING OF POPS

Gaily Dressed Women Greet Musicians at Start of 28th Season..

FINE PROGRAM BY LARGE ORCHESTRA

Audience Pays Tribute to the Excellent Music in a Frenzy of Applause

The twenty-eighth season of "The Pops" began last evening at Symphony Hall, with an orchestra of sixty-six pieces, an exceptionally large audience that began sedately to submit to the music, but ended in a frenzy of applause in tribute to its excellence.

Richer in the number of its string instruments this season, the orchestra, under the baton of Otto Urack, had more volume than has been customary The Pops," and the effect was most

The organ was again brought into unusually good effect in Weber's "Jubilee" overture, to the closing strains of which the audience paid its standing tribute.

Great acclaim was deservedly given to the orchestra's rendition of Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana," and nearly as much to its preceding number, "Wotan's Farwell" and the magic-fire scene from "Die Walkure." In this number particularly did the marvelous skill of the players show at its best and the harmony was perfect.

While the first part of the program was, perhaps, a trifle heavy for the occasion, the last part proved decidedly popular. Conductor Urack was not generous with his encores, however. He added "In The Shadows" and his own "Sailor's Song" in response to the demand for other numbers.

Schumann's "Evening Song," with its soft melody and its inspiring theme, invoked hearty applause, and the stirring "Stars and Stripes" sent the audience home with its blood stirring.

A feature of the opening night was the riot of color in the hats and gowns of the women present. The fact that Bulgaria and the Cubists are affecting the costumes of milady was very evident, and the people at the tables were almost as interesting as the players.

The first feature night will be on Wednesday next. It will be a Wagner night, and on Thursday, May 14, Amherst is given the honor on the first college night.

POST

MAY 6, 1913

POP SEASON OPENS WITH GREAT BAND

More Players Than Ever—Otto Urack Conducts

BY OLIN DOWNES

Last night the opening of the "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall proved the most successful in some seasons of these entertaining occasions, on account of a much larger attendance for the beginning of the spring season, and the exceptional enthusiasm of the audience.

This was wholly deserved. The management this season have advisedly increased the membership of the orchestra for the Pop concerts from 55 to 66 players, and all of these players of stringed instruments. The result is admirable as regards the increased richness, fullness and brilliancy of the orchestral tone.

URACK CONDUCTS

Otto Urack appeared for the first time as conductor at the Pop concerts, with distinguished success. The programme was excellently arranged. The performances were nearer the quality of a Symphony concert than they have ever been before.

The standards of these performances have grown higher season by season. It is evidently the intention to continue this advance and justify the increasing patronage. Mr. Urack was fortunate in his interpretations of light music of a popular tone, as he was in the sonorous march from "Tannhauser" or the impressive and poetic music which makes the closing scene of "Die Walkure."

There were the usual signs of the spring—parties who disported themselves on this as on other opening nights, well furbished, and with due recourse to that printed programme which is not musical; hundreds who sat silent in the galleries for the sake of good music. Debussy recently said that there was only one music, whether that music were present in a waltz of the cafe concert order, or some prodigious symphony. There was one Strauss who wrote waltzes which he called casually "The Editor," "Artists' Life," "Wine, Woman and Song," etc. These titles carried no esoteric significance.

They specified no attempt to clothe philosophy, metaphysics, sociology in tones. But are not these pieces, in fact, wonderful, rythmic, symphonic poems? Are they less intoxicating, less eternal in their appeal to the emotions than the colossal tone poems of that hated Strauss with the given name of Richard? One would not have danced very easily to Mr. Urack's changeful tempi yesterday evening, but listening there one danced a hundred waltzes and with a thousand of the other sex! The true province of music! The lost art of the ancients! And is not the actual genesis of the symphonic poem the dance?

The programme included the procession march from "Tannhauser," the "Jubet" overture of Weber, with the organ played by Mr. Marshall, and for the ending of Weber's piece, "God Save the King," alias "America," flung out by the full orchestra and the organ pipes, while the audience rose to its feet. Also selections from "Mme. Butterfly," the "Magic Fire Scene and Wotan's Farewell" from Wagner's "Walkure"—for once in an orchestral version that was not an inexcusable disarrangement; the overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor"; the "Blue Danube," played by request; selections from "The Mikado"; Sousa's march "The Stars and Stripes Forever"; and two wonderful fragments from Bizet's incidental music to Daudet's play, "L'Arlessienne."

The programme this evening will be as follows:

March, "The Flag of Victory"	Blon
Overture, "The Barber of Seville"	Rossini
Waltz, "Roses From the South"	Strauss
Selection from "Carmen"	Bizet
Overture, "The Bat"	Strauss
Introduction and Waltz	Urack
a—Dance Duet	Urack
b—Plotters' Trio	Urack
c—Song of the Man-o'-war's-men of the U. S. Fleet	Urack
Intermezzo, "The Jewels of the Madonna"	Wolf-Ferrari
Overture, "Mignon"	Thomas
Largo Violin, Mr. Hoffmann; organ, Mr. Marshall; harp.	Handel
Selection, "The Girl in the Train"	Lehar
March, "Kaiser Wilhelm"	Nagel

JUNE 21, 1913

BOSTON POST,

LENOM WEILDS BATON AT POPS

Symphony Oboist Gives Interesting Programme

An enthusiastic audience, which packed the auditorium to its capacity greeted Clement Lenom, the oboist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when he took up the baton for the first time at the Pop concerts last night in Symphony Hall.

Mr. Lenom's experience, not only as a skilled performer on his special instrument, but also as the conductor of various orchestral concerts in France had especially qualified him for this work, and it required only a few minutes for the audience to realize that the new leader was master of his task, and, moreover, able to interest his hearers in a way of his own.

Mr. Lenom conducted not only with enthusiasm, and with the evident intention of giving his best to his work, but also with exceptional sympathy for the music which he interpreted, with rythmic elasticity as well as decision, with a contagious personal pleasure in the music. He showed an especial regard for the treatment of phrases and for fitting nuance. His effects were always logical, never forced, never designed to make effect purely for effect's sake.

The utmost was done for the sake of the composers represented on an uncommonly well chosen programme. The list included music that was familiar, with an occasional piece of light music less well known to American audiences. But the unusual interest and the pleasant contrast between each piece was due far more to well considered arrangement than to music that could be classed as novel.

Music for music's sake: The Tannhauser overture; three movements from Massenet's charming suite, "Les Erinyes"; the overture to Mignon; the march, "Tabasco," from the early comic opera of George W. Chadwick; the "Kammenoi-Ostrow" of Rubenstein, in the beautifully orchestrated version of Victor Herbert—these and much more of like entertaining nature made the programme of an auspicious occasion.

For next Monday night Mr. Lenom has arranged an evening of American music. The list of names is representative of much of the best music that America has produced up to this time, and shows that America has produced a good deal that is worth while.

GLOBE—SATURDAY.

JUNE 21, 1913.

MR LENOM AT THE "POPS."

Oboist Makes First Appearance as Conductor at These Concerts With Pronounced Success.

A new conductor came to the desk at the "Pop" concert last night in the person of Clement Lenom, the oboist of the orchestra. Mr Lenom was received by a large audience, which practically filled floor and balconies and evinced the liveliest enthusiasm for the successive numbers of a well-chosen program.

Opening with Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" march, the last part of which had to be repeated, Mr Lenom continued through music of sufficiently light and diverting character, combined with the "Tannhauser" overtures; Massenet's suite, "Les Erinnyes," with its piquant dance, familiar elegy for the cello and the highly-colored finale; Gounod's Hymn to St Cecilia and Rubinstein's Kamennoi Ostrow, in which Mr Marshall, at the organ, adds much to the general pleasure.

The soloists of the evening both received their reward in applause asking for a repetition—Mr Theodorowicz, the concertmaster, in the melody in Gounod's hymn, and Mr Keller in the Massenet elegy for cello.

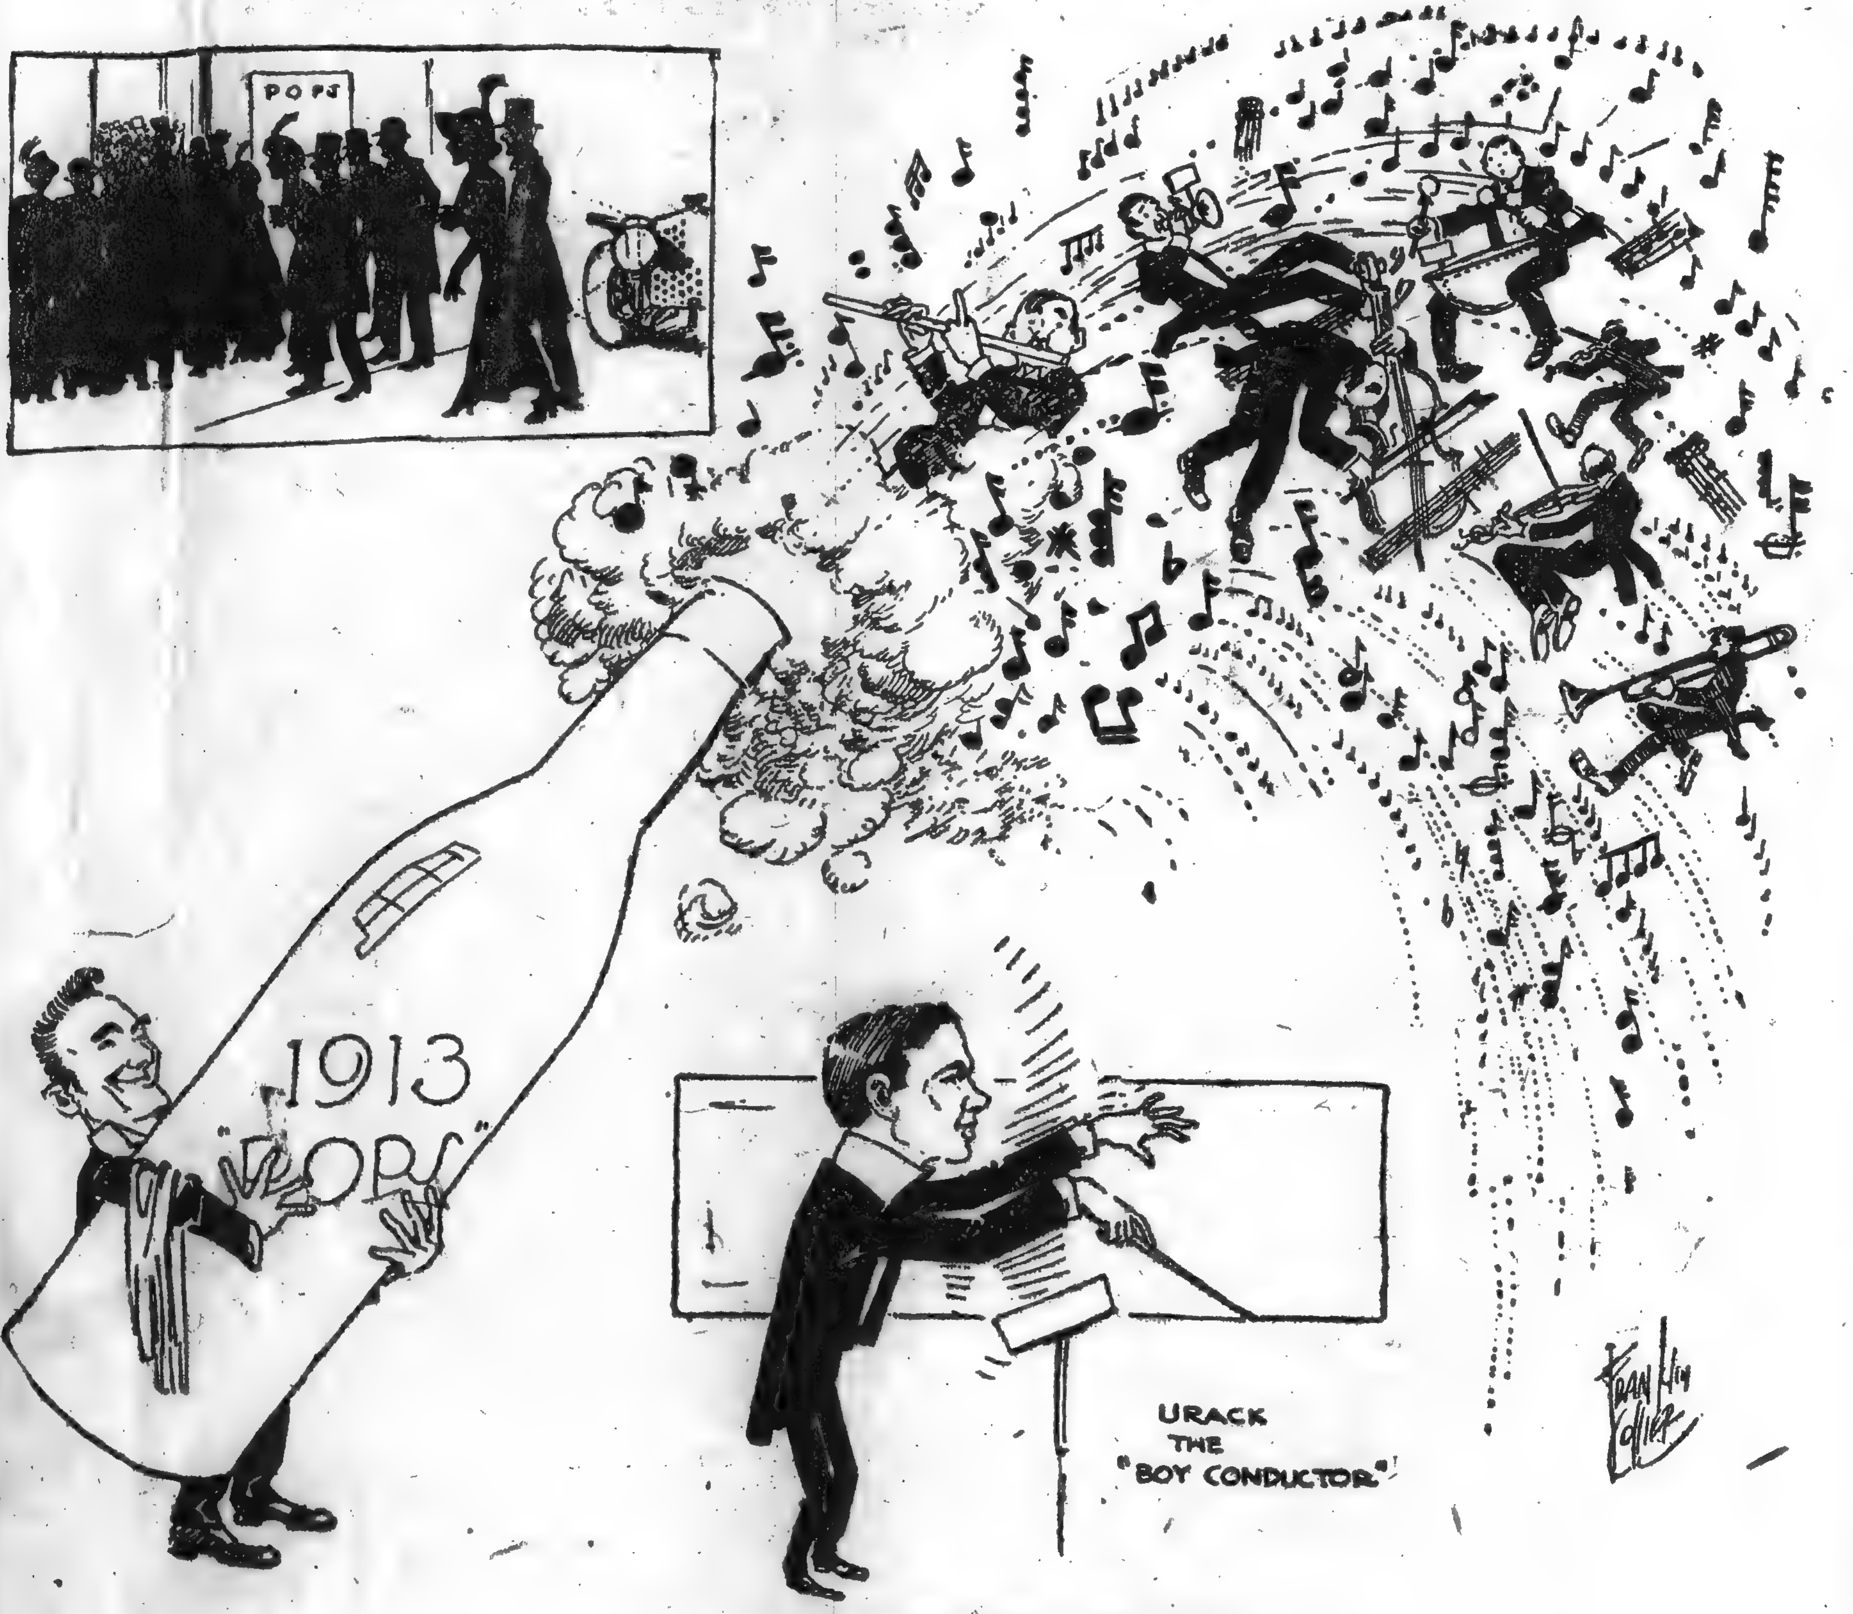
It is clear that Mr Lenom is proficient in the gentle art of making pleasurable programs, as in directing music of light and graceful texture in its true vein, and in reading that of more seriousness with a fine appreciation. His reign at these concerts, although necessarily brief, should make a brilliant conclusion of the series. Next Monday he will take up the cudgels for the American composer, and on the Monday following, which is June 30, will give a program from the Italians.

GLOBE—

MAY 6, 1913.

"POPS" OPEN THEIR ANNUAL ENGAGEMENT.

Return of Concerts, at Which Fine Music Lends Aid to Digestion, Warmly Greeted at Symphony Hall.



THE "POPS" OPEN THE SEASON.

Warmly greeted by all who still associate music and pleasure, the "Pops" arrive.

Music has spent an arduous season of research in the ethereal altitudes of the soul, and has caused debates between sworn friends waxing to blows. Once more the heavenly maid descends to her true and noble function as a first aid to digestion and a gentle stimulant to harmless persiflage.

This Springtime session over the glasses is the friend to the honest man, the man who cordially abominates music that never will keep time with his feet, and admits it without shame; the man who could not tell a chief theme from a double bassoon. But did you watch him last night, while Mr Urack and his enlarged orchestra were doing a waltz by the lesser Strauss?

He blew rings of smoke with a marvelous sense of rhythm across a tall goblet. They floated above a face done prettily in smiles, roses and deep blue, crowned with imposing millinery of the beckoning arm, until it became a wholly irrelevant thing what kind of a tariff the Senate may put on wool.

How sweet is the unblemished beauty of true candor. Come now, let us tell the truth. After all, how many are not profoundly bored by a symphony, the high and mightiness, or the pyschic unfathomability of it, and upon occasion would not rejoice to hear a rattling good two-step in its place, exuding ozone, bass drum and cymbals at every bar. But the guise of respectability must be worn.

Even a woman now and then confesses. A naive young creature, with the usual modish and nodding headgear, with patent leather pumps and silver buckles carrying an embossed monogram, with a silk skirt fetchingly slashed directoire, and a badly cut up heartline in her hand, remarked warmly to her escort:

"Now isn't that just divine, and Mr Urack is so graceful. Why don't Dr Muck play pieces like that once in a while, I wonder?"

What a miracle a little illusion works. Mr Urack, the brilliant young assistant conductor of the orchestra, who last night made his first appearance here at the "pop" concerts, had arranged a program which in reality was of quite a pretentious nature, with the opening march of the knights and guests of the tournament of song in "Tannhauser," and including the magic fire scene from "The Valkyrie," as well two overtures of Weber's, "Jubile and Der Freischuetz," excerpts fr Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" music, and selection from "Mme Butterfly."

But there was the festive air of ea ing, drinking and talk. There was eve sign of pleasurable relaxation, and t audience filled the house.

The orchestra has been increased t year from 55 to 66 men, which gives strings greater body and sonority. Urack has a splendid organization his command. He found favor la night with his audience and will fi more by humoring the usual and pro demands for lighter numbers as cores, pieces which are doubly effect to follow upon the heels of the p gram selection that has gone befor

Tonight the program will include f of Mr Urack's compositions eviden in the lighter vein. The ever-popu "Largo" will be played by Mr Hoffmann as solo violinist with Mr Marshall at the organ and Mr Rogers a harpist. There will be "The Barber o Seville" and "Mignon" overtures and selection from "Carmen."

Two special evenings are already announced—Wagner night, next Monday, and Amherst night, Wednesday, May 14.

JOURNAL—

MAY 6, 1913.

RIOT OF COLOR AT OPENING OF POPS

Gaily Dressed Women Greet Musicians at Start of 28th Season..

FINE PROGRAM BY LARGE ORCHESTRA

Audience Pays Tribute to the Excellent Music in a Frenzy of Applause

The twenty-eighth season of "The Pops" began last evening at Symphony Hall, with an orchestra of sixty-six pieces, an exceptionally large audience that began sedately to submit to the music, but ended in a frenzy of applause in tribute to its excellence.

Richer in the number of its string instruments this season, the orchestra, under the baton of Otto Urack, had more volume than has been customary at "The Pops," and the effect was most [illegible]tory [illegible]dded volum

The organ was again brought into unusually good effect in Weber's "Jubilee" overture, to the closing strains of which the audience paid its standing tribute.

Great acclaim was deservedly given to the orchestra's rendition of Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana," and nearly as much to its preceding number, "Wotan's Farwell" and the magic-fire scene from "Die Walkure." In this number particularly did the marvelous skill of the players show at its best and the harmony was perfect.

While the first part of the program was, perhaps, a trifle heavy for the occasion, the last part proved decidedly popular. Conductor Urack was not generous with his encores, however. He added "In The Shadows" and his own "Sailor's Song" in response to the demand for other numbers.

Schumann's "Evening Song," with its soft melody and its inspiring theme, invoked hearty applause, and the stirring "Stars and Stripes" sent the audience home with its blood stirring.

A feature of the opening night was the riot of color in the hats and gowns of the women present. The fact that Bulgaria and the Cubists are affecting the costumes of milady was very evident, and the people at the tables were almost as interesting as the players.

The first feature night will be on Wednesday next. It will be a Wagner night, and on Thursday, May 14, Amherst is given the honor on the first college night.

POST

MAY 6, 1913

POP SEASON OPENS WITH GREAT BAND

More Players Than Ever—Otto Urack Conducts

BY OLIN DOWNES

Last night the opening of the "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall proved the most successful in some seasons of these entertaining occasions, on account of a much larger attendance for the beginning of the spring season, and the exceptional enthusiasm of the audience.

This was wholly deserved. The management this season have advisedly increased the membership of the orchestra for the Pop concerts from 55 to 66 players, and all of these players of stringed instruments. The result is admirable as regards the increased richness, fullness and brilliancy of the orchestral tone.

URACK CONDUCTS

Otto Urack appeared for the first time as conductor at the Pop concerts, with distinguished success. The programme was excellently arranged. The performances were nearer the quality of a Symphony concert than they have ever been before.

The standards of these performances have grown higher season by season. It is evidently the intention to continue this advance and justify the increasing patronage. Mr. Urack was fortunate in his interpretations of light music of a popular tone, as he was in the sonorous march from "Tannhauser" or the impressive and poetic music which makes the closing scene of "Die Walkure."

There were the usual signs of the spring—parties who disported themselves on this as on other opening nights, well furbished, and with due recourse to that printed programme which is not musical; hundreds who sat silent in the galleries for the sake of good music. Debussy recently said that there was only one music, whether that music were present in a waltz of the cafe concert order, or some prodigious symphony. There was one Strauss who wrote waltzes which he called casually "The Editor," "Artists' Life," "Wine, Woman and Song," etc. These titles carried no esoteric significance.

They specified no attempt to clothe philosophy, metaphysics. sociology in tones. But are not these pieces, in fact, wonderful, rythmic, symphonic poems? Are they less intoxicating, less eternal in their appeal to the emotions than the colossal tone poems of that hated Strauss with the given name of Richard? One would not have danced very easily to Mr. Urack's changeful tempi yesterday evening, but listening there one danced a hundred waltzes and with a thousand of the other sex! The true province of music! The lost art of the ancients! And is not the actual genesis of the symphonic poem the dance?

The programme included the procession march from "Tannhauser," the "Jubet" overture of Weber, with the organ played by Mr. Marshall, and for the ending of Weber's piece, "God Save the King," alias "America," flung out by the full orchestra and the organ pipes, while the audience rose to its feet. Also selections from "Mme. Butterfly," the "Magic Fire Scene and Wotan's Farewell" from Wagner's "Walkure"—for once in an orchestral version that was not an inexcusable disarrangement; the overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor"; the "Blue Danube," played by request; selections from "The Mikado"; Sousa's march, "The Stars and Stripes Forever"; and two wonderful fragments from Bizet's incidental music to Daudet's play, "L'Arlessienne."

The programme this evening will be as follows:

March, "The Flag of Victory" .... Blon
Overture, "The Barber of Seville" .... Rossini
Waltz, "Roses From the South" ...... Strauss
Selection from "Carmen" .... Bizet
Overture, "The Bat" .... Strauss
Introduction and Waltz .... Urack
  a—Dance Duet .... Urack
  b—Plotters' Trio .... Urack
  c—Song of the Man-o'-war's-men of the U. S. Fleet .... Urack
Intermezzo, "The Jewels of the Madonna"
    Wolf-Ferrari
Overture, "Mignon" .... Thomas
Largo .... Handel
  Violin, Mr. Hoffmann; organ, Mr. Marshall; harp.
Selection, "The Girl in the Train" .... Lehar
March, "Kaiser Wilhelm" .... Nagel

JUNE 21, 1913

BOSTON POST,

LENOM WEILDS BATON AT POPS

Symphony Oboist Gives Interesting Programme

An enthusiastic audience, which packed the auditorium to its capacity, greeted Clement Lenom, the oboist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when he took up the baton for the first time at the Pop concerts last night in Symphony Hall.

Mr. Lenom's experience, not only as a skilled performer on his special instrument, but also as the conductor of various orchestral concerts in France, had especially qualified him for this work, and it required only a few minutes for the audience to realize that the new leader was master of his task, and, moreover, able to interest his hearers in a way of his own.

Mr. Lenom conducted not only with enthusiasm, and with the evident intention of giving his best to his work, but also with exceptional sympathy for the music which he interpreted, with rythmic elasticity as well as decision, with a contagious personal pleasure in the music. He showed an especial regard for the treatment of phrases and for fitting nuance. His effects were always logical, never forced, never designed to make effect purely for effect's sake.

The utmost was done for the sake of the composers represented on an uncommonly well chosen programme. The list included music that was familiar, with an occasional piece of light music less well known to American audiences. But the unusual interest and the pleasant contrast between each piece was due far more to well considered arrangement than to music that could be classed as novel.

Music for music's sake: The Tannhauser overture; three movements from Massenet's charming suite, "Les Erinnyes"; the overture to Mignon; the march, "Tabasco," from the early comic opera of George W. Chadwick; the "Kammenoi-Ostrow" of Rubenstein, in the beautifully orchestrated version of Victor Herbert—these and much more of like entertaining nature made the programme of an auspicious occasion.

For next Monday night Mr. Lenom has arranged an evening of American music. The list of names is representative of much of the best music that America has produced up to this time and shows that America has produced a good deal that is worth while.

GLOBE—SATURDAY.

JUNE 21, 1913.

MR LENOM AT THE "POPS."

Oboist Makes First Appearance as Conductor at These Concerts With Pronounced Success.

A new conductor came to the desk at the "Pop" concert last night in the person of Clement Lenom, the oboist of the orchestra. Mr Lenom was received by a large audience, which practically filled floor and balconies and evinced the liveliest enthusiasm for the successive numbers of a well-chosen program.

Opening with Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" march, the last part of which had to be repeated, Mr Lenom continued through music of sufficiently light and diverting character, combined with the "Tannhauser" overtures; Massenet's suite, "Les Erinnyes," with its piquant dance, familiar elegy for the cello and the highly-colored finale; Gounod's Hymn to St Cecilia and Rubinstein's Kamennoi Ostrow, in which Mr Marshall, at the organ, adds much to the general pleasure.

The soloists of the evening both received their reward in applause asking for a repetition—Mr Theodorowicz, the concertmaster, in the melody in Gounod's hymn, and Mr Keller in the Massenet elegy for cello.

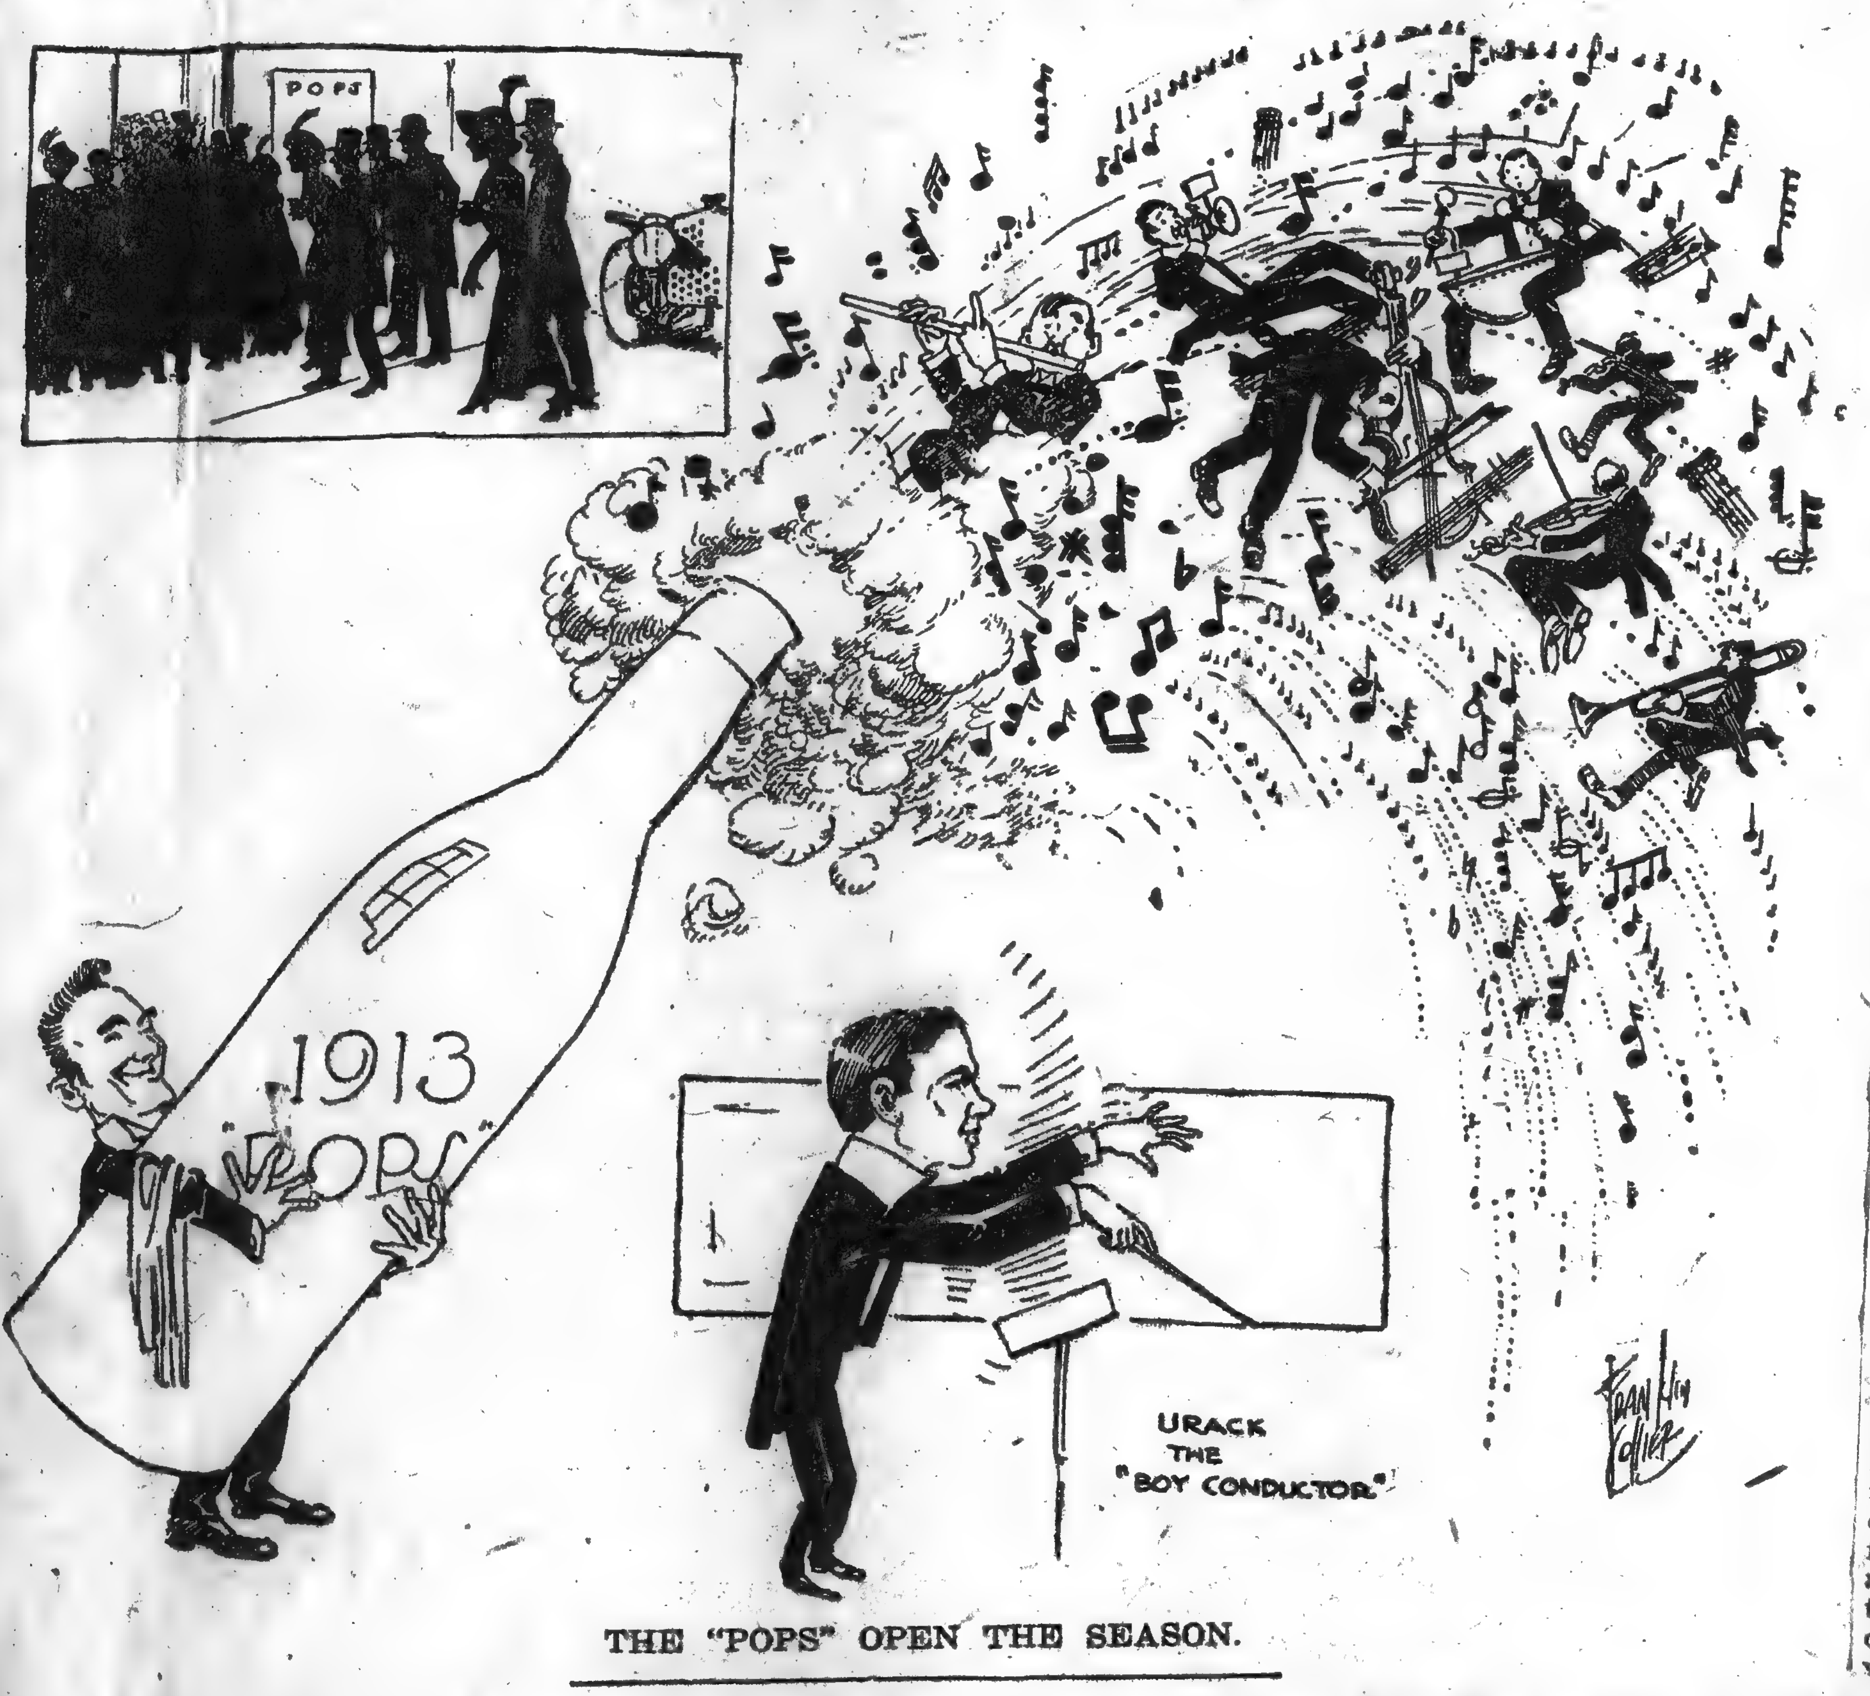
It is clear that Mr Lenom is proficient in the gentle art of making pleasurable programs, as in directing music of light and graceful texture in its true vein, and in reading that of more seriousness with a fine appreciation. His reign at these concerts, although necessarily brief, should make a brilliant conclusion of the series. Next Monday he will take up the cudgels for the American composer, and on the Monday following, which is June 30, will give a program from the Italians.

GLOBE—

MAY 6, 1913.

"POPS" OPEN THEIR ANNUAL ENGAGEMENT.

Return of Concerts, at Which Fine Music Lends Aid to Digestion, Warmly Greeted at Symphony Hall.



THE "POPS" OPEN THE SEASON.

Warmly greeted by all who still associate music and pleasure, the "Pops" arrive.

Music has spent an arduous season of research in the ethereal altitudes of the soul, and has caused debates between sworn friends waxing to blows. Once more the heavenly maid descends to her true and noble function as a first aid to digestion and a gentle stimulant to harmless persiflage.

This Springtime session over the glasses is the friend to the honest man, the man who cordially abominates music that never will keep time with his feet, and admits it without shame; the man who could not tell a chief theme from a double bassoon. But did you watch him last night, while Mr Urack and his enlarged orchestra were doing a waltz by the lesser Strauss?

He blew rings of smoke with a marvelous sense of rhythm across a tall goblet. They floated above a face done prettily in smiles, roses and deep blue, crowned with imposing millinery of the beckoning arm, until it became a wholly irrelevant thing what kind of a tariff the Senate may put on wool.

How sweet is the unblemished beauty of true candor. Come now, let us tell the truth. After all, how many are not profoundly bored by a symphony, the high and mightiness, or the pyschic unfathomability of it, and upon occasion would not rejoice to hear a rattling good two-step in its place, exuding ozone, bass drum and cymbals at every bar. But the guise of respectability must be worn.

Even a woman now and then confesses. A naive young creature, with the usual modish and nodding headgear, with patent leather pumps and silver buckles carrying an embossed monogram, with a silk skirt fetchingly slashed directoire, and a badly cut up heartline in her hand, remarked warmly to her escort:

"Now isn't that just divine, and Mr Urack is so graceful. Why don't Dr Muck play pieces like that once in a while, I wonder?"

What a miracle a little illusion works. Mr Urack, the brilliant young assistant conductor of the orchestra, who last night made his first appearance here at the "pop" concerts, had arranged a program which in reality was of quite a pretentious nature, with the opening march of the knights and guests of the tournament of song in "Tannhauser," and including the magic fire scene from "The Valkyrie," as well as two overtures of Weber's, "Jubilee" and Der Freischuetz," excerpts from Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" music, and a selection from "Mme Butterfly."

But there was the festive air of eating, drinking and talk. There was every sign of pleasurable relaxation, and the audience filled the house.

The orchestra has been increased this year from 55 to 66 men, which gives the strings greater body and sonority. Mr Urack has a splendid organization at his command. He found favor last night with his audience and will find more by humoring the usual and proper demands for lighter numbers as encores, pieces which are doubly effective to follow upon the heels of the program selection that has gone before.

Tonight the program will include four of Mr Urack's compositions evidently in the lighter vein. The ever-popular "Largo" will be played by Mr Hoffmann as solo violinist with Mr Marshall at the organ and Mr Rogers as harpist. There will be "The Barber of Seville" and "Mignon" overtures and a selection from "Carmen."

Two special evenings are already announced—Wagner night, next Monday, and Amherst night, Wednesday, May 14.

JOURNAL—

MAY 6, 1913.

RIOT OF COLOR AT OPENING OF POPS

Gaily Dressed Women Greet Musicians at Start of 28th Season..

FINE PROGRAM BY LARGE ORCHESTRA

Audience Pays Tribute to the Excellent Music in a Frenzy of Applause

The twenty-eighth season of "The Pops" began last evening at Symphony Hall, with an orchestra of sixty-six pieces, an exceptionally large audience that began sedately to submit to the music, but ended in a frenzy of applause in tribute to its excellence.

Richer in the number of its string instruments this season, the orchestra, under the baton of Otto Urack, had more volume than has been customary at "The Pops," and the effect was most [illegible] tory [illegible] added volume

The organ was again brought into unusually good effect in Weber's "Jubilee" overture, to the closing strains of which the audience paid its standing tribute.

Great acclaim was deservedly given to the orchestra's rendition of Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana," and nearly as much to its preceding number, "Wotan's Farwell" and the magic-fire scene from "Die Walkure." In this number particularly did the marvelous skill of the players show at its best and the harmony was perfect.

While the first part of the program was, perhaps, a trifle heavy for the occasion, the last part proved decidedly popular. Conductor Urack was not generous with his encores, however. He added "In The Shadows" and his own "Sailor's Song" in response to the demand for other numbers.

Schumann's "Evening Song," with its soft melody and its inspiring theme, invoked hearty applause, and the stirring "Stars and Stripes" sent the audience home with its blood stirring.

A feature of the opening night was the riot of color in the hats and gowns of the women present. The fact that Bulgaria and the Cubists are affecting the costumes of milady was very evident, and the people at the tables were almost as interesting as the players.

The first feature night will be on Wednesday next. It will be a Wagner night, and on Thursday, May 14, Amherst is given the honor on the first college night.

POST

MAY 6, 1913

POP SEASON OPENS WITH GREAT BAND

More Players Than Ever—Otto Urack Conducts

BY OLIN DOWNES

Last night the opening of the "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall proved the most successful in some seasons of these entertaining occasions, on account of a much larger attendance for the beginning of the spring season, and the exceptional enthusiasm of the audience.

This was wholly deserved. The management this season have advisedly increased the membership of the orchestra for the Pop concerts from 55 to 66 players, and all of these players of stringed instruments. The result is admirable as regards the increased richness, fullness and briliancy of the orchestral tone.

URACK CONDUCTS

Otto Urack appeared for the first time as conductor at the Pop concerts, with distinguished success. The programme was excellently arranged. The performances were nearer the quality of a Symphony concert than they have ever been before.

The standards of these performances have grown higher season by season. It is evidently the intention to continue this advance and justify the increasing patronage. Mr. Urack was fortunate in his interpretations of light music of a popular tone, as he was in the sonorous march from "Tannhauser" or the impressive and poetic music [illegible] makes the closing scene of "Die [illegible]e."

[illegible] were the usual signs of the [illegible] who disported them[illegible]s as on other opening [illegible]bished, and with due re[illegible]printed programme which [illegible] hundreds who sat silent [illegible] for the sake of good [illegible] recently said that there [illegible] music, whether that [illegible]ent in a waltz of the [illegible]er, or some prodigious [illegible] was one Strauss who [illegible]ich he called casually "Artists' Life," "Wine, [illegible]g," etc. These titles [illegible] significance. [illegible] no attempt to clothe [illegible]physics, sociology in [illegible]

[illegible]are not these pieces, in [illegible]ul, rythmic, symphonic [illegible] they less intoxicating, [illegible] their appeal to the emo[illegible]e colossal tone poems of [illegible] Strauss with the given name of Richard? One would not have danced very easily to Mr. Urack's changeful tempi yesterday evening, but listening there one danced a hundred waltzes and with a thousand of the other sex! The true province of music! The lost art of the ancients! And is not the actual genesis of the symphonic poem the dance?

The programme included the procession march from "Tannhauser," the "Jubet" overture of Weber, with the organ played by Mr. Marshall, and for the ending of Weber's piece, "God Save the King," alias "America," flung out by the full orchestra and the organ pipes, while the audience rose to its feet. Also selections from "Mme. Butterfly," the "Magic Fire Scene and Wotan's Farewell" from Wagner's "Walkure"—for once in an orchestral version that was not an inexcusable disarrangement; the overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor"; the "Blue Danube," played by request; selections from "The Mikado"; Sousa's march, "The Stars and Stripes Forever"; and two wonderful fragments from Bizet's incidental music to Daudet's play, "L'Arlessienne."

The programme this evening will be as follows:

March, "The Flag of Victory"	Blon
Overture, "The Barber of Seville"	Rossini
Waltz, "Roses From the South"	Strauss
Selection from "Carmen"	Bizet
Overture, "The Bat"	Strauss
Introduction and Waltz	Urack
a—Dance Duet	Urack
b—Plotters' Trio	Urack
c—Song of the Man-o'-war's-men of the U. S. Fleet	Urack
Intermezzo, "The Jewels of the Madonna"	Wolf-Ferrari
Overture, "Mignon"	Thomas
Largo	Handel
Violin, Mr. Hoffmann; organ, Mr. Marshall; harp.
Selection, "The Girl in the Train"	Lehar
March, "Kaiser Wilhelm"	Nagel

JUNE 21, 1913

BOSTON POST,

LENOM WEILDS BATON AT POPS

Symphony Oboist Gives Interesting Programme

An enthusiastic audience, which packed the auditorium to its capacity, greeted Clement Lenom, the oboist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when he took up the baton for the first time at the Pop concerts last night in Symphony Hall.

Mr. Lenom's experience, not only as a skilled performer on his special instrument, but also as the conductor of various orchestral concerts in France, had especially qualified him for this work, and it required only a few minutes for the audience to realize that the new leader was master of his task, and, moreover, able to interest his hearers in a way of his own.

Mr. Lenom conducted not only with enthusiasm, and with the evident intention of giving his best to his work, but also with exceptional sympathy for the music which he interpreted, with rythmic elasticity as well as decision, with a contagious personal pleasure in the music. He showed an especial regard for the treatment of phrases and for fitting nuance. His effects were always logical, never forced, never designed to make effect purely for effect's sake.

,The utmost was done for the sake of the composers represented on an uncommonly well chosen programme. The list included music that was familiar, with an occasional piece of light music less well known to American audiences. But the unusual interest and the pleasant contrast between each piece was due far more to well considered arrangement than to music that could be classed as novel.

Music for music's sake: The Tannhauser overture; three movements from Massenet's charming suite, "Les Erinyes"; the overture to Mignon; the march, "Tabasco," from the early comic opera of George W. Chadwick; the "Kammenoi-Ostrow" of Rubenstein, in the beautifully orchestrated version of Victor Herbert—these and much more of like entertaining nature made the programme of an auspicious occasion.

For next Monday night Mr. Lenom has arranged an evening of American music. The list of names is representative of much of the best music that America has produced up to this time and shows that America has produced a good deal that is worth while.

GLOBE—SATURDAY.

JUNE 21, 1913.

MR LENOM AT THE "POPS."

Oboist Makes First Appearance as Conductor at These Concerts With Pronounced Success.

A new conductor came to the desk at the "Pop" concert last night in the person of Clement Lenom, the oboist of the orchestra. Mr Lenom was received by a large audience, which practically filled floor and balconies and evinced the liveliest enthusiasm for the successive numbers of a well-chosen program.

Opening with Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" march, the last part of which had to be repeated, Mr Lenom continued through music of sufficiently light and diverting character, combined with the "Tannhauser" overtures; Massenet's suite, "Les Erinnyes," with its piquant dance, familiar elegy for the cello and the highly-colored finale; Gounod's Hymn to St Cecilia and Rubinstein's Kamennoi Ostrow, in which Mr Marshall, at the organ, adds much to the general pleasure.

The soloists of the evening both received their reward in applause asking for a repetition—Mr Theodorowicz, the concertmaster, in the melody in Gounod's hymn, and Mr Keller in the Massenet elegy for cello.

It is clear that Mr Lenom is proficient in the gentle art of making pleasurable programs, as in directing music of light and graceful texture in its true vein, and in reading that of more seriousness with a fine appreciation. His reign at these concerts, although necessarily brief, should make a brilliant conclusion of the series. Next Monday he will take up the cudgels for the American composer, and on the Monday following, which is June 30, will give a program from the Italians.

JOURNAL—SATURDAY,
JUNE 21, 1913.

CONDUCTOR LENOM SCORES SUCCESS

Pleases Large Audience on First Appearance at Pop Concert.

With marked success before an audience that completely filled Symphony Hall, C. Lenom made his initial appearance as conductor for the Symphony Orchestra at the Pop concert last evening.

Enthusiasm ran high and especially so at the conclusion of several favorite selections, some of which were given with the special interpretation of Conductor Lenom.

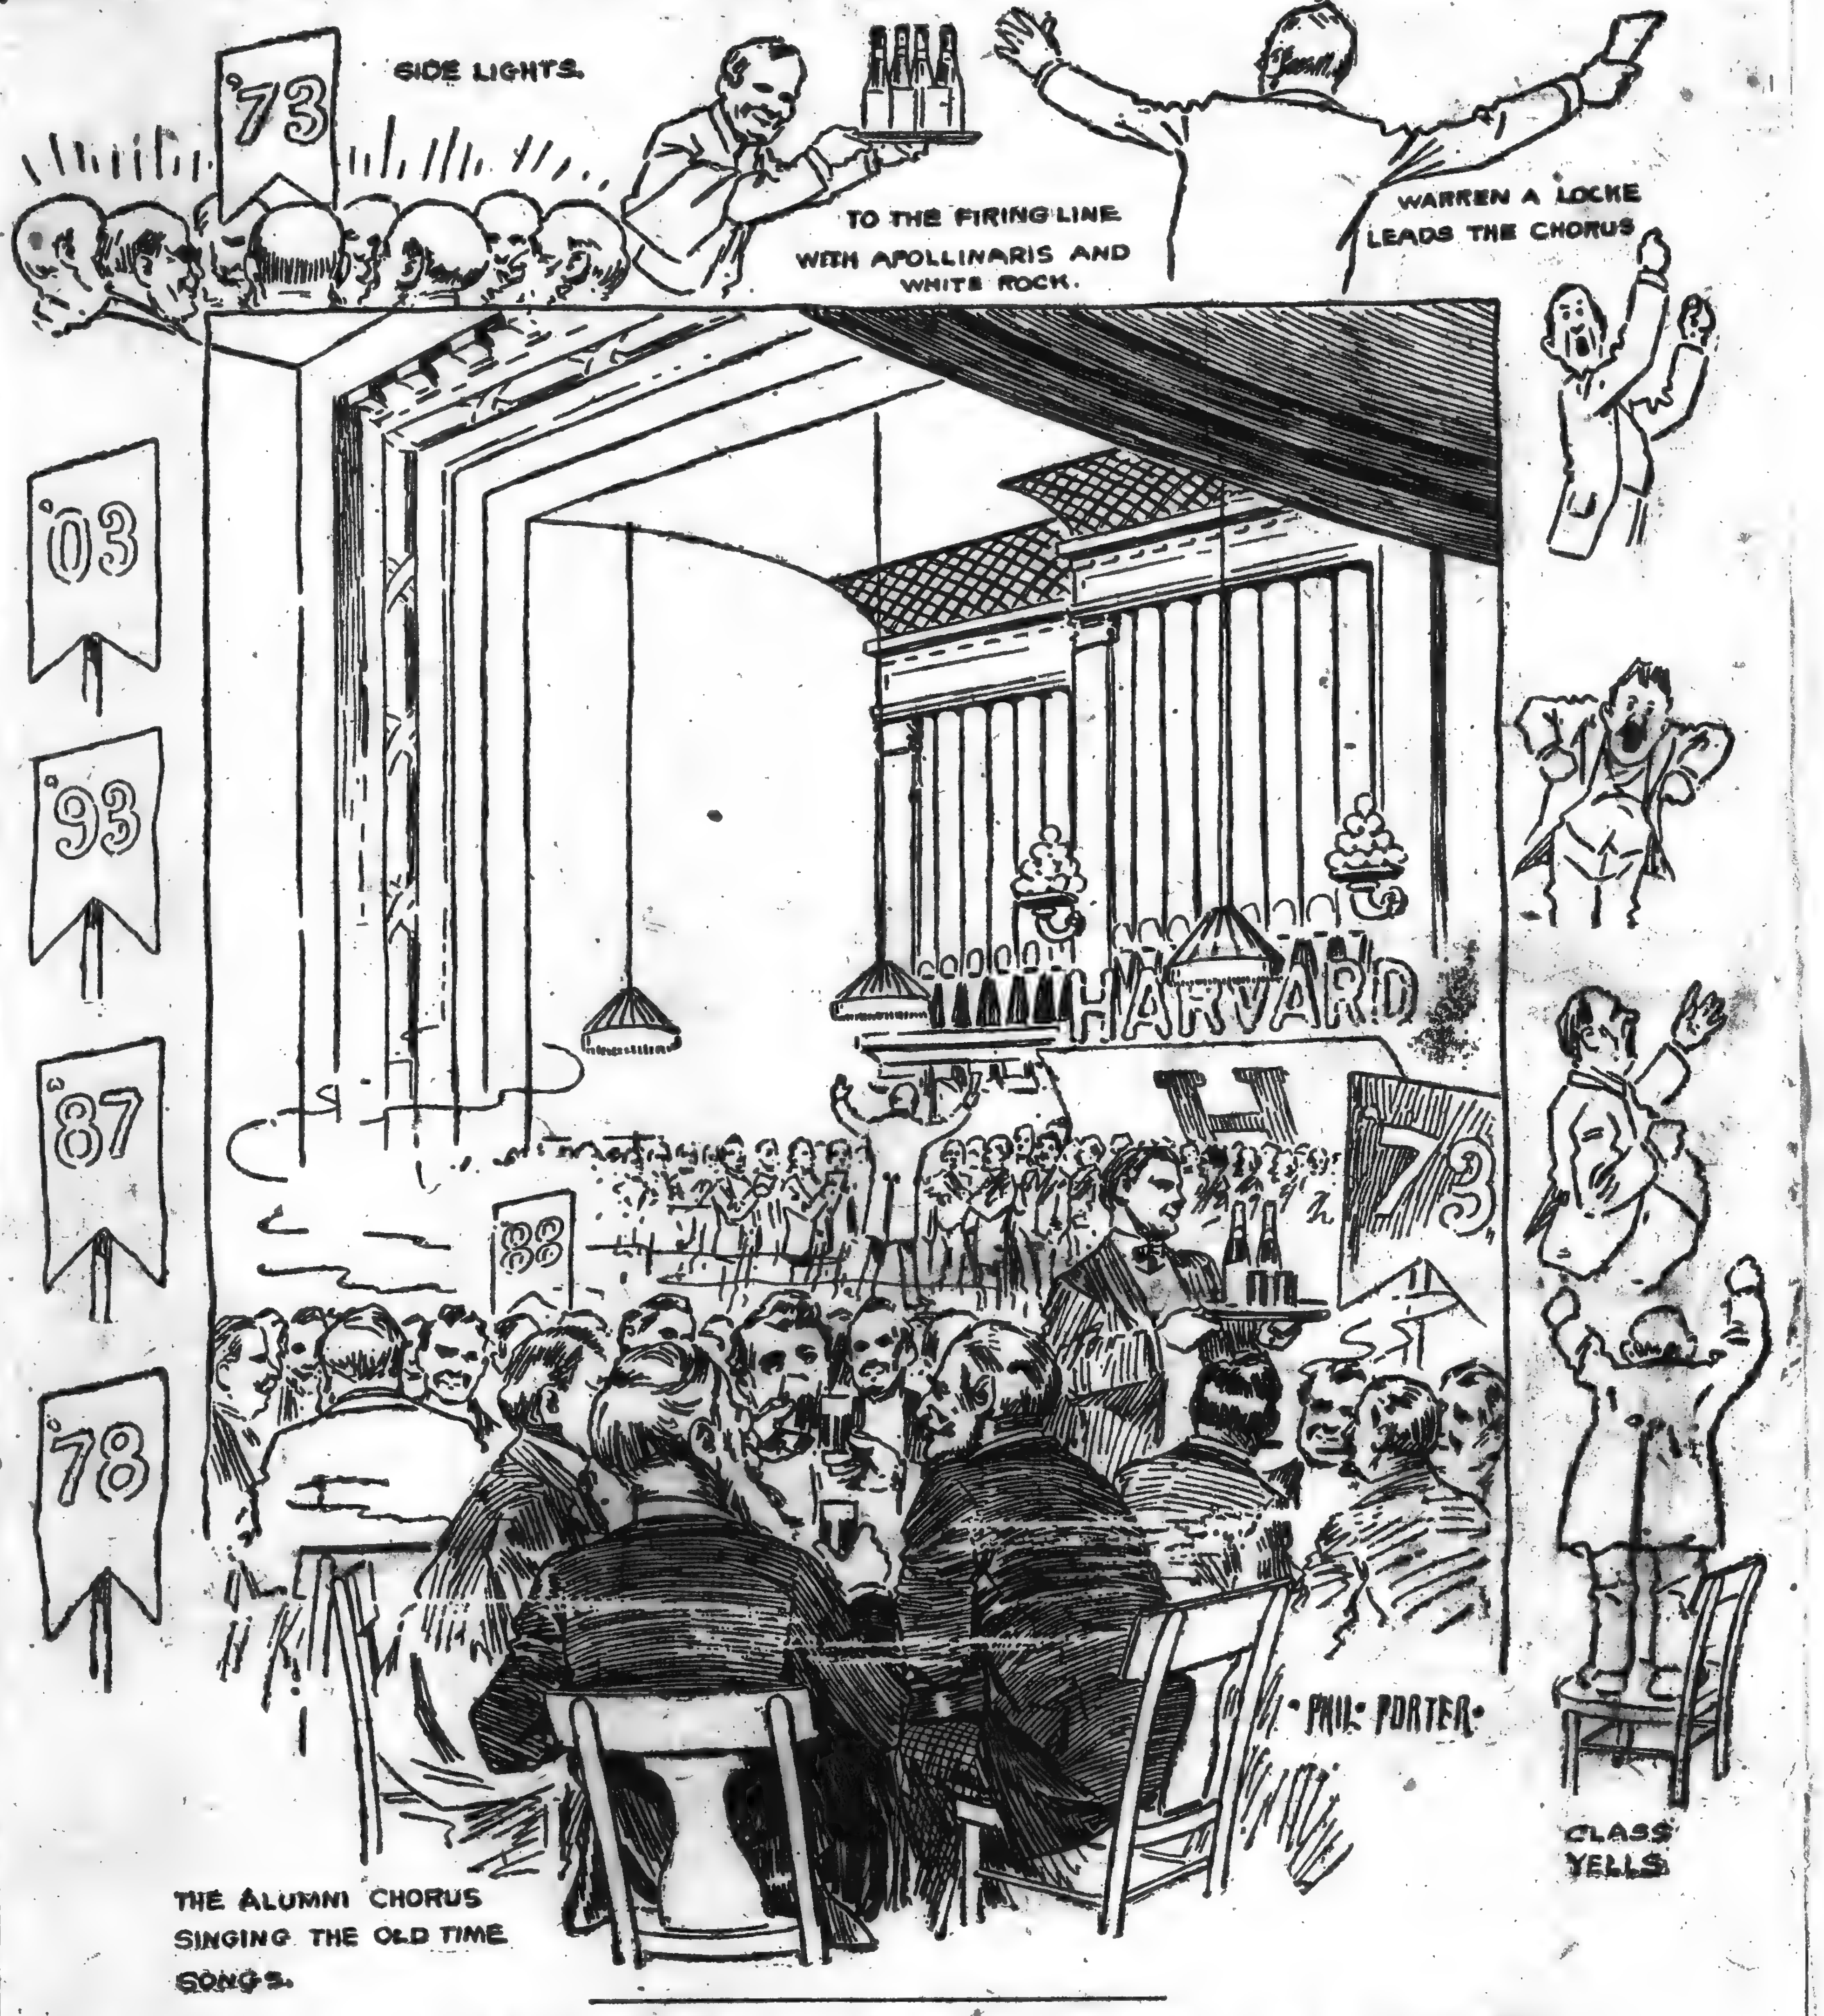
Perhaps the feature number of the evening's program was the overture, "Tannhauser," which was given after the interpretation of Dr. Muck, whom Mr. Lemon terms "the greatest German conductor." The piece met with such favor that it was repeated. The opening selection, the march, "Pomp and Circumstance," and an Italian interpretation of "Cavalleria Rusticana," also met with great applause and were especially enjoyable.

Two other overtures were "Orpheus" and "Mignon," and other selections, wide in variety, were "Kamennoi Ostrow," "Gypsy Love," the march, "Tabasco," and "Hymn to St. Cecelia."

The solo parts were excellent. Joseph Keller was 'cello soloist in the suite, Les Erinnyes and Julius Theodorowicz played the violin solo in the hymn. The "Dance of the Fakirs" and a serenade were other selections.

JOURNAL JUNE 20.

HARVARD NIGHT AT THE "POPS"



SIDE LIGHTS.
'73
TO THE FIRING LINE WITH APOLLINARIS AND WHITE ROCK.
WARREN A LOCKE LEADS THE CHORUS
'03
'93
'87
'88
'78
HARVARD
H '73
PHIL PORTER
CLASS YELLS

THE ALUMNI CHORUS SINGING THE OLD TIME SONGS.

2000 HARVARD GRADS HAVE A MERRY TIME AT THE "POP"

Winners of the "H" of half a century ago, members of long forgotten glee clubs, college leaders of another generation with the younger alumni, aggregating nearly 2000, joined in singing "Fair Harvard" last night at the commencement concert of the Boston Harvard Club at Symphony Hall.

Members of the class of '73, of which there were a full score present, held the seats of honor at the head of the auditorium. The old boys were hugely delighted with themselves when they were the first on their feet when the orchestra started the opening bars of "Fair Harvard," which was a signal mark of honor in the more reverent days of old.

The entire program led up to "Fair Harvard," with the enthusiasm growing wilder and wilder with each number. When the 2000 were not singing they were cheering, and after the first few numbers everything and everybody was given the three long Harvards.

Decorated in Crimson

The auditorium was beautifully decorated in crimson. In the rear of the stage great lights flared out a crimson "Harvard," and a large banner bearing the coveted "H" swung high over all. From the balcony were suspended Harvard banners, which at the end of the night were fought for and torn into ribbons for souvenirs.

The men were quiet during the first two numbers, as there was nothing of Harvard in either of them. The third number, "The Harvard Festival March," written by Percy Lee Atherton, '93, in honor of the vicennial of his class, brought out the first cheers. Ninety-three were first on their feet at the conclusion of the number, cheered Harvard, themselves and the composer, and then the cheer was taken up all over the hall.

The fourth number, "Euphrosyne," was also roundly cheered, as it was written by a Harvard man, also of '93, Frederick S. Converse. The fifth number, however, brought out the greatest enthusiasm. This was the alumni chorus of over half a hundred men, ranging in class from '69 to '12. They were cheered when they rose from their seats and marched to the stage, cheered while they stood on the stage waiting the word, and wildly cheered when they had completed their first part of the program.

They sang four songs and were compelled to encore each of them. This first manifestation of real college singing awoke old-time enthusiasm in all present, and from this time on the affair became less dignified and more exuberant. Seventy-three pounded Ninety-nine on the back and declared that the old-timers had been the greatest singers, while the younger men scoffingly boasted of his class yell.

Old-Timers Are First

The great scene of the night came with the opening bars of "Fair Harvard," the last number on the program. Seventy-three was first on its feet, and after the old-timers the entire hall rose as one man. Then the song rolled out up to the roof, out to Huntington avenue, and all but carried across the river into the very confines of the college itself.

After the first rendering of the piece the musicians believed all was over. They didn't know the Harvard man when once "Fair Harvard" stirred his blood. It was again one of the men of '73 who was assisted to a chair by his classmates and roared out, "Once more, fellows, all together."

Next a man from '87 repeated the demand, and so on, until finally all were mounted on chairs, the torn ribbons of the Harvard banners were waved on high, and the song rolled out in such strident tones that the frantic efforts of the world-famous orchestra seemed feeble.

Promise to Meet Again

They locked arms, old men and young, and circled among the tables in the zig-zag that follows a Harvard victory over Yale. They promised each other they would meet again at the crew races. They pledged themselves to give new libraries, new dormitories, scholarships and what not. They were gloriously drunk on a college spirit that was older than the oldest of them.

It was not until the older men had reached the open air and the last strains of the song had died than they turned to each other and said: "Well, it was a wonderful night."

The program:

A. Maquarre, conductor; Warren A. Locke, '69, director of the alumni chorus, and John P. Marshall, organist.

PART I.

(1) Overture, "Die Meistersinger Von Nurnberg" .... Wagner
(2) Invitation to the Dance....Weber-Berlioz
(3) Harvard festival march.P. L. Atherton, '93
(4) Overture, "Euphrosyne".F. S. Converse, '93
(5) Alumni chorus.
(a) "Domine Salvum Fac"............Gounod
(b) "In Picardie"......George L. Osgood, '66
(c) "A May Night"..................Abt
Solo by George E. Hills, '97
(d) "Discovery" ....Grieg

PART II.

(6) Two poems after Omar Khayyam
Arthur Foote, '74
(7) Two Moorish dances...John K. Paine, '69
(8) Kamennoi-Ostrow ....Rubinstein
(9) Hungarian march..................Berlioz
(10) "The Beautiful Blue Danube".....Straus
(11) Alumni chorus.
(a) "Loyal Song"......................Kucken
(b) "Stein Song".....................Bullard
(c) "The Long Day Closes"..........Sullivan
(d) "Hymn of Thanksgiving."
(12) "Fair Harvard."

JOURNAL—SATURDAY,
JUNE 21. 1913.

CONDUCTOR LENOM SCORES SUCCESS

Pleases Large Audience on First Appearance at Pop Concert.

With marked success before an audience that completely filled Symphony Hall, C. Lenom made his initial appearance as conductor for the Symphony Orchestra at the Pop concert last evening.

Enthusiasm ran high and especially so at the conclusion of several favorite selections, some of which were given with the special interpretation of Conductor Lenom.

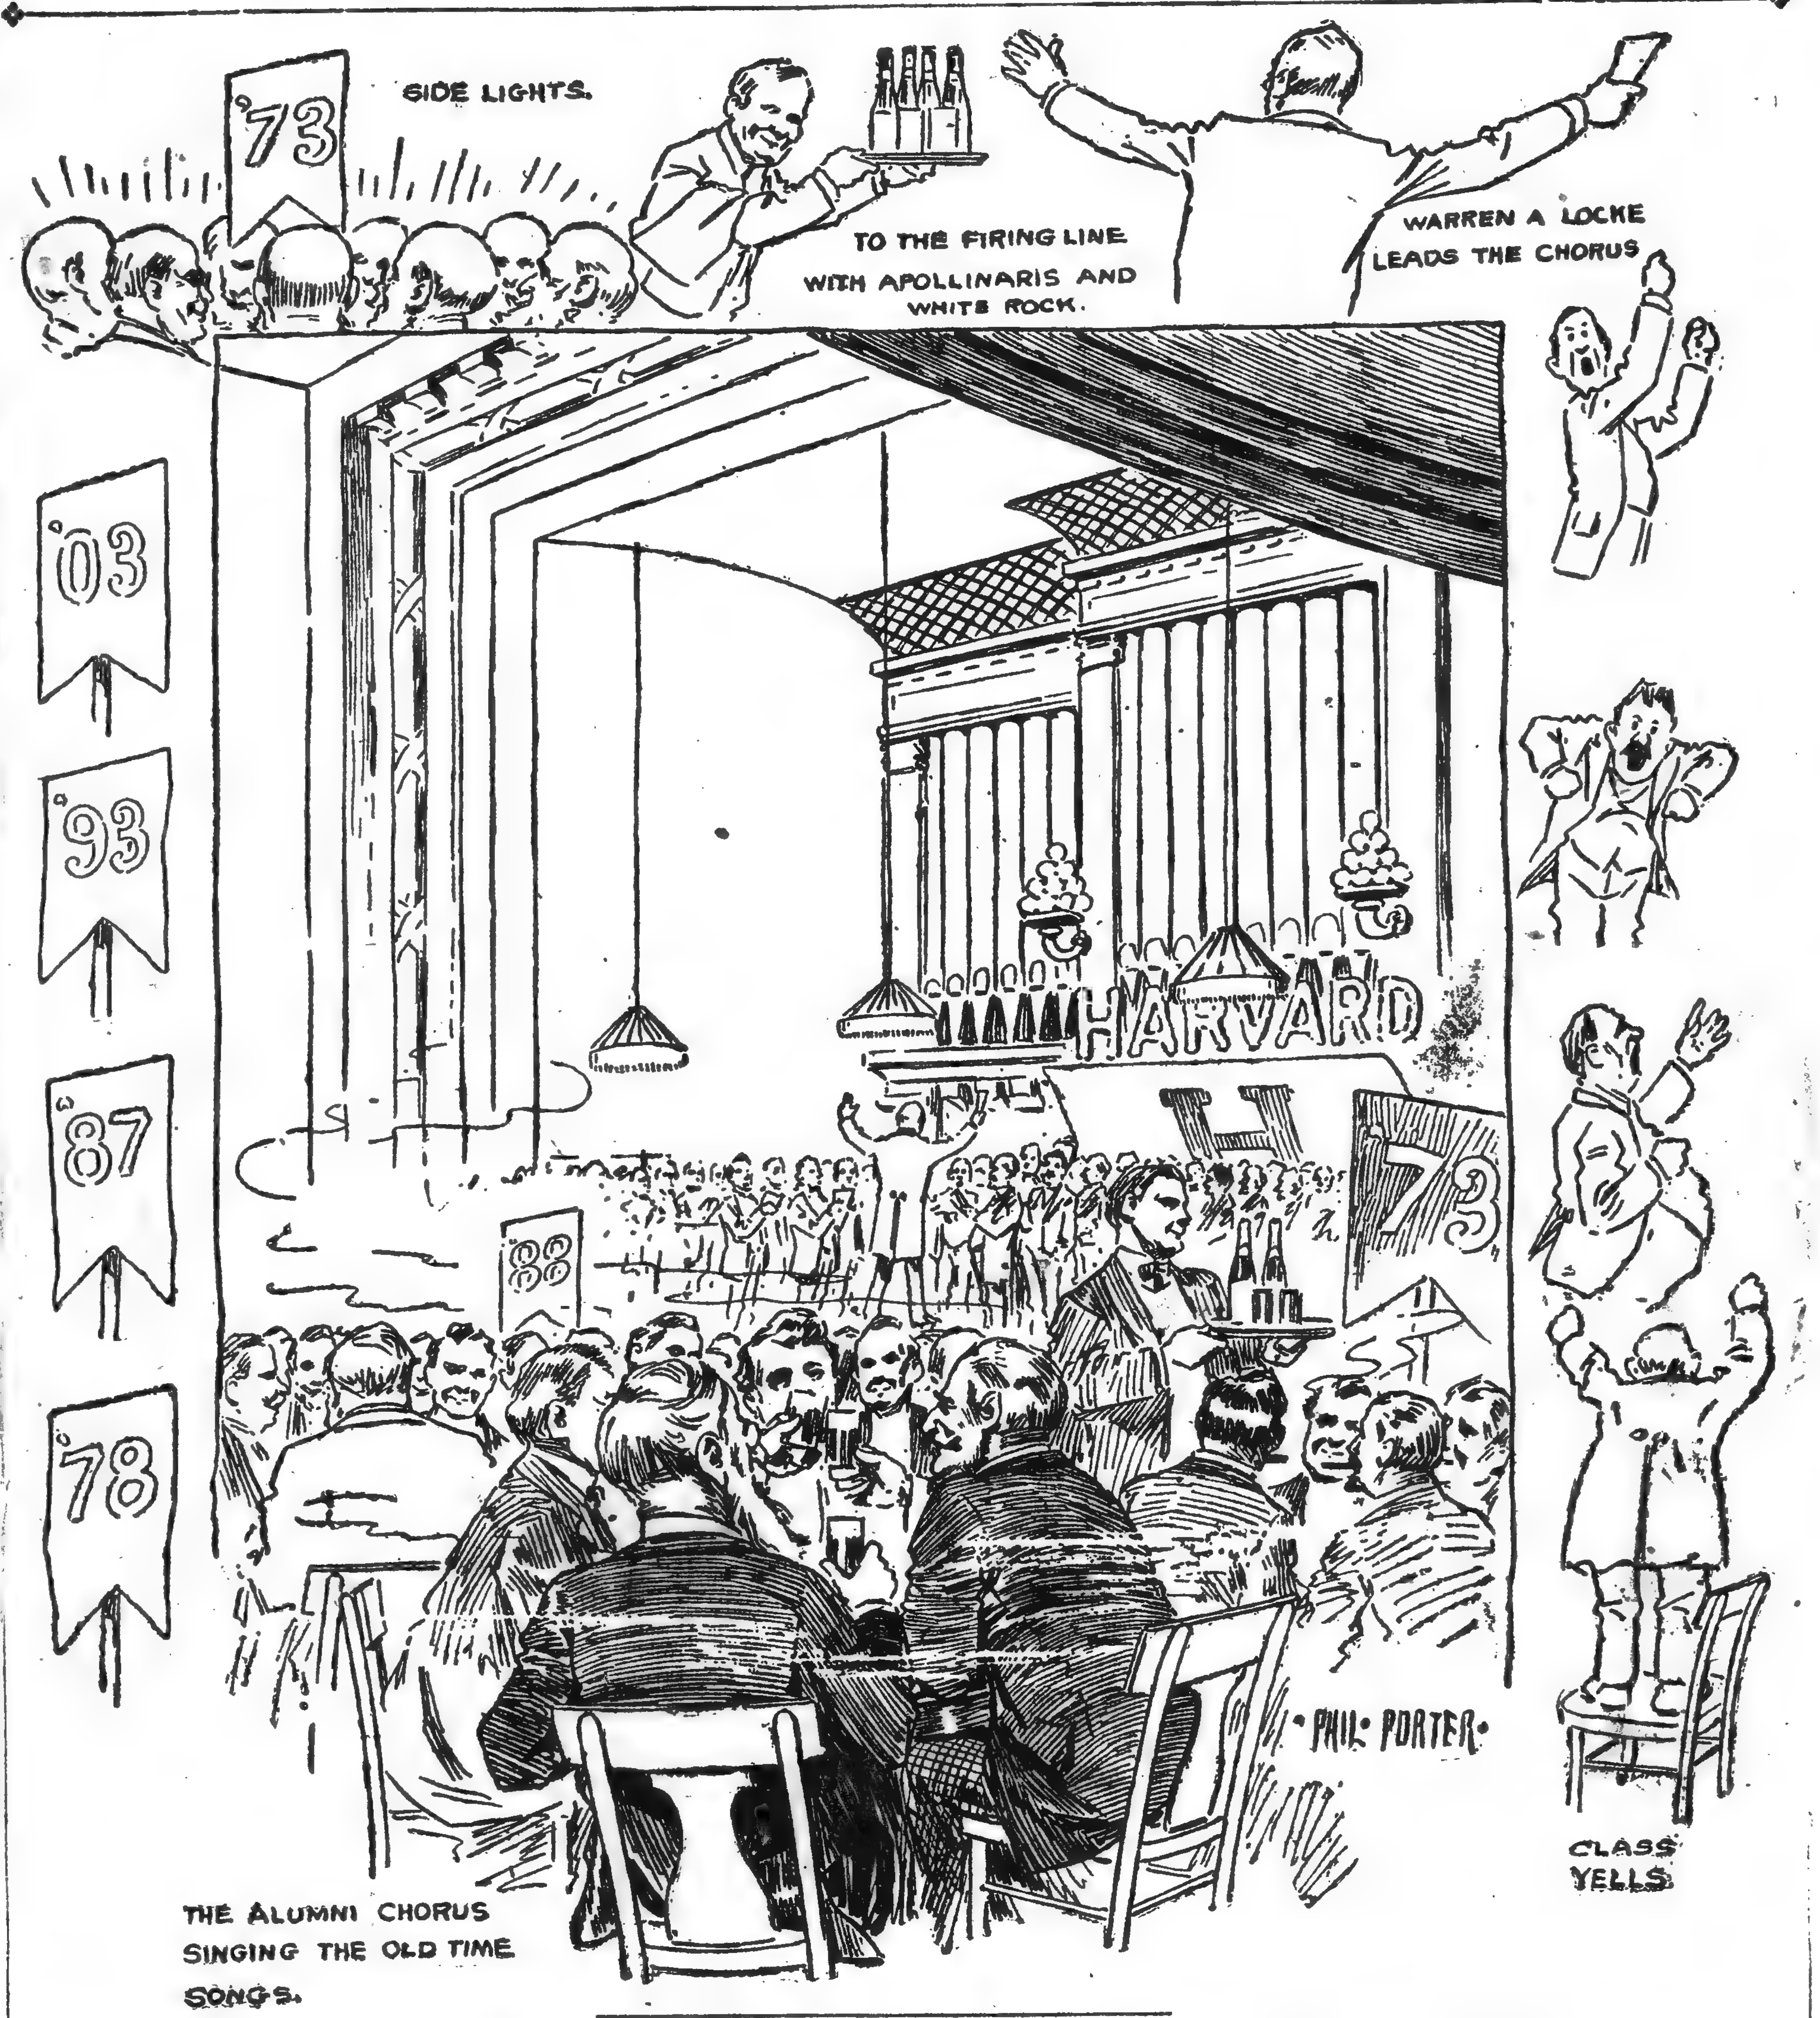
Perhaps the feature number of the evening's program was the overture, "Tannhauser," which was given after the interpretation of Dr. Muck, whom Mr. Lemon terms "the greatest German conductor." The piece met with such favor that it was repeated. The opening selection, the march, "Pomp and Circumstance," and an Italian interpretation of "Cavalleria Rusticana," also met with great applause and were especially enjoyable.

Two other overtures were "Orpheus" and "Mignon," and other selections, wide in variety, were "Kamennoi Ostrow," "Gypsy Love," the march, "Tabasco," and "Hymn to St. Cecelia."

The solo parts were excellent. Joseph Keller was 'cello soloist in the suite, Les Erinnyes and Julius Theodorowicz played the violin solo in the hymn. The "Dance of the Fakirs" and a serenade were other selections.

JOURNAL JUNE 29.

HARVARD NIGHT AT THE "POPS"



SIDE LIGHTS.
73
TO THE FIRING LINE WITH APOLLINARIS AND WHITE ROCK.
WARREN A. LOCKE LEADS THE CHORUS
03
93
87 78
88
HARVARD
H
73
PHIL PORTER
CLASS YELLS

THE ALUMNI CHORUS SINGING THE OLD TIME SONGS.

2000 HARVARD GRADS HAVE A MERRY TIME AT THE "POP"

Winners of the "H" of half a century ago, members of long forgotten glee clubs, college leaders of another generation with the younger alumni, aggregating nearly 2000, joined in singing "Fair Harvard" last night at the commencement concert of the Boston Harvard Club at Symphony Hall.

Members of the class of '73, of which there were a full score present, held the seats of honor at the head of the auditorium. The old boys were hugely delighted with themselves when they were the first on their feet when the orchestra started the opening bars of "Fair Harvard," which was a signal mark of honor in the more reverent days of old.

The entire program led up to "Fair Harvard," with the enthusiasm growing wilder and wilder with each number. When the 2000 were not singing they were cheering, and after the first few numbers everything and everybody was given the three long Harvards.

Decorated in Crimson

The auditorium was beautifully decorated in crimson. In the rear of the stage great lights flared out a crimson "Harvard," and a large banner bearing the coveted "H" swung high over all. From the balcony were suspended Harvard banners, which at the end of the night were fought for and torn into ribbons for souvenirs.

The men were quiet during the first two numbers, as there was nothing of Harvard in either of them. The third number, "The Harvard Festival March," written by Percy Lee Atherton, '93, in honor of the vicennial of his class, brought out the first cheers. Ninety-three were first on their feet at the conclusion of the number, cheered Harvard, themselves and the composer, and then the cheer was taken up all over the hall.

The fourth number, "Euphrosyne," was also roundly cheered, as it was written by a Harvard man, also of '93, Frederick S. Converse. The fifth number, however, brought out the greatest enthusiasm. This was the alumni chorus of over half a hundred men, ranging in class from '69 to '12. They were cheered when they rose from their seats and marched to the stage, cheered while they stood on the stage waiting the word, and wildly cheered when they had completed their first part of the program.

They sang four songs and were compelled to encore each of them. This first manifestation of real college singing awoke old-time enthusiasm in all present, and from this time on the affair became less dignified and more exuberant. Seventy-three pounded Ninety-nine on the back and declared that the old-timers had been the greatest singers, while the younger men scoffingly boasted of his class yell.

Old-Timers Are First

The great scene of the night came with the opening bars of "Fair Harvard," the last number on the program. Seventy-three was first on its feet, and after the old-timers the entire hall rose as one man. Then the song rolled out up to the roof, out to Huntington avenue, and all but carried across the river into the very confines of the college itself.

After the first rendering of the piece the musicians believed all was over. They didn't know the Harvard man when once "Fair Harvard" stirred his blood. It was again one of the men of '73 who was assisted to a chair by his classmates and roared out, "Once more, fellows, all together."

Next a man from '87 repeated the demand, and so on, until finally all were mounted on chairs, the torn ribbons of the Harvard banners were waved on high, and the song rolled out in such strident tones that the frantic efforts of the world-famous orchestra seemed feeble.

Promise to Meet Again

They locked arms, old men and young, and circled among the tables in the zig-zag that follows a Harvard victory over Yale. They promised each other they would meet again at the crew races. They pledged themselves to give new libraries, new dormitories, scholarships and what not. They were gloriously drunk on a college spirit that was older than the oldest of them.

It was not until the older men had reached the open air and the last strains of the song had died than they turned to each other and said: "Well, it was a wonderful night."

The program:

A. Maquarre, conductor; Warren A. Locke, '69, director of the alumni chorus, and John P. Marshall, organist.

PART I.

(1) Overture, "Die Meistersinger Von Nurnberg" ....Wagner
(2) Invitation to the Dance....Weber-Berlioz
(3) Harvard festival march.P. L. Atherton, '93
(4) Overture, "Euphrosyne".F. S. Converse, '93
(5) Alumni chorus.
(a) "Domine Salvum Fac"............Gounod
(b) "In Picardie"......George L. Osgood, '66
(c) "A May Night"......................Abt
Solo by George E. Hills, '97
(d) "Discovery" ....Grieg

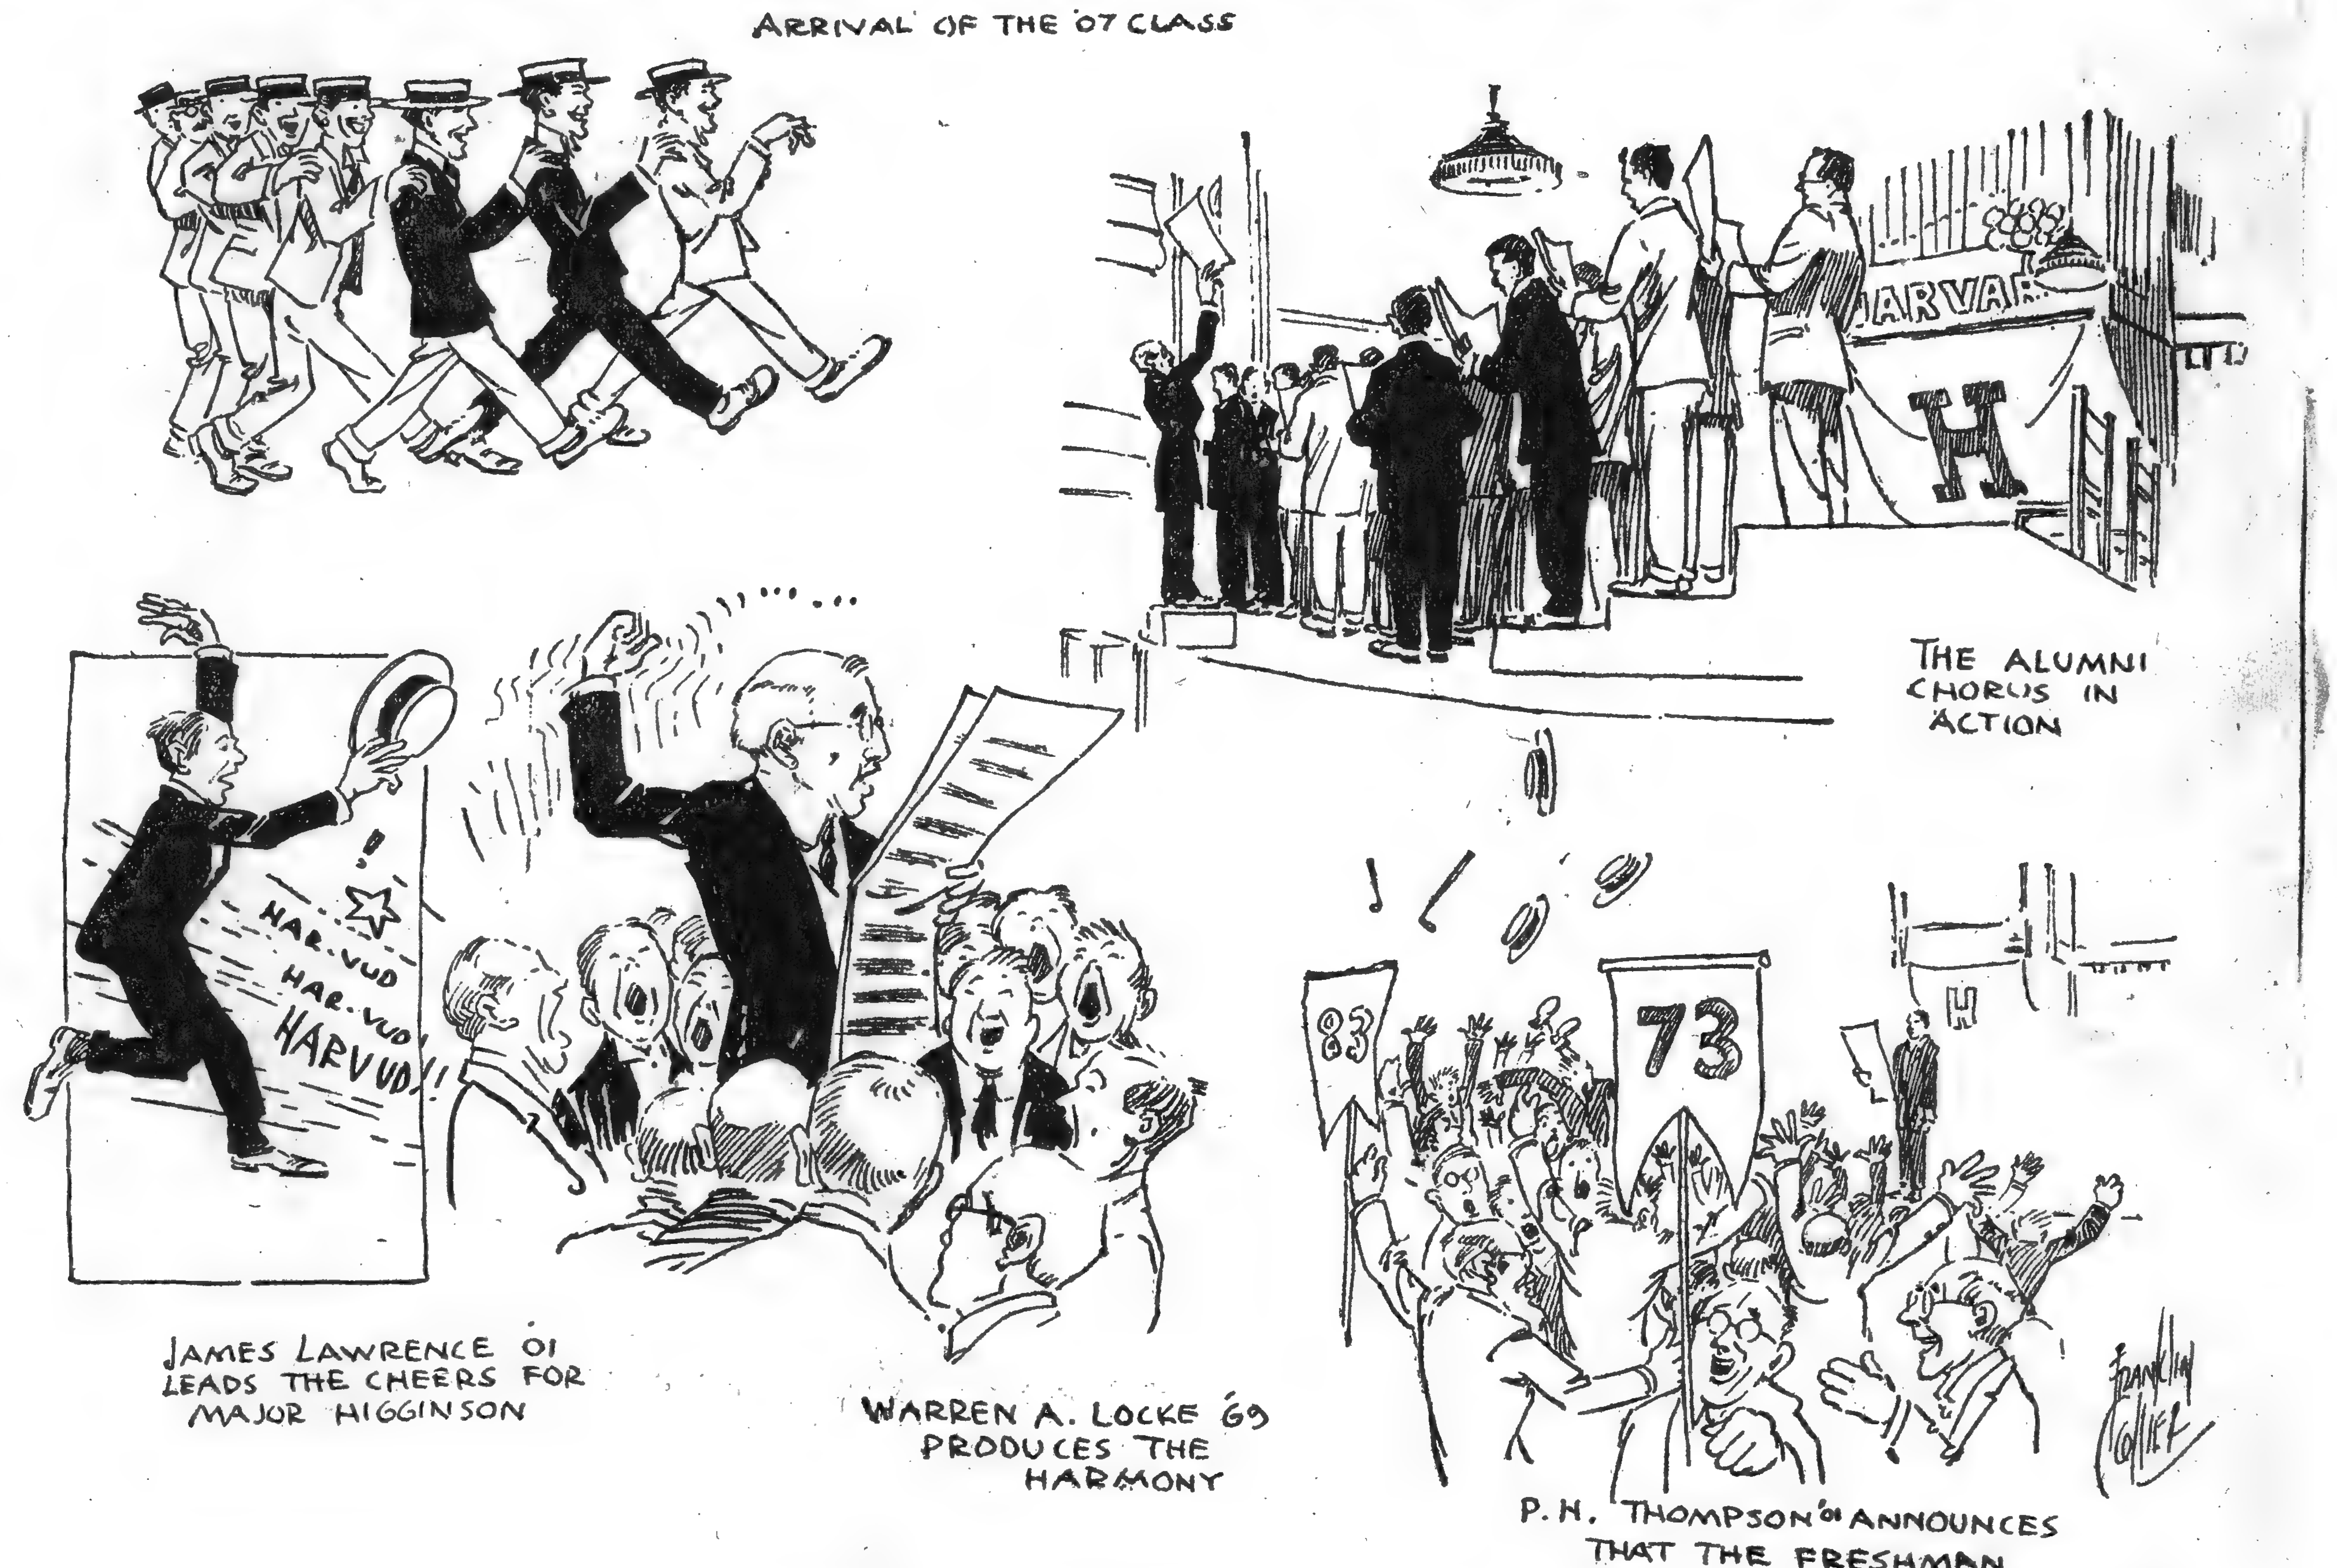
PART II.

(6) Two poems after Omar Khayyam
Arthur Foote, '74
(7) Two Moorish dances...John K. Paine, '69
(8) Kamennoi-Ostrow ....Rubinstein
(9) Hungarian march.....................Berlioz
(10) "The Beautiful Blue Danube".....Straus
(11) Alumni chorus.
(a) "Loyal Song"......................Kucken
(b) "Stein Song"......................Bullard
(c) "The Long Day Closes"..........Sullivan
(d) "Hymn of Thanksgiving."
(12) "Fair Harvard."

THE BOSTON GLOBE—FRIDAY, JUNE 20, 1913.

GREAT HARVARD CROWD AT CONCERT.

Reunion Classes in Symphony Hall Cheer Freshman Crew For Victory---Classical Program For the Older Men.



ARRIVAL OF THE '07 CLASS
THE ALUMNI CHORUS IN ACTION
HARVARD
H HAR-VUD HAR-VUD HARVUD!
83
73
H
JAMES LAWRENCE '01 LEADS THE CHEERS FOR MAJOR HIGGINSON
WARREN A. LOCKE '69 PRODUCES THE HARMONY
P.H. THOMPSON '01 ANNOUNCES THAT THE FRESHMAN CREW HAS WON THE 4 OAR
Franklin Collier

Several thousand Harvard men crowded floor and galleries at Symphony Hall last evening, where the Commencement concert for visiting almuni was held under the auspices of the Harvard Club of Boston. For most of those present it was the final event of the week's celebration. From the time that William S. Hall, '69, mounted the platform and called upon cheer-leader James Lawrence Jr, '01, to start a cheer for Maj Henry L. Higginson there was not an uninteresting moment.

Places on the floor were reserved for the celebrating classes and early in the evening members of '73, '78, '83, '88, '93, '98, '03, '05, '07 and '10 had been lined up by their anniversary leaders and were safely grouped on the floor beneath their banners. Members of the classes that are not celebrating this year crowded other available places and by 8 o'clock the hall was ringing with cheers.

The class of 1907, whichc has had an unusually strenuous sextenial celebration this week, was as lively and active as on the first day. The members came parading into the hall in lockstep and throughout the evening, under the leadership of "Jack" White and "Junie" Foster, practiced their original class yell, especially adapted for this occasion. The cheer began with a vigorous pounding of the tables followed by three '07s, a shrill whistle and a long Harvard.

The concert program differed from those of past years in that it was distinctly classical, arranged by men of the class of 1888. There were no popular selections, and not until the middle of the second part, when the younger men in the rear of the hall began to call lustily for football pieces, were these features added in the encores. Shortly after 10 o'clock Mr Maquarre, who conducted the Symphony Orchestra for the last time, raised his baton for the first strains of "Up the Street," and immediately everybody rose in a great outburst of enthusiasm.

This was followed by several other football selections and a renewal of Harvard and class cheers from all parts of the hall. Under the leadership of "Jim" Lawrence and class leaders cheers were given for the baseball team and the crew.

Another great outburst followed the announcement by Sec Thompson of the Boston Harvard Club during the intermission that the Harvard freshman four-oared crew had defeated the Yale freshmen at New London by six lengths.

Harvard men contributed generously to the musical program. As usual, the Harvard Alumni Chorus, under the direction of Warren A. Locke, '69, assisted the orchestra. The chorus gave a series of selections at the conclusion of each half of the program. John P. Marshall was the organist.

The first chorus number was "Domine Salvum Fac," by Gounod, accompanied by organ, trumpets and trombones. This was followed by "In Picardie," written by George L. Osgood, '66; the solo "A May Night," sung by George E. Hills, '97, and the solo "Discovery," by Grieg, sung by S. L. Swarts, '88, to the accompaniment of orchestra and organ. The chorus concluded in the second part with "The Hymn of Thanksgiving," an ancient folksong of the Netherlands. The audience applauded liberally. At the end of the concert Director Locke was given a long Harvard cheer.

The orchestra program included "Harvard Festival March," written for the vicennial of '93 by Percy Lee Atherton of that class; the overture "Euphrosyne," written by Frederick S. Converse, '93, and two poems from Omar Khayyam, for which the music was composed by Arthur Foote, '74. Mr Foote led the orchestra for this selection.

The program had been arranged according to the tastes of the older graduates, who occupied the places of honor beneath the crimson-bedecked platform. The younger men, however, were as much in evidence as ever with their cheers between selections.

An immense crimson banner, with a black H in the center, was draped across the wall in the rear of the platform and the word "Harvard" was stretched above in large red electric lights. From the galleries were hung at frequent intervals small crimson banners bearing the words "Harvard Club of Boston." Most of these were appropriated early in the evening by the younger men.

Just before 11 o'clock the audience arose to sing "Fair Harvard," the last number of the evening.

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

#911

CHAS. A. ELLIS, MANAGER

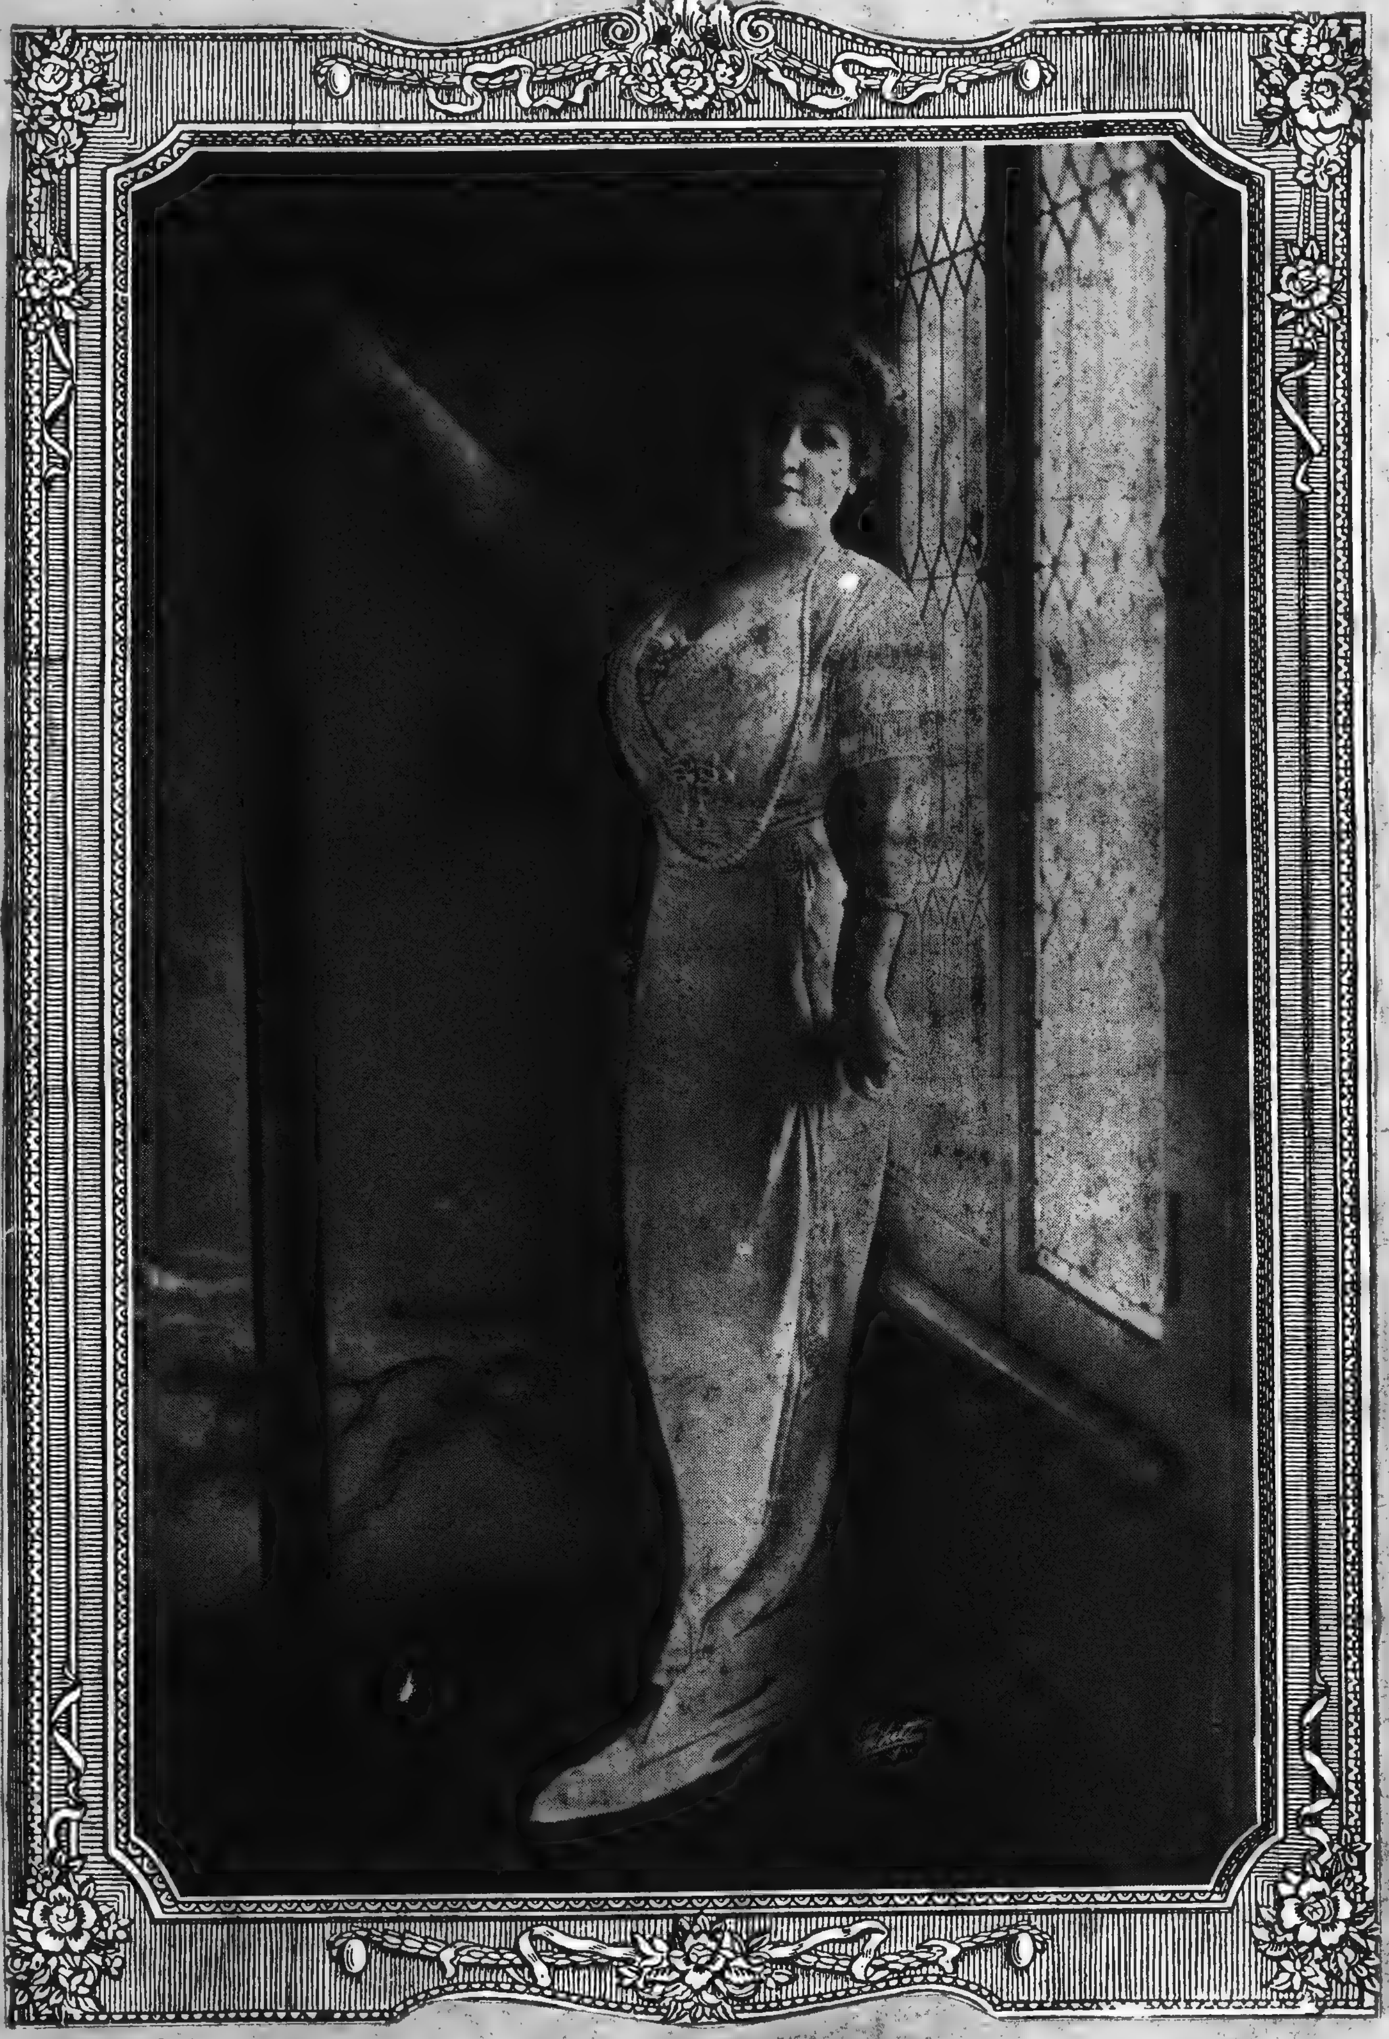
Boston Symphony

News-paper Notices

Boston
Cambridge.
Worcester
Northamton
New Bedford.
Springfield.

New York
Providence
New

CHAS. A. ELLIS MANAGER



MISS LILLIAN RUSSELL

Shipman's Scrap Book
FOR DUPLICATE ORDER NUMBER 216
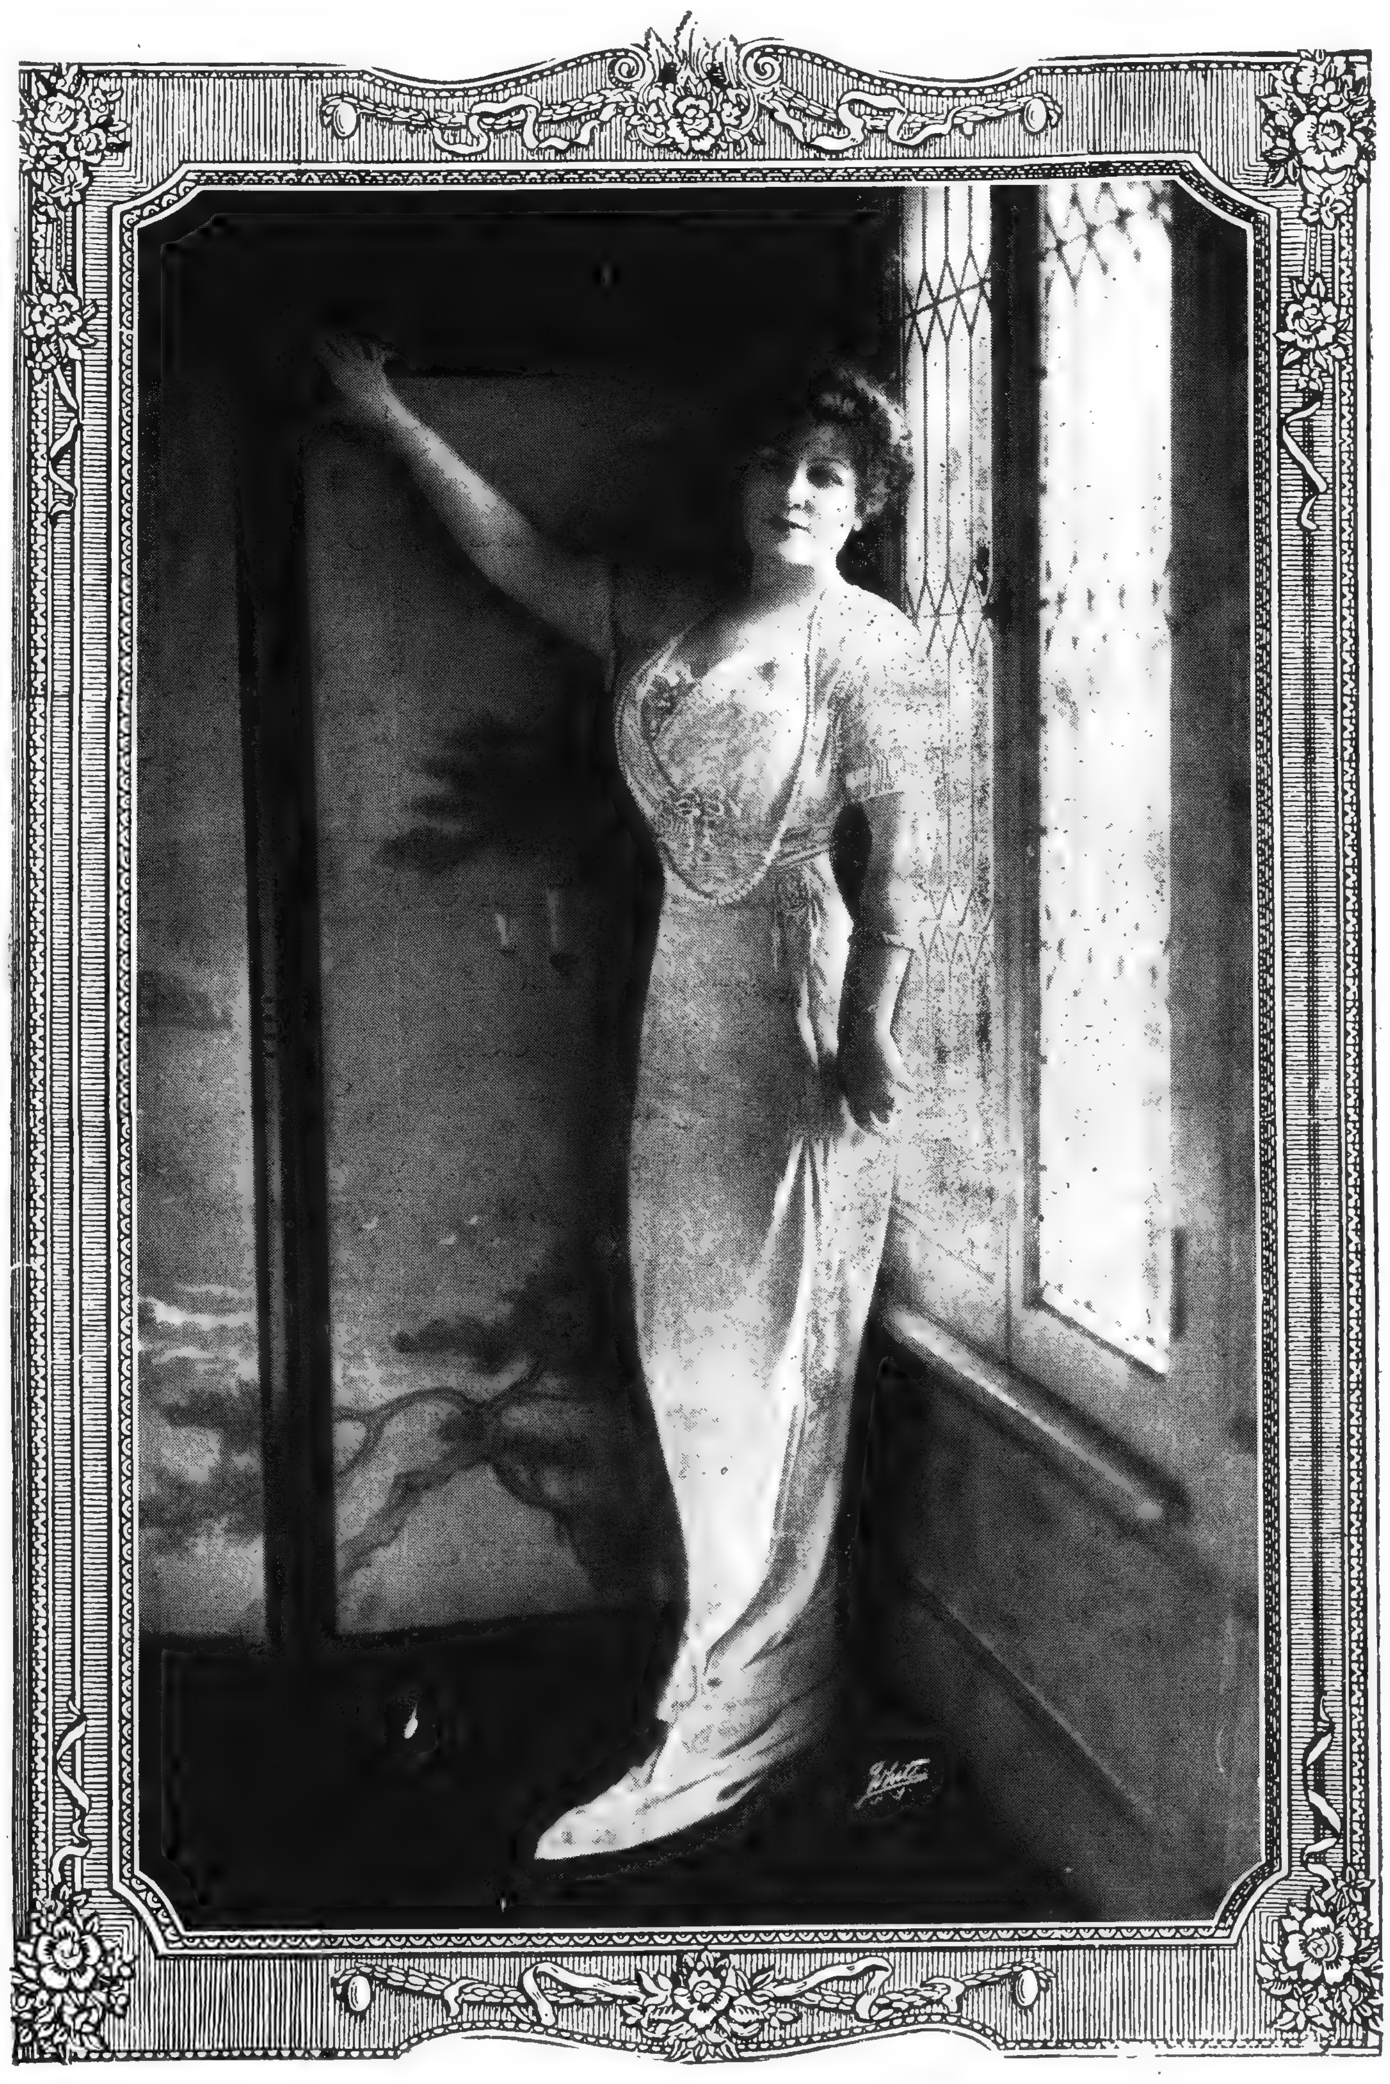
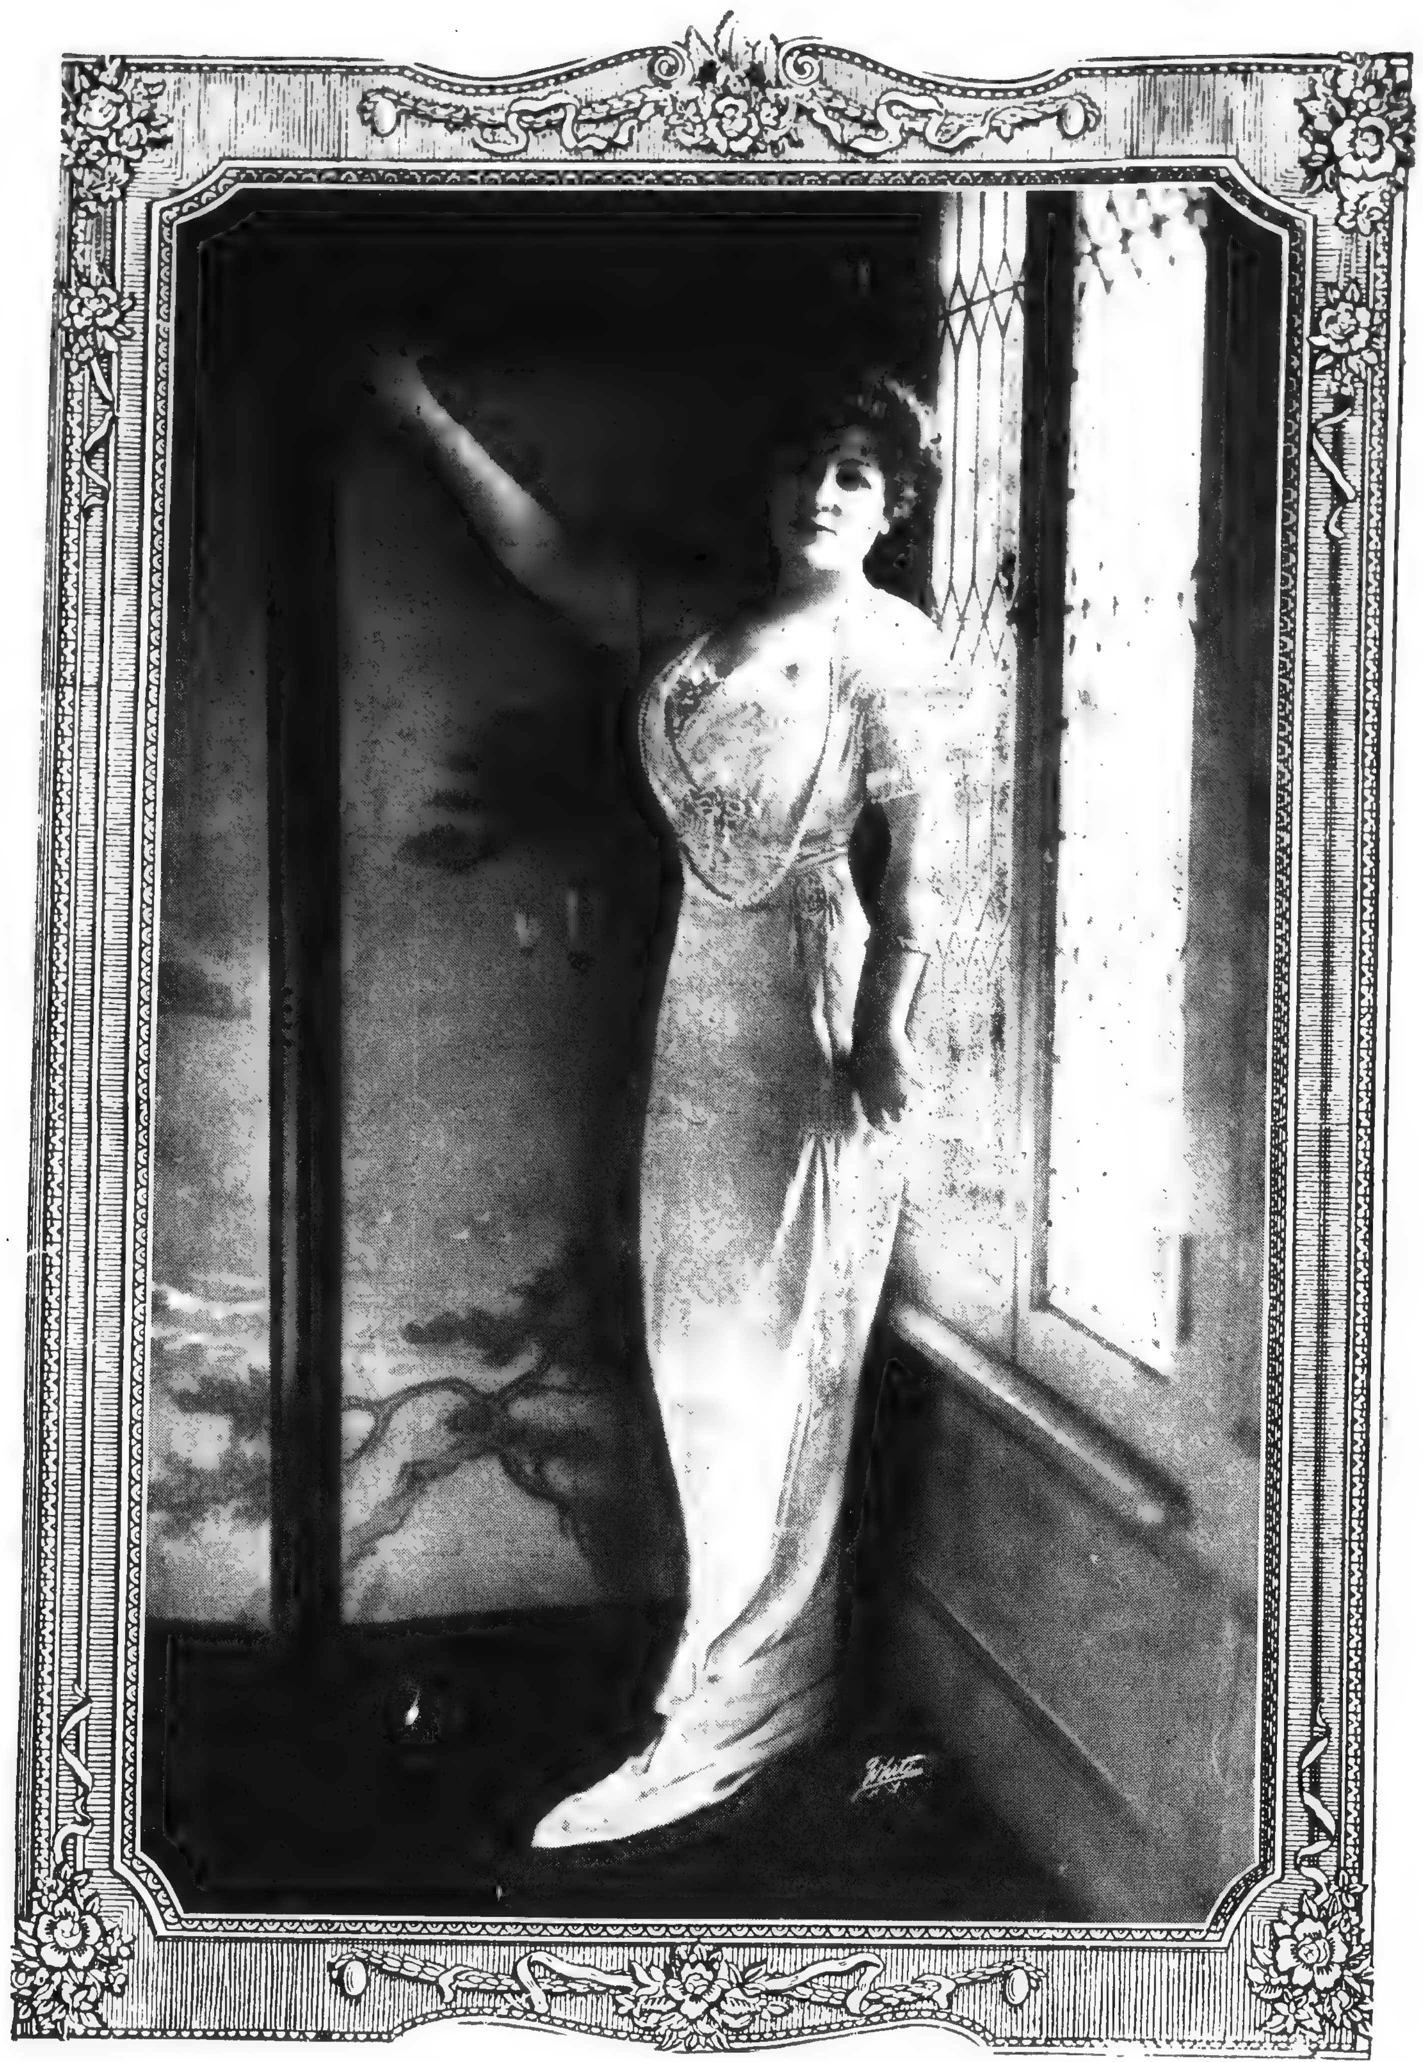
ASA L. SHIPMAN'S SONS
NEW YORK



Miss Lillian Russell

Shipman's Scrap Book
FOR DUPLICATE ORDER NUMBER
ASA L. SHIPMAN'S SONS
NEW YORK



MISS LILLIAN RUSSELL

Shipman's Scrap Book
FOR DUPLICATE ORDER NUMBER
ASA L. SHIPMAN'S SONS
NEW YORK

END OF VOLUME

VOLUME 32

BSO Pops

1913 - 1914

1913 - 1914

Shipman's Scrap Book
FOR DUPLICATE ORDER NUMBER

ASA L. SHIPMAN'S SONS
NEW YORK

TRANSCRIPT,

SEPTEMBER 6, 1913

THE CONCERT CALENDAR

The Beginnings of October—The Auctions for the Symphony Concerts—The Schedule for the Worcester Festival—Dr. Muck's Reappearance

MONDAY morning, Sept. 29, in Symphony Hall, the sale at auction of the higher-priced tickets for the afternoon series of Symphony Concerts.

Tuesday morning, Sept. 30, in Symphony Hall, the sale at auction of the lower-priced tickets for the afternoon series of Symphony Concerts.

Wednesday evening, Oct. 1, in Mechanics Hall in Worcester, the first concert of the annual music festival at which Verdi's Manzoni Requiem will be performed by chorus, or orchestra, Mmes. Hinkle and Schumann-Heink and Messrs. Murphy and Witherspoon, with Mr. Mees conducting.

Thursday morning, Oct. 2, in Symphony Hall, the sale by auction of the higher-priced seats for the evening series of Symphony Concerts.

Thursday afternoon, Oct. 2, in Mechanics Hall in Worcester, the second concert of the annual music festival with an orchestral programme and Mme. Sundelius and Mr. Philips for singers.

Thursday evening, Oct. 2, in Mechanics Hall at Worcester, the third concert of the annual music festival at which Pierné's oratorio of St. Francis, his teachings and his miracles—"St. Francis of Assisi" will be performed for the first time in America with orchestra, chorus and sundry solo singers, and with Mr. Mees conducting.

Friday morning, Oct. 3, in Symphony Hall, the sale at auction of the lower-priced seats for the evening series of Symphony Concerts.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 3, in Mechanics Hall at Worcester, the fourth concert of the annual music festival, with an orchestral programme and Miss Alice Eldridge for the assisting pianist.

Friday evening, Oct. 3, in Mechanics Hall at Worcester, the final concert of the annual music festival with a miscellaneous programme and Mme. Schumann-Heink and Messrs. Williams and Witherspoon for the chief singers.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 10, in Symphony Hall, the first of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Muck conducting.

Saturday evening, Oct. 11, in Symphony Hall, the first of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Muck conducting.

POST,

SEPTEMBER 7,

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck, who has been spending the greater part of the summer at his country home near Gratz in Austria, is expected to arrive in Boston the last week of this month, and the serious work of the Symphony Orchestra will begin Monday, Oct. 6, with the first rehearsal. The season opens with the first public rehearsal Friday afternoon, Oct. 10, and the first concert the following evening. In this first week, however, the orchestra, under Dr. Muck, will give a private concert in Symphony Hall, this being one of the functions arranged for the entertainment of the delegates to the convention of the Bankers' Association.

The usual auction sales will take place on the accustomed days the week before the first concerts. The Friday afternoon seats will be sold on Monday, Sept. 29, and Tuesday, Sept. 30. The Saturday evening seats will be sold on Thursday, Oct. 2, and Friday, Oct. 3.

The Symphony Orchestra has never opened a season with brighter prospects. Dr. Muck has arranged an interesting set of concerts for Boston, and soloists of most unusual quality have been engaged. Outside of Boston the success of the season is absolutely assured. Already every seat in Carnegie Hall has been sold for the two series of concerts given in New York. The same state of affairs will be true in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn. Full details of the plans for Boston will be announced shortly.

HERALD,

SEPTEMBER 6, 1913.

SYMPHONY PLANS ABOUT COMPLETED

Formal announcement of the plans for the 33d season of the Boston Symphony orchestra will shortly be made. Dr. Muck, the conductor, returns to Boston from Europe the latter part of the month. The first public rehearsal and concert will be given Friday afternoon, Oct. 10, and Saturday evening, Oct. 11 respectively. The opening of the regular season will be preceded by a private concert for the Bankers' Association convention.

The auction sale of seats will be held as follows: The Friday afternoon seats, Monday, Sept. 29, and Tuesday, Sept. 30; Saturday evening seats, Thursday, Oct. 2, and Friday, Oct. 3.

All signs indicate that the coming season will eclipse the remarkable record of last year, both as regards home concerts and those on the tours.

RECORD.

SEPTEMBER 6

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Plans for the 33rd season of the phony Orchestra are well under way formal announcement of the schedul the year will soon be made. The firs lic rehearsal of the season will be gi Friday afternoon, Oct. 10. The auction sales of seats will come as usual the end of this month, the Friday afternoon seats being sold on Monday, Sept. 29, and Tuesday, Sept. 30; the Saturday evening seats on Thursday, Oct. 2, and Friday, Oct. 3

AMERICAN, SUNDAY,

SEPTEMBER 7,

Dr. Muck Coming to Head Symphony

Dr. Muck, who has been spending the greater part of the Summer at his country home near Gratz, in Austria, is expected to arrive in Boston the last week of this month, and the serious work of the Symphony Orchestra will begin Monday, October 6, with the first rehearsal.

The season opens with the first public rehearsal Friday afternoon, October 10, and the first concert the following evening.

In this first week, however, the orchestra under Dr. Muck will give a private concert in Symphony Hall for the entertainment of the delegates to the convention of the Bankers' Association.

The usual auction sales will take place before the first concerts. The Friday afternoon seats will be sold on Monday, September 29, and Tuesday, September 30. The Saturday evening seats will be sold on Thursday, October 2, and Friday, October 3.

The Symphony Orchestra has never opened a season with brighter prospects. Soloists of unusual quality have been engaged. Outside of Boston the success of the season is already assured. Already every seat in Carnegie Hall has been sold for the two series of concerts given in New York.

GLOBE-

-SEPTEMBER 7.

Another Symphony Orchestra Season Near.

Dr Muck, who has been spending the greater part of the Summer at his country home near Gratz in Austria, is expected to arrive in Boston the last week of this month and the serious work of the Symphony Orchestra will begin Monday, Oct 6, with the first rehearsal. The season opens with the first public rehearsal, Friday afternoon, Oct 10, and the first concert the following evening. In this first week, however, the orchestra under Dr Muck will give a private concert in Symphony Hall as one of the functions arranged for the entertainment of the delegates to the Convention of the Bankers' Association.

The usual auction sales will take place on the accustomed days the week before the first concerts. The Friday afternoon seats will be sold on Monday and Tuesday, Sept 29 and 30. The Saturday evening seats will be sold on Thursday and Friday, Oct 2 and 3.

The season in New York already is assured of its usual success. Every seat in Carnegie Hall has been sold out for the two series of concerts. Full details of the soloists and works of the Boston concerts will be announced shortly.

SUNDAY HERALD.

SEPTEMBER 7.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Muck, who has been spending the greater part of the summer at his country home near Gratz in Austria, is expected to arrive in Boston the last week of this month, and the serious work of the Symphony Orchestra will begin Monday, Oct. 6, with the first rehearsal. The season opens with the first public rehearsal Friday afternoon, Oct. 10, and the first concert the next evening. In this first week, however, the orchestra under Dr. Muck will give a private concert in Symphony Hall arranged for the delegates to the convention of the Bankers' Association.

The usual auction sales will take place on the accustomed days the week before the first concerts. The Friday afternoon seats will be sold on Monday, Sept. 29, and Tuesday, Sept. 30. The Saturday evening seats will be sold on Thursday, Oct. 2, and Friday, Oct. 3.

The Symphony Orchestra has never opened a season with brighter prospects. Dr. Muck has arranged an interesting set of concerts for Boston, and soloists of must unusual quality have been engaged. Outside of Boston the success of the season is assured. Already every seat in Carnegie Hall has been sold for the two series of concerts given in New York. The same will be true in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn. Full details of the plans for Boston will be announced shortly.

From HERALD

Address: New York

Date SEP 7 - 1913

The Boston Orchestra.

Boston's famous Symphony Orchestra begins its thirty-third season in Boston on Friday afternoon, October 10, again under the conductorship of Dr. Carl Muck. Its membership, as last year, will consist of 100 musicians, and the personnel will show little change, though there has been an important addition in the person of Mr. Alfred Holy, of Vienna, first harpist.

During the season the Boston orchestra will give 110 concerts, and of these New York will have two series of five each and eight special matinee concerts. The first series, on Thursday evenings, will commence November 6, the other dates being December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 19. The second series will be on the following Saturday afternoons of the same weeks, all the concerts being held in Carnegie Hall. The matinees will be given October 18, November 1, 15 and 29, December 13, January 3 and March 7 and 28. An announcement from Boston says:—

"Carnegie Hall is at this early date entirely sold out by subscription, and the season promises to be quite as brilliant as that of last winter."

The five concerts of the orchestra at the Academy of Music in Brooklyn will take place on Friday evenings, November 7 December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20.

SEPTEMBER 14.

SUNDAY HERALD.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The management of the Symphony Orchestra will issue its formal prospectus in detail next week, giving the list of soloists that have been engaged and other information of interest. It hopes that it will be able to make more or less definite announcement regarding Dr. Muck's plans as to programs and novelties. As yet he has maintained a profound silence on this subject. He has engaged new members for the orchestra who will replace musicians that retired at the end of last season. This year, as usual, 60 members of the orchestra will play at the Worcester county music festival, which comes the last week in September. Alfred Holy, harpist of the orchestra and successor of Heinrich Schuecker, is expected in Boston next week.

The season of 1913-14 will provide plenty of work for the Symphony men. A schedule of 111 concerts has been made, exclusive of the two concerts in aid of the pension fund. Practically the same cities will be visited as last year and will have the same number of concerts. The most significant change will be in Providence, where six concerts are to be given instead of the usual five.

The total number of concerts is not limited to 111, because of lack of more engagements. The management is compelled each year to decline from 15 to 20 concerts. New York has long been asking for a third series of five concerts. Under the present conditions no one in New York who is not a regular subscriber has a chance to hear the orchestra, for every seat in Carnegie Hall is sold for the season.

Attention is again called to the dates of the auction sales. The rehearsal seats will be sold on Monday and Tuesday, Sept. 29th and 30th; the $18 seats on Monday and the $10 seats on Tuesday. The concert seats will be sold on Thursday and Friday, Oct. 2d and 3d; the $18 seats on Thursday, and the $10 seats on Friday.

SUNDAY GLOBE-

-SEPTEMBER 14.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Announcements

The season's prospectus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is announced to appear next week. It will contain the best of soloists and will have something to say about Dr Muck's programs and novelties. The eminent conductor is now in Berlin for the fortnight prior to sailing.

The majority of the members of the orchestra are back from their Summer vacations or engagements. The first of the new players to arrive will be Alfred Holy, the harpist, who will succeed the late Mr Schuecker. Mr Holy is expected next week. As usual 60 men of the orchestra will be at the Worcester Festival, Oct 1, 2 and 3.

During the season of 1913-1914 the orchestra will give 111 concerts exclusive of the two for the Pension Fund. Six concerts will replace the former five in Providence, where the orchestra is now on a profitable basis, otherwise the out-of-town schedule will be quite as before.

No feasible method seems likely to give New York the third series of five concerts for which there has long been a demand, since no one in New York, not a regular subscriber, now has an opportunity to hear the orchestra. Carnegie Hall is sold out for the season. Brooklyn also would increase the appearances there. Since the longest practical season is 30 weeks, the amount of travel entailed makes a greater number of concerts not to be advised.

Attention is again called to the dates of the auction sales. The rehearsal seats will be sold on Monday and Tuesday, Sept 29 and 30; the $18 seats on Monday and the $10 seats on Tuesday. The concert seats will be sold Thursday and Friday, Oct 2 and 3; the $18 seats on Thursday and the $10 seats on Friday.

POST, SEPTEMBER 14,

Boston Symphony Orchestra

DR. KARL MUCK, CONDUCTOR.

The management of the Symphony Orchestra is so far advanced in its plans for the coming season that it will issue its formal prospectus in detail next week, giving the list of soloists that have been engaged and other information of interest. It hopes that it will be able to make more or less definite announcement regarding Dr. Muck's plans as to programme and novelties. As yet Dr. Muck has maintained a profound silence on this subject. He is now in Berlin for a fortnight prior to his sailing to this country. He has engaged the new members of the orchestra who will take the place of the musicians that retired at the end of last season. The majority of the members of the orchestra are back in Boston from their summer vacations or engagements. This year, as for many years past, 60 of them will form the orchestra of the Worcester County Music Festival which comes the last week in September. The first of the new members to arrive will be Mr. Alfred Holy, the harpist of the orchestra and the successor of the late Heinrich Schuecker. He is expected in Boston next week.

The season of 1913-14 will provide plenty of work for the Symphony men. A schedule of 111 concerts has been made, these exclusive of the two concerts in aid of the Pension Fund. Practically the same cities will be visited as last year and will have the same number of concerts. The most significant change will be in Providence, where six concerts are to be given instead of the usual five. In Providence the orchestra is now on a very solid and profitable basis and its concerts there are decidedly worth while.

The total number of concerts is not limited to 111 because of lack of more engagements. As a matter of fact, the management is compelled each year to decline from 15 to 20 concerts which, if there were time for them, would mean a very considerable difference in the usual budget. New York, for example, has long been asking for a third series of five concerts. Under the present conditions no one in New York who is not a regular subscriber has a chance to hear the orchestra, for every seat in Carnegie Hall is sold for the season. Brooklyn, too, has for several years past been trying to put in a series of five Sunday afternoon concerts to follow the five Friday evening concerts. There in Brooklyn conditions are the same as in New York. Unfortunately the longest practicable season for the orchestra is 30 weeks, for it is unwise to give concerts earlier than the first of October and equally unwise to continue them after the first week in May. One hundred and eleven concerts makes an average of nearly four a week and of these 111, 55 entail a considerable amount of travel. It would be unwise from every point of view to over-work the orchestra, and the concerts at present scheduled with the necessary rehearsals and travelling fill up nearly all the time available.

Attention is again called to the dates of the auction sales. The rehearsal seats will be sold on Monday and Tuesday Sept. 29 and 30; the $18 seats on Monday and the $10 seats on Tuesday. The concert seats will be sold on Thursday and Friday, Oct. 2 and 3; the $18 seats on Thursday and the $10 seats on Friday.

BOSTON AMERICAN,

SEPTEMBER 14, 1913.

111 CONCERTS BY SYMPHONY

The management of the Symphony Orchestra is so far advanced in its plans for the coming season that it will issue its formal prospectus in detail next week, giving the list of soloists. It hopes that it will be able to make more or less definite announcement regarding Dr. Muck's plans as to programs and novelties.

As yet Dr. Muck has maintained a profound silence on this subject. He is now in Berlin for a fortnight prior to his sailing to this country. He has engaged the new members of the orchestra who will take the places of the musicians that retired at the end of last season.

The majority of the members of the orchestra are back in Boston from their Summer vacations or engagements. This year, as for many years past, sixty of them will form the orchestra of the Worcester County Music Festival which comes the last week in September.

The season of 1913-14 will provide plenty of work for the Symphony men. A schedule of one hundred and eleven concerts has been made, these exclusive of the two concerts in aid of the Pension Fund. In Providence six concerts are to be given instead of the usual five. In New York every seat in Carnegie Hall is sold for the season.

TRANSCRIPT,

SEPTEMBER 6, 1913

THE CONCERT CALENDAR

The Beginnings of October—The Auctions for the Symphony Concerts—The Schedule for the Worcester Festival—Dr. Muck's Reappearance

MONDAY morning, Sept. 29, in Symphony Hall, the sale at auction of the higher-priced tickets for the afternoon series of Symphony Concerts.

Tuesday morning, Sept. 30, in Symphony Hall, the sale at auction of the lower-priced tickets for the afternoon series of Symphony Concerts.

Wednesday evening, Oct. 1, in Mechanics Hall in Worcester, the first concert of the annual music festival at which Verdi's Manzoni Requiem will be performed by chorus, or orchestra, Mmes. Hinkle and Schumann-Heink and Messrs. Murphy and Witherspoon, with Mr. Mees conducting.

Thursday morning, Oct. 2, in Symphony Hall, the sale by auction of the higher-priced seats for the evening series of Symphony Concerts.

Thursday afternoon, Oct. 2, in Mechanics Hall in Worcester, the second concert of the annual music festival with an orchestral programme and Mme. Sundelius and Mr. Philips for singers.

Thursday evening, Oct. 2, in Mechanics Hall at Worcester, the third concert of the annual music festival at which Pierné's oratorio of St. Francis, his teachings and his miracles—"St. Francis of Assisi" will be performed for the first time in America with orchestra, chorus and sundry solo singers, and with Mr. Mees conducting.

Friday morning, Oct. 3, in Symphony Hall, the sale at auction of the lower-priced seats for the evening series of Symphony Concerts.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 3, in Mechanics Hall at Worcester, the fourth concert of the annual music festival, with an orchestral programme and Miss Alice Eldridge for the assisting pianist.

Friday evening, Oct. 3, in Mechanics Hall at Worcester, the final concert of the annual music festival with a miscellaneous programme and Mme. Schumann-Heink and Messrs. Williams and Witherspoon for the chief singers.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 10, in Symphony Hall, the first of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Muck conducting.

Saturday evening, Oct. 11, in Symphony Hall, the first of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Muck conducting.

POST,

SEPTEMBER 7,

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck, who has been spending the greater part of the summer at his country home near Gratz in Austria, is expected to arrive in Boston the last week of this month, and the serious work of the Symphony Orchestra will begin Monday, Oct. 6, with the first rehearsal. The season opens with the first public rehearsal Friday afternoon, Oct. 10, and the first concert the following evening. In this first week, however, the orchestra, under Dr. Muck, will give a private concert in Symphony Hall, this being one of the functions arranged for the entertainment of the delegates to the convention of the Bankers' Association.

The usual auction sales will take place on the accustomed days the week before the first concerts. The Friday afternoon seats will be sold on Monday, Sept. 29, and Tuesday, Sept. 30. The Saturday evening seats will be sold on Thursday, Oct. 2, and Friday, Oct. 3.

The Symphony Orchestra has never opened a season with brighter prospects. Dr. Muck has arranged an interesting set of concerts for Boston, and soloists of most unusual quality have been engaged. Outside of Boston the success of the season is absolutely assured. Already every seat in Carnegie Hall has been sold for the two series of concerts given in New York. The same state of affairs will be true in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn. Full details of the plans for Boston will be announced shortly.

HERALD,

SEPTEMBER 6, 1913.

SYMPHONY PLANS ABOUT COMPLETED

Formal announcement of the plans for the 33d season of the Boston Symphony orchestra will shortly be made. Dr. Muck, the conductor, returns to Boston from Europe the latter part of the month. The first public rehearsal and concert will be given Friday afternoon, Oct. 10, and Saturday evening, Oct. 11 respectively. The opening of the regular season will be preceded by a private concert for the Bankers' Association convention.

The auction sale of seats will be held as follows: The Friday afternoon seats, Monday, Sept. 29, and Tuesday, Sept. 30; Saturday evening seats, Thursday, Oct. 2, and Friday, Oct. 3.

All signs indicate that the coming season will eclipse the remarkable record of last year, both as regards home concerts and those on the tours.

RECORD.

SEPTEMBER 6.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Plans for the 33rd season of the Symphony Orchestra are well under way and formal announcement of the schedule for the year will soon be made. The first public rehearsal of the season will be given on Friday afternoon, Oct. 10. The auction sales of seats will come as usual the end of this month, the Friday afternoon seats being sold on Monday, Sept. 29, and Tuesday, Sept. 30; the Saturday evening seats on Thursday, Oct. 2, and Friday, Oct. 3

AMERICAN, SUNDAY,

SEPTEMBER 7,

Dr. Muck Coming to Head Symphony

Dr. Muck, who has been spending the greater part of the Summer at his country home near Gratz, in Austria, is expected to arrive in Boston the last week of this month, and the serious work of the Symphony Orchestra will begin Monday, October 6, with the first rehearsal.

The season opens with the first public rehearsal Friday afternoon, October 10, and the first concert the following evening.

In this first week, however, the orchestra under Dr. Muck will give a private concert in Symphony Hall for the entertainment of the delegates to the convention of the Bankers' Association.

The usual auction sales will take place before the first concerts. The Friday afternoon seats will be sold on Monday, September 29, and Tuesday, September 30. The Saturday evening seats will be sold on Thursday, October 2, and Friday, October 3.

The Symphony Orchestra has never opened a season with brighter prospects. Soloists of unusual quality have been engaged. Outside of Boston the success of the season is already assured. Already every seat in Carnegie Hall has been sold for the two series of concerts given in New York.

GLOBE-

-SEPTEMBER 7.

Another Symphony Orchestra Season Near.

Dr Muck, who has been spending the greater part of the Summer at his country home near Gratz in Austria, is expected to arrive in Boston the last week of this month and the serious work of the Symphony Orchestra will begin Monday, Oct 6, with the first rehearsal. The season opens with the first public rehearsal, Friday afternoon, Oct 10, and the first concert the following evening. In this first week, however, the orchestra under Dr Muck will give a private concert in Symphony Hall as one of the functions arranged for the entertainment of the delegates to the Convention of the Bankers' Association.

The usual auction sales will take place on the accustomed days the week before the first concerts. The Friday afternoon seats will be sold on Monday and Tuesday, Sept 29 and 30. The Saturday evening seats will be sold on Thursday and Friday, Oct 2 and 3.

The season in New York already is assured of its usual success. Every seat in Carnegie Hall has been sold out for the two series of concerts. Full details of the soloists and works of the Boston concerts will be announced shortly.

SUNDAY HERALD.

SEPTEMBER 7.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Muck, who has been spending the greater part of the summer at his country home near Gratz in Austria, is expected to arrive in Boston the last week of this month, and the serious work of the Symphony Orchestra will begin Monday, Oct. 6, with the first rehearsal. The season opens with the first public rehearsal Friday afternoon, Oct. 10, and the first concert the next evening. In this first week, however, the orchestra under Dr. Muck will give a private concert in Symphony Hall arranged for the delegates to the convention of the Bankers' Association.

The usual auction sales will take place on the accustomed days the week before the first concerts. The Friday afternoon seats will be sold on Monday, Sept. 29, and Tuesday, Sept. 30. The Saturday evening seats will be sold on Thursday, Oct. 2, and Friday, Oct. 3.

The Symphony Orchestra has never opened a season with brighter prospects. Dr. Muck has arranged an interesting set of concerts for Boston, and soloists of must unusual quality have been engaged. Outside of Boston the success of the season is assured. Already every seat in Carnegie Hall has been sold for the two series of concerts given in New York. The same will be true in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn. Full details of the plans for Boston will be announced shortly.

HERALD

s: New York

SEP 7 - 1913

The Boston Orchestra.

Boston's famous Symphony Orchestra ins its thirty-third season in Boston on ay afternoon, October 10, again under onductorship of Dr. Carl Muck. Its mbership, as last year, will consist of 84 100 musicians, and the personnel will show little change, though there has been an important addition in the person of Mr. Alfred Holy, of Vienna, first harpist.

During the season the Boston orchestra will give 110 concerts, and of these New York will have two series of five each and eight special matinee concerts. The first series, on Thursday evenings, will commence November 6, the other dates being December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 19. The second series will be on the following Saturday afternoons of the same weeks, all the concerts being held in Carnegie Hall. The matinees will be given October 18, November 1, 15 and 29, December 13, January 3 and March 7 and 28. An announcement from Boston says:—

"Carnegie Hall is at this early date entirely sold out by subscription, and the season promises to be quite as brilliant as that of last winter."

The five concerts of the orchestra at the Academy of Music in Brooklyn will take place on Friday evenings, November 7 December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20.

SEPTEMBER 14.

SUNDAY HERALD.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The management of the Symphony Orchestra will issue its formal prospectus in detail next week, giving the list of soloists that have been engaged and other information of interest. It hopes that it will be able to make more or less definite announcement regarding Dr. Muck's plans as to programs and novelties. As yet he has maintained a profound silence on this subject. He has engaged new members for the orchestra who will replace musicians that retired at the end of last season. This year, as usual, 60 members of the orchestra will play at the Worcester county music festival, which comes the last week in September. Alfred Holy, harpist of the orchestra and successor of Heinrich Schuecker, is expected in Boston next week.

The season of 1913-14 will provide plenty of work for the Symphony men. A schedule of 111 concerts has been made, exclusive of the two concerts in aid of the pension fund. Practically the same cities will be visited as last year and will have the same number of concerts. The most significant change will be in Providence, where six concerts are to be given instead of the usual five.

The total number of concerts is not limited to 111, because of lack of more engagements. The management is compelled each year to decline from 15 to 20 concerts. New York has long been asking for a third series of five concerts. Under the present conditions no one in New York who is not a regular subscriber has a chance to hear the orchestra, for every seat in Carnegie Hall is sold for the season.

Attention is again called to the dates of the auction sales. The rehearsal seats will be sold on Monday and Tuesday, Sept. 29th and 30th; the $18 seats on Monday and the $10 seats on Tuesday. The concert seats will be sold on Thursday and Friday, Oct. 2d and 3d; the $18 seats on Thursday, and the $10 seats on Friday.

NDAY GLOBE-

-SEPTEMBER 14.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Announcements

The season's prospectus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is announced to appear next week. It will contain the best of soloists and will have something to say about Dr Muck's programs and novelties. The eminent conductor is now in Berlin for the fortnight prior to sailing.

The majority of the members of the orchestra are back from their Summer vacations or engagements. The first of the new players to arrive will be Alfred Holy, the harpist, who will succeed the late Mr Schuecker. Mr Holy is expected next week. As usual 60 men of the orchestra will be at the Worcester Festival, Oct 1, 2 and 3.

During the season of 1913-1914 the orchestra will give 111 concerts exclusive of the two for the Pension Fund. Six concerts will replace the former five in Providence, where the orchestra is now on a profitable basis, otherwise the out-of-town schedule will be quite as before.

No feasible method seems likely to give New York the third series of five concerts for which there has long been a demand, since no one in New York, not a regular subscriber, now has an opportunity to hear the orchestra. Carnegie Hall is sold out for the season. Brooklyn also would increase the appearances there. Since the longest practical season is 30 weeks, the amount of travel entailed makes a greater number of concerts not to be advised.

Attention is again called to the dates of the auction sales. The rehearsal seats will be sold on Monday and Tuesday, Sept 29 and 30; the $18 seats on Monday and the $10 seats on Tuesday. The concert seats will be sold Thursday and Friday, Oct 2 and 3; the $18 seats on Thursday and the $10 seats on Friday.

POST, SEPTEMBER 14,

Boston Symphony Orchestra

DR. KARL MUCK, CONDUCTOR.

The management of the Symphony Orchestra is so far advanced in its plans for the coming season that it will issue its formal prospectus in detail next week, giving the list of soloists that have been engaged and other information of interest. It hopes that it will be able to make more or less definite announcement regarding Dr. Muck's plans as to programme and novelties. As yet Dr. Muck has maintained a profound silence on this subject. He is now in Berlin for a fortnight prior to his sailing to this country. He has engaged the new members of the orchestra who will take the place of the musicians that retired at the end of last season. The majority of the members of the orchestra are back in Boston from their summer vacations or engagements. This year, as for many years past, 60 of them will form the orchestra of the Worcester County Music Festival which comes the last week in September. The first of the new members to arrive will be Mr. Alfred Holy, the harpist of the orchestra and the successor of the late Heinrich Schuecker. He is expected in Boston next week.

The season of 1913-14 will provide plenty of work for the Symphony men. A schedule of 111 concerts has been made, these exclusive of the two concerts in aid of the Pension Fund. Practically the same cities will be visited as last year and will have the same number of concerts. The most significant change will be in Providence, where six concerts are to be given instead of the usual five. In Providence the orchestra is now on a very solid and profitable basis and its concerts there are decidedly worth while.

The total number of concerts is not limited to 111 because of lack of more engagements. As a matter of fact, the management is compelled each year to decline from 15 to 20 concerts which, if there were time for them, would mean a very considerable difference in the usual budget. New York, for example, has long been asking for a third series of five concerts. Under the present conditions no one in New York who is not a regular subscriber has a chance to hear the orchestra, for every seat in Carnegie Hall is sold for the season. Brooklyn, too, has for several years past been trying to put in a series of five Sunday afternoon concerts to follow the five Friday evening concerts. There in Brooklyn conditions are the same as in New York. Unfortunately the longest practicable season for the orchestra is 30 weeks, for it is unwise to give concerts earlier than the first of October and equally unwise to continue them after the first week in May. One hundred and eleven concerts makes an average of nearly four a week and of these 111, 55 entail a considerable amount of travel. It would be unwise from every point of view to over-work the orchestra, and the concerts at present scheduled with the necessary rehearsals and travelling fill up nearly all the time available.

Attention is again called to the dates of the auction sales. The rehearsal seats will be sold on Monday and Tuesday, Sept. 29 and 30; the $18 seats on Monday and the $10 seats on Tuesday. The concert seats will be sold on Thursday and Friday, Oct. 2 and 3; the $18 seats on Thursday and the $10 seats on Friday.

BOSTON AMERICAN,

SEPTEMBER 14, 1913.

111 CONCERTS BY SYMPHONY

The management of the Symphony Orchestra is so far advanced in its plans for the coming season that it will issue its formal prospectus in detail next week, giving the list of soloists. It hopes that it will be able to make more or less definite announcement regarding Dr. Muck's plans as to programs and novelties.

As yet Dr. Muck has maintained a profound silence on this subject. He is now in Berlin for a fortnight prior to his sailing to this country. He has engaged the new members of the orchestra who will take the places of the musicians that retired at the end of last season.

The majority of the members of the orchestra are back in Boston from their Summer vacations or engagements. This year, as for many years past, sixty of them will form the orchestra of the Worcester County Music Festival which comes the last week in September.

The season of 1913-14 will provide plenty of work for the Symphony men. A schedule of one hundred and eleven concerts has been made, these exclusive of the two concerts in aid of the Pension Fund. In Providence six concerts are to be given instead of the usual five. In New York every seat in Carnegie Hall is sold for the season.

RECORD.

SEPTEMBER 13.

Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Muck, who is now in Berlin, is maintaining his characteristically cryptic silence as to his plans for the coming Symphony season. He has had several musicians to engage to take the place of retiring members of the Orchestra and this important task he has finished. But regarding his programme and his general scheme of work he has as yet said nothing. The management has laid out for the Orchestra a total number of 111 concerts exclusive of the concerts in aid of the Pension Fund, which will be two, as in the past.

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date SEP 1

Wir kommen der Konzertſaiſon wahrhaftig immer näher und näher. Beweis dafür die Mittheilungen und Ankündigungen der verſchiedenen Symphonie-Orcheſter, welche allwöchentlich ſchon auf den Redaktionstiſch geflattert kommen.

Das Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter theilt mit, daß ſämmtliche zehn New Yorker Konzerte bis zum letzten Sitz vergeben ſind; das bedeutet ſomit zehn vollſtändig ausverkaufte Häuſer in Carnegie Hall. Die beiden Serien der Boſtoner Konzerte werden, wie in der Vergangenheit, an Donnerstag Abenden und Samstag Nachmittagen gegeben werden, und zwar ſind die betreffenden Daten der 6. und 8. November, 4. und 6. Dezember, 8. und 10. Januar, 19. und 21. Februar und 19. und 21. März. Als Soliſten ſind uns Paderewski, Fritz Kreisler und Frau Eliſabeth Boehm van Endert vom Berliner Opernhaus, die im Rahmen des Boſtoner Orcheſters hier debütiren wird, angekündigt. Der Dirigent Dr. Karl Muck wird Ende dieſes Monats hier anlangen.

Mit einer imponirenden Reihe von mit-

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date SEP

Boston Symphony Concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give two series of concerts at Carnegie Hall this season, as in the past, on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons. The dates are Nov. 6 and 8, Dec. 4 and 6, Jan. 8 and 10, Feb. 19 and 21, and March 19 and 21. The soloists announced are Paderewski, Fritz Kreisler, and Elizabeth Boehn von Endert, lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who makes her début in New York with the organization. Dr. Muck, the conductor, will arrive from Austria at the end of this month.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York.
Date SEP 11 1913

— Bei den beiden Conzert-Serien, die das Boſton Symphonie-Orcheſter hier geben wird, wird Elizabeth Boenn von Endert, die lyriſche Sopraniſtin der Königl. Oper in Berlin, zum erſten Male in Amerika auftreten. Das erſte Conzert findet am 6. November ſtatt.

— Dr. Muck, der muſikaliſche Leiter des Orcheſters, wird Ende dieſes Monats von ſeinem Ferienaufenthalt aus Oeſterreich zurückkehren.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From
Address New York City
Date

Aus deutſchen Kreiſen
und Anderes.

— Dr. Karl Muck, der Dirigent des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters, wird Ende dieſes Monats von ſeinem Ferienaufenthalt in Oeſterreich zurückkehren. Am 6. November wird der berühmte Muſiker ein Gaſt-Concert hier leiten, bei welchem Eliſabeth Boenn von Endert von der Berliner Hofoper zum erſten Mal in den Vereinigten Staaten auftritt.

From GERMAN HEROLD
Address: New York City
Date SEP 12 1913

— Dr. Karl Muck, der Dirigent des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters, wird Ende dieſes Monats von ſeinem Ferienaufenthalt in Oeſterreich zurückkehren. Am 6. November wird der berühmte Muſiker ein Gaſt-Concert hier leiten, bei welchem Eliſabeth Boenn von Endert von der Berliner Hofoper zum erſten Mal in den Vereinigten Staaten auftritt.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York SEP 12 1913
Date

JUST a few words must tell to-day what the larger concert givers are planning for New York this winter. Reports from Boston announce that all the seats in Carnegie Hall for the two series of Boston Symphony visits have been sold for the season by subscription. This means that it will be as difficult for the casual music lover to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year as it was last.

The two series of concerts will be given, as in the past, on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons, the dates being Nov. 6 and 8, Dec. 4 and 6, Jan. 8 and 10, Feb. 19 and 21 and March 19 and 21. The soloists announced/ are Paderewski, Fritz Kreisler and Elizabeth Boehn van Endert.

The last named is the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who will make her debut in New York with the orchestra. The conductor, Dr. Muck, will arrive from Austria the end of September.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City.
Date SEP 14 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Reports from Boston announce that all seats in Carnegie Hall for its two series of concerts during the coming winter have been sold for the season by subscription. This means that it will be as difficult for the casual music lover to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year as it was last. The two series of concerts will be given, as in the past, on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons, the dates being November 6 and 8, December 4 and 6, January 8 and 10, February 19 and 21 and March 19 and 21.

The soloists announced are Paderewski, Fritz Kreisler and Elizabeth Boehn von Endert, the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who will make her debut in New York with the orchestra.

Dr. Muck will arrive from Austria the end of this month.

From Address
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHEST

(Mr. Earl Muck, Conductor.)

Plans for the series of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Providence during the coming season are almost completed and will be in shape for formal announcement within a comparatively short time. As announced last spring six concerts will be given this year instead of the usual five. They will be given in Infantry hall on Tuesday evenings, the dates being Oct. 21, Nov. 18, Dec. 30, Feb. 3, March 24 and April 14.

In response to circulars sent out last spring a large majority of the subscribers of last year have renewed their subscriptions for the coming season. Notices will be sent to them shortly informing them that at any time they may forward their checks to C. A. Ellis, Symphony hall, and their tickets will be sent to them by registered mail. The sale of season tickets to new subscribers will begin Oct. 13.

The list of soloists to be announced comprises many very distinguished names and the season should be one of great success.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

PLANS for the series of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Providence during the coming season are almost completed and will be in shape for formal announcement within a comparatively short time. As announced last spring six concerts will be given this year instead of the usual five. They will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evenings, the dates being Oct. 21, Nov. 18, Dec. 30, Feb. 3, March 24 and April 14.

In response to circulars sent out last spring a large majority of the subscribers of last year have renewed their subscriptions for the coming season. Notices will be sent to them shortly informing them that at any time they may forward their checks to C. A. Ellis, Symphony Hall, and their tickets will be sent to them by registered mail. The sale of season tickets to new subscribers will begin Oct. 13.

The list of soloists to be announced comprises many very distinguished names and the season should be one of great success.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

AS announced last spring the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give six concerts in this city during the coming winter instead of the usual five, a sufficient number of subscribers having renewed their subscriptions in response to circulars sent out last spring. The concerts will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evenings, Oct. 21, Nov. 18, Dec. 30, Feb. 3, March 24 and April 14. The sale of season tickets to new subscribers will begin on Oct. 13.

Plans for the concerts are nearly completed and the list of soloists includes several important names.

* * *

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston Symphony patrons who have subscribed for the series of five concerts to be given in Philadelphia by that organization during the coming winter will shortly receive notices to the effect that their tickets are ready for them in Boston and will be sent to them as rapidly as paid for by registered mail. The new plan brought into operation last spring of allowing subscribers to renew several months ahead has worked admirably and a great majority of the regular subscribers of the concerts have taken their seats for the coming season.

The five concerts will be of extraordinary brilliance if only on account of the soloists that have been engaged. These comprise Paderewski, Geraldine Farrar, Fritz Kreisler, Elizabeth van Endert and Teresa Carreno. The concerts will be given as usual on Monday evenings in the Academy of Music, the dates being November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16.

After a six-weeks' season as violin soloist at the Bellevue, Ocean City, N. J., Miss Helen Kalmbach has returned to Philadelphia.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Boston Symphony patrons who have subscribed for the series of five concerts to be given in Philadelphia by that famous organization during the coming Winter will shortly receive notices to the effect that their tickets are ready for them in Boston and will be sent to them as rapidly as paid for by registered mail. The new plan brought into operation last Spring of allowing subscribers to renew several months ahead has worked admirably and a great majority of the regular subscribers of the concerts have taken their seats for the coming season.

The five concerts will be of extraordinary brilliance if only on account of the remarkable soloists that have been engaged. These comprise Paderewski, Geraldine Farrar, Fritz Kreisler, Elizabeth Van Endert and Teresa Carreno. The concerts will be given as usual on Monday evenings in the Academy of Music, the dates being November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelph
Date

* * *

Boston Symphony Orchestra patrons who have subscribed for the series of five concerts to be given in Philadelphia by the organization during the coming winter, will shortly receive notices to the effect that their tickets are ready for them in Boston and will be sent to them as rapidly as paid for, by registered mail. The new plan brought into operation last spring, of allowing subscribers to renew several months ahead, has worked admirably, and a great majority of the regular subscribers of the concerts have taken their seats for the coming season.

The five concerts will be of much brilliance if only on account of the soloists that have been engaged. These comprise Paderewski, Geraldine Farrar, Fritz Kreisler, Elizabeth van Endert and Teresa Carreno. The concerts will be given as usual, on Monday evenings, in the Academy of Music, the dates being November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16.

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that a very considerable proportion of the seats in the Academy of Music have already been taken up by subscription for the five concerts the Boston Orchestra will give in Philadelphia during the coming winter. The subscription comprises principally renewals by subscribers of last season, although many new applications have been received in Boston since last spring. The concerts will be given, as usual, on Monday evenings, the dates being November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date 913

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that a very considerable proportion of the seats in the Academy of Music have already been taken up by subscription for the five concerts the Boston Orchestra will give in Philadelphia during the coming winter. The subscription comprises principally renewals by subscribers of last season, although many new applications have been received in Boston since last spring. The concerts will be given as usual on Monday evenings, the dates being November 3. December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16. The Orchestra announces as soloists Geraldine Farrar, Paderewski, Kreisler, Teresa Carreno and Elizabeth Boehn van Endert. Mme. van Endert is the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who is coming to America for the first time to make a limited number of appearances with the Boston Orchestra. Dr. Muck, the conductor, is expected to arrive in the country the end of this month.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date

* * *

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces an unusual list of soloists. These will be Geraldine Farran, Paderewski, Kreisler, Teresa, Carreno and Elizabeth Boehn van Endert. Mme. van Endert is the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who is coming to America for the first time to make a limited number of appearances with the Boston orchestra.

Doctor Muck is expected to arrive in the country at the end of this month.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Orpheus Club.

* * *

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that a very considerable proportion of the seats in the Academy of Music have already been taken up by subscription for the five concerts the Boston Orchestra will give in Philadelphia during the coming Winter. The subscription comprises principally renewals by subscribers of last season, although many new applications have been received in Boston since last Spring. The concerts will be given as usual, on Monday evenings, the dates being November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16.

The Orchestra announces an unusual list of soloists. These will be Geraldine Farrar, Paderewski, Kreisler, Teresa Carreno and Elizabeth Boehn van Endert. Mme. van Endert is the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who is coming to America for the first time to make a limited number of appearances with the Boston Orchestra.

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date
Established:

MUSICAL NOTES

Boston Symphony patrons who have subscribed for the series of five concerts to be given in Philadelphia by that famous organization during the coming winter will shortly receive notices to the effect that their tickets are ready for them in Boston and will be sent to them, as rapidly as paid for, by registered mail. The new plan brought into operation last spring of allowing subscribers to renew several months ahead has worked admirably and a great majority of the regular subscribers of the concerts have taken their seats for the coming season.

The five concerts will be of extraordinary brilliance, if only on account of the remarkable soloists that have been engaged. These comprise Paderewski, Geraldine Farrar, Fritz Kreisler, Elizabeth Van Endert and Teresa Carreno. The concerts will be given, as usual, on Monday evenings in the Academy of Music, the dates being November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16.

[3]

RECORD.

SEPTEMBER 13.

Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Muck, who is now in Berlin, is maintaining his characteristically cryptic silence as to his plans for the coming Symphony season. He has had several musicians to engage to take the place of retiring members of the Orchestra and this important task he has finished. But regarding his programme and his general scheme of work he has as yet said nothing. The management has laid out for the Orchestra a total number of 111 concerts exclusive of the concerts in aid of the Pension Fund, which will be two, as in the past.

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date

Wir kommen der Konzertſaiſon wahrhaftig immer näher und näher. Beweis dafür die Mittheilungen und Ankündigungen der verſchiedenen Symphonie-Orcheſter, welche allwöchentlich ſchon auf den Redaktionstiſch geflattert kommen.

Das Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter theilt mit, daß ſämmtliche zehn New Yorker Konzerte bis zum letzten Sitz vergeben ſind; das bedeutet ſomit zehn vollſtändig ausverkaufte Häuſer in Carnegie Hall. Die beiden Serien der Boſtoner Konzerte werden, wie in der Vergangenheit, an Donnerstag Abenden und Samstag Nachmittagen gegeben werden, und zwar ſind die betreffenden Daten der 6. und 8. November, 4. und 6. Dezember, 8. und 10. Januar, 19. und 21. Februar und 19. und 21. März. Als Soliſten ſind uns Paderewski, Fritz Kreisler und Frau Eliſabeth Boehm van Endert vom Berliner Opernhaus, die im Rahmen des Boſtoner Orcheſters hier debütiren wird, angekündigt. Der Dirigent Dr. Karl Muck wird Ende dieſes Monats hier anlangen.

Mit einer imponirenden Reihe von mit-

From TIMES
Address: New York City
SEP
Date

Boston Symphony Concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give two series of concerts at Carnegie Hall this season, as in the past, on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons. The dates are Nov. 6 and 8, Dec. 4 and 6, Jan. 8 and 10, Feb. 19 and 21, and March 19 and 21. The soloists announced are Paderewski, Fritz Kreisler, and Elizabeth Boenn von Endert, lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who makes her début in New York with the organization. Dr. Muck, the conductor, will arrive from Austria at the end of this month.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York.
SEP 11
Date

[illegible] Garben ſein.

— Bei den beiden Conzert-Serien, die das Boſton Symphonie-Orcheſter hier geben wird, wird Elizabeth Boenn von Endert, die lyriſche Sopraniſtin der Königl. Oper in Berlin, zum erſten Male in Amerika auftreten. Das erſte Conzert findet am 6. November ſtatt.

— Dr. Muck, der muſikaliſche Leiter des Orcheſters, wird Ende dieſes Monats von ſeinem Ferienaufenthalt aus Oeſterreich zurückkehren.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From
Address New York City
Date

Aus deutſchen Kreiſen
und Anderes.

— Dr. Karl Muck, der Dirigent des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters, wird Ende dieſes Monats von ſeinem Ferienaufenthalt in Oeſterreich zurückkehren. Am 6. November wird der berühmte Muſiker ein Gaſt-Concert hier leiten, bei welchem Eliſabeth Boenn von Endert von der Berliner Hofoper zum erſten Mal in den Vereinigten Staaten auftritt.

From GERMAN HEROLD
Address: New York City
SEP 1
Date

— Dr. Karl Muck, der Dirigent des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters, wird Ende dieſes Monats von ſeinem Ferienaufenthalt in Oeſterreich zurückkehren. Am 6. November wird der berühmte Muſiker ein Gaſt-Concert hier leiten, bei welchem Eliſabeth Boenn von Endert von der Berliner Hofoper zum erſten Mal in den Vereinigten Staaten auftritt.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York SEP 12 1913
Date

JUST a few words must tell to-day what the larger concert givers are planning for New York this winter. Reports from Boston announce that all the seats in Carnegie Hall for the two series of Boston Symphony visits have been sold for the season by subscription. This means that it will be as difficult for the casual music lover to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year as it was last.

The two series of concerts will be given, as in the past, on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons, the dates being Nov. 6 and 8, Dec. 4 and 6, Jan. 8 and 10, Feb. 19 and 21 and March 19 and 21. The soloists announced are Paderewski, Fritz Kreisler and Elizabeth Boehn van Endert.

The last named is the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who will make her debut in New York with the orchestra. The conductor, Dr. Muck, will arrive from Austria the end of September.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City.
Date SEP 14 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Reports from Boston announce that all seats in Carnegie Hall for its two series of concerts during the coming winter have been sold for the season by subscription. This means that it will be as difficult for the casual music lover to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year as it was last. The two series of concerts will be given, as in the past, on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons, the dates being November 6 and 8, December 4 and 6, January 8 and 10, February 19 and 21 and March 19 and 21.

The soloists announced are Paderewski, Fritz Kreisler and Elizabeth Boehn von Endert, the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who will make her debut in New York with the orchestra.

Dr. Muck will arrive from Austria the end of this month.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
(Mr. Earl Muck, Conductor.)

Plans for the series of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Providence during the coming season are almost completed and will be in shape for formal announcement within a comparatively short time. As announced last spring six concerts will be given this year instead of the usual five. They will be given in Infantry hall on Tuesday evenings, the dates being Oct. 21, Nov. 18, Dec. 30, Feb. 3, March 24 and April 14.

In response to circulars sent out last spring a large majority of the subscribers of last year have renewed their subscriptions for the coming season. Notices will be sent to them shortly informing them that at any time they may forward their checks to C. A. Ellis, Symphony hall, and their tickets will be sent to them by registered mail. The sale of season tickets to new subscribers will begin Oct. 13.

The list of soloists to be announced comprises many very distinguished names and the season should be one of great success.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

PLANS for the series of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Providence during the coming season are almost completed and will be in shape for formal announcement within a comparatively short time. As announced last spring six concerts will be given this year instead of the usual five. They will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evenings, the dates being Oct. 21, Nov. 18, Dec. 30, Feb. 3, March 24 and April 14.

In response to circulars sent out last spring a large majority of the subscribers of last year have renewed their subscriptions for the coming season. Notices will be sent to them shortly informing them that at any time they may forward their checks to C. A. Ellis, Symphony Hall, and their tickets will be sent to them by registered mail. The sale of season tickets to new subscribers will begin Oct. 13.

The list of soloists to be announced comprises many very distinguished names and the season should be one of great success.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

AS announced last spring the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give six concerts in this city during the coming winter instead of the usual five, a sufficient number of subscribers having renewed their subscriptions in response to circulars sent out last spring.

The concerts will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evenings, Oct. 21, Nov. 18, Dec. 30, Feb. 3, March 24 and April 14. The sale of season tickets to new subscribers will begin on Oct. 13.

Plans for the concerts are nearly completed and the list of soloists includes several important names.

* * *

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston Symphony patrons who have subscribed for the series of five concerts to be given in Philadelphia by that organization during the coming winter will shortly receive notices to the effect that their tickets are ready for them in Boston and will be sent to them as rapidly as paid for by registered mail. The new plan brought into operation last spring of allowing subscribers to renew several months ahead has worked admirably and a great majority of the regular subscribers of the concerts have taken their seats for the coming season.

The five concerts will be of extraordinary brilliance if only on account of the soloists that have been engaged. These comprise Paderewski, Geraldine Farrar, Fritz Kreisler, Elizabeth van Endert and Teresa Carreno. The concerts will be given as usual on Monday evenings in the Academy of Music, the dates being November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16.

After a six-weeks' season as violin soloist at the Bellevue, Ocean City, N. J., Miss Helen Kalmbach has returned to Philadelphia.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony patrons who have subscribed for the series of five concerts to be given in Philadelphia by that famous organization during the coming Winter will shortly receive notices to the effect that their tickets are ready for them in Boston and will be sent to them as rapidly as paid for by registered mail. The new plan brought into operation last Spring of allowing subscribers to renew several months ahead has worked admirably and a great majority of the regular subscribers of the concerts have taken their seats for the coming season.

The five concerts will be of extraordinary brilliance if only on account of the remarkable soloists that have been engaged. These comprise Paderewski, Geraldine Farrar, Fritz Kreisler, Elizabeth Van Endert and Teresa Carreno. The concerts will be given as usual on Monday evenings in the Academy of Music, the dates being November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16.

* * *

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date

* * *

Boston Symphony Orchestra patrons who have subscribed for the series of five concerts to be given in Philadelphia by the organization during the coming winter, will shortly receive notices to the effect that their tickets are ready for them in Boston and will be sent to them as rapidly as paid for, by registered mail. The new plan brought into operation last spring, of allowing subscribers to renew several months ahead, has worked admirably, and a great majority of the regular subscribers of the concerts have taken their seats for the coming season. The five concerts will be of much brilliance if only on account of the soloists that have been engaged. These comprise Paderewski, Geraldine Farrar, Fritz Kreisler, Elizabeth van Endert and Teresa Carreno. The concerts will be given as usual, on Monday evenings, in the Academy of Music, the dates being November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16.

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that a very considerable proportion of the seats in the Academy of Music have already been taken up by subscription for the five concerts the Boston Orchestra will give in Philadelphia during the coming winter. The subscription comprises principally renewals by subscribers of last season, although many new applications have been received in Boston since last spring. The concerts will be given, as usual, on Monday evenings, the dates being November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that a very considerable proportion of the seats in the Academy of Music have already been taken up by subscription for the five concerts the Boston Orchestra will give in Philadelphia during the coming winter. The subscription comprises principally renewals by subscribers of last season, although many new applications have been received in Boston since last spring. The concerts will be given as usual on Monday evenings, the dates being November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16. The Orchestra announces as soloists Geraldine Farrar, Paderewski, Kreisler, Teresa Carreno and Elizabeth Boehn van Endert. Mme. van Endert is the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who is coming to America for the first time to make a limited number of appearances with the Boston Orchestra. Dr. Muck, the conductor, is expected to arrive in the country the end of this month.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date

* * *

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces an unusual list of soloists. These will be Geraldine Farrar, Paderewski, Kreisler, Teresa Carreno and Elizabeth Boehn van Endert. Mme. van Endert is the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who is coming to America for the first time to make a limited number of appearances with the Boston orchestra.

Doctor Muck is expected to arrive in the country at the end of this month.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Orpheus Club.

* * *

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that a very considerable proportion of the seats in the Academy of Music have already been taken up by subscription for the five concerts the Boston Orchestra will give in Philadelphia during the coming Winter. The subscription comprises principally renewals by subscribers of last season, although many new applications have been received in Boston since last Spring. The concerts will be given as usual, on Monday evenings, the dates being November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16.

The Orchestra announces an unusual list of soloists. These will be Geraldine Farrar, Paderewski, Kreisler, Teresa Carreno and Elizabeth Boehn van Endert. Mme. van Endert is the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who is coming to America for the first time to make a limited number of [illegible] with the Boston Orchestra.

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

MUSICAL NOTES

Symphony patrons who have [illegible] for the series of five concerts [illegible] in Philadelphia by that [illegible] during the coming [illegible] shortly receive notices to the [illegible] that their tickets are ready for [illegible] in Boston and will be sent to them as rapidly as paid for, by [illegible] mail. The new plan brought into operation last spring of allowing subscribers to renew several months ahead has worked admirably and a great majority of the regular subscribers of the concerts have taken their seats for the coming season.

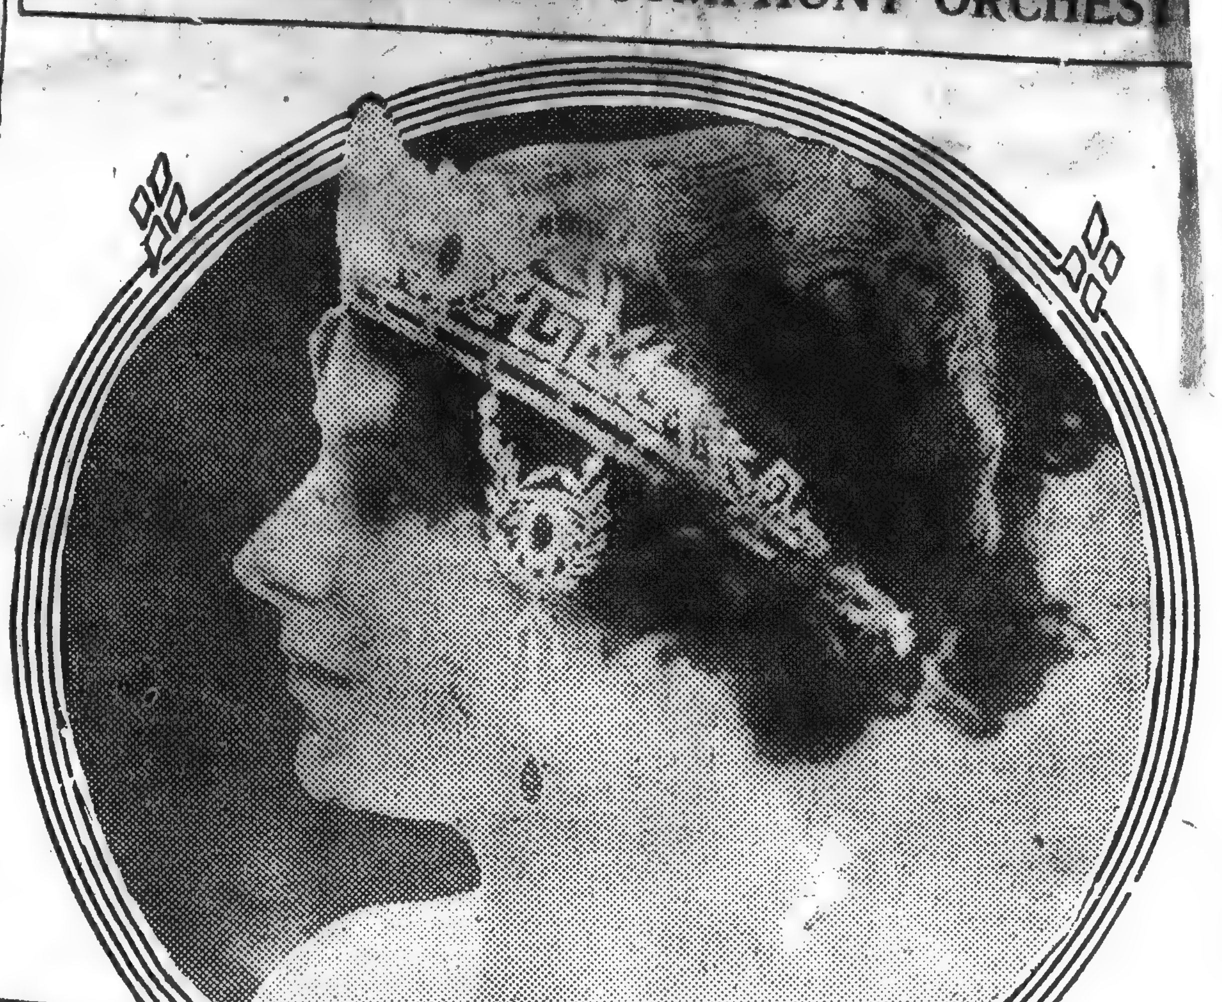
The five concerts will be of extraordinary brilliance, if only on account of the remarkable soloists that have been engaged. These comprise Paderewski, Geraldine Farrar, Fritz Kreisler, Elizabeth Van Endert and Teresa Carreno. The concerts will be given, as usual, on Monday evenings in the Academy of Music, the dates being November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16.

Address Philadelphia.

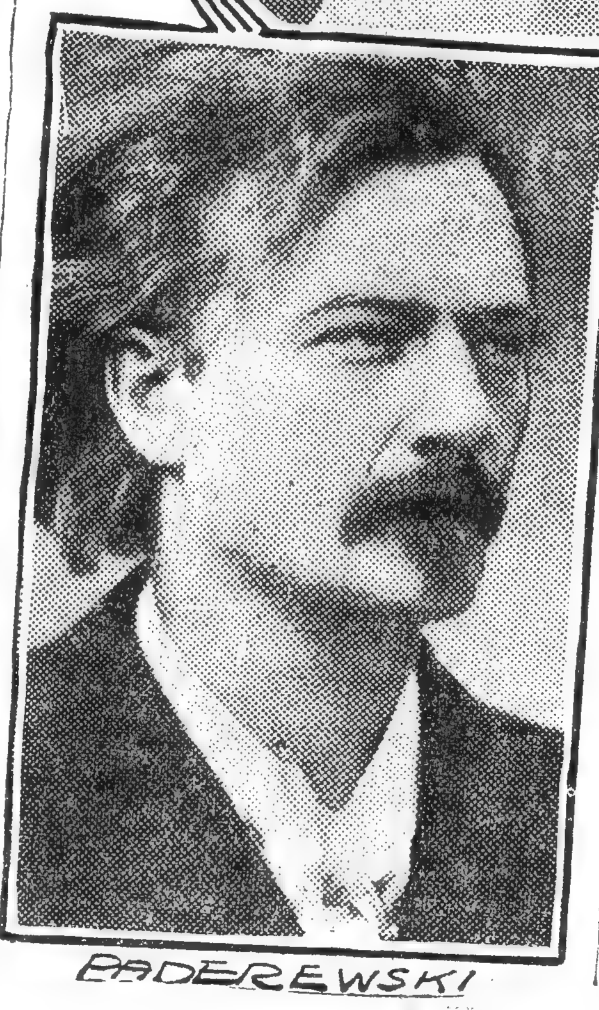
Date S 913

Establi

TWO NOTED SOLOISTS TO BE HEARD WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHEST



GERALDINE FARRAR



PADEREWSKI

Boston Symphony patrons who have subscribed for the series of five concerts to be given in Philadelphia by that famous organization during the coming winter will shortly receive notices to the effect that their tickets are ready for them in Boston and will be sent to them, as rapidly as paid for, by registered mail. The new plan brought into operation last spring of allowing subscribers to renew several months ahead has worked admirably

The five concerts will be of extraordinary brilliance if only on account of the remarkable soloists that have been engaged. These comprise Paderewski, Geraldine Farrar, Fritz Kreisler, Elizabeth van Endert and Teresa Carreno. The concerts will be given as usual on Monday evenings in the Academy of Music. the dates being November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16.

From AMERICAN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston Symphony patrons, who have subscribed for the series of five concerts to be given in Baltimore by that famous organization during the coming winter, will shortly receive notices of the fact that their tickets are ready for them in Boston, and will be sent to them, as rapidly as paid for, by registered mail. The new plan brought into operation last spring of allowing subscribers to renew several months ahead has worked admirably, and a great majority of the regular subscribers of the concerts have taken their seats for the coming season.

The five concerts will be of extraordinary brilliance if only on account of the remarkable soloists who have been engaged. These comprise Paderewski, Geraldine Farrar, Fritz Kreisler, Elizabeth van Endert and Teresa Carreno. The concerts will be given as usual on Wednesday evening in the Lyric Theatre, the dates being November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING NEWS

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date SEP

Estab

SYMPHONY SEATS REA

Tickets For Five Concerts H
Held In Boston; Brilliant Season Predicted.

Boston Symphony patrons who have subscribed for the series of five concerts to be given in Baltimore by that famous organization during the coming winter will shortly receive notices of the fact that their tickets are ready for them in Boston and will be sent to them as rapidly as paid for by registered mail. The new plan brought into operation last spring of allowing subscribers to renew several months ahead has worked admirably and a great majority of the regular subscribers of the concerts have taken their seats for the coming season.

The five concerts will be brilliant, if only on account of the soloists who have been engaged. These comprise Paderewski, Geraldine Farrar, Fritz Kreisler, Elizabeth van Endert and Teresa Carreno. The concerts will be given as usual on Wednesday evening in the Lyric Theater, the dates being November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau

From EVENING NEWS,

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date SEP 6 1913

Es k, 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY DATES

Boston Symphony patrons who have subscribed for the series of five concerts to be given in Baltimore by that famous organization during the coming winter, will shortly receive notices of the fact that their tickets are ready for them in Boston and will be sent to them as rapidly as paid for by registered mail. The new plan brought into operation last spring of allowing subscribers to renew several months ahead has worked admirably and a great majority of the regular subscribers of the concerts have taken their seats for the coming season.

The five concerts will be of extraordinary brilliance if only on account of the remarkable soloists, who have been engaged. These are Paderewski. Geraldine Farrar. Fritz Kreisler. Elizabeth van Endert and Teresa Carreno. The concerts will be given as usual on Wednesday evenings at the Lyric. The dates are November 5. December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18.

From AMERICAN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

Estab 84

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that a very considerable proportion of the seats in the Lyric Theater have already been taken up by subscription for the five concerts the Boston Orchestra will give in Baltimore during the coming winter. The concerts will be given as usual on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18. The Orchestra announces an unusual list of soloists. These will be Geraldine Farrar, Paderewski, Kreisler, Teresa Carreno and Elizabeth Boehn van Endert. Mme. Van Endert is the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who is coming to America for the first time.

Miss Farrar's Arrival and Plans.

Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan Opera House, who, as a preface to her operatic work in New York the coming winter, will make a concert tour under the direction of Charles A. Ellis, of Boston, will arrive in New York from Cherbourg by the Kaiser Wilhelm II. next Tuesday, September 16. On the 19th she will leave New York for her first appearance on the Pacific Coast. She will venture her first song recital in New York. Besides these concerts of her own she will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston October 31 and November 1; in Philadelphia November 3, and Baltimore November 5.

[4]

From EVG. NEWS

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

Estab 84

Many Reserving Seats For Symphony Orchestra

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced that a very considerable proportion of the seats in the Lyric Theater has already been taken up by subscription for the five concerts the Boston Orchestra will give in Baltimore during the coming winter. The subscription principally comprises renewals by subscribers of last season, although many new applications have been received in Boston since last spring. The concerts will be given as usual on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18.

The Orchestra announces an unusual list of soloists. These will be Geraldine Farrar, Paderewski, Kreisler, Teresa Carreno and Elizabeth Boehn Van Endert. Mme. Van Endert is the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who is coming to America for the first time to make a limited number of appearances with the Boston Orchestra.

From SUN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date

Establis 34

Baltimore music lovers are smacking their lips over the program of the soloists, which the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced recently. It will be remembered that last year the late comers had difficulty in securing seats at all, and from all accounts the coming season will duplicate the past on that score. Already a considerable proportion of the seats have been taken up by renewals, and in addition a great many new subscriptions have been received. The concerts will be given as usual on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18.

The soloists will be Geraldine Farrar, Paderewski, Kreisler, Teresa Carrena and Elizabeth Boehn van Endert. Mme. van Endert is the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who is coming to America for the first time to make a limited number of appearances with the Boston Orchestra.

Dr. Muck is expected to arrive in the country the end of this month.

From EVENING SUN

Address: New York

Date SEP 18 1913

E 1884

SLIPPING quietly into town from Boston, the famous Symphony manager, C. A. Ellis, was discovered just after midnight this morning on the steps of a Manhattan hotel that is the headquarters of Col. Higginson's travelling organization five times a year. He arrived unattended by either a string or a brass band. To a New York friend, Mr. Ellis explained that he had come to spend a day here before starting west with Miss Geraldine Farrar, who is making this fall her first appearance on the Pacific Coast. They will leave tomorrow to begin the tour. The party consists of Miss Farrar, her mother, Mrs. Sydney Farrar; Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the veteran 'cellist; Arthur Rosenstein, accompanist, and Mr. Ellis as manager. They will be in the West till the last days of October.

The Boston orchestra conductor, Carl Muck, is meanwhile sailing from Bremen this week Saturday on the George Washington. Mr. Ellis's chief star, Paderewski, at the same time is leaving his home in Switzerland for Paris, preparatory to sailing for Cherbourg on

Bureau in the World

From TIMES

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Estab 84

* * *

Turning eastward then she will give concerts in Denver the 13th, Chicago the 19th and Pittsburgh the 21st. She will venture her first song recital in New York in Carnegie Hall, Saturday afternoon, October 25, and Tuesday afternoon, October 29, she will sing the same program in Symphony Hall, Boston. Besides these concerts of her own she will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, October 31 and November 1; in Philadelphia November 3 and Baltimore November 5. In her concerts in the west she will have the assistance of Alwin Schroeder, the eminent violoncellist, and Arthur Rosenstein, accompanist.

Mrs. Owen B. Jenkins has sent out invitations for a musical reception to meet Miss Barbara Schaefer and Miss Kathryn McGinley, on Monday afternoon, from 4 until 5.30, at the Orpheus Club.

From JOURNAL

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date

E 84

It will interest many to learn that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been fortunate enough to secure Paderewski as one of its soloists, and the management has announced that he will appear in this city at one of its concerts, probably late in the winter. This will be the only appearance in this city of the noted pianist, who has not been in America since the season of 1908-9, when he was here for a few weeks to hear the first performance of his Symphony, and he has not made an extended tour of the country since 1907-8. He is due to arrive in New York the second week in October and will be in this country until the end of April.

Other soloists will be announced in a week or ten days, as soon as negotiations are completed, the management having already signified its intention of making the coming series the most brilliant ever given here by the orchestra.

The announcement of the appearance of Paderewski promises an excellent beginning toward the fulfilment of this promise, as he has called out large audiences at his few appearances in this city, and subscribers to the Symphony course will be glad to know that his appearance in the series is assured.

* * *

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From GLOBE

Address: New York

Date

Estab 84

Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, comes to America this fall for a season's tour of this country under the management of C. A. Ellis of Boston. Mr. Kreisler, accompanied by his wife, will sail from Bremen Oct. 7 by the Kaiser Wilhelm II., arriving in New York a week later. His first concert will be given in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Thursday evening, Oct. 1, and on the following Sunday afternoon he will give a recital in Orchestra Hall, Chicago. His first engagement with an orchestra is the following week in Philadelphia, with the Philadelphia Orchestra. During the coming winter Mr. Kreisler will play with every symphony orchestra in the country, and this will include a series of a dozen appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. After playing in the east Mr. Kreisler in the late winter will go to the Pacific coast, where he will play in all the principal cities, and on his way there and back will play in all the principal cities west of the Mississippi. He will be in America until the late spring.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From GLOBE

Address: New York SEP 18 1913

Date

Establ 84

Music.

Boston Orchestra Changes — Other Musical News.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will have this season the usual number of changes in its personnel, due chiefly to the retirement on pension of the older members. The most important change is that of the first harpist. Last spring Heinrich Schuecker, who was for so many years the harpist of the orchestra, died suddenly, and his place has been taken by Alfred Holy of Vienna. There will be two new first violins in place of Gustav Strube, who has become an instructor in the Peabody Institute, Baltimore, and John Mullaly, an almost original member of the orchestra, who has just retired. There will be two important changes in the horns, as Dr. Muck has engaged for the first quartet a new first horn and a new third horn.

Dr. Muck sails Saturday from Bremen on the George Washington, and is due to arrive in New York the 28th. He will go direct to Boston and will there make the formal announcement of his plans for the season.

From EVENING MAIL

Address: New York City.

Date SEP 17 1913

Estab 1884

The management of the Boston Syn phony Orchestra announces that aga all t seats have been sold by su scription for the two series of concer in Carnegie Hall during the coming se son. The soloists announced Paderewski, Fritz Kreisler and Eli beth Boehn van Endert, the princip lyric soprano of the Royal Opera Berlin, who will make her debut in York with the orchestra. Dr. Muck arrive from Austria at the end of month. The Thursday and Sa afternoon concerts will be gi vember 6, 8, December 4, 6, Ja 10, February 19, 21, March 19, 21.

LF 14

ORCHESTRA

oston Sym-hat a very e seats in e already n for the hestra will he coming comprise cribers of new ap-in Boston ts will be nings, the cember 1,
March 16. soloists
i, Kreis-
Elizabeth n Endert of the oming to make a with the the con-in the 1884

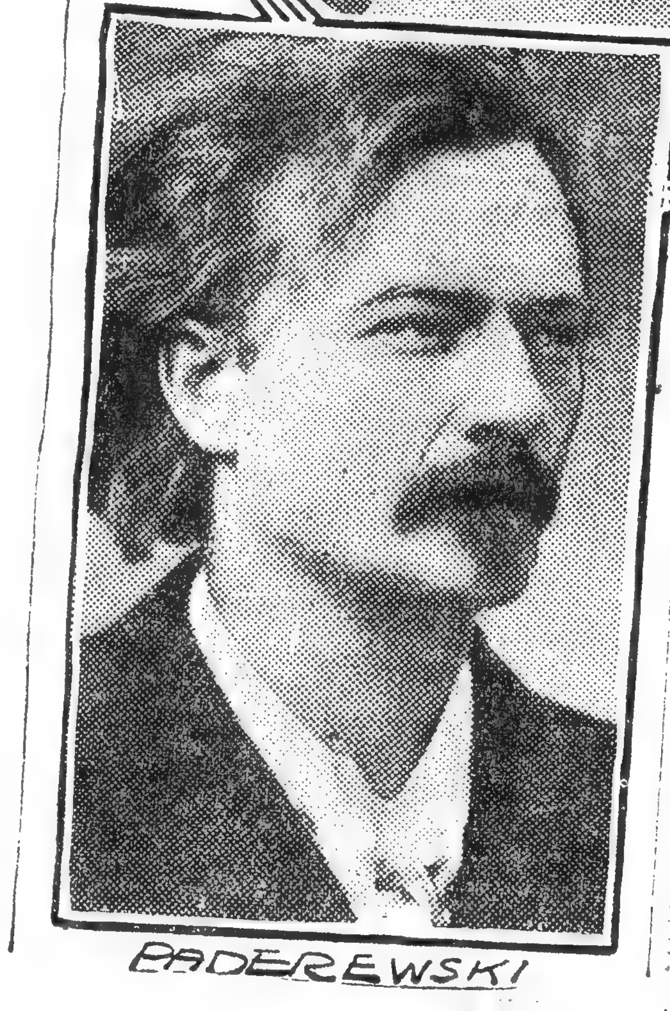
Address Philadelphia

Date 913

Establi

TWO NOTED SOLOISTS TO BE HEARD WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

GERALDINE FARRAR



PADEREWSKI

Boston Symphony patrons who have subscribed for the series of five concerts to be given in Philadelphia by that famous organization during the coming winter will shortly receive notices to the effect that their tickets are ready for them in Boston and will be sent to them, as rapidly as paid for, by registered mail. The new plan brought into operation last spring of allowing subscribers to renew several months ahead has worked admirably

The five concerts will be of extraordinary brilliance if only on account of the remarkable soloists that have been engaged. These comprise Paderewski, Geraldine Farrar, Fritz Kreisler, Elizabeth van Endert and Teresa Carreno. The concerts will be given as usual on Monday evenings in the Academy of Music, the dates being November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16.

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston Symphony patrons, who have subscribed for the series of five concerts to be given in Baltimore by that famous organization during the coming winter, will shortly receive notices of the fact that their tickets are ready for them in Boston, and will be sent to them, as rapidly as paid for, by registered mail. The new plan brought into operation last spring of allowing subscribers to renew several months ahead has worked admirably, and a great majority of the regular subscribers of the concerts have taken their seats for the coming season.

The five concerts will be of extraordinary brilliance if only on account of the remarkable soloists who have been engaged. These comprise Paderewski, Geraldine Farrar, Fritz Kreisler, Elizabeth van Endert and Teresa Carreno. The concerts will be given as usual on Wednesday evening in the Lyric Theatre, the dates being November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING NEWS
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date SEP 1913

Establi

SYMPHONY SEATS READY

Tickets For Five Concerts Here Held In Boston; Brilliant Season Predicted.

Boston Symphony patrons who have subscribed for the series of five concerts to be given in Baltimore by that famous organization during the coming winter will shortly receive notices of the fact that their tickets are ready for them in Boston and will be sent to them as rapidly as paid for by registered mail. The new plan brought into operation last spring of allowing subscribers to renew several months ahead has worked admirably and a great majority of the regular subscribers of the concerts have taken their seats for the coming season.

The five concerts will be brilliant, if only on account of the soloists who have been engaged. These comprise Paderewski, Geraldine Farrar, Fritz Kreisler, Elizabeth van Endert and Teresa Carreno. The concerts will be given as usual on Wednesday evening in the Lyric Theater, the dates being November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau

From EVENING NEWS,
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date SEP 6 1913

Es , 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY DATES

Boston Symphony patrons who have subscribed for the series of five concerts to be given in Baltimore by that famous organization during the coming winter, will shortly receive notices of the fact that their tickets are ready for them in Boston and will be sent to them as rapidly as paid for by registered mail. The new plan brought into operation last spring of allowing subscribers to renew several months ahead has worked admirably and a great majority of the regular subscribers of the concerts have taken their seats for the coming season.

The five concerts will be of extraordinary brilliance if only on account of the remarkable soloists, who have been engaged. These are Paderewski. Geraldine Farrar, Fritz Kreisler, Elizabeth van Endert and Teresa Carreno. The concerts will be given as usual on Wednesday evenings at the Lyric. The dates are November 5, December 3, Jenuary 7, February 18 and March 18.

From AMERICAN
Address Baltimore, Md.

84

Symphony Orchestra.

gement of the Boston Symchestra announces that a very ble proportion of the seats in Theater have already been by subscription for the five the Boston Orchestra will give re during the coming winter. rts will be given as usual on evenings, the dates being No- December 3, January 7, February and March 18. The Orchestra announces an unusual list of soloists. These will be Geraldine Farrar, Paderewski, Kreisler, Teresa Carreno and Elizabeth Boehn van Endert. Mme. Van Endert is the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who is coming to America for the first time.

Miss Farrar's Arrival and Plans.

Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan Opera House, who, as a preface to her operatic work in New York the coming winter, will make a concert tour under the direction of Charles A. Ellis, of Boston, will arrive in New York from Cherbourg by the Kaiser Wilhelm II. next Tuesday, September 16. On the 19th she will leave New York for her first appearance on the Pacific Coast. She will venture her first song recital in New York. Besides these concerts of her own she will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston October 31 and November 1; in Philadelphia November 3, and Baltimore November 5.

---

d.

84

rving Seats phony Orchestra

gement of the Boston Orchestra has announced y considerable proportion s in the Lyric Theater has een taken up by subscrip- the five concerts the Boston Orc a will give in Baltimore during the coming winter. The subscription principally comprises renewals by subscribers of last season, although many new applications have been received in Boston since last spring. The concerts will be given as usual on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18.

The Orchestra announces an unusual list of soloists. These will be Geraldine Farrar, Paderewski, Kreisler, Teresa Carreno and Elizabeth Boehn Van Endert. Mme. Van Endert is the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who is coming to America for the first time to make a limited number of appearances with the Boston Orchestra.

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Establis 84

Baltimore music lovers are smacking their lips over the program of the soloists, which the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced recently. It will be remembered that last year the late comers had difficulty in securing seats at all, and from all accounts the coming season will duplicate the past on that score. Already a considerable proportion of the seats have been taken up by renewals, and in addition a great many new subscriptions have been received. The concerts will be given as usual on Wednesday evenings, the dates being November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18.

The soloists will be Geraldine Farrar, Paderewski, Kreisler, Teresa Carrena and Elizabeth Boehn van Endert. Mme. van Endert is the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who is coming to America for the first time to make a limited number of appearances with the Boston Orchestra.

Dr. Muck is expected to arrive in the country the end of this month.

Newspap

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York
Date SEP 18 1913

E 1884

SLIPPING quietly into town from Boston, the famous Symphony manager, C. A. Ellis, was discovered just after midnight this morning on the steps of a Manhattan hotel that is the headquarters of Col. Higginson's travelling organization five times a year. He arrived unattended by either a string or a brass band. To a New York friend, Mr. Ellis explained that he had come to spend a day here before starting west with Miss Geraldine Farrar, who is making this fall her first appearance on the Pacific Coast. They will leave tomorrow to begin the tour. The party consists of Miss Farrar, her mother, Mrs. Sydney Farrar; Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the veteran 'cellist; Arthur Rosenstein, accompanist, and Mr. Ellis as manager. They will be in the West till the last days of October.

The Boston orchestra conductor, Carl Muck, is meanwhile sailing from Bremen this week Saturday on the George Washington. Mr. Ellis's chief star, Paderewski, at the same time is leaving his home in Switzerland for Paris, preparatory to sailing for Cherbourg on Oct. 1 with Mme. Paderewska and his English representative, L. G. Sharp. Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, with his American wife, sails from Bremen on Oct. 7 by the Kaiser Wilhelm II.

Estab 84

concerts in Denver the 13th, Chicago the 19th and Pittsburgh the 21st. She will venture her first song recital in New York in Carnegie Hall, Saturday afternoon, October 25, and Tuesday afternoon, October 29, she will sing the same program in Symphony Hall, Boston. Besides these concerts of her own she will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, October 31 and November 1; in Philadelphia November 3 and Baltimore November 5. In her concerts in the West she will have the assistance of Alwin Schroeder, the eminent violoncellist, and Arthur Rosenstein, accompanist.

Mrs. Owen B. Jenkins has sent out invitations for a musical reception to meet Miss Barbara Schaefer and Miss Kathryn McGinley, on Monday afternoon, from 4 until 5.30, at the Orpheus Club.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

E 84

It will interest many to learn that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been fortunate enough to secure Paderewski as one of its soloists, and the management has announced that he will appear in this city at one of its concerts, probably late in the winter. This will be the only appearance in this city of the noted pianist, who has not been in America since the season of 1908-9, when he was here for a few weeks to hear the first performance of his Symphony, and he has not made an extended tour of the country since 1907-8. He is due to arrive in New York the second week in October and will be in this country until the end of April.

Other soloists will be announced in a week or ten days, as soon as negotiations are completed, the management having already signified its intention of making the coming series the most brilliant ever given here by the orchestra.

The announcement of the appearance of Paderewski promises an excellent beginning toward the fulfilment of this promise, as he has called out large audiences at his few appearances in this city, and subscribers to the Symphony course will be glad to know that his appearance in the series is assured.

* * *

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From GLOBE
Address: New York
Date

Estabi 84

Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, comes to America this fall for a season's tour of this country under the management of C. A. Ellis of Boston. Mr. Kreisler, accompanied by his wife, will sail from Bremen Oct. 7 by the Kaiser Wilhelm II., arriving in New York a week later. His first concert will be given in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Thursday evening, Oct. 1, and on the following Sunday afternoon he will give a recital in Orchestra Hall, Chicago. His first engagement with an orchestra is the following week in Philadelphia, with the Philadelphia Orchestra. During the coming winter Mr. Kreisler will play with every symphony orchestra in the country, and this will include a series of a dozen appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. After playing in the east Mr. Kreisler in the late winter will go to the Pacific coast, where he will play in all the principal cities, and on his way there and back will play in all the principal cities west of the Mississippi. He will be in America until the late spring.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From GLOBE
Address: New York SEP 18 1913
Date

Establ 84

Music.

Boston Orchestra Changes — Other Musical News.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will have this season the usual number of changes in its personnel, due chiefly to the retirement on pension of the older members. The most important change is that of the first harpist. Last spring Heinrich Schuecker, who was for so many years the harpist of the orchestra, died suddenly, and his place has been taken by Alfred Holy of Vienna. There will be two new first violins in place of Gustav Strube, who has become an instructor in the Peabody Institute, Baltimore, and John Mullaly, an almost original member of the orchestra, who has just retired. There will be two important changes in the horns, as Dr. Muck has engaged for the first quartet a new first horn and a new third horn.

Dr. Muck sails Saturday from Bremen on the George Washington, and is due to arrive in New York the 28th. He will go direct to Boston and will there make the formal announcement of his plans for the season.

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City.
Date SEP 17 1913

Estab 1884

The management of the Boston Sym phony Orchestra announces that aga all t seats have been sold by su scription for the two series of concer in Carnegie Hall during the coming se son. The soloists announced Paderewski, Fritz Kreisler and Eliz beth Boehn van Endert, the princip lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who will make her debut in York with the orchestra. Dr. Muck arrive from Austria at the end month. The Thursday and S afternoon concerts will be g vember 6, 8, December 4, 6, 10, February 19, 21, March

[4]

Newspaper Cutting

From New

Address Providence, R. I.

Date

BOSTON ~~SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.~~

1884

The great Paderewski, after an absence of four years, is returning to America this fall to make an extended tour of several months under the direction of Mr. Charles A. Ellis of Boston. He sails from Cherbourg Oct. 1 and will arrive in New York the following weeek

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been fortunate enough to secure the services of Mr. Paderewski as soloist for a number of his concerts, one of which will be in Providence. The plan of Mr. Paderewski's tour does not admit of a recital in this city, so that his only appearance in Providence will be as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This one distinctive feature is sufficient of itself to make the series of Boston Symphony concerts here unusually attractive, but other great artists are under negotion for appearance here. It is the intention of the management of the Boston Symphony to make the six concerts it is to give in Providence the most brilliant affairs of the kind this city has ever had.

The great majority of last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra have renewed their subscription for the ensuing season. Applications of new subscribers may be sent even now to Charles A. Ellis, Symphony hall. Boston Such seats as have not been taken up for the season will be placed on sale in Providence Oct. 13th.

Soloists of Renown Will Ap

SYMPHONY orchestra soloists who are coming to America this season for the first time are Mme Elizabeth van Endert, soprano of the Royal opera, Berlin, and Carl Flesch, the violinist. Mme. van Endert in opera sings the lyric soprano roles such as Miss Geraldine Farrar takes. She comes to the United States for a special season of appearances with the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr. Flesch, a Hungarian, comes with a high reputation as an interpreter of classic violin concertos.

Artists besides Mme. van Endert who will appear under exclusive Boston Symphony management in the United States and will take part in symphony tours are Mr. Paderewski, the pianist, and Mr. Kreisler, the violinist. Miss Geraldine Farrar, now on the way to the Pacific coast to appear there for the first time in her career in concert, will sing with the orchestra at an early Boston concert. She is scheduled to begin her work when the Metropolitan opera season opens, singing for the first time the title role of Bizet's "Carmen."

(Photo reproduced by permission of C. A. Ellis)

IGNACE PADEREWSKI

Pianist who will play with orchestra and will give recitals

(Photo reproduced by permission of C. A. Ellis)

MISS GERALDINE FARRAR

Soprano who at end of autumn tour of United States appears in Boston

Mr. Paderewski makes his first American appearance of the season in Trenton, N. J., on Oct. 15. He will play in New York, then take a trip to cities of the middle West and return East for a series of engagements. He has not visited the United States since he came to attend the production of his "Polish" symphony in Boston under the direction of Max Fiedler in the season of 1908-09 and to give a series of concerts. Mr. Kreisler, whose triumphs last winter made his managers cease to book him as a small hall recital artist, takes the platform for the first time at the Academy of Music in Brooklyn, Oct. 16. He is engaged to appear with all the leading orchestras of the country, not returning to Europe until late in the spring.

(Photo by Mishkin Studio)

JOSEF HOFMANN

He will play piano in Symphony hall as soloist with orchestra

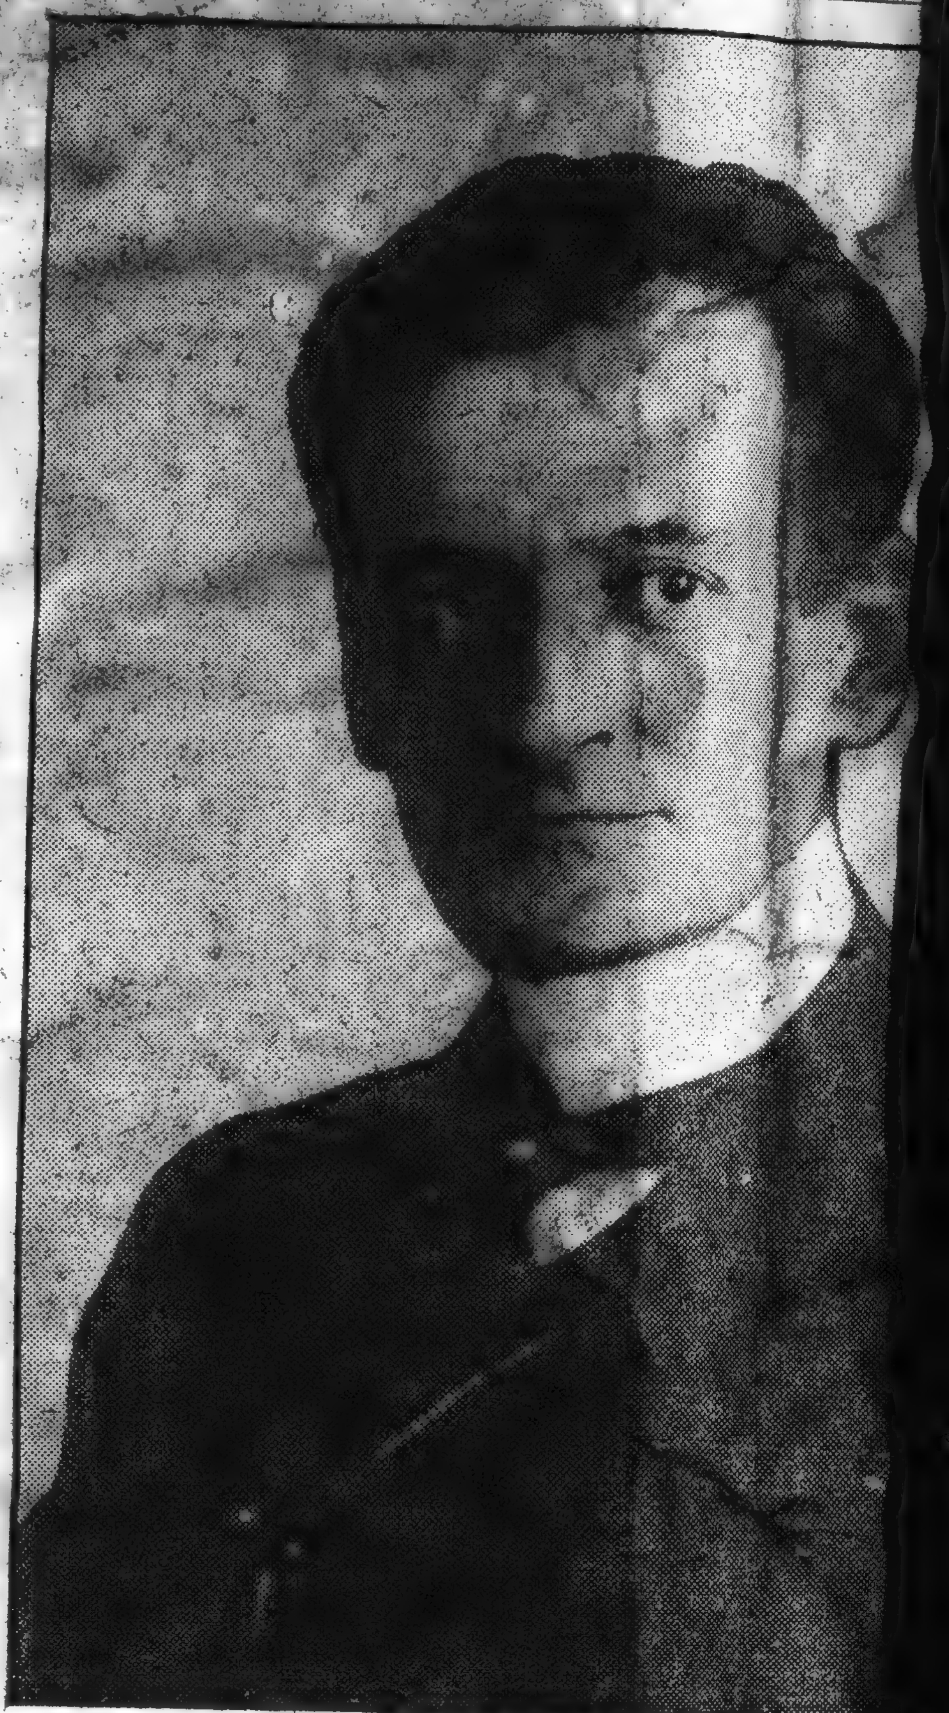
(Photo reproduced by permission of C. A. Ellis)

HAROLD BAUER

He returns to assist Dr. Muck as pianist in orchestra season

Mme. Louise Homer, the contralto, is to sing at the Symphony concerts. Mme. Teresa Carreno, the pianist, has included appearances with the orchestra in her American tour. Other pianists to play are Harold Bauer and Josef Hofmann. Members of the orchestra will appear as soloists from time to time, but arrangements for their part in the schedule are not yet announced.

It is said that Dr. Muck, the Symphony orchestra conductor, has mapped out the general lines of his programs for the year, but, as usual, he keeps them to himself. The expectation in regard to his plans is that the music will be conservatively chosen, and that only those new works which have stood the trial of presentation in Europe will find a place in the repertory. Efforts to lead the way in world recognition of recent compositions are not looked for. The selection of soloists indicates that the conductor will hold to the Gericke tradition of tilling tested soil rather than that he will respond to any Nikisch or Fiedler impulse to break new ground.



(Photo by Garo, Boston)

Dr. Carl Muck, conductor, who names Symphon tion in Symphony hall Oct. 9. His regular concert season will open Oct. 10. The 24 Boston concerts and the tours will employ his time until May 2, 1914.

The auction sales of seats for the Boston concerts ar

phony hall Sept.
and 3, the Friday offered the first tw concert seats the s

Ellis)

MME. ELISABETH VAN ENDERT

Soprano new to America, to have short season with orchestra well relax their demands for technical nicety and let the heavy pieces of the modern school come in for a free statement of their intellectual content. The citizens have so far outlived the possibility of being accounted musically provincial that they may cease to be precisionists. The world will admit that they know something about art, even if they do not stand ready to put the right label on every symphonic theme and to name the tint of every instrumental combination.

It may be a good time in the history of symphonic music in Boston for the listener to begin to ask more of himself and less of his interpreters. In that way he may get more from the music which he purchases at great expense from Europe every winter and he may open his heart eventually to the native American composer.

Dr. Muck will return to Boston about Sept. 29 and he will make his first appearance at the special concert for the American Bankers Association conventhe light of his classic genius on the music of Debussy. The audiences of the Symphony concerts this season might (Copyright

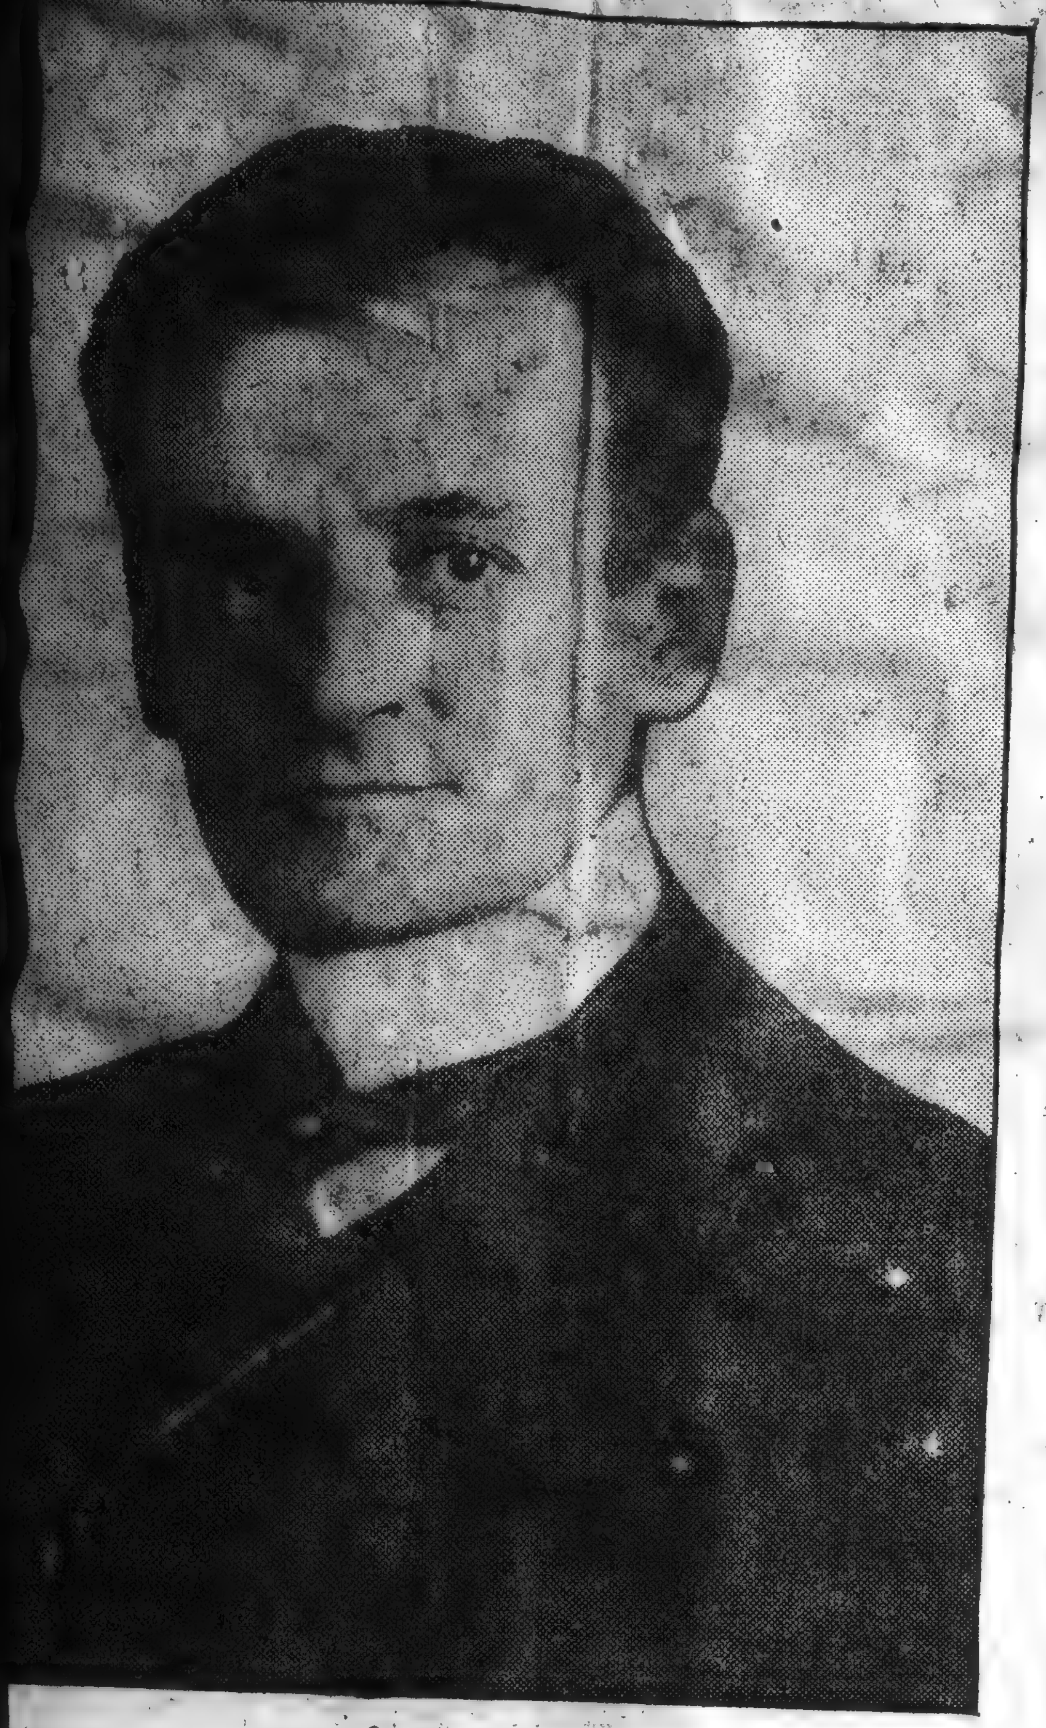
Fl

Violinist to

Will Appear at Symphony Concerts



(Photo by Garo, Boston)

ck, conductor, who names Symphony assisting artists

(Photo reproduced by permission of C. A. Ellis)

CARL FLESCH

Artist new to America, expert in interpreting violin concertos

(Copyright by Aime Dupont, New York)

MME. LOUISE HOMER

Contralto of Metropolitan Opera, who will be Symphony soloist

(Photo reproduced by permission of C. A Ellis)

MME. TERESA CARRENO

Pianist scheduled to appear in Symphon concerts hall Oct. 9. His regu-will open Oct. 10. The ts and the tours will ntil May 2, 1914.

les of seats for the Boston concerts are to be held at Symphony hall Sept. 29 and 30, and Oct. 2 and 3, the Friday rehearsal seats being offered the first two days, the Saturday concert seats the second two days.

Ellis)

ETH VAN ENDERT

America, to have short with orchestra demands for technical ne heavy pieces of the me in for a free state-tellectual content. The far outlived the possi-ccounted musically pro-may cease to be pre-world will admit that hing about art, even if nd ready to put the very symphonic theme tint of every instru-

on.
od time in the history
sic in Boston for the to ask more of himself interpreters. In that more from the music ses at great expense ry winter and he may entually to the native er.
eturn to Boston about will make his first ap-special concert for the rs Association convenclassic genius on the

The audiences of the ts this season might

(Copyright by Aime Dupont, New York)

FRITZ KREISLER

Violinist to tour United States under Boston manager

Forecasting "The Symphonies"

Plans, Policies and Problems for the New Series of Concerts

By H. T. P.

TEN days hence Dr. Muck will be in Boston again, picking up his work for the new year; in two weeks the Symphony Orchestra will come together for its first rehearsal for the season; and in three weeks follows the first pair of concerts in Symphony Hall. By the middle of October conductor and band will be launched upon their seven months of hard and unbroken work. For it the managerial arrangements stand much as they have stood in recent years. In Boston the orchestra will undertake twenty-four pairs of "regular" concerts on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings and two more, presumably on Sunday afternoons, for the profit of its Pension Fund. The Symphony Concerts proper will begin on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 10 and 11, and end on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, May 1 and 2. The five monthly visits from November through March that the orchestra pays to New York and other cities to the southward and its journey for a week at midwinter into the Middle West, will break the series at intervals that make agreeable relaxation in the long succession of concerts. Since Christmas falls this year on Thursday, it will not necessitate any shifting of either afternoon or evening concert, and the concert that falls on Good Friday will be left to its normal place. For years the custom was to shift it to the preceding Thursday, lest an appreciable part of its public should prefer to hear no music outside the churches on Good Friday. A season or two ago, in the dating of the tickets, the management forgot to set the concert back. It fell on Good Friday; the audience was as numerous and well disposed as usual; and then and there the ancient shift was abandoned.

Mme. Boehm van Endert

New Singer at the Symphony Concerts

An Institutional Orchestra

Outside Boston the orchestra wil take its usual eight concerts in Ca its annual series in Providence and ter; and its occasional visits to oth in New England. In November, D
January, February and March, it w its customary journeys southwar week of concerts in New York, B
Philadelphia, Washington and Ba Toward the end of January, again ing annual custom, it will spend a concerts in the Middle West. Fro ber to May the schedule for the n son lists 113 concerts, nearly all established series with assured au Outside Boston as well as within concerts of the orchestra have bec stitutional. The series in Cambri the visits to other cities of New began in the earliest years of its ex
They have continued ever since, in in number as the public for them ened. The concerts in New York ha excelled the concerts of the orchestr dent there in the quality alike of pe ance and of audience. These audien deed have now become as fixed a q as those of the Gerwandhaus conc Leipzig or the Philharmonic conc Vienna. Year after year the subs retake their places, leaving little ro newcomers. In Brooklyn a similar public preëmpts the seats; while the ences in Philadelphia, Baltimore and ington tend more and more to renew selves. The only recourse for thos cannot find places is to suggest mor certs—particularly in New York and lyn—in each of these monthly visits.

Present Problems

More concerts, however, at hon abroad, have become practically impo for conductor, orchestra and manage
The high prestige of the Symphony certs in Boston, in New York, whereve orchestra plays; the institutional char they have gained; the quality and the lo of the public that they attract are al pendent upon the maintenance of pr standards. Conducting is labor of body, nerves and spirit and by no m all of it is done in the concert-room.
are long hours of rehearsals, long spent in the study of scores, long divided among twenty necessary detai which the conductor is responsible.
every concert he ought to be as nearly at his best as is humanely possible; if he is to be so, he must not be overworked or hampered or worried. No conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, however ambitious and energetic, has cared to undertake more than 120 concerts in a season. Dr. Muck, who virtually renounces all things but his work from October to May, is under contract for a few less.

Similarly, if the standards of the orchestra are to be maintained and even heightened, the men must be kept continuously at the top of their form. They must not be fatigued by too much and too frequent travel, staled by too many rehearsals or turned careless by too much routine. The orchestra must be always a finely sensitive and contented instrument upon which the conductor may play. He must, in turn, be as finely and continuously responsive to his the audience must be shrewdly stimulated to constant and eager interest. With all these delicate human agencies the management, finally, must work deftly and wisely and with its account books steadily open before it.

Looking to the Future

So it is that after thirty-three years of existence, the Symphony Orchestra draws closer and closer to the maximum of its working capacity and of its earning power. If it is to maintain its standards and keep to the top of its bent for seven months of the year, it can undertake very few more concerts. Almost everywhere, except at home in Boston, on Saturday evenings, its audiences fill every available seat in the concert hall. It is not the policy of the management to turn prestige into profit by a scale of prices higher than those usually set for concerts of the first rank. With each year the fixed charges of the orchestra tend to increase. The salaries of conductors and players mount; composers and publishers exact higher and higher royalties; "assisting artists" expect larger and larger fees; travelling and incidental expenses do not diminish. Both ends have never met as yet on the annual balance sheet of the orchestra; perhaps, though the deficit lessens, they never will.

Moreover, and strange as it seems, it is here in Boston that the revenues of the orchestra might increase. For many years every seat for the afternoon concerts, outside the open second balcony, has been taken by subscription and at fairly high premiums. For some years, the subscription for the evening conerts has not exhausted the available places. Changes in habits of living and concert-going fashions account sufficiently for the difference in the numbers of the two audiences; while a change in the public of the evening concerts, especially in the less costly seats, indicates the source whence it may gradually recruit itself. An audience that has known the orchestra these many years fills the whole of Symphony Hall on Friday afternoons and a considerable part of it on Saturday evenings. A public that has discovered for itself the pleasures of symphonic music and of such an orchestra, tends more and more to occupy the rest. The coming of Dr. Muck and the play of his abilities and personality over music, band and audience, perceptibly stimulated this public last winter. It bids fair to return gladly and in increasing numbers for the new season. No listeners are more keenly appreciative than these self-taught hearers; none are more to be desired for the future of the orchestra. Even this autumn, they may give the orchestra as numerous audiences for the evening concerts at home as it gathers abroad.

Changes Among the Men

This season—to turn from speculation to ascertainable facts—Dr. Muck has laid only a mildly reorganizing hand upon the various choirs of the orchestra. He has found a new first harp of notable ability to replace the late Mr. Schuecker and joined to him the second harp that the orchestra has needed long and sorely. Mr Strube, departing to teach at Baltimore and Mr. Mullaly, going into retirement, have left the violins and two newcomers will succeed them. The horns and the second violins—in recent years the choirs that fell a little below the standard of the rest—are each to be bettered by two new men; and in the violas there has been a single change. Long since Dr. Muck engaged the new players, but characteristically he has forgotten to send their names forward.

A Matchless Instrument

As yet, too, Dr. Muck has sent from Europe no word about programmes and novel pieces for the new season, and no announcement may be expected from him until he returns to Boston. When he came back to the orchestra a year ago, he sought above all else to make it a matchless instrument. Swiftly, rather than gradually, he restored it to its old beauty and euphony of tone, its old precision and symmetry, its old range of voice from the finest tracery of detail to the largest sweeps of sonority. Under his hand, it regained its old sensitiveness to rhythm and color; its old command of contrast, progression and climax; its old suppleness and variety of voice; and its unique mingling of technical perfections and tonal beauty with poetizing, dramatizing and generally imparting power. Long before the season ended, the orchestra had become nearly the perfect instrument of his ideal. In the final concerts of the spring it surpassed itself. Perhaps Dr. Muck is a little obsessed by his vision of an orchestra that shall play as never orchestra played before; but in actual fact he is surprisingly near the realization of it.

Programmes and Policy

The conductor's purpose and ambition were clear in the ordering of his programmes. He "unified" them, of course, as his theory and practice are; but in a gentler fashion than he used in his first term and to the better satisfaction of a public long pampered and long querulous on the score of programmes. He held the balance fairly even between ancient and modern classics, between pieces once played and then long neglected, and pieces that were wholly new. He returned often to music that he had made known during his first conductorship in Boston. Outside Lendvai's symphony and Mraczek's "Max and Moritz," he made no interesting ex-

over

[6]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

CIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, MASS., SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 1913

Will Appear at Symphony Concerts

(Photo by Garo, Boston)

conductor, who names Symphony assisting artists

l Oct. 9. His regu-l open Oct. 10. The nd the tours will
May 2, 1914.
of seats for the Boston concerts are to be held at Symphony hall Sept. 29 and 30, and Oct. 2 and 3, the Friday rehearsal seats being offered the first two days, the Saturday concert seats the second two days.

(Photo reproduced by permission of C. A. Ellis)

CARL FLESCH

Artist new to America, expert in interpreting violin concertos

(Copyright by Aime Dupont, New York)

MME. LOUISE HOMER

Contralto of Metropolitan Opera, who will be Symphony soloist

(Photo reproduced by permission of C A Ellis)

MME. TERESA CARRENO

Pianist scheduled to appear in Symphon concerts

s)

H VAN ENDERT

erica, to have short orchestra

nands for technical heavy pieces of the in for a free state-ectual content. The outlived the possi-nted musically pro-y cease to be pred will admit that g about art, even if ready to put the y symphonic theme nt of every instrutime in the history in Boston for the sk more of himself erpreters. In that re from the music at great expense winter and he may ually to the native

rn to Boston about make his first ap-cial concert for the Association convenssic genius on the e audiences of the this season might

(Copyright by Aime Dupont, New York)

FRITZ KREISLER

Violinist to tour United States under Boston manager

[6]

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 20,

Forecasting "The Symphonies"

Plans, Policies and Problems for the New Series of Concerts

By H. T. P.

TEN days hence Dr. Muck will be in Boston again, picking up his work for the new year; in two weeks the Symphony Orchestra will come together for its first rehearsal for the season; and in three weeks follows the first pair of concerts in Symphony Hall. By the middle of October conductor and band will be launched upon their seven months of hard and unbroken work. For it the managerial arrangements stand much as they have stood in recent years. In Boston the orchestra will undertake twenty-four pairs of "regular" concerts on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings and two more, presumably on Sunday afternoons, for the profit of its Pension Fund. The Symphony Concerts proper will begin on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 10 and 11, and end on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, May 1 and 2. The five monthly visits from November through March that the orchestra pays to New York and other cities to the southward and its journey for a week at midwinter into the Middle West, will break the series at intervals that make agreeable relaxation in the long succession of concerts. Since Christmas falls this year on Thursday, it will not necessitate any shifting of either afternoon or evening big concert, and the concert that falls on Good Friday will be left to its normal place. For years the custom was to shift it to the preceding Thursday, lest an appreciable part of its public should prefer to hear no music outside the churches on Good Friday. A season or two ago, in the dating of the tickets, the management forgot to set the concert back. It fell on Good Friday; the audience was as numerous and well disposed as usual; and then and there the ancient shift was abandoned.

Mme. Boehm van Endert

New Singer at the Symphony Concerts

An Institutional Orchestra

Outside Boston the orchestra will und take its usual eight concerts in Cambrid its annual series in Providence and Worc ter; and its occasional visits to other cit in New England. In November, Decemb
January, February and March, it will mak its customary journeys southward for week of concerts in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore. Toward the end of January, again following annual custom, it will spend a week in concerts in the Middle West. From October to May the schedule for the new season lists 113 concerts, nearly all in long-established series with assured audiences. Outside Boston as well as within it, the concerts of the orchestra have become institutional. The series in Cambridge and the visits to other cities of New England began in the earliest years of its existence. They have continued ever since, increasing in number as the public for them broadened. The concerts in New York have long excelled the concerts of the orchestras resident there in the quality alike of performance and of audience. These audiences indeed have now become as fixed a quantity as those of the Gerwandhaus concerts in Leipzig or the Philharmonic concerts in Vienna. Year after year the subscribers retake their places, leaving little room for newcomers. In Brooklyn a similar fixed public preëmpts the seats; while the audiences in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington tend more and more to renew themselves. The only recourse for those that cannot find places is to suggest more concerts—particularly in New York and Brooklyn—in each of these monthly visits.

Present Problems

More concerts, however, at home or abroad, have become practically impossible for conductor, orchestra and management. The high prestige of the Symphony Concerts in Boston, in New York, wherever the orchestra plays; the institutional character they have gained; the quality and the loyalty of the public that they attract are all dependent upon the maintenance of present standards. Conducting is labor of mind, body, nerves and spirit and by no means all of it is done in the concert-room. There are long hours of rehearsals, long hours spent in the study of scores, long hours divided among twenty necessary details for which the conductor is responsible. At every concert he ought to be as nearly at his best as is humanely possible; if he is to be so, he must not be overworked or hampered or worried. No conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, however ambitious and energetic, has cared to undertake more than 120 concerts in a season. Dr. Muck, who virtually renounces all things but his work from October to May, is under contract for a few less.

Similarly, if the standards of the orchestra are to be maintained and even heightened, the men must be kept continuously at the top of their form. They must not be fatigued by too much and too frequent travel, staled by too many rehearsals or turned careless by too much routine. The orchestra must be always a finely sensitive and contented instrument upon which the conductor may play. He must, in turn, be as finely and continuously responsive to his music. Even the audience must be shrewdly stimulated to constant and eager interest. With all these delicate human agencies the management, finally, must work deftly and wisely and with its account books steadily open before it.

Looking to the Future

So it is that after thirty-three years of existence, the Symphony Orchestra draws closer and closer to the maximum of its working capacity and of its earning power. If it is to maintain its standards and keep to the top of its bent for seven months of the year, it can undertake very few more concerts. Almost everywhere, except at home in Boston, on Saturday evenings, its audiences fill every available seat in the concert hall. It is not the policy of the management to turn prestige into profit by a scale of prices higher than those usually set for concerts of the first rank. With each year the fixed charges of the orchestra tend to increase. The salaries of conductors and players mount; composers and publishers exact higher and higher royalties; "assisting artists" expect larger and larger fees; travelling and incidental expenses do not diminish. Both ends have never met as yet on the annual balance sheet of the orchestra; perhaps, though the deficit lessens, they never will.

Moreover, and strange as it seems, it is here in Boston that the revenues of the orchestra might increase. For many years every seat for the afternoon concerts, outside the open second balcony, has been taken by subscription and at fairly high premiums. For some years, the subscription for the evening conerts has not exhausted the available places. Changes in habits of living and concert-going fashions account sufficiently for the difference in the numbers of the two audiences; while a change in the public of the evening concerts, especially in the less costly seats, indicates the source whence it may gradually recruit itself. An audience that has known the orchestra these many years fills the whole of Symphony Hall on Friday afternoons and a considerable part of it on Saturday evenings. A public that has discovered for itself the pleasures of symphonic music and of such an orchestra, tends more and more to occupy the rest. The coming of Dr. Muck and the play of his abilities and personality over music, band and audience, perceptibly stimulated this public last winter. It bids fair to return gladly and in increasing numbers for the new season. No listeners are more keenly appreciative than these self-taught hearers; none are more to be desired for the future of the orchestra. Even this autumn, they may give the orchestra as numerous audiences for the evening concerts at home as it gathers abroad.

Changes Among the Men

This season — to turn from speculation to ascertainable facts—Dr. Muck has laid only a mildly reorganizing hand upon the various choirs of the orchestra. He has und a new first harp of notable ability replace the late Mr. Schuecker and ed to him the second harp that the stra has needed long and sorely. Mr e, departing to teach at Baltimore
r. Mullaly, going into retirement, ft the violins and two newcomers eed them. The horns and the second recent years the choirs that below the standard of the rest to be bettered by two new men; violas there has been a single g since Dr. Muck engaged the but characteristically he has end their names forward.

strument

Dr. Muck has sent from Eu-about programmes and novel e new season, and no an-may be expected from him s to Boston. When he came chestra a year ago, he sought to make it a matchless in-wiftly, rather than gradually,
t to its old beauty and eu-e, its old precision and sym-d range of voice from the of detail to the largest sweeps Under his hand, it regained veness to rhythm and color; and of contrast, progression
s old suppleness and variety its unique mingling of techs and tonal beauty with polizing and generally impart-ng before the season ended.
had become nearly the ent of his ideal. In the of the spring it surpassed
Dr. Muck is a little obision of an orchestra that ever orchestra played beual fact he is surprisingly tion of it.

Policy

's purpose and ambition he ordering of his pro-unified" them, of course, d practice are; but in a han he used in his first better satisfaction of a ered and long querulous rogrammes. He held the en between ancient and between pieces once ng neglected, and pieces
new. He returned often ad made known during hip in Boston. Outside y and Mraczek's "Max ade no interesting ex-

---

his the the reme.
the read-lend the then,
in the evotion hat the college pposed than male.
College
lothed en he defeat orable for a n Dr. meless ent on college n and at the fun at destine answers and the an any ndpoint.
uite ane other the fu-and as-ps, that to the et there paradox general forms of et at the football hletes by and Brit-arvellous if not so sy-going, easure of as turned sacrifices have en-

over

cursions into the music of the newest men. His first concern was the orchestra, and he chose music that best suited his purpose with it.

This year Dr. Muck has his perfected instrument ready to his hand and he can exercise it in what music he will. He is not likely to neglect the classics, ancient or modern, since his own predilection for them is strong and he appreciates justly the similar predilection in a large part of his hearers. They and he and all of us stir to the reänimating and newly revealing performance that he often accomplishes with them. He is as certain to revive more than one piece that he believes long overlooked or unjustly neglected. Dr. Muck has his convictions and loyalties with such music and he would persuade others to share them. The point of doubt, the interesting and exciting point of doubt, is the degree to which he will admit to his programmes the music of the newest and the boldest composers. More and more, it is gaining its place in concerts elsewhere. One by one the schedules for the new season come from London, from Paris, from the German cities, from Chicago and New York close at hand, and oftener and oftener the names of Scriabin, Schönberg, Stravinsky, Delius and the second generation of the innovating Parisians stand upon them.

The Right to "Novelties"

Dr. Muck is frank in his personal dislike of much of this music and in his disbelief in its theory and practice. It may be that Scriabin, Schönberg and the rest may offend our ears and sensibilities as as much as they offend his. Hearing, we may agree with him that they write an incomprehensible music. The more, then, should he give us opportunity to note and judge for ourselves. An appreciable part of the public of the Symphony Concerts in both Boston and New York has its musical curiosities. By report and even actual hearing it knows the disputed quality of these new men. It has the right to expect more information and further experience of them from the Symphony Orchestra since it, beyond any other band in America, is capable of these exacting and baffling pieces. The long-standing glory of the Symphony Concerts has been the open-mindedness of the conductors and the catholicity of the programmes. It would be a pity to subordinate such a distinction to even a transcendental perfection of performance. To open the door to the ultra-moderns is not to crowd the classics out of their mansions. The curious about the new as well as the contented with the old have their rights and privileges through forty-eight concerts.

The Share of the Soloists

Moreover, in the forty-eight concerts to come there should be more room than ever to satisfy these various and reasonable desires, since the "assisting artists" are to have a smaller share in them than in many a previous season. Two sound considerations have counselled this course. The standards of the Symphony Concerts forbid the engagement of undistinguished singers, pianists and violinists. Whenever those standards have been relaxed, under "pressure" of one sort and another, and a mediocre or an immature "assisting artist" has appeared, there has been no mistaking the difference between his or her quality and the quality of the orchestra itself. With a distinguished orchestra should go distinguished "soloists," if a public that is quick to discriminate is to be interested and content. By mutual agreement of conductor, management and audiences, the Symphony Concerts are not a training ground for the unripe or a testing-place for the obscure. The fact of residence and connections in Boston does not necessarily make a "soloist" either interesting or important. All concerned in the Symphony Concerts have outgrown this local standard. Furthermore, under keen and continuing interest in Dr. Muck as man and conductor, under the new perfections of the orchestra and under waxing pleasure in symphonic music for its own sake, the public of the concerts grows more and more content to hear conductor and band unassisted.

The Returning Illustrious

Accordingly only nine "assisting artists" have been engaged thus far for the new season and all of them are of an acknowledged rank that entitles them to a place in the Symphony Concerts. All but two indeed are singers, pianists or violinists, so high placed and so generally known that their names speak for themselves. For the first time in three seasons, Miss Farrar will sing with the orchestra. After as long an absence, Mme. Homer, now as ripened in concerts as she is on the stage of the Metropolitan, will reappear. For the pianists, Mr. Paderewski will return in the large maturity of his powers; Mr. Hofmann will come again to reap the reward of belated Bostonian discovery of his great abilities; Mr. Bauer will unfold once more the graver beauties of whatever music he chooses; and for the last times in all probability, Mme. Carreño in her sixties, yet with undiminished command of herself, her instrument and her music, will play at the Symphony Concerts. Of the violinists—only two outside Mr. Witek and Mr. Noack of the orchestra itself—Mr. Kreisler needs no heralding. He played Beethoven's concerto in the concerts of last season and he played it as not within living memory has it been played in Boston.

Two Newcomers

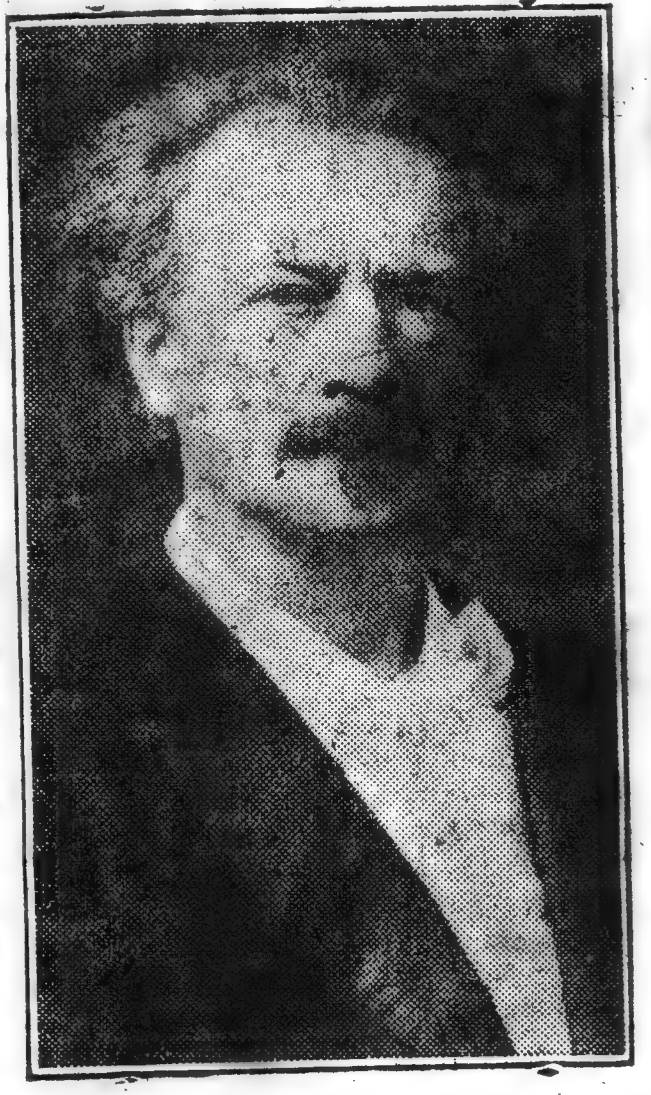
Of the two newcomers one is a singer, Mme. Böhm van Endert, and one is a violinist, Carl Flesch; while both have won their high reputations chiefly in Germany. Mme. van Endert, in whom comeliness and personal charm unite with beauty of voice and skill in song, is a soprano, who made her beginnings at the Court Opera in Dresden and passed thence to the Royal Opera and the new German Opera in Berlin. Now she comes to America under engagement to the Symphony Orchestra to sing in ten of its concerts in Boston, New York and elsewhere. Her voice is a light and warm soprano still in its first freshness. She has the musical intelligence—or rather divination—as well as the vocal artistry that make her expert even in the music of Mozart. In Germany or in America there are few such singers for such music. Mr. Flesch, in turn, is a violinist of the sound and sober German school that still walks in the ways of Joachim and that would mingle exposition, emotion, and technical excellence in exactly the just measure that shall most disclose the music. Not so many years ago, he was almost asked to become the concert-master of the Symphony Orchestra. Now he comes to it as virtuoso and "soloist."

RECORD.

SEPTEMBER 20.

The 33d season of the Symphony Orchestra will open with a public rehearsal Friday, Oct. 10, and will continue as usual for 30 weeks, in which 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts will be given on successive Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, except the six weeks the Orchestra will be away on tour.

The annual auction sale of seats will be held, according to the usual custom, in Symphony Hall the week preceding the opening of the season: The $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 29, and the $10 seats on Tuesday, Sept. 30. The $18 seats for the concerts vill be sold on Thursday. Oct. 2, and the 10 seats on Friday.



PADEREWSKI,
he most popular living pianist, to play at the Symphony.

The season of 1913-14 will be unusually ich in the number of visiting artists of rst rank. The management now announce the names of nine soloists who will appear in addition to such artists from the Orchestra who may from time to time assist. These include four pianists, two violinists, and three singers. The pianists are Teresa Carreno, Harold Bauer, Josef Hofmann, and last, but not least, Paderewski. The violinists are Fritz Kreisler and Carl Flesch. The singers are Geraldine Farrar, Elizabeth van Endert of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and Louise Homer.

TERESA CARENO,
The greatest living woman pianist, who returns to Boston.

Mme. van Endert is a stranger. She is the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and comes to America by special arrangement for a limited number of appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mme. van Endert is, in a sense, the successor of Miss Farrar in the Berlin Opera and most of Miss Farrar's parts have fallen to her.

SUNDAY GLOBE—SEPTEMBER 21, 1913.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

IGNACE PADEREWSKI
Unity photo.
GERALDINE FARRAR.
TERESA CARRENO
CARL FLESCH
ELISABETH VAN ENDERT.

Famous Artists Who Will Be Heard as Soloists With the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Symphony Orchestra Soloists.

The annual Fall announcement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a harbinger of another musical season. These concerts begin before all others each October, and when, at latest with the first week of May, there have finished, the pianists, singers, fiddlers and conductors are already turning their faces toward the dollars of a new year.

Dr Muck was expected to sail from Bremen yesterday. As yet he has issued no word as to his programs or novelties. So something still remains to write about before the first concert Friday afternoon, Oct 10.

Mr Ellis now has the names of his soloists ready for anouncement and should take pride in setting forth such a list. There are three singers, four pianists and two violinists. Of these two will appear for the first time in Boston, both of them upon a first visit ~~to this country~~—Elizabeth van Endert, the lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and Carl Flesch, the violinist, who enjoys the reputation in Europe of a sterling artist.

The singers are Miss Farrar, Mme Homer and Mme van Endert; the pianists Mr Paderewski, Mme Carreno, Josef Hofmann and Harold Bauer, and the violinists, Fritz Kreisler and Carl Flesch.

It will be a pleasure to hear Miss Farrar again, doubly so since her appearances in Boston for some time bid fair to be limited to those in concert. It is three years since Miss Farrar has sung in Boston with the orchestra. She arrived from Europe last week with an array of clothes which kept a company of notables waiting down the column in next morning's papers until they could be described. Miss Farrar appeared in good spirits and is here early to begin a concert tour to the Pacific Coast for Mr Ellis. This season holds unusual promise to Miss Farrar, for she will open the season at the Metopolitan Opera House as Carmen, a part she will take for the first time in her life.

Mme van Endert comes to America by special arrangement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a series of concerts in various cities with that organization. Before she returns to Europe she also will fill a few concert engagements in the West. Her stay in America will be limited to a few weeks.

The new soprano is a pupil of Richard Mueller of Dresden and made her debut as a singer in a series of concerts in the Rhine cities in 1906. She made so deep an impression that she was engaged by Count Seebach, intendant of the Dresden Opera, for a term of five years to sing the principal lyric parts in that institution. After she had been there three years Count von Huelsen, intendant of the Royal Opera, Berlin, secured her release from Dresden and gave her a five-year contract in Berlin.

To her fell the honor of creating the principal part, that of Octavian, in Strauss' opera "Der Rosenkavalier." She is said to have a voice of beautiful quality and has been successful in the parts which fall to singers of her class, such as Nedda, Mimi, Micaela, the Countess in "The Marriage of Figaro," Marguerite in "Faust," Eva in "Die Meistersinger," Pamina in "The Magic Flute."

Mme Homer needs no extolling word. The golden beauty of her voice has mellowed through these years of her prime and her singing is to be welcomed.

Four Great Pianists.

This list of four pianists may well make the concert-goer pause and consider how even two more of equal rank could be mustered to add to it. It is four years since Paderewski was last heard in Boston. In 1908-9 he came to America for a short time, principally to hear the performance of his symphony by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and incidentally appeared as soloist with the orchestra and gave a recital. This year he will be in America the entire season, arriving early in October and departing in April. His tour, like that of Kreisler, is under the direction of Mr Ellis.

Paderewski is now at the hight of his mature powers. In November he will be 53 years old, although one seeing him would take him to be at least 10 years less. His figure is as youthful as it was when America first knew him 20 odd years ago. His spirits are as high and as buoyant as ever and his art has still the lyric charm that hypnotized the public of America, which is quite as wonderful in its way.

Teresa Carreno is one of the most remarkable figures in contemporary music. This extraordinary woman this Winter will celebrate her 60th birthday. It is 38 years since she first began to play the piano in America. A beautiful woman still, with the fire of youth undimmed, the perfection of technique unharmed, she still plays with a torrential temperament which at times takes an audience off its feet. It is several years since she has played with the orchestra in Boston and a warm welcome will surely await her.

Next to Paderewski, if the patronage of public can be taken as a standard, Hofmann is the most popular pianist of today, in Europe as well as America. Harold Bauer is in all respects a notable member of an illustrious company of artists.

Flesch, New Violinist.

Carl Flesch, the new violinist, comes not as a youthful aspirant, but with the long and fixed approval of European audiences. He was born Oct 9, 1873, at Moson, Hungary. Although beginning the study of the violin at 6, he did not receive good instruction until the age of 9. The next year his parents, appreciative of music, but not themselves musicians, sent him to the High School in Vienna. Within three years he became a pupil of Prof Gruen in the Conservatory. Here he was graduated when he was 15.

He went then to Paris and became a pupil of Sauzay and shortly thereafter of the great Marsik, to whose school Flesch may be said to belong. In 1894 he won the first prize at the Paris Conservatoire and immediately afterward began to give concerts.

His debut, which took place in Vienna, was followed by three very successful concerts in Berlin. The following five years Flesch spent in Roumania as professor in the Royal Conservatory of Bucharest and as leader of the Queen's string quartet. Another tour of concerts through Germany was followed by a stay of several years in Amsterdam as professor at the Conservatory in the city.

in Amsterdam, following example of Rubinstein, that he ceived the idea of playing a serie programs covering the entire litera for the violin. This task, which carried out in five concerts with success, immediately placed Flesc the front rank of his profession. approval of press and public, le Joachim himself, quickly brought into international prominence. S then he has been considered by m as standing among the three or greatest living violinists.

Mr Kreisler, whose noble art needs no exploitation, will return to America next month for a long concert tour under the direction of Mr Ellis. His appearance in Boston last year, both at his own concert in Symphony Hall and with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were among the most notable events of a very remarkable season of music. His performances of the Beethoven Concerto in the Symphony concerts are justly memorable.

The coming season of the orchestra will be its 33d. Mr Higginson's aim now as it was 32 years ago is manifestly the best organization, an assured foundation, a company of virtuosi and one of the few eminent conductors of the world can make it.

There will be a few changes in the personnel, the most notable of which is the engagement of Alfred Holy of Vienna as harpist to succeed the late Heinrich Schuecker.

There will be 24 pairs of concerts, beginning Oct 10 and 11 and ending May 1 and 2. The orchestra will be away on its usual six trips during the weeks of Nov 3, Dec 1, Jan 5, Jan 26, Feb 16 and March 16.

••SW(R)

moderate total if one

THE BOSTON JOURNAL—SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 1913.

GALAXY OF COMING SYMPHONY CONCERT STARS

MME. LOUISE HOMER

GERALDINE FARRAR

ELIZABETH VAN ENDERT

PADEREWSKI.

FRITZ KREISLER

Brilliant Soloists Announced for the 33d Symphony Year

THE thirty-third season of the Symphony Orchestra will open Friday afternoon, Oct. 10. Twenty-four pairs of concerts will be given on successive Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings except the six weeks the orchestra will be away on tour.

The annual auction sale of seats will be held in Symphony Hall the week preceding the opening of the season. The $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 29, and the $10 seats on Tuesday, Sept. 30. The $18 seats for the concerts will be sold on Thursday, Oct. 2, and the $10 seats on Friday. All the sales will begin at 10 o'clock.

When Dr. Muck reaches Boston he will undoubtedly have an interesting announcement to make regarding his program plans. He is due to arrive in Boston late this month. Rehearsals will begin on Monday morning, Oct. 6.

In choosing the soloists for the season Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, has followed the plan which has worked out with much success in past years. In the earlier years of the orchestra it was the custom to have a soloist at every concert, and naturally these soloists necessarily include many of mediocre ability; but as the orchestra advanced it became the feeling of its patrons that unless the soloist has really unusual gifts a concert without a soloist was more enjoyable. As a matter of fact, the orchestra has reached such a point of virtuosity and perfection of performance that only the greatest artists can stand comparison with it.

The season of 1913-14 will be unusually rich in the number of visiting artists of first rank and the choice of the number desired has not been easy. The management, however, now announces the names of nine soloists who will appear, in addition to soloists from the orchestra who may assist from time to time. The principal soloists include four pianists, two violinists and three singers. The pianists are Teresa Carreno, Harold Bauer, Josef Hofmann and last, but not least, Paderewski. The violinists are Fritz Kreisler and Carl Flesch. The singers are Geraldine Farrar and Louise Homer of the Metropolitan Opera House, and Elizabeth van Endert of the Royal Opera, Berlin.

It is three years since Miss Farrar last sang here with the orchestra, and two years since she last appeared in concert. She will make her appearance here before the opening of the opera season in New York.

Mme. Louise Homer is another great favorite in Boston.

Mme. van Endert is the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and comes to America by special arrangement for a limited number of appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mme. van Endert is, in a sense, the successor of Miss Farrar in the Berlin Opera. She is youthful, having been singing for only seven years. This will be her first visit to the United States.

The most important feature of the coming musical season, generally speaking, is the return of Paderewski. His last appearances here were in the season of 1908-9. He is at present, by all accounts, at the very height of his power.

The other pianists are only less distinguished than Paderewski. They are all greatly admired in Boston.

Nor does Fritz Kreisler need any introduction to the Boston public. He is one of the great violinists of the day.

Carl Flesch is coming to America for the first time, but a most enviable reputation has preceded him. He is a Hungarian, now a resident of Berlin. For the last four or five years he has been a notable figure in Europe. He has a big reputation as an interpreter of the classic concertos, and in Berlin he is regarded as being nearer Joachim than any other living violinist.

Karl Flesch, distinguished Hungarian violinist. At left—World-famous pianist, Ignace Paderewski.

Boston Post Sunday Sept 21, 1913

Greatest Soloists of the World for Symphony Orchestra This Season

Geraldine Farrar Leads List of Noted Opera Singers on the Program

SOME OF THE FAMOUS SOLOISTS WHO WILL APPEAR WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA DURING THE SEASON

ELIZABETH VAN ENDERT ROYAL OPERA BERLIN.

GERALDINE FARRAR- SOLOIST- BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TERESA CARRENO

©1913 BY E F SMALL

MME LOUISE HOMER.

Paderewski, Teresa Carreno and Fritz Kreisler Among the Instrumentalists.

The greatest soloists in the world will appear in Boston this Winter with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This almost goes without saying, for appearance with the Boston Symphony has come to be the highest honor that a singer or instrumentalist can gain in this country.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces today its list of soloists for the thirty-third season. Geraldin Farrar heads the list. Miss Farrar only appears in Boston with the orchestra. She is too valuable to the Metropolitan Opera to be spared during the regular opera season.

Madame Louise Homer, the famous contralto of the Metropolitan, is also to be heard this season. The third singer, Madame Van Endert, is a stranger. She comes to America by special arrangement, and for a few appearances only, from the Royal Opera of Berlin. She has succeeded to most of Miss Farrar's role at the Berlin Opera, and is still young, having only been singing for seven years. She is a pupil of Mueller of Dresden.

Paderewski returns to America this season and appears with the Symphony Orchestra, not only in Boston, but in other cities. Both Paderewski and Farrar will give concert tours under the direction of Manager Ellis of the Symphony.

Famous Pianists.

The other pianists to be heard are hardly less distinguished. There is that remarkable woman, Teresa Carreno, and Harold Bauer and Joseph Hofmann.

Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, is world famous, but Carl Flesch, who also plays the violin, is a newcomer. He is a Hungarian and is said to be wonderful.

The thirty-third season of the orchestra will open with a public rehearsal Friday afternoon, October 10, and will continue as usual for thirty weeks in which twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts will be given on successive Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, except the six weeks the orchestra will be away on tour, the weeks of November 3, December 1, January 5 and 26, February 16, and March 16.

auction sale of seats will be held according to the usual custom, in Symphony Hall the week preceding the opening of the season. The $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, September 29, beginning at 10 o'clock, and the $10 seats on Tuesday, September 30, at the same hour. The $18 seats for the concerts will be sold on Thursday, October 2, beginning at 10 o'clock, and the $10 seats on Friday at the same hour.

The prospectus of the Symphony Orchestra which is now out, holds out much promise for an enjoyable Winter.

Dr. Muck Returning.

The soloists are of the highest grade, and when Dr. Muck reaches Boston he will undoubtedly have an interesting announcement to make regarding his plans for programs and novelties. Dr. Muck sailed from Bremen yesterday by the North Garman Lloyd steamship, George Washington, and is due to arrive in Boston about the 29th. The rehearsals will begin on Monday morning, October 6.

In choosing the soloists for the season Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, has followed the plan which has worked out with much success in past years. In earlier years of the orchestra it was the custom to have a soloist at every concert and naturally these soloists necessarily included many of mediocre ability, but as the orchestra progressed it became the feeling of its patrons that unless the soloists have really unusual quality a concert without a soloist was more enjoyable. As a matter fact, the orchestra has reached such a point of virtuosity and perfection of performance that only the greatest artists can stand comparison with it.

SUNDAY POST,

SEPTEMBER 21,

The list of soloists who will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Carl Muck conductor, during the coming musical season, is one of the most notable and interesting which has been appointed by the Boston Symphony management in years. For their artistic attainments and their striking personalities, these men and women engaged stand pre-eminent today. Not one of them is of less than the highest rank among the great musicians of the period; nor has any one of them failed to impress himself as a man or herself as a woman, as well as a musician, upon society.

The list includes Ignace Paderewski, Josef Hoffmann, Teresa Carreno and Harold Bauer, for pianists; for singers, Geraldine Farrar, Louise Homer and Elizabeth van Endert, a newcomer to America; for violinists, Fritz Kreisler and Carl Flesch, the latter also a European artist of international reputation, now about to tour America for the first time.

The most famous of living pianists, whose name will go down in musical history in the same traditional category with the names of Liszt, Rubinstein and a very few other chosen ones, comes to America after an extended exploration of such far countries as Africa and South America.

Having long since succeeded in Europe and America, even in Germany, where he encountered much prejudice at the beginning of his career, Paderewski has gone farthest south and given recitals in places that are not associated by the well-bred Bostonian with anything like Symphony concerts or the urbane entertainments of the Kneisel quartet.

Paderewski's Achievements

What has Mr. Paderewski not done, in his field? He has played and conquered over most of the surface of the civilized world; he has composed, what not?—a gigantic symphony in honor of his country, Poland; an opera, "Manru" (both of which "premieres" drew the attention of the world); he has, in late years, written some strange piano music, which may yet survive him longer than the memory of his picturesque and magnetic personality.

It is said that Paderewski is now in excellent physical condition, which has not been the case in his recent tours of this country, and that he is looking forward with real zest to a concert tour of the country that made his reputation, a tour that has often tired and maddened him until he wished Paderewski, Kreisler and Farrar are here for special tours under the management of Charles A. Ellis. Geraldine Farrar is today quite another artist than the sprig of a girl who made her operatic debut as Marguerite at the Boston Theatre in 1907. Then she was a promising young singer who was as a general rule more strictly criticised by her countrymen than might have been the case if she had been an artist of other nationality.

Miss Farrar was quick to make known her resentment of much of this criticism, which she felt should have been administered in a more encouraging manner; but fortunately she did not stop at resentment. She worked.

She was also, doubtless, aware of the value of publicity, and of her value to the press. As the result of native energy, studiousness and knowledge of the world, she is today one of the most valuable members of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Were the ambitions of the Metropolitan management less elevated than is the case, they could reckon for many nights on big receipts by simply parading before the public Enrico Caruso and Geraldine Farrar.

But Miss Farrar has become, in very truth, an artist entitled to the most sincere respect of musicians who know what her present attainments represent.

The Youngest Artist

There will be considerable interest in the youngest of the singers who are to appear with the Boston Orchestra, and one who is in some respects Miss Farrar's successor at Berlin. This is Elizabeth van Endert, now soprano of the Berlin Opera, where Miss Farrar made her start on the lyric stage. She takes today many of the roles that were Miss Farrar's in Germany.

Miss van Endert has risen very rapidly to the front of late years. She is a lyric soprano and comes to America by special arrangement for a limited number of appearances with the Boston Symphony. She was a pupil of Mueller in Dresden as late as 1906.

She made her debut, not in opera, but as a concert singer. Then she sang for three years at the Dresden Opera, and has since been a member of the Royal Opera at Berlin, where Dr. Muck conducted for so many years.

When Miss van Endert appears in Boston it will not be the first or the second time that she has appeared under Dr. Muck's baton.

No individual of this group of artists, however, is more eagerly awaited by the musical public which keeps informed of European performances than Carl Flesch. A Hungarian by birth, Flesch is now about 40 years old, at the height of a career which seems to have included in its rewards most of the good things that the gods can give to men.

Flesch has not known any extreme poverty or other adverse conditions that so often confront music students. He is now, in fact, a very wealthy man. Yet none of these things seem to have in any way detracted from his sincerity or earnestness in study; while it is no doubt partly on account of his opportunities for a broader education than falls to the lot of the average musician that he is one of the most cultured musicians of the day in Europe.

His library alone, it is said, stamps him as one of marked attainments in many intellectual fields. He not only plays but teaches very industriously. He moves in circles that include the most representative individuals of Berlin society.

Carl Flesch has had wide experience not only as a soloist but what in many respects means more to the musician—in the performance of chamber music and also as a matter of course in orchestral playing.

As a violinist his technic is described as of extraordinary sureness and brilliancy—a technic so perfected in fact that however difficult the work, technic is apparently forgotten by the performer as well as the listener; a tone that is exceptionally warm and vital and full of color; a style which combines the virtues of two schools. That is, as a musician who knows him well remarks, "His left hand is Viennese and his bow Parisian."

In other words, the grace, the clarity and good taste of the French school is Flesch's, and also the qualities, especially in his left hand, of the monumental technic which has received its latest development at the hands of such men as Sevcik, the teacher of Jan Kubelik and others.

Flesch was taken by his father when he was 12 years old to play to Hellmesberger at Vienna. Up to that time he had received his instruction from a village teacher. He studied at the Vienna Conservatory with Professor Grun and at 16 years graduated from that institution with a first prize. He then went to the Paris Conservatoire, where he was the pupil first of Sauzay and then of Marsick. In 1894 he graduated from the Conservatoire with another prize.

For a few seasons he was a member of the Lamoureux Orchestra in Paris. He went to Berlin later on and immediately made a furor by his appearances there. He was appointed court violinist to Queen Carmen Sylva of Roumania and there formed a quartet.

He became a professor at the Amsterdam Conservatory, where a quartet was formed that included Sylvain Noack, now the second concert-meister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as its second violin. Flesch remained at the Amsterdam Conservatory until 1903. Since then he has been living and industriously teaching and concert-touring about Europe.

A small man of dark complexion, very near-sighted and peering keenly through his glasses, he is one of the most familar and respected figures in Berlin's musical circles. His pupils are many; his friends are found among men who have distinguished themselves, in many cases, in directions quite divergent from music.

Kreisler's Magnetism

Of the other great violinist to play with the Boston orchestra this winter it is hardly necessary to speak at length. As it has been said of families, "the best relations are those of which one never speaks." This is now the case with Fritz Kreisler. The charm of his playing, the personal magnetism of the man, are vows recognized by concert audiences everywhere. Of late years Kreisler, in addition to his invariably musical manner of playing, has broadened and deepened as an artist, and to this his performance of the Beethoven violin concerto last season with the Boston Symphony gave memorable witness.

Teresa Carreno, who has not been in America for several years, is now 60 years of age, and yet preserves that remarkable fire, breadth and authority in performance that make her, a woman pianist, more than an equal, even as regards these characteristics, of most of the male pianists of the day.

Carreno has seen the passing of more than one generation of great players. She was born in Venezuela, in 1853, and she studied under Gottschalk, and afterwards under Georges Mathias, one of the few great pupils of Frederick Chopin, in Paris. She has composed ambitiously. There are extraordinary stories—and they are true—of her saving the day by herself stepping into the conductor's chair and conducting operatic performances at a time in her younger years when she was manageress of such a troupe.

Carreno's Husbands

The story of her husbands and of her quarrels with them, and the new romances that followed such partings, would be in itself a book. Sauret and d'Albert—great artists—were in turn her husbands. Her union with the pianist, Eugene d'Albert, her third union—she was his third wife, is singularly convincing evidence for the contention that two artists cannot comfortably live together. But all the incidents of Carreno's impetuous life and her most romantic career seem to have only contributed toward the enriching and maturing of her art. Today, at 60 years of age, Mme. Carreno is one of the most inspiring and exceptionally equipped of the pianists now before the public.

Harold Bauer is quite another kind of player. Poetic, powerfully intellectual, a master of the hundred subtleties that are at the command of the modern pianist, of an intellectual imagination, if the term may be used, he is rarely catholic in his tastes and versatile in his style. He received his first real recognition in this country in Boston.

Last, but not least, Josef Hoffmann, since his early performance of Beethoven's C major concerto with this same Boston Symphony Orchestra, as a wonder child in his 10th year, has since then maintained his rank as an artist, and increased his reputation the world over. He is personally popular, not only for his art, but for his manliness, and his lack of assumption, and the good fellowship that makes him equally welcome at a club or in a studio.

To Raise Solo Standards

There are fewer and greater soloists engaged for the coming season, probably, than has been the case in any previous season of the Boston Symphony. This is a result of the ideals of the management and of the special efforts of the orchestra's present leader, Dr. Muck, to sustain them. For it is the wish of the Boston Symphony management to raise the standards of the solo performances year by year, if such a thing is possible, even as the orchestra is continually striving toward a greater perfection.

Moreover, however well selected, the aria or concerto on an orchestral programme is likely to be incongruous with or inadequate to the other music on the programme, however carefully arranged that programme may be. Moreover, those who appreciate good orchestral music at its full value know well that the presence of a soloist is usually a distraction from greater issues rather than an ornament to the occasion. This although the soloist, in the case of the public to which orchestral music is practically a new thing, may usually be relied upon to attract many individuals by reason of the appeal of his personality who would not otherwise attend the concert.

There is, after all, no soloist in the world who can match his instrument against the incomparable eloquence of the greatest of all instruments, the modern orchestra, and among modern orchestras it is not necessary at this time to describe the rank held by the Boston Symphony.

It is probable that next season the list will be at least as select and not necessarily more numerous than the present group, and it is to be expected that this course will be followed in the future with no less strictness and care in the fulfillment of the ideals which have had to do with the founding of the finest musical organization in America.

THE SYMPHONY SEASON

The Symphony season will open with a public rehearsal and concert Friday afternoon, Oct. 10, Saturday evening, Oct. 11, respectively. It will end on Saturday evening, May 2. The usual number of 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts will be given on the successive Fridays and Saturdays, with the exception of the six weeks the orchestra is away on tour—the weeks of Nov. 3, Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Jan. 26, Feb. 16 and March 16.

The only auction sales of seats will come, as usual, the week preceding the opening of the season. The $18 and $10 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold in Symphony Hall, beginning at 10 o'clock on Monday, Sept. 29, and Tuesday, Sept. 30, respectively, while the concert seats will be sold on Oct. 2 and 3, the $18 seats on Thursday and the $10 seats on Friday.

Paderewski leaves his home in Morges, Switzerland, the end of this week to spend a short time in Paris before sailing for this country. Accompanied by Mme. Paderewski and Mr. L. G. Sharp, his English representative, Mr. Paderewski will sail from Cherbourg Wednesday, Oct. 1, by the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse and is due to arrive in New York the following Tuesday. So far as the greater part of this country is concerned it will be his first tour in five years, for he was here only a few weeks in the season of 1908-9, having come here chiefly to hear the performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the symphony which he had just finished. Mr. Paderewski's plans call for between 80 and 90 concerts and he will be in America until the latter part of April. His season begins in Trenton, N. J., Oct. 13, to be followed by a concert in Jersey City on the 14th. His first appearance in New York will be in Aeolian Hall Saturday afternoon, Oct. 18, under the auspices of the Aeolian Company. Then he will make a short trip westward, playing in Detroit, Ann Arbor, Toronto, Erie and Buffalo. Returning to the East he will give a series of recitals in the principal cities, and on Jan. 1 he leaves for the West and the Pacific coast, where he will be for approximately two months. All reports have it that Mr. Paderewski has not been in so good health for years and is more than eager to begin the arduous labor of a long American tour.

Fritz Kreisler, accompanied by his wife, will sail from Bremen Oct. 7 by the Kaiser Wilhelm II., arriving in New York a week later. His first concert will be given in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Thursday evening, Oct. 16, and on the following Sunday afternoon he gives a recital in Orchestra Hall, Chicago. His first engagement with an orchestra is the following week in Philadelphia with the Philadelphia Orchestra. During the coming winter Mr. Kreisler will play in every symphony orchestra in the country, and this will include a series of a dozen appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. After playing in the East, Mr. Kreisler in the late winter will go to the Pacific coast, where he will play in all the principal cities, and on his way there and back will play in all the principal cities west of the Mississippi. He will be in America until the late spring.

Geraldine Farrar, who is making this fall her first appearance on the Pacific coast, left New York yesterday (Saturday) to begin her tour. The party consisted of Miss Farrar, her mother, Mrs. Sydney Farrar, Mr. Alwin

LOUISE HOMER. (Photo copyright by E. F. Small.)
Above at left—FRITZ KREISLER.
(Photo copyright by Aime Dupont.)

TERESA CARRENO.

GERALDINE FARRAR.

ELIZABETH VAN ENDERT
of the Royal Opera, Berlin

it is no doubt partly on account of his opportunities for a broader education than falls to the lot of the average musician that he is one of the most cultured musicians of the day in Europe.

His library alone, it is said, stamps him as one of marked attainments in many intellectual fields. He not only plays but teaches very industriously. He moves in circles that include the most representative individuals of Berlin society.

Carl Flesch has had wide experience not only as a soloist but what in many respects means more to the musician—in the performance of chamber music and also as a matter of course in orchestral playing.

As a violinist his technic is described as of extraordinary sureness and brilliancy—a technic so perfected in fact that however difficult the work, technic is apparently forgotten by the performer as well as the listener; a tone that is exceptionally warm and vital and full of color; a style which combines the virtues of two schools. That is, as a musician who knows him well remarks, "His left hand is Viennese and his bow Parisian."

In other words, the grace, the clarity and good taste of the French school is Flesch's, and also the qualities, especially in his left hand, of the monumental technic which has received its latest development at the hands of such men as Sevcik, the teacher of Jan Kubelik and others.

Flesch was taken by his father when he was 12 years old to play to Hellmesberger at Vienna. Up to that time he had received his instruction from a village teacher. He studied at the Vienna Conservatory with Professor Grun and at 16 years graduated from that institution with a first prize. He then went to the Paris Conservatoire, where he was the pupil first of Sauzay and then of Marsick. In 1894 he graduated from the Conservatoire with another prize.

For a few seasons he was a member of the Lamoureux Orchestra in Paris. He went to Berlin later on and immediately made a furor by his appearances there. He was appointed court violinist to Queen Carmen Sylva of Roumania and there formed a quartet.

He became a professor at the Amsterdam Conservatory, where a quartet was formed that included Sylvain Noack, now the second concert-meister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as its second violin. Flesch remained at the Amsterdam Conservatory until 1903. Since then he has been living and industriously teaching and concert-touring about Europe.

A small man of dark complexion, very near-sighted and peering keenly through his glasses, he is one of the most familar and respected figures in Berlin's musical circles. His pupils are many; his friends are found among men who have distinguished themselves, in many cases, in directions quite divergent from music.

Kreisler's Magnetism

Of the other great violinist to play with the Boston orchestra this winter it is hardly necessary to speak at length. As it has been said of families, "the best relations are those of which one never speaks." This is now the case with Fritz Kreisler. The charm of his playing, the personal magnetism of the man, are vows recognized by concert audiences everywhere. Of late years Kreisler, in addition to his invariably musical manner of playing, has broadened and deepened as an artist, and to this his performance of the Beethoven violin concerto last season with the Boston Symphony gave memorable witness.

Teresa Carreno, who has not been in America for several years, is now 60 years of age, and yet preserves that remarkable fire, breadth and authority in performance that make her, a woman pianist, more than an equal, even as regards these characteristics, of most of the male pianists of the day.

Carreno has seen the passing of more than one generation of great players. She was born in Venezuela, in 1853, and she studied under Gottschalk, and afterwards under Georges Mathias, one of the few great pupils of Frederick Chopin, in Paris. She has composed ambitiously. There are extraordinary stories—and they are true—of her saving the day by herself stepping into the conductor's chair and conducting operatic performances at a time in her younger years when she was manageress of such a troupe.

Carreno's Husbands

The story of her husbands and of her quarrels with them, and the new romances that followed such partings, would be in itself a book. Sauret and d'Albert—great artists—were in turn her husbands. Her union with the pianist, Eugene d'Albert, her third union—she was his third wife, is singularly convincing evidence for the contention that two artists cannot comfortably live together. But all the incidents of Carreno's impetuous life and her most romantic career seem to have only contributed toward the enriching and maturing of her art. Today, at 60 years of age, Mme. Carreno is one of the most inspiring and exceptionally equipped of the pianists now before the public.

Harold Bauer is quite another kind of player. Poetic, powerfully intellectual, a master of the hundred subtleties that are at the command of the modern pianist, of an intellectual imagination, if the term may be used, he is rarely catholic in his tastes and versatile in his style. He received his first real recognition in this country in Boston.

Last, but not least, Josef Hoffmann, since his early performance of Beethoven's C major concerto with this same Boston Symphony Orchestra as a wonder child in his 10th year, has since then maintained his rank as an artist, and increased his reputation the world over. He is personally popular, not only for his art, but for his manliness, and his lack of assumption, and the good fellowship that makes him equally welcome at a club or in a studio.

To Raise Solo Standards

There are fewer and greater soloists engaged for the coming season, probably, than has been the case in any previous season of the Boston Symphony. This is a result of the ideals of the management and of the special efforts of the orchestra's present leader, Dr. Muck, to sustain them. For it is the wish of the Boston Symphony management to raise the standards of the solo performances year by year, if such a thing is possible, even as the orchestra is continually striving toward a greater perfection.

Moreover, however well selected, the aria or concerto on an orchestral programme is likely to be incongruous with or inadequate to the other music on the programme, however carefully arranged that programme may be. Moreover, those who appreciate good orchestral music at its full value know well that the presence of a soloist is usually a distraction from greater issues rather than an ornament to the occasion. This although the soloist, in the case of the public to which orchestral music is practically a new thing, may usually be relied upon to attract many individuals by reason of the appeal of his personality who would not otherwise attend the concert.

There is, after all, no soloist in the world who can match his instrument against the incomparable eloquence of the greatest of all instruments, the modern orchestra, and among modern orchestras it is not necessary at this time to describe the rank held by the Boston Symphony.

It is probable that next season the list will be at least as select and not necessarily more numerous than the present group, and it is to be expected that this course will be followed in the future with no less strictness and care in the fulfillment of the ideals which have had to do with the founding of the finest musical organization in America.

THE SYMPHONY SEASON

The Symphony season will open with a public rehearsal and concert Friday afternoon, Oct. 10, Saturday evening, Oct. 11, respectively. It will end on Saturday evening, May 2. The usual number of 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts will be given on the successive Fridays and Saturdays, with the exception of the six weeks the orchestra is away on tour—the weeks of Nov. 3, Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Jan. 26, Feb. 16 and March 16.

The only auction sales of seats will come, as usual, the week preceding the opening of the season. The $18 and $10 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold in Symphony Hall, beginning at 10 o'clock on Monday, Sept. 29, and Tuesday, Sept. 30, respectively, while the concert seats will be sold on Oct. 2 and 3, the $18 seats on Thursday and the $10 seats on Friday.

Paderewski leaves his home in Morges, Switzerland, the end of this week to spend a short time in Paris before sailing for this country. Accompanied by Mme. Paderewski and Mr. L. G. Sharp, his English representative, Mr. Paderewski will sail from Cherbourg Wednesday, Oct. 1, by the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse and is due to arrive in New York the following Tuesday. So far as the greater part of this country is concerned it will be his first tour in five years, for he was here only a few weeks in the season of 1908-9, having come here chiefly to hear the performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the symphony which he had just finished. Mr. Paderewski's plans call for between 80 and 90 concerts and he will be in America until the latter part of April. His season begins in Trenton, N. J., Oct. 13, to be followed by a concert in Jersey City on the 14th. His first appearance in New York will be in Aeolian Hall Saturday afternoon, Oct. 18, under the auspices of the Aeolian Company. Then he will make a short trip westward, playing in Detroit, Ann Arbor, Toronto, Erie and Buffalo. Returning to the East he will give a series of recitals in the principal cities, and on Jan. 1 he leaves for the West and the Pacific coast, where he will be for approximately two months. All reports have it that Mr. Paderewski has not been in so good health for years and is more than eager to begin the arduous labor of a long American tour.

Fritz Kreisler, accompanied by his wife, will sail from Bremen Oct. 7 by the Kaiser Wilhelm II., arriving in New York a week later. His first concert will be given in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Thursday evening, Oct. 16, and on the following Sunday afternoon he gives a recital in Orchestra Hall, Chicago. His first engagement with an orchestra is the following week in Philadelphia with the Philadelphia Orchestra. During the coming winter Mr. Kreisler will play in every symphony orchestra in the country, and this will include a series of a dozen appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. After playing in the East, Mr. Kreisler in the late winter will go to the Pacific coast, where he will play in all the principal cities, and on his way there and back will play in all the principal cities west of the Mississippi. He will be in America until the late spring.

Geraldine Farrar, who is making this fall her first appearance on the Pacific coast, left New York yesterday (Saturday) to begin her tour. The party consisted of Miss Farrar, her mother, Mrs. Sydney Farrar, Mr. Alwin [illegible]

LOUISE HOMER. (Photo copyright by E. F. Small.)
Above at left—FRITZ KREISLER.
(Photo copyright by Aime Dupont.)

TERESA CARRENO.

GERALDINE FARRAR.

ELIZABETH VAN ENDERT
of the Royal Opera, Berlin.

SUNDAY HERALD, BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 21, 1913.

Harold Bauer.

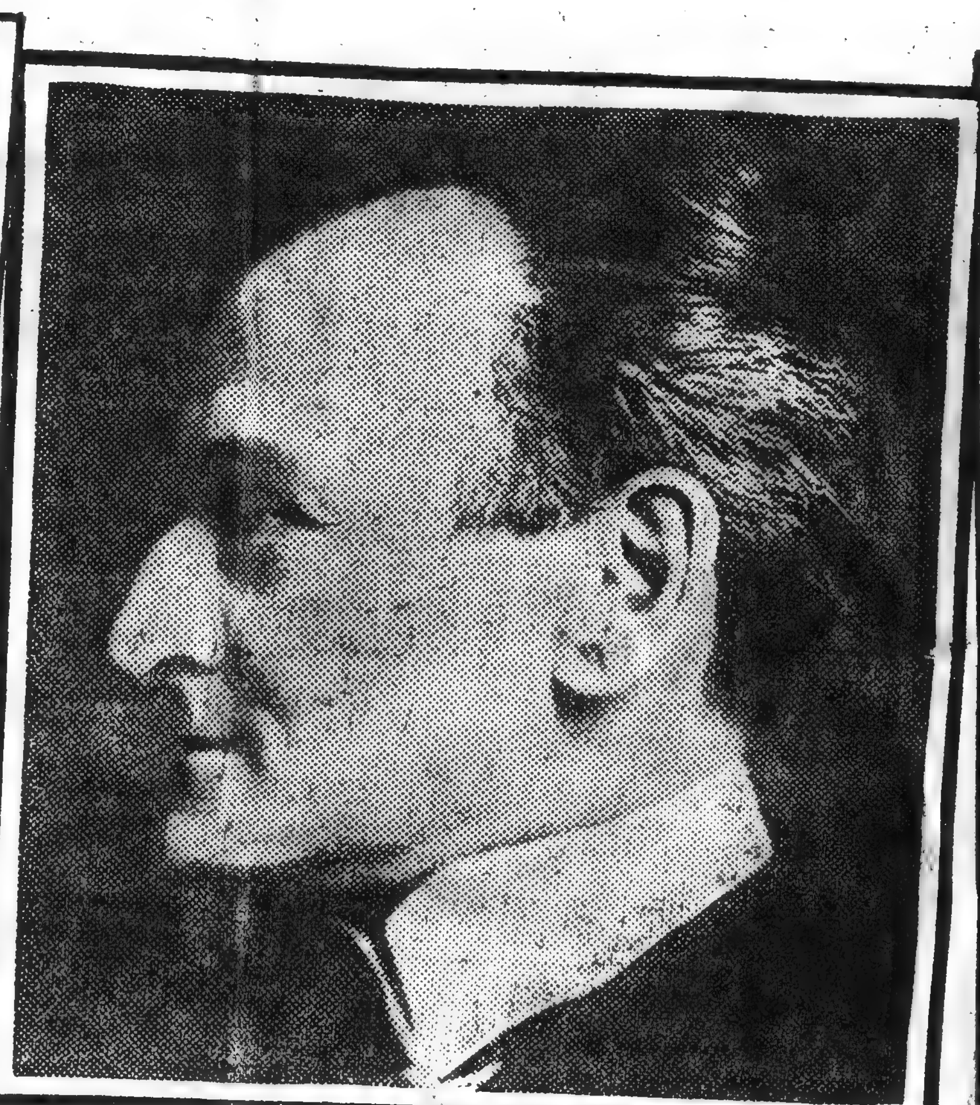
Mme. Louise Homer.

Geraldine Farrar.

Elizabeth

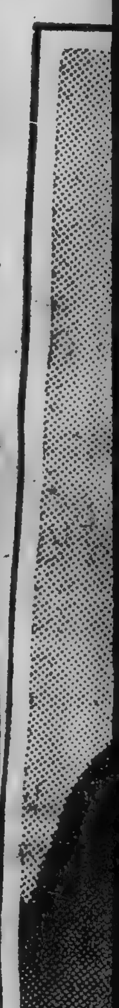
Fritz Keisler.

Josef Hofmann.



Dr. Karl Muck.

Teressa Carreno.



The auction sale of seats for the public rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra 1913-1914 will open on Monday morning, Sept. 29. Mr. Charles A. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, publishes today the announcement of the soloists and details concerning the auction sale.

Dr. Muck sailed from Bremen by the steamship George Washington yesterday afternoon. He will arrive here with Mrs. Muck a week from tomorrow. For the greater part of the summer he was at his country home at Dobelbad, near Graz, Austria, but the last 10 days were spent in Berlin, where he made preparations for the season. He has engaged several new members, including two first violinists, to take the places of Messrs. Mullaly and Strube, who have retired; two second violinists, a viola and two horns. As announced last spring, he has engaged Alfred Holy, harpist, of Vienna, to take the place of the late Heinrich Schuecker. He has sent over no hint regarding his programs, but an announcement will probably be made directly after his arrival.

Symphony Season 1913-1914

We now quote from the official announcement:

"The character of the musical season is, to a certain extent, established by the invasion of foreign virtuosos. One year there will be a dearth of artists of the highest rank. Another year will be marked by the absence of pianists and an embarrassment of violinists, while the next year an American manager may hardly be able to care for all the pianists that come, and wonder where he can get good violinists.

"Two years ago there were comparatively few artists of the first rank in America. Last season was a year of violinists. The coming season will be rich in pianists.

"For the past several years it has been the rule of Mr. Ellis in engaging artists for the Symphony concerts in Boston to have only a few assisting soloists, those of the highest rank. There is no question about the wishes of the patrons of the concerts; they much prefer to hear the orchestra alone than to have the program disturbed by some mediocre person. For the coming winter, aside from artists in the orchestra who may appear as soloists, Mr. Ellis announces nine names, an illustrious list: three singers, four pianists, two violinists.

The Visiting Soloists

The singers will be Miss Geraldine Farrar, Mme. Elizabeth van Endert and Mme. Louis Homer. Miss Farrar has not been heard here for some time. She has been occupied with her operatic work in New York, but this year, before the opening of the opera season at the Metropolitan, she is making a tour of the West under the management of Mr. Ellis, and she will sing here with the orchestra in mid-November. Mme. van Endert's first appearance in America will be with the orchestra in Boston. She is young and the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin. Highly recommended by foreign authorities, she will be brought in mid-winter for concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, Cambridge, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington.

Later she will sing several times in the middle West. Mme. van Endert is a pupil of Richard Mueller of Dresden. She made her debut as a singer at Cologne in 1906, and in concert. The next year she was engaged at the Dresden Opera for five years, and there she took such parts as Nedda, Mimi, Micaela the Countess in "The Marriage of Figaro," Marguerite, Eva, and Pamina. Count von Huelsen of the Royal Opera, Berlin, secured her release and in 1910 she became a member of the Berlin Opera Company. She distinguished herself in the Berlin production of Strauss's "Rosencavalier."

Mme. Homer, looked upon by many as a Bostonian because she studied here and sang in church, is known to all and always welcomed by many.

The pianists will be Mme. Teresa Carreno, Harold Bauer, Josef Hofmann. Ignace Paderewski. Mme. Carreno will be 60 years old on the 22d of next December and she has been playing in public since she was a little girl, an infant phenomenon, yet is her enthusiasm unabated, her fire unquenched. Last season she again excited wonder throughout Europe by her polished mechanism, technical dexterity, imposing interpretation. Mr. Bauer was applauded and appreciated in Boston long before other cities in this country recognized his peculiar merits, and here he has today, as everywhere, a large band of admirers. He has developed, ripened in his art, so that he may now fairly be reckoned among the leading pianists of the world. Mr. Hofmann, idolized here when he was a wonderful child, was greeted rather coolly in Boston when he returned after his studies with Rubinstein and with a European reputation. Nor was this the fault of the public, for the complaint that the pianist lacked warmth and seemed chiefly occupied with matters of the law and not the spirit, was not then hypercritical. When Mr. Hofmann last appeared here his performance justly excited enthusiasm at the Symphony concerts and in recital. Mr. Paderewski was last heard here in 1908-09, when his symphony was performed under Mr. Fiedler's direction. He then played in a Symphony concert, and gave a recital. Since then he has made tours in South Africa and South America. Early next month he is returning to America for a season, under the direction of Mr. Ellis. Mr. Paderewski will be 53 years old in November. From all accounts the charm of his playing has not lessened and the heroic side of his performance is said to be greater than ever.

The violinists will be Fritz Kreisler and Carl Flesch. Mr. Kreisler, like Mr. Paderewski, returns to America next month for a long tour under the direction of Mr. Ellis The popularity of this truly great artist has never been greater than it is today. Music lovers remember the huge audiences that listened to him at his concerts in Symphony Hall a year ago, and also remember the profound pleasure caused by his performance of Beethoven's Concerto with the orchestra. He will play with the orchestra in November. Mr. Flesch, a newcomer, is a Hungarian who for several years has been a prominent figure in the musical world of the continent. He comes to America for the first time preceded by an enviable reputation as an interpreter of the classics.

Symphony Auction Sales

The season will begin with a public rehearsal Friday afternoon, Oct. 10, and a concert Saturday evening, Oct. 11. With the exception of the six weeks, the orchestra is away on tour, the rehearsal and concert will be given every week until May 2.

The auction sales will begin a week from tomorrow, Monday, Sept. 29. On that day at 10 o'clock the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold and the sale of the $10 seats will be on the following day. The concert seats will be sold on Thursday, Oct. 2, and Friday, Oct. 3.

The $18 seats will be sold on Thursday and the $10 seats on Friday.

There is every reason to believe from the interest already snown taht the season in Boston will be one of the most successful the orchestra has ever had.

11

ADVERTISER,

SEPTEMBER 20.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The 33d season of the Symphony Orchestra will open with a public rehearsal Friday, Oct. 10, and will continue as usual for 30 weeks, in which 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts will be given on successive Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, except the six weeks the Orchestra will be away on tour.

The annual auction sale of seats will be held, according to the usual custom, in Symphony Hall the week preceding the opening of the season. The $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 29, and the $10 seats on Tuesday, Sept. 30. The $18 seats for the concerts will be sold on Thursday, Oct. 2, and the $10 seats on Friday.

The season of 1913-14 will be unusually rich in the number of visiting artists of first rank. The management now announce the names of nine soloists who will appear in addition to such artists from the Orchestra who may from time to time assist. These include four pianists, two violinists, and three singers. The pianists are Teresa Carreno, Harold Bauer, Josef Hofmann, and last, but not least, Paderewski. The violinists are Fritz Kreisler and Carl Flesch. The singers are Geraldine Farrar, Elizabeth van Endert of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and Louise Homer.

Mme. van Endert is a stranger. She is the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and comes to America by special arrangement for a limited number of appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mme. van Endert is, in a sense, the successor of Miss Farrar in the Berlin Opera and most of Miss Farrar's parts have fallen to her.

TRAVELER HE

SEPTEMBER

Berlin Soprano Symphon

---

every concert and naturally these soloists moderate total such a strange appearance that king-agents offered him the conven-

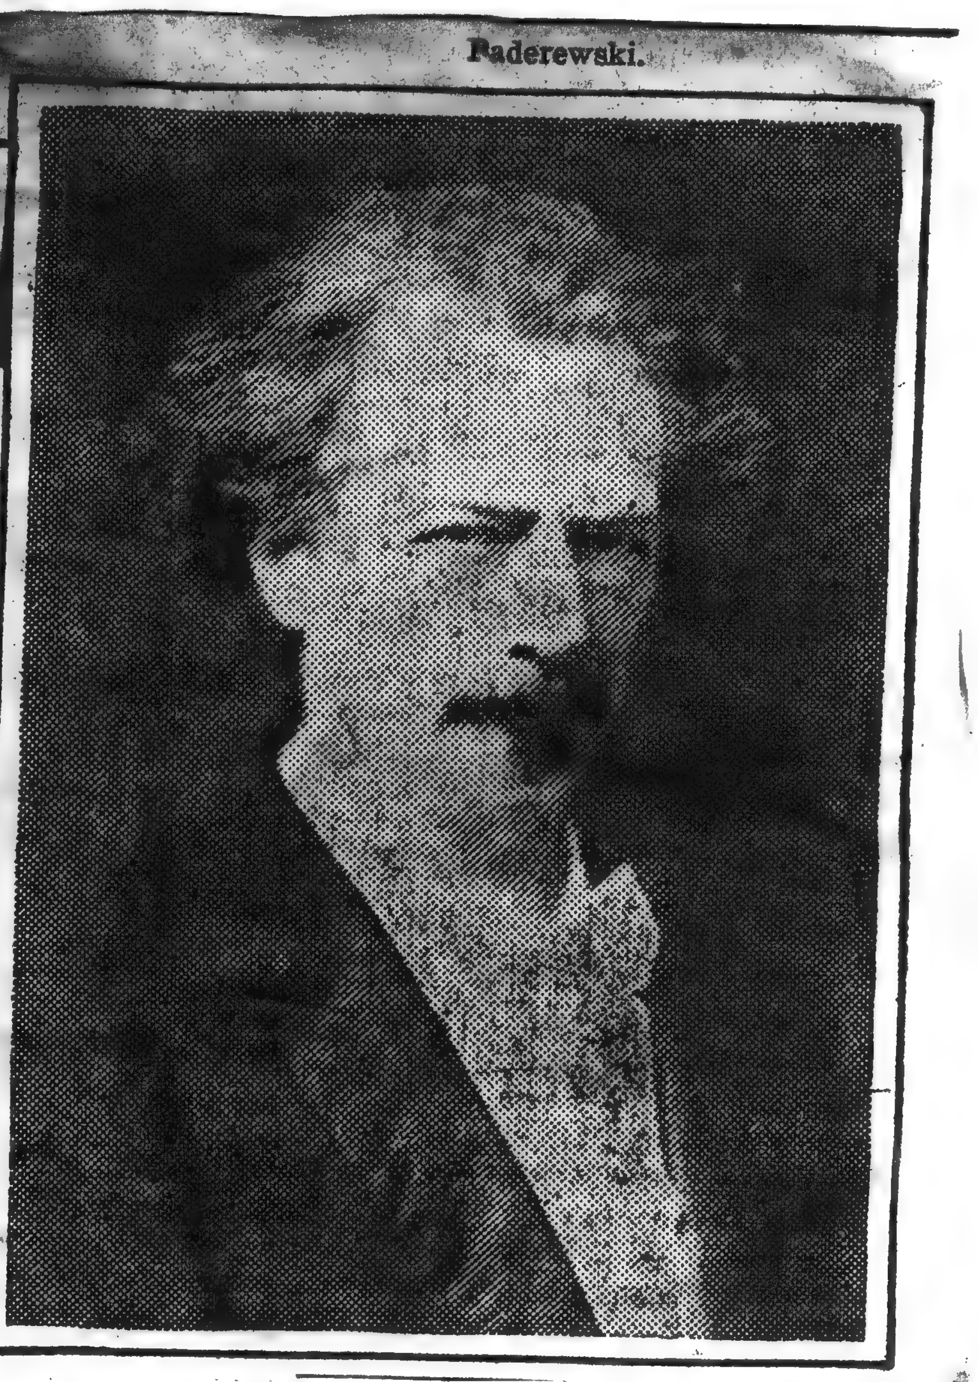
SEPTEMBER 21. 1913.

aldine Farrar.

Elizabeth Van Endert.

Paderewski.



Muck.

Teresa Carreno.

Carl Flesch.

ADVERTISER,

SEPTEMBER 20.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The 33d season of the Symphony Orchestra will open with a public rehearsal Friday, Oct. 10, and will continue as usual for 30 weeks, in which 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts will be given on successive Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, except the six weeks the Orchestra will be away on tour.

The annual auction sale of seats will be held, according to the usual custom, in Symphony Hall the week preceding the opening of the season. The $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 29, and the $10 seats on Tuesday, Sept. 30. The $18 seats for the concerts will be sold on Thursday, Oct. 2, and the $10 seats on Friday.

The season of 1913-14 will be unusually rich in the number of visiting artists of first rank. The management now announce the names of nine soloists who will appear in addition to such artists from the Orchestra who may from time to time assist. These include four pianists, two violinists, and three singers. The pianists are Teresa Carreno, Harold Bauer, Josef Hofmann, and last, but not least, Paderewski. The violinists are Fritz Kreisler and Carl Flesch. The singers are Geraldine Farrar, Elizabeth van Endert of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and Louise Homer.

Mme. van Endert is a stranger. She is the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and comes to America by special arrangement for a limited number of appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mme. van Endert is, in a sense, the successor of Miss Farrar in the Berlin Opera and most of Miss Farrar's parts have fallen to her.

TRAVELER HERALD

SEPTEMBER 20,

Berlin Soprano Who Will Be Symphony Orchestra Soloist

GLOBE-

SEPTEMBER 23,

New Form of Symphony Tickets.

The management of the Symphony Orchestra has made a radical innovation in the form of season tickets for the coming Winter. Practically since the beginning of the orchestra the ticket has been a card with the dates of the various rehearsals or concerts to be punched by the doorkeeper as the ticket is used up.

More or less annoyance has been caused by this style of ticket, and to obviate these disadvantages the tickets for this year are in the form of a book, so perforated that each ticket can be easily detached. These are necessarily much bulkier than the old form, but it is believed that this fact will be more than offset by the convenience of having a separate ticket for each concert.

PROMISING SEASON FOR SYMPHONY

Exceptionally Strong List of Soloists Engaged—Dr. Muck Sails for America.

Dr. Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed today from Bremen for the United States and is expected in Boston about the 29th. In accordance with custom no detailed announcement is made of programs and novelties. The exceptional list of soloists announced, however, give promise of a brilliant season.

The singers will be Geraldine Farrar, Eilsabeth Van Endert and Louise Homer. It is three years since Miss Farrar last sang here with the orchestra and two years since she last appeared in concert. Mme. Louise Homer's coming will be awaited with special interest, as she is today one of the finest of opera singers and has a large Boston following.

The third singer, Mme. Van Endert, is a stranger. She is the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin. Mme. Van Endert is, in a sense, the successor of Miss Farrar in the Berlin Opera. She is youthful, having been singing for only seven years.

Paderewski heads the pianists. His last appearances here were in the season of 1908-9, when he came to America for a few weeks, principally to hear the performance of his symphony by our orchestra.

The other pianists are that remarkable woman, Teresa Carreno, who at the age of 60 has preserved that torrential temperament that has made her unique among pianists of our time, Harold Bauer and Josef Hofmann.

Fritz Kreisler, the eminent violinist, will be heard; also Carl Flesch, held in Berlin as a second Joachim.

The season will open with a public rehearsal and concert Friday afternoon, Oct. 10, Saturday evening, Oct. 11, respectively. The usual number of 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts will be given on the successive Fridays and Saturdays, with the exception of the six weeks the orchestra is on tour—the weeks of Nov. 3, Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Jan. 26, Feb. 16 and March 16.

The auction sales of seats will come, as usual, the week preceding the opening of the season. Tha $18 and $10 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold in Symphony Hall, beginning at 10 o'clock, on Monday, Sept. 29, and Tuesday, Sept. 30, respectively, while the concert seats will be sold on Oct. 2 and 3; the $18 seats on Thursday and the $10 seats on Friday.

JOURNAL—TUESDA

SEPTEMBER 23,

NEW TICKETS FOR SYMPHONY SEASON

The management of the Symphony Orchestra has made a radical innovation in the form of season tickets which the patrons of the concerts will use the coming winter. Practically since the beginning of the orchestra the ticket has been a small card, with the dates of the various rehearsals or concerts printed around the edges, to be punched by the doorkeeper as the ticket was used up. While the old tickets were convenient on account of their size, there has always been greater or less annoyance caused by the ease with which they were lost. Moreover it was awkward when the subscriber wanted to give the ticket away for a concert.

To obviate these disadvantages the tickets for this year are in the form of a book, one ticket for each rehearsal or concert, so perforated that each ticket can be easily detached. The experiment will be made this year, and if it pleases the patrons this form of ticket will become permanent.

POST, TUESDAY, S

EPTEMBER 23,

TICKET BOOKS FOR CONCERTS

Symphony Orchestra Management Makes Change

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has made a radical innovation in the form of season tickets which the patrons of the concerts will use the coming winter. Practically since the beginning of the orchestra the ticket has been a small, hard card, with the dates of the various rehearsals or concerts printed around the edges to be punched by the doorkeeper as the ticket is used up. This form of ticket has become almost tradition, but in the last few years many requests have been made that a coupon ticket be substituted for it. While the old tickets were very convenient on account of their size, there has always been greater or less annoyance caused by the ease with which they were lost. Moreover, it is at times very awkward when one would like to give the ticket away for a concert.

To obviate these disadvantages the tickets for this year are in the form of a book, one ticket for each rehearsal or concert, so perforated that each ticket can be easily detached. These are necessarily much bulkier than the old form, but it is believed that this fact will be more than offset by the convenience of having a separate ticket for each concert. At any rate, the experiment will be made this year, and if it pleases the patrons, this form of ticket will become permanent.

HERALD. TUESDAY.

SEPTEMBER 23.

SYMPHONY TICKETS

The management of the Symphony orchestra has made a radical innovation in the form of season tickets for the coming winter. The ticket has bee a small, hard card with the dates of th various rehearsals or concerts printe around the edges. There has been a noyance on account of the ease wi which these tickets were lost. The tic ets for this year are in the form of book, one ticket for each rehearsal concert, so perforated that each tick can be easily detached.

From SUN

Address: New York

Date SEP 2 1 1913

Estab

The Boston Symphony Orchestra have this season the usual number changes in its personnel, due chie[illegible] the retirement on pension of the older members. The most important change is that of the first harpist. Last spring Heinrich Schuecker, who was for so many years the harpist of the orchestra, died suddenly and his place has been taken by Alfred Holy of Vienna. There will be two new first violinists in place of Gustav Strube, who has become instructor in the Peabody Institute, Baltimore, and John Mullaly, an almost original member of the orchestra, who has retired. There will be two important changes in the horns, as Dr. Muck has engaged for the first quartet a new first horn and a new third horn. Dr. Muck sailed yesterday from Bremen on the North German Lloyd steamship George Washington and is due to arrive in New York the 28th. He will go direct to Boston and will make the formal announcement of his plans for the season.

Paderewski leaves his home in Morges, Switzerland, the end of this week to spend a short time in Paris before sailing for this country. Accompanied by Mme. Paderewski and L. G. hSarp, his English representative, Mr. Paderewski will sail from Cherbourg. Wednesday, October 1, by the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, and is due to arrive in New York the following Tuesday. The great pianist returns after an absence of four years to make an all season's tour of this country under the direction of C. A. Ellis of Boston. So far as the greater part of the country is concerned, it will be his first tour in five years, for he was here only a few weeks in the season of 1908-09, having come here chiefly to hear the performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the symphony which he had just finished. Mr. Paderewski's plans call for between eighty and ninety concerts and he will be in America until the latter part of April. His season begins in Trenton, N. J., October 13, to be followed by a concert in Jersey City on the 14th. His first appearance in New York will be in Æolian Hall, Saturday afternoon, October 18, under the auspices of the Æolian Company. Then he will make a short trip westward, playing in Detroit, Ann Arbor, Toronto, Erie and Buffalo. Returning to the East he will give a series of recitals in the principal cities and on January 1 he leaves for the West and the Pacific coast, where he will be for approximately two months. All reports have it that Mr. Paderewski has not been in so good health for years and is more than eager to begin the arduous labor of a long American tour.

Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, comes to America this fall for a season's tour of this country under the management of C. A. Ellis of Boston. Mr. Kreisler, accompanied by his wife, will sail from Bremen on October 7 by the Kaiser Wilhelm II., arriving in New York a week later. His first concert will be given in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, on Thursday evening, October 16, and on the following Sunday afternoon he gives a recital in Orchestra Hall, Chicago. His first engagement with an orchestra is the following week in Philadelphia with the Philadelphia Orchestra. During the coming winter Mr. Kreisler will play in every symphony orchestra in the country, and this will include a series of a dozen appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. After playing in the East Mr. Kreisler, in the late winter, will go to the Pacific coast, where he will play in all the principal cities and on his way there and back will play in all the principal cities west of the Mississippi. He will be in America until late spring.

From TIMES

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

SEP 20 1913

Date

Est

84

The musical season of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences will open on the 18th of October, when Fritz Kreisler will give his first recital after his arrival from Europe. The season will be an unusually rich one. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give five concerts in the opera house on Friday evenings.

The New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conductor, will give five Saturday matinee concerts for young people and, like the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be supported by distinguished solo artists.

From TRIBUNE

Address: New York City.

Date SEP 2 1 1913

Estab

4

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will have this season the usual number of changes in its personnel, due chiefly to the retirement on pension of the older members. The most important change is that of the first harpist. Last spring Heinrich Schuecker, who was for so many years the harpist of the orchestra, died suddenly and his place has been taken by Alfred Holy, of Vienna. There will be two new first violinists in place of Gustav Strube, who has become instructor in the Peabody Institute, Baltimore, and John Mullaly, an almost original member of the orchestra, who has retired. There will be two important changes in the horns, as Dr. Muck has engaged for the first quartet a new first horn and a new third horn.

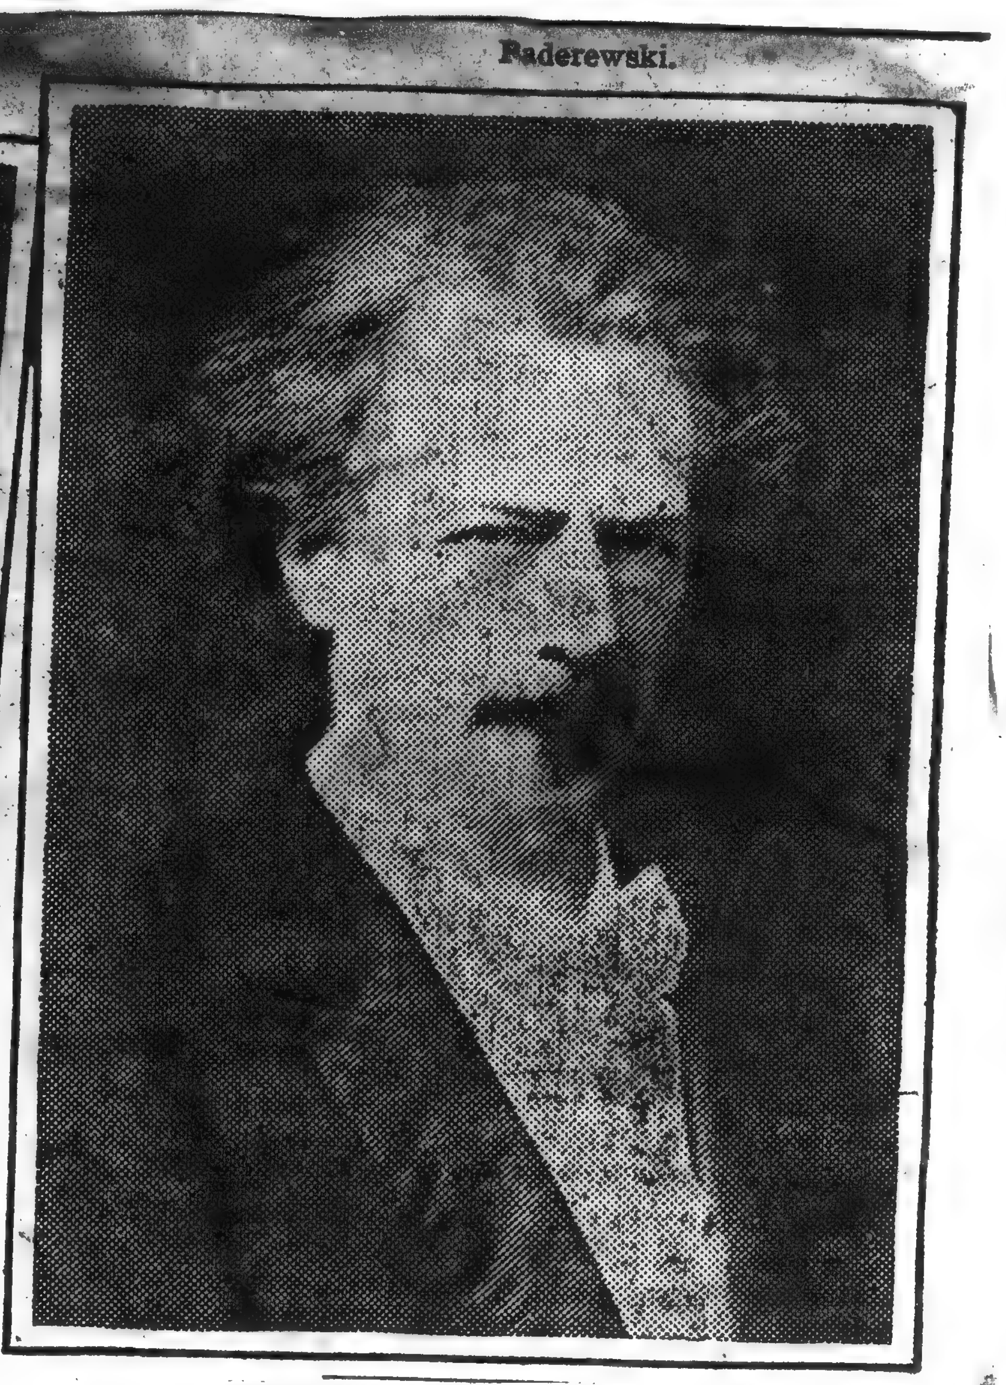
Dr. Muck sailed yesterday from Bremen on the North German Lloyd steamship George Washington, and is due to arrive in New York on September 28. He will go direct to Boston and will make the formal announcement of his plans for the season.

[12]

SEPTEMBER 21. 1913.

raldine Farrar.

Elizabet Van Endert.



Paderewski.

Muck.

Teresa Carreno.

Carl Flesch.

ADVERTISER.

SEPTEMBER 20.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The 33d season of the Symphony Orchestra will open with a public rehearsal Friday, Oct. 10, and will continue as usual for 30 weeks, in which 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts will be given on successive Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, except the six weeks the Orchestra will be away on tour.

The annual auction sale of seats will be held, according to the usual custom, in Symphony Hall the week preceding the opening of the season. The $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 29, and the $10 seats on Tuesday, Sept. 30. The $18 seats for the concerts will be sold on Thursday, Oct. 2, and the $10 seats on Friday.

The season of 1913-14 will be unusually rich in the number of visiting artists of first rank. The management now announce the names of nine soloists who will appear in addition to such artists from the Orchestra who may from time to time assist. These include four pianists, two violinists, and three singers. The pianists are Teresa Carreno, Harold Bauer, Josef Hofmann, and last, but not least, Paderewski. The violinists are Fritz Kreisler and Carl Flesch. The singers are Geraldine Farrar, Elizabeth van Endert of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and Louise Homer.

Mme. van Endert is a stranger. She is the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and comes to America by special arrangement for a limited number of appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mme. van Endert is, in a sense, the successor of Miss Farrar in the Berlin Opera and most of Miss Farrar's parts have fallen to her.

TRAVELER HERALD

SEPTEMBER 20,

Berlin Soprano Who Will Be Symphony Orchestra Soloist

GLOBE-

SEPTEMBER 23,

New Form of Symphony Tickets.

The management of the Symphony Orchestra has made a radical innovation in the form of season tickets for the coming Winter. Practically since the beginning of the orchestra the ticket has been a card with the dates of the various rehearsals or concerts to be punched by the doorkeeper as the ticket is used up.

More or less annoyance has been caused by this style of ticket, and to obviate these disadvantages the tickets for this year are in the form of a book, so perforated that each ticket can be easily detached. These are necessarily much bulkier than the old form, but it is believed that this fact will be more than offset by the convenience of having a separate ticket for each concert.

PROMISING SEASON FOR SYMPHONY

Exceptionally Strong List of Soloists Engaged—Dr. Muck Sails for America.

Dr. Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed today from Bremen for the United States and is expected in Boston about the 29th. In accordance with custom no detailed announcement is made of programs and novelties. The exceptional list of soloists announced, however, give promise of a brilliant season.

The singers will be Geraldine Farrar, Eilsabeth Van Endert and Louise Homer. It is three years since Miss Farrar last sang here with the orchestra and two years since she last appeared in concert. Mme. Louise Homer's coming will be awaited with special interest, as she is today one of the finest of opera singers and has a large Boston following.

The third singer, Mme. Van Endert, is a stranger. She is the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin. Mme. Van Endert is, in a sense, the successor of Miss Farrar in the Berlin Opera. She is youthful, having been singing for only seven years.

Paderewski heads the pianists. His last appearances here were in the season of 1908-9, when he came to America for a few weeks, principally to hear the performance of his symphony by our orchestra.

The other pianists are that remarkable woman, Teresa Carreno, who at the age of 60 has preserved that torrential temperament that has made her unique among pianists of our time, Harold Bauer and Josef Hofmann.

Fritz Kreisler, the eminent violinist, will be heard; also Carl Flesch, held in Berlin as a second Joachim.

The season will open with a public rehearsal and concert Friday afternoon, Oct. 10, Saturday evening, Oct. 11, respectively. The usual number of 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts will be given on the successive Fridays and Saturdays, with the exception of the six weeks the orchestra is on tour—the weeks of Nov. 3, Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Jan. 26, Feb. 16 and March 16.

The auction sales of seats will come, as usual, the week preceding the opening of the season. The $18 and $10 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold in Symphony Hall, beginning at 10 o'clock, on Monday, Sept. 29, and Tuesday, Sept. 30, respectively, while the concert seats will be sold on Oct. 2 and 3; the $18 seats on Thursday and the $10 seats on Friday.

JOURNAL—TUESDA

SEPTEMBER 23,

NEW TICKETS FOR SYMPHONY SEASON

The management of the Symphony Orchestra has made a radical innovation in the form of season tickets which the patrons of the concerts will use the coming winter. Practically since the beginning of the orchestra the ticket has been a small card, with the dates of the various rehearsals or concerts printed around the edges, to be punched by the doorkeeper as the ticket was used up. While the old tickets were convenient on account of their size, there has always been greater or less annoyance caused by the ease with which they were lost. Moreover it was awkward when the subscriber wanted to give the ticket away for a concert.

To obviate these disadvantages the tickets for this year are in the form of a book, one ticket for each rehearsal or concert, so perforated that each ticket can be easily detached. The experiment will be made this year, and if it pleases the patrons this form of ticket will become permanent.

POST, TUESDAY, S

EPTEMBER 23,

TICKET BOOKS FOR CONCERTS

Symphony Orchestra Management Makes Change

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has made a radical innovation in the form of season tickets which the patrons of the concerts will use the coming winter. Practically since the beginning of the orchestra the ticket has been a small, hard card, with the dates of the various rehearsals or concerts printed around the edges to be punched by the doorkeeper as the ticket is used up. This form of ticket has become almost tradition, but in the last few years many requests have been made that a coupon ticket be substituted for it. While the old tickets were very convenient on account of their size, there has always been greater or less annoyance caused by the ease with which they were lost. Moreover, it is at times very awkward when one would like to give the ticket away for a concert.

To obviate these disadvantages the tickets for this year are in the form of a book, one ticket for each rehearsal or concert, so perforated that each ticket can be easily detached. These are necessarily much bulkier than the old form, but it is believed that this fact will be more than offset by the convenience of having a separate ticket for each concert. At any rate, the experiment will be made this year, and if it pleases the patrons, this form of ticket will become permanent.

HERALD. TUESDAY.

SEPTEMBER 23.

SYMPHONY TICKETS

The management of the Symphony orchestra has made a radical innovation in the form of season tickets for the coming winter. The ticket has been a small, hard card with the dates of the various rehearsals or concerts printed around the edges. There has been annoyance on account of the ease with which these tickets were lost. The tickets for this year are in the form of a book, one ticket for each rehearsal or concert, so perforated that each ticket can be easily detached.

From TRIBUNE

Address: New York City.

Date SEP 21 1913

Estab

4

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will have this season the usual number of changes in its personnel, due chiefly to the retirement on pension of the older members. The most important change is that of the first harpist. Last spring Heinrich Schuecker, who was for so many years the harpist of the orchestra, died suddenly and his place has been taken by Alfred Holy, of Vienna. There will be two new first violinists in place of Gustav Strube, who has become instructor in the Peabody Institute, Baltimore, and John Mullaly, an almost original member of the orchestra, who has retired. There will be two important changes in the horns, as Dr. Muck has engaged for the first quartet a new first horn and a new third horn.

Dr. Muck sailed yesterday from Bremen on the North German Lloyd steamship George Washington, and is due to arrive in New York on September 28. He will go direct to Boston and will make the formal announcement of his plans for the season.

[12]

From SUN

Address: New York

Date

Estab

The Boston Symphony Orchestra have this season the usual number changes in its personnel, due chiefly the retirement on pension of the older members. The most important change is that of the first harpist. Last spring Heinrich Schuecker, who was for so many years the harpist of the orchestra, died suddenly and his place has been taken by Alfred Holy of Vienna. There will be two new first violinists in place of Gustav Strube, who has become instructor in the Peabody Institute, Baltimore, and John Mullaly, an almost original member of the orchestra, who has retired. There will be two important changes in the horns, as Dr. Muck has engaged for the first quartet a new first horn and a new third horn. Dr. Muck sailed yesterday from Bremen on the North German Lloyd steamship George Washington and is due to arrive in New York the 28th. He will go direct to Boston and will make the formal announcement of his plans for the season.

Paderewski leaves his home in Morges, Switzerland, the end of this week to spend a short time in Paris before sailing for this country. Accompanied by Mme. Paderewski and L. G. hSarp, his English representative, Mr. Paderewski will sail from Cherbourg, Wednesday, October 1, by the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, and is due to arrive in New York the following Tuesday. The great pianist returns after an absence of four years to make an all season's tour of this country under the direction of C. A. Ellis of Boston. So far as the greater part of the country is concerned, it will be his first tour in five years, for he was here only a few weeks in the season of 1908-09, having come here chiefly to hear the performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the symphony which he had just finished. Mr. Paderewski's plans call for between eighty and ninety concerts and he will be in America until the latter part of April. His season begins in Trenton, N. J., October 13, to be followed by a concert in Jersey City on the 14th. His first appearance in New York will be in Æolian Hall, Saturday afternoon, October 18, under the auspices of the Æolian Company. Then he will make a short trip westward, playing in Detroit, Ann Arbor, Toronto, Erie and Buffalo. Returning to the East he will give a series of recitals in the principal cities and on January 1 he leaves for the West and the Pacific coast, where he will be for approximately two months. All reports have it that Mr. Paderewski has not been in so good health for years and is more than eager to begin the arduous labor of a long American tour.

Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, comes to America this fall for a season's tour of this country under the management of C. A. Ellis of Boston. Mr. Kreisler, accompanied by his wife, will sail from Bremen on October 7 by the Kaiser Wilhelm II., arriving in New York a week later. His first concert will be given in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, on Thursday evening, October 16, and on the following Sunday afternoon he gives a recital in Orchestra Hall, Chicago. His first engagement with an orchestra is the following week in Philadelphia with the Philadelphia Orchestra. During the coming winter Mr. Kreisler will play in every symphony orchestra in the country, and this will include a series of a dozen appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. After playing in the East Mr. Kreisler, in the late winter, will go to the Pacific coast, where he will play in all the principal cities and on his way there and back will play in all the principal cities west of the Mississippi. He will be in America until late spring.

From TIMES

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date SEP 20 1913

84

The musical season of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences will open on the 16th of October, when Fritz Kreisler will give his first recital after his arrival from Europe. The season will be an unusually rich one. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give five concerts in the opera house on Friday evenings.

The New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conductor, will give five Saturday matinee concerts for young people, and, like the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be supported by distinguished solo artists.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N.Y.
Date SEP 21 1913

DR. MUCK EN ROUTE.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Conductor Sails from Bremen.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will have this season the usual number of changes in its personnel, due chiefly to the retirement on pension of the older members. The most important change is that of the first harpist.

Last spring Heinrich Schuecker, who was for so many years the harpist of the orchestra, died suddenly, and his place has been taken by Alfred Holy, of Vienna. There will be two new first violinists in place of Gustav Strube, who has become instructor in the Peabody Institute, Baltimore, and John Mullaly, an almost original member of the orchestra, has retired. There will be two important changes in the horns, as Dr. Muck has engaged for the first quartet a new first horn and a new third horn.

Dr. Muck sailed yesterday from Bremen on the George Washington, and is due to arrive in New York Sept. 28. He will go direct to Boston, and will then make the formal announcement of his plans for the season.

1884

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Many changes have been made in the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season. Several of the old members have been retired and pensioned. The first harpist, who was associated with the orchestra for many years, died suddenly some months ago and a Viennese, Alfred Holy, will occupy his position. Two of the first violins have resigned and will be succeeded by others, and the brasses have been strengthened by the engagement of a new first and a new third horn. Dr. Muck will continue as conductor.

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City.
Date EP 19 1913

BY EMILIE FRA

Dr. Muck will sail to-morrow from Bremen for Boston, where he will announce his plans for the season of Boston symphony concerts. There will be a few changes in the personnel of the orchestra, including the harpist, Alfred Holy, of Vienna, who will replace the late Heinrich Schuecker. Gustave Strube will become a teacher at the Peabody Institute, of Baltimore, and another vacancy in the violins will be the post of John Mullaly, a member of the organization almost from its earliest days.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and probably several other noted organizations will play a new symphony of Paderewski, who will be in this country for the performance and play at eighty or ninety concerts. He will open his season in Trenton October 13 and will make his first appearance in recital in Aeolian Hall October 18 under the auspices of the Aeolian Company.

Geraldine Farrar leaves New York to-morrow on her concert tour, which will open on the Pacific coast. The inger will be accompanied by Mrs. Farar, her mother; Alwin Schroeder, the inent 'cellist, and Arthur Rosenstein, nist.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
SEP 21 1913
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will have this season changes in its personnel, due chiefly to the retirement on pension of the older members. The most important is that of the first harpist. Last spring Heinrich Schuecker, for years the harpist of the orchestra, died, and his place has been taken by Alfred Holy, of Vienna. There will be two new first violinists in place of Gustav Strube, who has become instructor in the Peabody Institute, Baltimore, and John Mullaly, who has retired. There will be two important changes in the horns, as Dr. Muck has engaged for the first quartet a new first horn and a new third horn.

Dr. Muck sailed yesterday from Bremen on the North German Lloyd steamship George Washington, and is due to arrive in New York on September 28. He will go to Boston and make the formal announcement of his plans for the season.

1884

GLOBE—
SEPTEMBER 25.

SYMPHONY HARPIST HERE.

Alfred Holy Landing — New First Horn Will Be Bruno Jaenicke of the Weisbaden Royal Opera.

Alfred Holy, successor of the late Heinrich Schuecker as first harp of the Symphony Orchestra, is arriving in New York today by the Mauretania. He comes directly to Boston. Dr Muck sends word that the new first horn of the orchestra is Bruno Jaenicke, a Swiss hornist of great reputation in Europe, who for the last year or so has been solo horn in the Royal Opera at Weisbaden. One of the new first violins is Florian Whitmann, who comes from the Tonkuenstler Orchestra of Munich.

That part of the orchestra which is to be used at the Worcester County Festival next week will hold its rehearsals in Symphony Hall Saturday afternoon. Both Dr Mees and Mr Strube, the conductors, will be present.

TRANSCRIPT,
SEPTEMBER 24.

From Symphony Hall

Dr. Muck has sent forward the name of two of the newcomers to the Symphony Orchestra that he has lately engaged. The new first horn—a very important past in the band—is Brun Jaenizka from the orchestra of the Opera House at Wiesbaden; and one of the new first violins is Florian Wittmann from the Tönkünstler Orchestra at Munich. Each ranks high with his instrument in Germany.

A new form of ticket has been devised for the Symphony Concerts this year to replace the stiff, rectangular little cards, bordered with the dates of the concerts, that the subscribers have received since the earliest year of the orchestra. The cards were easy to lose and, if the owner gave one away for a single concert, it had to be returned to him for the rest. For the new season the tickets will be issued in books of detachable coupons, one for each concert in either the afternoon or the evening series. The new form promises the greater convenience. And, by the way, while the management is thus departing from ancient custom, why does it not announce the "public rehearsals" as the afternoon concerts that they really are? Even in the early days of the orchestra they were hardly "rehearsals"; they have been formal concerts and nothing else these many years; and sometimes they excel in one or another respect the "concerts proper" of Saturday evening. Possibly the old designation sticks in the speech of the town; but the abandoned form of the tickets was no less ancient and outmoded custom.

BOSTON POST,
SEPTEMBER 25.

NEW MEMBER OF SYMPHONY

Alfred Holy, the successor of the late Heinrich Schuecker, and the new first harp of the Symphony Orchestra, is arriving in New York today by the Mauritania. He comes directly to Boston.

Dr. Muck sends word that the new first horn of the orchestra is Bruno Jaenicke, a Swiss hornist of great repuatation in Europe, who for the last year or so has been solo horn in the Royal Opera at Weisbaden. One of the new first violins is Florian Witmann, who comes from the Tonkuenstler Orchestra of Munich.

That part of the orchestra which is to be used at the Worcester County Festival next week holds a rehearsal in Symphony Hall Saturday afternoon. Both Dr. Mees and Mr. Strube, the conductors, will be present.

JOURNAL—
SEPTEMBER 25.

NEW ARTISTS FOR SYMPHONY SEASON

lfred Holy, the successor of the late nrich Schuecker, and the new first of the Symphony Orchestra, is ing in New York today from Eu-

Dr. Muck sends word that the first horn of the orchestra is Bruno cke, a Swiss musician of great ation in Europe, who, for the last or so, has been solo horn in the Opera at Weisbaden. One of the rst violins is Florian Witmann. omes from the Tonkuenstler Or- of Munich.

MONITOR.
SEPTEMBER 24, 1

SYMPHONY DATA FOR CAMBRIDGE CONCERTS READY

Announcement of soloists and of dates of the Cambridge concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra is to be sent to former subscribers tomorrow.

The circulars giving the details of the concerts were received from the printer at Symphony hall administration offices this morning and are being addressed.

The soloists are: George Proctor and Mme. Carreno, pianists; Mmes. Van Endert and Sundelius, sopranos, and Miss Ruth Deyo and Fritz Kreisler, violinists. There will be eight concerts in Sanders theater, with Dr. Karl Muck conducting.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date SEP 21 1913

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has made an important change in its Providence ticket office which will be of great interest to the patrons of the symphony concerts in this city. For the coming season all the tickets, both for the season and for the single concerts, will be sold at Seddon's News Shop, Butler Exchange, 123 Westminster street. The change has been made from a desire to put the ticket office more nearly in the centre of the city than it has been. The ticket agent this year, as for many years past, will be Mr. J. W. Armstrong.

Arrangements have just been completed whereby the soloist at the opening concert of the orchestra Tuesday evening, Oct. 21, will be Mme. Gadski, principal dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. Mme. Gadski is one of the great favorites in Providence and her appearance with the orchestra will be warmly welcomed.

, 1884

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
SEP 21 1913
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An announcement that will be welcomed by music lovers in this city is that telling of the concert to be rendered shortly by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This set of musicians will again bow to the Providence public in the near future.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ITEM
Address Philadelphia
Date SEP 22 1913

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that a very considerable proportion of the seats in the Academy of Music have already been taken up by subscription for the five concerts the Boston Orchestra will give in Philadelphia during the coming Winter. The subscription comprises principally renewals by subscribers of last season, although many new applications have been received in Boston since last Spring. The concerts will be given as usual on Monday evenings, the dates being November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16. The Orchestra announces as soloists Geraldine Farrar, Paderewski, Kreisler, Teresa Carreno and Elizabeth Boehn van Endert. Mme. van Endert is the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who is coming to America for the first time to make a limited number of appearances with the Boston Orchestra. Dr. Muck, the conductor, is expected to arrive in the country the end of this month.

From TIMES Pa.
Address Philadelphia
Date SEP 20 1913

Many Changes In The Personnel of Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will have this season the usual number of changes in its personnel, due chiefly to the retirement on pension of the older members. The most important change is that of the first harpist.

Last spring Heinrich Schuecker, who was for so many years the harpist of the orchestra, died suddenly and his place has been taken by Alfred Holy, of Vienna. There will be two new first violinists in place of Gustav Strube, who has become instructor in the Peabody Institute, Baltimore, and John Mullaly, an almost original member of the orchestra, who has retired. There will be two important changes in the horns, as Dr. Muck has engaged for the first quartet a new first horn and a new third horn.

Dr. Muck sailed today from Bremen

1884

[13]

NEWS
From
Address Providence, R. I.
Date SEP 20 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has made an important change in its Providence ticket office, which will be of great interest to the patrons of the Symphony concerts in this city. For the coming season, all the tickets, both for the season and for the single concerts, will be sold at Seddon's News Shop, Butler Exchange, 123 Westminster street. The change has ben made from a desire to put the ticket office more nearly in the centre of the city than it has been. The ticket agent this year, as for many years past, will be Mr. J. W. Armstrong.

Arrangements have just been completed whereby the soloist at the opening concert of the orchestra, Tuesday evening, Oct. 21, will be Mme. Gadski, principal dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. Mme. Gadski is one of the great favorites in Providence and her appearance with the orchestra will be warmly welcomed.

, 1884

From HERALD
Address: New York
Date 24 1913

Autumn Gives Fresh Impetus to Lenox Society

Miss Mary Weyman Gives Bridge Party and Reception in Her Country Place.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE HERALD.]

LENOX, Mass., Tuesday.—Delightful autumn weather gave a fresh impetus social activities in Lenox and other B shire colonies to-day. Miss Mary man gave a bridge party and reception at her country place, at Stockbridge, this afternoon for Mrs. Arthur E. Grannis, daughter of Mrs. Oscar Iasigi. Prizes were won by Miss Amy M. Kohlsaat, Miss Amelia C. Hamilton, Mrs. Bernhard Hoffman and Mrs. Lawrence Hamlin, of New York. Mrs. Alexander Sedgwick was at the tea table.

Mrs. J. Frederick Schenck gave a dinner at Valley Head to-night for Mrs. Spencer Cosby and Mrs. Charles R. Shepard, of Washington. Colonel Cosby has been called to Washington.

A dinner also was given to-night for Mr. Thatcher M. Adams and Mrs. Robert Woodworth at Sundrum House.

Upon the return to Lenox of Mr. Giraud Foster from New York a meeting is to be held at the Lenox Club to decide upon a date for holding an informal horse show, which for several years has been a feature of October life in Lenox.

Mrs. John E. Alexandre has issued cards for dinners at Spring Lawn on Friday and Saturday evenings.

The art exhibition in Stockbridge will be kept open until October 3, three days longer than at first announced. At four o'clock on Wednesday afternoon, October 1, Miss Ruth Deyo, piano virtuoso, who is with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play while the pictures and sculpture are still in place. The arrangements are being made by Miss Mabel Choate.

Mrs. William M. Groff, of Albany, is again the guest of Mrs. George Westinghouse at Erskine Park. Miss Dorothy Groff, who has been there, has gone to Vassar College. Miss Katherine Mellen left Stockbridge to-day for a young women's school in Middlebury, Conn.

Mr. and Mrs. Richard C. Dixey and Miss Mary A. Tappan are in Boston to meet Mr. and Mrs. Gorham Brooks, who are arriving there to-morrow from Europe. They will come at once to Lenox for the rest of the season.

Mr. and Mrs. William E. S. Griswold are to close Wyndhurst next Monday and go to Greenwich, Conn., for October.

Mr. and Mrs. Francis Rogers and Mr. John Sanford Barnes are expected to arrive in New York to-morrow on board the Olympic. They are coming to Lenox.

Mr. and Mrs. William Bloodgood, of New York, are at the Dr. West villa in Pittsfield, which they are to vacate October 1.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry W. Bishop, who have been at Seabright all the season, are to be at Wiaka, their Pittsfield villa, during October.

Mr. and Mrs. Clements Houghton and Miss Betty Houghton, who have had the Sampson villa in Pittsfield this season, returned to their winter home in Boston today.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Woodward Haven, the Misses Lillian and Charlotte Winthrop Cram and Mr. and Mrs. Warren M. Salisbury are in New York for most of this week.

Mr. and Mrs. William Marshall Bullitt have returned to Louisville, Ky., from Stockbridge.

Arriving to-day at the Curtis Hotel were Mr. and Mrs. Henry O. Talmadge and Mr. and Mrs. E. Fairchild, of New York. Miss Helen Chase returned to New York after a stay of several weeks at the Curtis.

At the Maplewood Hotel in Pittsfield are Lieutenant L. R. Sargent, U. S. N., and Mrs. Sargent, Norfolk, Va.; Mr. and Mrs. George Sherman, Mr. and Mrs. W. C. Stebbins, of New York, and Mr. and Mrs. William Forsythe, of Philadelphia.

Mrs. Robert Jamison and Miss Margaret A. Jamison returned to Pittsburg, Pa., today from the Aspinwall Hotel. Mr. and Mrs. G. B. Deacon, of New York, and Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Leslie, of Philadelphia, are at the Aspinwall. Mr. and Mrs. H. P. Cornell, of Providence, R. I., are at the Red Lion Inn, Stockbridge.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date SEP 22 1913

Bar Harbor.

Bar Harbor, Me., Sept. 21.—The season here has dwindled to a few cottagers, who will remain through September. There has been a general exodus of hotel guests, the Malvern, De Gregoire, and Louisburg having closed. The Newport and Belmont will keep open until October. The swimming pool had its last visitors of the season yesterday, but the club will be open for the use of members and subscribers until October 1. The tennis courts continue to be popular, and with the wane of gayeties, horseback riding and mountain climbing have found a fresh impetus with those who are lingering for a quiet time. Both the hotel and club orchestras have gone, and now when there is dancing at the Swimming Club, as there frequently is, some member plays the piano for the crowd.

The Swimming Club suffered some embarrassment this season in satisfying its debt to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was finally settled by a subscription. Some of the members who were heavily taxed complained there was need of such an orchestra for "turkey " and tango music. Anyway, some of more dignified ones of the organization did not approve of a subscription, d at the last meeting it was decided to ase the dues $5, the new rule to go effect next year. Edgar Scott, the dent, is one of those who opposed tion.

and Mrs. Warner Mifflin Leeds are g those who will remain to the end season. They will leave in October landome, their estate on Long Isl- Next year they will occupy Green- Court, the Bar Harbor home of Mr. Mrs. Francis Burton Harrison. They taken a lease for three years. way Court, by many, is considered ost beautifully located cottage in Harbor.

and Mrs. Giuseppe Catalani will Elsinore, the home of Mrs. Henry ock, during September, when they ve for her place in South Coven- nn. Mrs. Dimock departed today Mrs. Frederick Thompson at her place in New York. Mr. and atalani have not made definite or a home in Washington, but in ability will be with Mrs. Dimock circle. Mr. Catalani is counselor Italian embassy.

Mrs. John Jacob Astor, her mother, rs. William Force, and her sister, Miss ine Force, who are at La Selva, main as long as the weather is avorable.

Dr. and Mrs. S. Weir Mitchell will prolong their stay at Far Niente until the cold weather drives them home. Dr. Mitchell does all his writing at Bar Har-and abandons it entirely during the er months in Philadelphia. He jok- tells his friends that he writes in the summer and prescriptions in winter. Dr. Mitchell writes in the oon and climbs mountains in the oon.

nd Mrs. S. Megargee Wright and closed Lookout this week and re- to Philadelphia by motor.

nd Mrs. James Speyer were among wcomers at Bar Harbor, and were Foxwood during the month of Au- The Speyers spent a great deal of n the motor car, and attracted ttention with a chow rigged out in tire.

John Aspegren and children, who the Kebo cottage, will return to rk next week. Dr. and Mrs. John er, who are in the Richardson cot- ill return about the same time.

Doull, of New York, has completed etches of Blair Eyrie, the home D. C. Blairs. She made sketches of rance and the Italian garden, one h was purchased by Mrs. Blair.

1884

From EVG. NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date SEP 20 1913

CHANGES IN ORCHESTRA

Boston Symphony Will Present New Artists At Concerts This Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will have this season the usual number of changes in its personnel, due chiefly to the retirement on pension of the older members. The most important change is that of the first harpist. Last spring Heinrich Schuecker, who was for so many years the harpist of the orchestra, died suddenly and his place has been taken by Alfred Holy of Vienna.

There will be two new first violinists in place of Gustav Strube, who has become instructor in the Peabody Institute, Baltimore, and John Mullaly, an almost original member of the orchestra, who has retired. There will be two important changes in the horns, as Dr. Muck has engaged for the first quartet a new first horn and a new third horn.

Dr. Muck sailed today from Bremen on the North German Lloyd steamship George Washington, and is due to arrive in New York on the 28th. He will go direct to Boston and will make the formal announcement of his plans for the season.

884

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Sept 21/13
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will have this season the usual number of changes in its personnel, due chiefly to the retirement on pension of the older members. The most important change is that of the first harpist. Last spring Mr. Heinrich Schuecker, who was for so many years the harpist of the orchestra, died suddenly and his place has been taken by Mr. Alfred Holy, of Vienna. There will be two new first violinists in place of Mr. Gustav Strube, who has become instructor in the Peabody Institute, Baltimore, and Mr. John Mullaly, an almost original member of the orchestra, who has retired. There will be two important changes in the horns, as Dr. Muck has engaged for the first quartet a new first horn and a new third horn. Dr. Muck sailed yesterday from Bremen on the North German Lloyd steamship George Washington and is due to arrive in New York the 28th. He will go direct to Boston and will make the formal announcement of his plans for the season.

York, 1884

From ITEM
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date SEP 21 1913

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that a very considerable proportion of the seats in the Academy of Music have already been taken up by subscription for the five concerts the Boston Orchestra will give in Philadelphia during the coming Winter. The subscription comprises principally renewals by subscribers of last season, although many new applications have been received in Boston since last Spring. The concerts will be given as usual on Monday evenings, the dates being November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16. The Orchestra announces as soloists Geraldine Farrar, Paderewski, Kreisler, Teresa Carreno and Elizabeth Boehn van Endert. Mme. van Endert is the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, who is coming to America for the first time to make a limited number of appearances with the Boston Orchestra. Dr. Muck, the conductor, is expected to arrive in the country the end of this month.

Establ 1884

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York
Date SEP 23 1913

CHANGES in the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season are announced, owing chiefly to the retirement on pension of the older members. The most important change, that of the first harpist, follows the death last spring of Heinrich Schuecker, who was for so many years the Boston harpist. His place has been taken by Alfred Holy of Vienna. There will be two new first violins in place of Gustav Strube, who has become instructor in the Peabody Institute, Baltimore, and John Mullaly, a member almost since the start of the orchestra, who has just retired. Dr. Muck has engaged a new first and third horn.

W. B. CHASE.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date SEP 21 1913

Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, comes to America this fall for a season's tour of this country under the management of C. A. Ellis, of Boston. Mr. Kreisler, accompanied by his wife, will sail from Bremen October 7, by the Kaiser Wilhelm II, arriving in New York a week later. His first concert will be given in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Thursday evening, October 16, and on the following Sunday afternoon he gives a recital in Orchestra Hall, Chicago. His first engagement with an orchestra is the following week in Philadelphia with the Philadelphia Orchestra. During the coming winter Mr. Kreisler will play with every Symphony Orchestra in the country, and this will include a series of a dozen appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. After playing in the East Mr. Kreisler in the late winter will go to the Pacific Coast where he will play in all the principal cities, and on his way there and back will play in all the principal cities West of the Mississippi. He will be in America until late spring.

Est 1884

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date SEP 21 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will have this season the usual number of changes in its personnel, due chiefly to the retirement on pension of the older members. The most important change is that of the first harpist. Last spring Heinrich Schuecker, who was for so many years the harpist of the orchestra, died suddenly and his place has been taken by Alfred Holy, of Vienna. There will be two new first violinists in place of Gustav Strube, who has become instructor in the Peabody Institute, Baltimore, and John Mullaly, an almost original member of the orchestra, who has retired. There will be two important changes in the horns, as Director Muck has engaged for the first quartet a new first horn and a new third horn. Dr. Muck sailed yesterday (Saturday) from Bremen on the North German Lloyd steamship George Washington, and is due to arrive in New York the 28th. He will go direct to Boston and will make the formal announcement of his plans for the season.

Establi

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date SEP 21 1913

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will have this season the usual number of changes in its personnel, due chiefly to the retirement on pension of older members. The most important change is that of the first harpist. Last Spring Heinrich Schuecker, who was for so many years the harpist of the orchestra, died suddenly and his place has been taken by Alfred Holy, of Vienna. There will be two new first violinists in place of Gustav Strube, who has become instructor in the Peabody Institute, Baltimore, and John Mullaly, an almost original member of the orchestra, who has retired. There will be two important changes in the horns, as Dr. Muck has engaged for the first quartet a new first horn and a new third horn.

Dr. Muck sailed yesterday from Bremen on the North German Lloyd Steamship George Washington, and is due to arrive in New York the 28th. He will go direct to Boston and will make the formal announcement of his plans for the season.

* * *

M. B. Swaab, violinist and director of the violin department of his school in the Fuller Building, 10 South Eighteenth Street, announces through the courtesy and kindness of wealthy music-lovers and patrons that several part-free violin scholarships will again be awarded this season. Worthy applicants only, either sex, beginners or advanced, will be considered. Applications must be made not later than October 11. Mr. Swaab, who will grant these awards, is a violinist and instructor of recognized authority, having received his diploma from the Royal Conservatory of Leipzig, Germany. He was for a long time violinist with the Leipzig Royal Gewandhaus Orchestra, under Arthur Nikisch, formerly of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

Estabi

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date SEP 21 1913

Paderewski leaves his home in Morges, Switzerland, the end of this week to spend a short time in Paris before sailing for this country. Accompanied by Mme. Paderewski and Mr. L. G. Sharp, his English representative, Mr. Paderewski will sail from Cherbourg Wednesday, October 1 by the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, and is due to arrive in New York the following Tuesday. The great pianist returns after an absence of four years to make an all-season's tour of this country under the direction of C. A. Ellis, of Boston. So far as the greater part of the country is concerned it will be his first tour in five years, for he was here only a few weeks in the season of 1908-9, having come here chiefly to hear the performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the symphony which he had just finished. Mr. Paderewski's plans call for between eighty and ninety concerts and he will be in America until the latter part of April. His season begins in Trenton, N. J., October 13.

Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, comes to America this Fall for a season's tour of this country under the management of C. A. Ellis, of Boston. Mr. Kreisler, accompanied by his wife, will sail from Bremen October 7 by the Kaiser Wilhelm II, arriving in New York a week later. His first concert will be given in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Thursday evening, October 16, and on the following Sunday afternoon he gives a recital in Orchestra Hall, Chicago. His first engagement with an orchestra is the following week in Philadelphia with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

* * *

Estab 84

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date SEP 27 1913

For several years past Mr. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony, has been making it a custom to get for that orchestra the exclusive services of some great artist. Last year it was Fritz Kreisler, the year before it was Josef Hofmann. This year it is Elisabeth Boehn van Endert, principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera House, Berlin. Mme. van Endert is the successor in Berlin of Miss Geraldine Farrar, taking the parts that fell to that American singer. She is young, having been singing in public but six years. Her voice is said to be a warm, rich soprano which, if not of coloratura quality, is sufficiently flexible to have made her a noteworthy singer of the more florid tunes of Mozart. Mme. van Endert created in Berlin the title role of Richard Strauss' most successful opera "Der Rosenkavalier," and she sang that part fifty-six times under Dr. Muck, season before last. Her only appearance in the East will be with the Boston Symphony.

1884 are the Rachmanino phony in E minor, the great Mahle

VERTISER.

SEPTEMBER 27.

Symphony Orchestra.

The annual auction sales of season tickets for the Symphony concerts will begin at Symphony Hall Monday morning. On that day the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold.

The $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold Tuesday morning.

The $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday. The $10 seats for the concerts will be sold on Friday.

BOSTON HERALD.

SEPTEMBER 27.

SYMPHONY SALE OPENS MONDAY

Two Days for Rehearsal Admissions, Concert Tickets on Thursday and Friday.

The annual auction sales of season tickets for the Symphony concerts will begin at Symphony Hall, Monday morning, at 10 o'clock. On that day the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold. These comprise the first 36 rows on the floor, or back to the beginning of the overhang of the balcony, and the first four rows of the centre of the first balcony. As is generally understood, whatever amount is bid is to be added to the upset price of $18 for each seat. The bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order, and not for choice, and not more than four seats will be sold on one bid.

The $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold Tuesday morning, beginning at 10 o'clock. These comprise the last eight rows on the floor and the last five rows in the first balcony. It is but a matter of a couple of hours to sell these. The second balcony is not sold at auction for the public rehearsals, being held for the 25-cent rush seats.

The $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday, beginning at 10 o'clock. These are the same as the $18 seats for the rehearsals, and the sale progresses perhaps a little more rapidly.

The $10 seats for the concerts will be sold on Friday. These comprise the last eight rows on the floor, the last five rows of the first balcony, and the entire second balcony. The same rules govern the sales for the concerts as for the rehearsals.

Dr. Muck is expected to arrive in New York tomorrow.

BOSTON JOURNAL—SEPTEMBER 27.

Auction Sales of Sy Season Tickets

The annual auction sales of season tickets for the Symphony concerts will begin at Symphony Hall Monday morning at 10 o'clock. On that day the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold. These comprise the first thirty-six rows on the floor and the first balcony seats, except the last five rows of the center section. Whatever amount is bid is to be added to the upset price of $18 for each seat. The broad aisle will be reached about 1 o'clock and the balcony sale will probably begin about 3.

The $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold Tuesday morning, beginning at 10 o'clock. These comprise the last eight rows on the floor and the last five rows in the first balcony. This sale should take only a couple of hours. The second balcony is not sold at auction for the public rehearsals, being held for the 25-cent "rush" seats.

The $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday, beginning at 10 o'clock. These are the same as the $18 seats for the rehearsals and the sale progresses perhaps a little more rapidly.

The $10 seats for the concerts will be sold on Friday. These comprise the last eight rows on the floor, the last five rows of the first balcony center and the entire second balcony.

No more than four seats will be sold on one bid and tickets must be paid for as soon as they are bought.

Dr. Muck, Mr. Urack, Mr. Longy, Mr. Warnke and other members of the orchestra who have been spending the summer abroad are expected home next week. Then Dr. Muck will announce his first programs.

TRANSCRIPT.

SEPTEMBER 27.

THE CONCERT CALENDAR

The First Symphony Concerts—Mr. Kubelik on a Sunday Evening—Miss Farrar's Song Recital

Friday afternoon, Oct. 10, in Symphony Hall, the first of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Muck conducting.

Saturday evening, Oct. 11, in Symphony Hall, the first of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Muck conducting.

Sunday evening, Oct. 12, in Symphony Hall, a concert by Mr. Kubelik, the violinist of delicately masterful technique, finely spun tone and the lighter qualities of expression. He has long had an eager public here.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 17, in Symphony Hall, the second of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra.

Saturday evening, Oct. 18, in Symphony Hall, the second of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 24, in Symphony Hall, the third of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra.

Saturday evening, Oct. 25, in Symphony Hall, the third of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra.

Tuesday afternoon, Oct. 28, in Symphony Hall, a song recital by Miss Farrar unassisted, the first concert of the kind that she has ventured in Boston. Her exacting programme ranges through diversified pieces by German, French and American composers. She will bring to them a voice that has gained in body and a skill in song and resources of imagination and expression that are steadily ripening.

SUNDAY POST, SEPTEMBER 28,

The musical season of 1913-14 will be launched with the opening concert of the 56th Worcester Music Festival, next Wednesday night in Mechanics Hall, Worcester, Mass. What the fruits of the new season will be is still partly a matter for speculation. Dr. Muck arrives in Boston tomorrow, and tomorrow morning at 10 a. m. the first of the auction sales of seats for the Boston Symphony season will commence, in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck has yet to announce his programmes. Contrary to all other procedure, contrary to the habits of other conductors and, probably, the inclinations of the Symphony management, the Doctor has not as yet made known any of his plans for the coming season, in regard to the music that he intends to play, and concerning these plans there is much conjecture. Last year the more advanced guard of those who attended the Symphony concerts demanded more "novelties" and more music by modern and contemporaneous composers than they obtained.

Others were more than recompensed for lack in this direction by the exceptional quality of the performances. It is expected that during the coming season, having moulded the orchestra itself to his liking, in the course of a winter's rehearsals, Dr Muck will endeavor to please all factions. Announcements of new music that he may carry in his folio are eagerly awaited.

Sixty of the Symphony players, who will play under Mr. Strube and Dr. Arthur Mees at the Worcester Festival, have been rehearsing with the respective conductors in Symphony Hall. The first rehearsal of the re-united orchestra, under Dr. Muck, will take place on Oct. 6. The first Symphony concert, or public rehearsal, as it is technically known, will take place on Friday afternoon, Oct. 10. Dr. Muck brings back with him four new members of the Symphony Orchestra, as well as the assistant conductor, Otto Urack, who is supposed to be on the George Washington with him.

SUNDAY GLOBE—SEPTEMBER 28.

Symphony Seat Sale, From Tomorrow Until Friday

Tomorrow the annual auction sale of season tickets for the orchestra's concerts will awaken Symphony Hall from its Summer sleep. These sales are altogether peculiar to Boston and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They are a direct outgrowth of conditions which prevailed in the early days of the orchestra, when admission was very low and season tickets were unknown. From time to time the suggestion has come that for auctions be substituted a regular subscription sale, such as is the fashion nearly everywhere else. A canvass of the regular patrons of the orchestra, however, has shown conclusively that the present method of selling finds greatest favor with them.

The auctions will follow the usual rules of past years. The $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold tomorrow, beginning at 10 o'clock. These seats comprise the first 35 rows on the floor, or back to the overhang of the center of the first balcony; both sides of the first balcony and the first four rows of the center. To whatever the sum bid for each seat will be added the upset price of $18.

The $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold beginning at 10 o'clock Tuesday morning. These comprise the last eight rows on the floor and the last five rows of the first balcony. The second balcony is reserved at rehearsals for the rush seats sold on the day of the re-

---

[illegible] sold Thursday, beginning at 10 o'clock. These are the same seats as the $18 seats for the rehearsals. The $10 seats for the concerts will be sold Friday morning, beginning at 10 o'clock. These include the seats on the floor and in the first balcony which have an upset price of $10 at the rehearsals, and the entire second balcony.

Bids will be accepted for seats in the regular order only and not for choice; and not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and marked off as sold. The auctioneers will be Messrs Walter, Malcolm, Jackson.

Dr Muck is expected to arrive in New York today and will come immediately to Boston. It is thought that the assistant conductor, Mr Urack, is on the George Washington with Dr Muck. The other members of the orchestra who have been abroad for the Summer, including Mr Longy, pr[illegible] Mr Grisez, principal cla[illegible] Mr Warnke, first 'cellist, are expected back this week. The first rehearsal is called for 9:30 Monday morning, Oct 6.

MONITOR, BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 27,

With a new coat of varnish on the walnut office partitions and counting room desks with which the stage and the front part of the auditorium of Symphony hall are temporarily equipped every autumn, the managers of the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts have things bright and ready for holding the season ticket auction sales. The treasurer will open his books, the auctioneer will take the platform and the public will be called in to buy for the first time on the morning of Sept. 29, at 10 o'clock, when the Friday afternoon $18 seats will be put up. The next day the $10 seats will be sold. On Oct. 3 and 4 the Saturday evening seats will be cried. Dr. Muck, the conductor of the orchestra, will return from Europe Sunday. He will have the first rehearsal of his men on Oct. 6.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From SUN

Address: New York

Date SEP 28 1913

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra begs to announce that next Wednesday, October 1, is the last day on which tickets for the two series of concerts to be given in New York this season will be held in the names of those persons to whom they have been allotted. Such tickets as have not been taken up by that day will be assigned to applicants for seats who up to this time have not been able to secure anything for the concerts. Last year and year before many patrons lost their seats by not taking up their tickets in time.

---

and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From AMERICAN

Address: New York City.

Date SEP 28 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. Muck, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is due to arrive in New York in a few days and will proceed to Boston, where he will again take up his musical duties. He has engaged several new musicians to take places made vacant in his ranks. Many of the older members of the Boston Symphony have resigned from active work, a few have joined other orchestras, and one or two deaths have been reported. There will be a new harpist, two first violins, and several important changes among the brasses.

1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address: New York

Date SEP 28 1913

Reports from Boston announce that all the seats in Carnegie Hall for its two series of concerts during the coming Winter have been sold for the season by subscription. This means that it will be as difficult for the casual music lover to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year as it was last. The two series of concerts will be given, as in the past, on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons, the dates being November 6 and 8, December 4 and 6, January 8 and 10, February 19 and 21 and March 19 and 21.

The soloists announced are Paderewski, Fritz Kreisler and Elizabeth Boehn Van E[illegible] the principal lyric soprano of th[illegible] Opera, Berlin, who will ma[illegible] in New York with the or[illegible] arrive from Austria at th[illegible] month.

1884

---

and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From HERALD

Address: New York SEP 29 1913

Date

DR. CARL MUCK RETURNS.

Boston Orchestra Conductor Says There Will Be Soloists at Only Half the Concerts.

With indifferent success in procuring novelties for the coming season, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in New ork yesterday afternoon on board the George Washington, of the North German Lloyd line, after a four months' rest abroad. He announced one change of policy which is in keeping with his theory that orchestral concerts ought to be composed of music solely for the orchestra.

"There will be soloists at only twelve of our twenty-four concerts," he said. "The other twelve will be devoted to music for the orchestra only. I think American audiences are arriving at that point where the introduction of a singer, a pianist or a violinist as soloist breaks the concert for them."

Dr. Muck brought back one new symphony. It is by Noren and never has been produced. The conductor believes appreciation of Mr. Jean Sibelius is constantly growing and he said that the Finnish composer's last symphony would find its way into one of the Boston orchestra's programmes.

Another orchestral conductor who arrived on board the George Washington, was Mr. Leopold Stokowski, of the Philadelphia Symphony, who has been spending the summer with his family in Munich. He brought back several novelties, among them a new French symphony by Rabaud, von Hauseffer's tone poem, "Weiland der Schmeid," Roussel's new overture, "Nachsten von Holbronn," a Viennese rhapsody by Florent Schmidt, Max Schilling's prologue, "Koenig Oedipus," and Mr. Ernest Schelling's Legende Symphomique.

884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From STAATSZEITUNG

Address: New York City.

Date SEP 28 1913

Herr C. A. Ellis, der geſchäftliche Leiter des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters theilt mit, daß die Billets für die zwei Konzert-Serien der kommenden Saiſon nur bis zum 1. Oktober zur Verfügung der Abonnenten gehalten werden, und daß bis dahin nicht abgeholte Sitze den gemeldeten Neu-Abonnenten zugetheilt werden.

Established 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EAGLE

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date SEP 28 1913

An interesting personality will be revealed this winter in Mme. Boehn Van Endert, who is announced as one of the soloists that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring to this city. For several years Mr. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony, has made it a custom to get for that orchestra the exclusive services of some great artist. Last year it was Fritz Kreisler, the year before it was Josef Hofmann. This year it is Elisabeth Boehn van Endert, principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera House, Berlin, who is the successor in Berlin of Geraldine Farrar, in the roles that fell to that great artist. She is young, having been singing in public but six years, and that time has been divided between the Royal Opera of Dresden and the Berlin Opera. She has beauty and charm in personality. Her voice is a warm, rich soprano which if not of coloratura quality is yet sufficiently flexible to have made her a noteworthy singer of the more florid arias of Mozart. Mme. van Endert created in Berlin the title role of Richard Strauss "Der Rosenkavalier," and she sang that part fifty-six times under Dr. Muck, season before last. Her only appearance in the East will be with the Boston Symphony.

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From CITIZEN

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. SEP 28 1913

Date

artist.

From all accounts an interesting personality will be revealed this winter in Mme. Boehn van Endert, who is announced as one of the soloists that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring to this city. Mme. van Endert is principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera House, Berlin. She is the successor in Berlin of Miss Geraldine Farrar, taking the parts that fell to that artist. She is young, having been singing in public but six years and that time has been divided between the Royal Opera of Dresden and the Berlin Opera. Her voice is said to be a warm, rich soprano which, if not of coloratura quality, is sufficiently flexible to have made her a noteworthy singer of the more florid tunes of Mozart. Mme. Van Endert created in Berlin the title role of Richard Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier." Her only appearances in the East will be with the Boston Symphony.

1884

ADVERTISER.

SEPTEMBER 27,

Symphony Orchestra.

The annual auction sales of season tickets for the Symphony concerts will begin at Symphony Hall Monday morning. On that day the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold. The $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold Tuesday morning.

The $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday. The $10 seats for the concerts will be sold on Friday.

BOSTON HERALD.

SEPTEMBER 27.

SYMPHONY SALE OPENS MONDAY

Two Days for Rehearsal Admissions, Concert Tickets on Thursday and Friday.

The annual auction sales of season tickets for the Symphony concerts will begin at Symphony Hall, Monday morning, at 10 o'clock. On that day the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold. These comprise the first 36 rows on the floor, or back to the beginning of the overhang of the balcony, and the first four rows of the centre of the first balcony. As is generally understood, whatever amount is bid is to be added to the upset price of $18 for each seat. The bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order, and not for choice, and not more than four seats will be sold on one bid.

The $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold Tuesday morning, beginning at 10 o'clock. These comprise the last eight rows on the floor and the last five rows in the first balcony. It is but a matter of a couple of hours to sell these. The second balcony is not sold at auction for the public rehearsals, being held for the 25-cent rush seats.

The $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday, beginning at 10 o'clock. These are the same as the $18 seats for the rehearsals, and the sale progresses perhaps a little more rapidly.

The $10 seats for the concerts will be sold on Friday. These comprise the last eight rows on the floor, the last five rows of the first balcony, and the entire second balcony. The same rules govern the sales for the concerts as for the rehearsals.

Dr. Muck is expected to arrive in New York tomorrow.

BOSTON JOURNAL—SEPTEMBER 27.

Auction Sales of Sy Season Tickets B

The annual auction sales of season tickets for the Symphony concerts will begin at Symphony Hall Monday morning at 10 o'clock. On that day the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold. These comprise the first thirty-six rows on the floor and the first balcony seats, except the last five rows of the center section. Whatever amount is bid is to be added to the upset price of $18 for each seat. The broad aisle will be reached about 1 o'clock and the balcony sale will probably begin about 3.

The $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold Tuesday morning, beginning at 10 o'clock. These comprise the last eight rows on the floor and the last five rows in the first balcony. This sale should take only a couple of hours. The second balcony is not sold at auction for the public rehearsals, being held for the 25-cent "rush" seats.

The $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday, beginning at 10 o'clock. These are the same as the $18 seats for the rehearsals and the sale progresses perhaps a little more rapidly.

The $10 seats for the concerts will be sold on Friday. These comprise the last eight rows on the floor, the last five rows of the first balcony center and the entire second balcony.

No more than four seats will be sold on one bid and tickets must be paid for as soon as they are bought.

Dr. Muck, Mr. Urack, Mr. Longy, Mr. Warnke and other members of the orchestra who have been spending the summer abroad are expected home next week. Then Dr. Muck will announce his first programs.

TRANSCRIPT.

SEPTEMBER 27,

THE CONCERT CALENDAR

The First Symphony Concerts—Mr. Kubelik on a Sunday Evening—Miss Farrar's Song Recital

Friday afternoon, Oct. 10, in Symphony Hall, the first of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Muck conducting.

Saturday evening, Oct. 11, in Symphony Hall, the first of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Muck conducting.

Sunday evening, Oct. 12, in Symphony Hall, a concert by Mr. Kubelik, the violinist of delicately masterful technique, finely spun tone and the lighter qualities of expression. He has long had an eager public here.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 17, in Symphony Hall, the second of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra.

Saturday evening, Oct. 18, in Symphony Hall, the second of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 24, in Symphony Hall, the third of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra.

Saturday evening, Oct. 25, in Symphony Hall, the third of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra.

Tuesday afternoon, Oct. 28, in Symphony Hall, a song recital by Miss Farrar unassisted, the first concert of the kind that she has ventured in Boston. Her exacting programme ranges through diversified pieces by German, French and American composers. She will bring to them a voice that has gained in body and a skill in song and resources of imagination and expression that are steadily ripening.

SUNDAY POST,

SEPTEMBER 28,

The musical season of 1913-14 will be launched with the opening concert of the 56th Worcester Music Festival, next Wednesday night in Mechanics Hall, Worcester, Mass. What the fruits of the new season will be is still partly a matter for speculation. Dr. Muck arrives in Boston tomorrow, and tomorrow morning at 10 a. m. the first of the auction sales of seats for the Boston Symphony season will commence, in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck has yet to announce his programmes. Contrary to all other procedure, contrary to the habits of other conductors and, probably, the inclinations of the Symphony management, the Doctor has not as yet made known any of his plans for the coming season, in regard to the music that he intends to play, and concerning these plans there is much conjecture. Last year the more advanced guard of those who attended the Symphony concerts demanded more "novelties" and more music by modern and contemporaneous composers than they obtained.

Others were more than recompensed for lack in this direction by the exceptional quality of the performances. It is expected that during the coming season, having moulded the orchestra itself to his liking, in the course of a winter's rehearsals, Dr Muck will endeavor to please all factions. Announcements of new music that he may carry in his folio are eagerly awaited.

Sixty of the Symphony players, who will play under Mr. Strube and Dr. Arthur Mees at the Worcester Festival, have been rehearsing with the respective conductors in Symphony Hall. The first rehearsal of the re-united orchestra, under Dr. Muck, will take place on Oct. 6. The first Symphony concert, or public rehearsal, as it is technically known, will take place on Friday afternoon, Oct. 10. Dr. Muck brings [illegible] with him four new members of the Symphony Orchestra, as well as the assistant conductor, Otto Urack, who is supposed to be on the George Washington with him.

SUNDAY GLOBE-SEPTEMBER 28,

Symphony Seat Sale From Tomorrow Until Friday

Tomorrow the annual auction sale of season tickets for the orchestra's concerts will awaken Symphony Hall from its Summer sleep. These sales are altogether peculiar to Boston and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They are a direct outgrowth of conditions which prevailed in the early days of the orchestra, when admission was very low and season tickets were unknown. From time to time the suggestion has come that for auctions be substituted a regular subscription sale, such as is the fashion nearly everywhere else. A canvass of the regular patrons of the orchestra, however, has shown conclusively that the present method of selling finds greatest favor with them.

The auctions will follow the usual rules of past years. The $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold tomorrow, beginning at 10 o'clock. These seats comprise the first 35 rows on the floor, or back to the overhang of the center of the first balcony; both sides of the first balcony and the first four rows of the center. To whatever the sum bid for each seat will be added the upset price of $18.

The $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold beginning at 10 o'clock Tuesday morning. These comprise the last eight rows on the floor and the last five rows of the first balcony. The second balcony is reserved at rehearsals for the rush seats sold on the day of the rehearsal at 25-cent [illegible]

The $18 seats for the concerts will be sold Thursday, beginning at 10 o'clock. These are the same seats as the $18 seats for the rehearsals. The $10 seats for the concerts will be sold Friday morning, beginning at 10 o'clock. These include the seats on the floor and in the first balcony which have an upset price of $10 at the rehearsals, and the entire second balcony.

Bids will be accepted for seats in the regular order only and not for choice; and not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and marked off as sold. The auctioneers will be Messrs Walter, Malcolm, Jackson.

Dr Muck is expected to arrive in New York today and will come immediately to Boston. It is thought that the assistant conductor, Mr Urack, is on the George Washington with Dr Muck. The other members of the orchestra who have been abroad for the Summer, including Mr Longy, pr[illegible] Mr Grisez, principal cla[illegible] Mr Warnke, first 'cellist, a[illegible] expected back this week. The first rehearsal is called for 9:30 Monday morning, Oct 6.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

SEPTEMBER 27,

* * *

With a new coat of varnish on the walnut office partitions and counting room desks with which the stage and the front part of the auditorium of Symphony hall are temporarily equipped every autumn, the managers of the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts have things bright and ready for holding the season ticket auction sales. The treasurer will open his books, the auctioneer will take the platform and the public will be called in to buy for the first time on the morning of Sept. 29, at 10 o'clock, when the Friday afternoon $18 seats will be put up. The next day the $10 seats will be sold. On Oct. 3 and 4 the Saturday evening seats will be cried. Dr. Muck, the conductor of the orchestra, will return from Europe Sunday. He will have the first rehearsal of his men on Oct. 6.

* * * *

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From SUN

Address: New York

Date SEP 28 1913

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra begs to announce that next Wednesday, October 1, is the last day on which tickets for the two series of concerts to be given in New York this season will be held in the names of those persons to whom they have been allotted. Such tickets as have not been taken up by that day will be assigned to applicants for seats who up to this time have not been able to secure anything for the concerts. Last year and year before many patrons lost their seats by not taking up their tickets in time.

Establis

...and Most Complete

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From AMERICAN

Address: New York City.

Date SEP 28 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. Muck, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is due to arrive in New York in a few days and will proceed to Boston, where he will again take up his musical duties. He has engaged several new musicians to take places made vacant in his ranks. Many of the older members of the Boston Symphony have resigned from active work, a few have joined other orchestras, and one or two deaths have been reported. There will be a new harpist, two first violins, and several important changes among the brasses.

Es 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From MORNING TELEGRAPH

Address: New York

Date SEP 28 1913

REPORTS from Boston announce that all the seats in Carnegie Hall for its two series of concerts during the coming Winter have been sold for the season by subscription. This means that it will be as difficult for the casual music lover to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year as it was last. The two series of concerts will be given, as in the past, on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons, the dates being November 6 and 8, December 4 and 6, January 8 and 10, February 19 and 21 and March 19 and 21.

The soloists announced are Paderewski, Fritz Kreisler and Elizabeth Boehn Van E[illegible] the principal lyric soprano of th[illegible] Opera, Berlin, who will ma[illegible] in New York with the or[illegible] [illegible] arrive from Austria at th[illegible] month.

1884

...and Most Complete

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From HERALD

Address: New York SEP 29 1913

Date

DR. CARL MUCK RETURNS.

Boston Orchestra Conductor Says There Will Be Soloists at Only Half the Concerts.

With indifferent success in procuring novelties for the coming season, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in New ork yesterday afternoon on board the George Washington, of the North German Lloyd line, after a four months' rest abroad. He announced one change of policy which is in keeping with his theory that orchestral concerts ought to be composed of music solely for the orchestra.

"There will be soloists at only twelve of our twenty-four concerts," he said. "The other twelve will be devoted to music for the orchestra only. I think American audiences are arriving at that point where the introduction of a singer, a pianist or a violinist as soloist breaks the concert for them."

Dr. Muck brought back one new symphony. It is by Noren and never has been produced. The conductor believes appreciation of Mr. Jean Sibelius is constantly growing and he said that the Finnish composer's last symphony would find its way into one of the Boston orchestra's programmes.

Another orchestral conductor who arrived on board the George Washington, was Mr. Leopold Stokowski, of the Philadelphia Symphony, who has been spending the summer with his family in Munich. He brought back several novelties, among them a new French symphony by Rabaud, von Hauseffer's tone poem, "Weiland der Schmeid," Roussel's new overture, "Nachsten von Holbronn," a Viennese rhapsody by Florent Schmidt, Max Schilling's prologue, "Koenig Oedipus," and Mr. Ernest Schelling's Legende Symphomique.

Es 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From STAATSZEITUNG

Address: New York City.

Date ... 28 1913

Herr C. A. Ellis, der geſchäftliche Leiter des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters theilt mit, daß die Billets für die zwei Konzert-Serien der kommenden Saiſon nur bis zum 1. Oktober zur Verfügung der Abonnenten gehalten werden, und daß bis dahin nicht abgeholte Sitze den gemeldeten Neu-Abonnenten zugetheilt werden.

Established 1884

The First ... Most Complete

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EAGLE

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date SEP 28 1913

An interesting personality will be revealed this winter in Mme. Boehn Van Endert, who is announced as one of the soloists that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring to this city. For several years Mr. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony, has made it a custom to get for that orchestra the exclusive services of some great artist. Last year it was Fritz Kreisler, the year before it was Josef Hofmann. This year it is Elisabeth Boehn van Endert, principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera House, Berlin, who is the successor in Berlin of Geraldine Farrar, in the roles that fell to that great artist. She is young, having been singing in public but six years, and that time has been divided between the Royal Opera of Dresden and the Berlin Opera. She has beauty and charm in personality. Her voice is a warm, rich soprano which if not of coloratura quality is yet sufficiently flexible to have made her a noteworthy singer of the more florid arias of Mozart. Mme. van Endert created in Berlin the title role of Richard Strauss "Der Rosenkavalier," and she sang that part fifty-six times under Dr. Muck, season before last. Her only appearance in the East will be with the Boston Symphony.

Estab 1884

The First Established and Most Complete

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From CITIZEN

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. SEP 28 1913

Date

artist.

From all accounts an interesting personality will be revealed this winter in Mme. Boehn van Endert, who is announced as one of the soloists that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring to this city. Mme. van Endert is principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera House, Berlin. She is the successor in Berlin of Miss Geraldine Farrar, taking the parts that fell to that artist. She is young, having been singing in public but six years and that time has been divided between the Royal Opera of Dresden and the Berlin Opera. Her voice is said to be a warm, rich soprano which, if not of coloratura quality, is sufficiently flexible to have made her a noteworthy singer of the more florid tunes of Mozart. Mme. Van Endert created in Berlin the title role of Richard Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier." Her only appearances in the East will be with the Boston Symphony.

Establis 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City.

Date

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra begs to announce that next Wednesday, October 1, is the last day on which tickets for the two series of concerts to be given in New York this season will be held in the name of those persons to whom they have been allotted. Such tickets as have not been taken up by that day will be assigned to applicants for seats who up to this time have not been able to secure anything for the concerts. Last year and the year before many patrons lost their seats by not taking up their tickets in time.

All communications should be addressed to C. A. Ellis, Symphony Hall Boston.

k, 1884

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City.

Date SEP 27 1913

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that Wednesday is the last day on which tickets for the two series of concerts in New York will be held for those in whose names they now stand.

Establi 34

Bureau in the World

From PRESS
Address: New York

Date SEP 28 1913

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that next Wednesday, October 1, is the last day on which tickets for the two series of concerts to be given in New York this season will be held in the name of those persons to whom they have been allotted. Such tickets as have not been taken up by that day will be assigned to applicants for seats who up to this time have not been able to obtain anything for the concerts. Last year and the year before many patrons lost their seats by not taking up their tickets in time. All communications should be addressed to C. A. Ellis, Symphony Hall, Boston.

v York, 1884

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York

Date SEP 27 1913

NEXT Wednesday, Oct. 1, is the last day on which tickets for the Boston Symphony concerts in New York will be held in the name of persons to whom they have been allotted. Tickets not taken up by that day will be assigned to new applicants. So many of these are in sight that the entire series will sell out, as it did last year.

rk, 1884

JOURNAL—
OCOBER 4,

SYMPHONY SEASON TO START WITH A CLASSIC PROGRAM

The season of Symphony concerts will have its formal opening next Friday afternoon, and the same program will be played at the concert on the following evening. Following the custom he has established for himself in the past, Dr. Muck has arranged a simple and familiar program for the opening.

The symphony will be Beethoven's Seventh, in A major. Dr. Muck did not play this last season, but those who have heard it under him when he was here in his first engagement will remember that it was one of his most brilliant achievements. There will be three other numbers, the "Tragic Overture" of Brahms, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

JOURNAL—SATURDAY.
OCTOBER 4.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT FRIDAY AFTERNOON NEXT

Dr. Muck has arranged a Classic Program to Start With.

NEXT week's Symphony concert will open the musical season in Boston. Dr. Muck has arranged a program of familiar works, headed by Beethoven's seventh symphony, and there will be no soloist. The orchestra will have several new members, including Mr. Holy, the new harpist, who succeeds the late Heinrich Schuecker.

ADVERTISER,
OCTOBER 4,

USUAL PRICES FOR SATURDAY NIGHT SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The usual prices prevailed at the auction sale yesterday of the $10 seats for the Saturday night Symphonies at Symphony Hall. In place of Walter Jackson, with whom the Symphony buyers are familiar, the sale was conducted by his brother, Malcolm Jackson.

The seats first disposed of were at the rear of the floor under the balcony, and these brought premiums ranging from $2 up to $11, the former figure being for those against the wall. Curiously enough these last seats brought the same premium as did some of the very front seats during Thursday's sale.

The next seats disposed of were the last four rows of the first balcony, and these averaged the same as the rear floor seats.

The front rows on the two sides of the second balcony brought rather better prices, $15 premiums being paid for seats 22 and 23 at the left. Other prices obtained on this side were $13, with others selling downward to $6. On the right side the highest premium was $12.50, this being paid for a single seat about the middle of the hall.

In the second row the best prices obtained were $12.50 for four sittings on the right and $9 on the left. Rear seats in the second balcony were taken at prices ranging from $10 in the front row downward, in the second row from $7.50 downward, and so on.

First Symphony Concert.

The season of Symphony concerts will have its formal opening Friday afternoon. Following the custom he has established for himself in the past, Dr. Muck has arranged a simple and easily digested programme for the opening concert, all the concerts being well tried friends. The symphony will be Beethoven's 7th in A maj. There will be three other numbers. These will be the "Tragic" Overture of Brahms; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," and Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

Music Notes.

A most interesting list of midweek concerts is announced by L. H. Mudgett for the present season. The Kneisel and Flonzaley Quartettes will give their usual series, the former giving four concerts on Thursday evenings and the latter three concerts on Thursday evenings. The list of singers will include Maggie Teyte, Julia Culp, Mme. Sundelius, Helen Allen Hunt, Emilio DeGorza, H. Evans Williams and John Chipman. The pianists will comprise Miss Katharine Goodson, Miss Ruth Deyo and Messrs. Bachaus, Harold Henry (new) and Godowsky, while the violinist so far announced will be Miss Parlow. The beautiful music of the 'cello will be brought out by Miss Beatrice Harrison, who is new to Boston, and Mr. Gerardy. The [illegible] Trio will also be heard. As usual, Mr. Elmen[illegible] Mr. Newman will deliver series of illustrated lectures.

Miss Geraldine Farrar will give a song recital in Symphony Hall, Oct. 28. For the first time in her career Miss Farrar will undertake an entire concert programme [illegible] New York Saturday, Oct. 25, [illegible] in Boston the following Tuesd[illegible]. At her concert in Boston sh[illegible] sing a programme of 24 songs [illegible] German, French and English songs ranging from classical airs to the dramatic tone pictures of the modern composers.

OCTOBER 3.
GLOBE—FRIDAY.

SEAT PREMIUMS OF $139.

Sale for Saturday Evening Symphony Concerts — Next Highest Figure $81.

Premiums of $139 apiece were paid for three $18 seats for Saturday evening Symphony concerts in yesterday's auction. They were bid in by one man, who picked seats numbered 17, 18 and 19 in row P. Early premiums in this row were $10.50, but soon the day's previous highest premium of $81 was bid. Spectators became unusually interested when the bidding continued steadily up to $139.

Ordinarily the highest premiums are paid for seats in rows M and N. Yesterday $81 was paid for seat 18 in row N, and $34 apiece was paid for seats 16, 17, 18 and 19 in row M. Seat 20 in row O brought $46.

Early in the sale seats in the first three rows went at $2 premiums, but starting with the fourth row prices began to increase. In other rows the highest premiums were: D, $5.50; E, $14; F, $12; G, $16.50; H, $14.50; I, $13; J, $24.50; K, $37, and L, $48. The sale of $18 seats ended yesterday. Today $10 seats in the rear of the floor and balcony for Saturday evening concerts will be auctioned.

ADVERTISER,
OCTOBER 3,

EAGER BIDDING FOR CONCERT SEATS

Auction Sale at Symphony Hall Yesterday Produced Highest Price in the History of Entertainments.

The auction sale of the $18 seats for the Symphony concerts held in Symphony Hall yesterday was in many respects the most sensational one in years. The highest price was paid for seats in the history of the concerts, although it has been exceeded two or three times for rehearsal seats.

A special agent bought in P-18, 19 and 20 at a premium of $139 each, making the total cost of the seats $471, an average cost per seat per concert about $6.50, which is more than is paid for the opera performances in the Metropolitan Opera House, New York.

The seats started at $20, and it was evident at once that practically unlimited orders had been given to secure these particular seats. The bidding started, advancing one dollar at a time, then jumped to five dollars, then fell back to one dollar and finally to 50 cent advances, until they were bought in at $139.

Better Than Other Years.

The sale, on the whole, was considerably better than last year. Seats along the centre aisle of the floor brought good prices; an end, for example, bringing a premium of $81, and several bringing premiums of over $70.

As usual, the balcony seats, especially those on the side, brought good prices, and the favorite seats for the concerts, as for the rehearsals, is the third row on the sides. These seats brought premiums ranging from $25 to $40 each.

The last of the auction sales will begin in Symphony Hall today at 10 a.m., when the $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. These comprise the last eight rows on the floor under the balcony, the last five rows in the first balcony under the second balcony, and the entire second balcony. The second balcony will be reached in the bidding between 11 and 11.30 a.m.

BOSTON HERALD,
OCTOBER 3, 1913.

$139 PREMIUM ON $18 SEATS

Bidder Pays $471 for Three Chairs for Symphony Concerts.

The auction sale of the $18 seats for the Symphony concerts held in Symphony Hall, yesterday, was in many respects the most sensational in years. The highest price was paid for seats in the history of the concerts. A special agent bought in P 18, 19 and 20 at a premium of $139 each, making the total cost of the seats $471, an average cost per seat per concert of about $6.50, which is more than is paid for the opera performances in the Metropolitan Opera House. The seats started at $20, and it was evident at once that practically unlimited orders had been given to secure these particular seats. The bidding started advancing $1 at a time, then jumped to $5, then fell back to $1, and finally to 50 cent advances until they were bought in at $139.

The sale, on the whole, was considerably better than last year. Seats along the centre aisle of the floor brought good prices, an end, for example, bringing a premium of $81.

The last of the auction sales will begin in Symphony Hall this morning at 10 o'clock, when the $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold.

JOURNAL—FRIDAY.
OCTOBER 3, 1913.

PREMIUMS OF $139 GIVEN FOR 3 SEATS

Premiums of $139 each were offered for three seats auctioned at the sale of $18 seats for the Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall yesterday. Bidding was the most spirited in the history of these auctions, and sensational prices were the rule, rather than the exception.

The three seats which brought the high price of $189 each were purchased by an agency representative who had evidently been given unlimited authority in making the purchase. The total cost of the seats is $471, which makes the average cost of each concert $6.50.

Bidding on these seats started at $20 and advances were rapid, until the price had mounted considerably over the $100 mark. Then the rises fell first to $1 and then to 50 cents. The seats are in row P.

Other seats in the center of the house brought good prices. Several brought premiums of $70 to $80. Many balcony seats brought $25 to $40 premiums.

The last of these auction sales will be held Friday morning, when the $1 seats will be auctioned off. These comprise eight rows on the floor, five in the first balcony and the entire second balcony.

BOSTON POST,
OCTOBER 3, 1913

SYMPHONY SEATS FOR $139 EACH

Record Premiums Are Paid for Saturday Night Concerts

The auction sale of the $18 seats for the Symphony concerts held in Symphony Hall yesterday was in many respects the most sensational one in years. The highest price was paid for seats in the history of the concerts, although it has been exceeded two or three times for rehearsal seats.

A special agent bought in P-18, 19 and 20 at a premium of $139 each, making the total cost of the seats $471, an average cost per seat per concert of about $6.50, which is more than is paid for the opera performances in the Metropolitan Opera House.

STARTED AT $20

The seats started at $20, and it was evident at once that practically unlimited orders had been given to secure these particular seats. The bidding started advancing one dollar at a time, then jumped to five dollars, then fell back to one dollar, and finally to fifty cent advances until they were bought in at $139.

The sale, on the whole, was considerably better than last year. Seats along the centre aisle of the floor brought good prices, an end, for example, bringing a premium of $81, and several bringing premiums of over $70.

As usual, the balcony seats, especially those on the side, brought good prices, and the favorite seats for the concerts, as for the rehearsals, is the third row on the sides. These seats brought premiums ranging from $25 to $40 each.

The last of the auction sales will begin in Symphony Hall this morning at ten o'clock, when the $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. These comprise the last eight rows on the floor under the balcony, the last five rows in the first balcony under the second balcony, and the entire second balcony. The second balcony will be reached in the bidding between eleven and half past.

TRAVELER
SEPTEMBER 30,

DR. MUCK BRIEFLY DISCUSSES PLANS

Dr. Muck, conductor of the Symphony orchestra, is in Boston once more after a summer in Europe and frankly says he is glad ot be back. While as usual refusing to discuss his plans for the coming Symphony season at length, he says two pieces called "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," by Max Schillings, the present conductor at Stuttgart, will be played this season. Boston will also hear a new symphony by Heinrich Noren which he has named "Vita," also a symphonic poem, "Peter Schlemihl," by Reznicek, and a symphonic poem, "Ce qu'on Entend sur la Montagne," by Liszt. Among the revivals possible are the Rachmaninoff symphony in E minor, the great Mahler

TRANSCRIPT,

SEPTEMBER 30,

GOOD SALE FOR $10 SEATS

Back Rows on Floor and Balcony for Symphony Rehearsals Bring Better Prices Than Last Year—Highest Premium Is $26

The $10 seats for the Symphony Orchestra public rehearsals were somewhat higher than last year. There were some 400 seats disposed of today, including the last eight rows on the floor and the last four rows in the first balcony.

The highest premium was $26 for floor seats, and the average premium was $20, making an average price per seat of $30. The lowest premium at this sale was $12 for a few seats in the last row on the floor. There was a crowd of nearly 300 persons at the auction and the bidding was general. There appeared to be very few purchases by brokers.

On Thursday forenoon at ten o'clock, the $18 seats for the Symphony concerts will be put on sale; and on Friday forenoon at the same hour the $10 concert seats will be sold. The Friday sale will include the second balcony seats also.

TRANSCRIPT,

SEPTEMBER 30,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Familiar Classics for Dr. Muck's First Programme

The programme for the first pair of Symphony Concerts on Oct 10 and 11, will be as follows:

Symphony in A major, No. 7...........Beethoven
Intermission.
Tragic Overture ....Brahms
Symphonic Poem, "Les Préludes"...........Liszt
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman".....Wagner

On Thursday evening, Oct. 9, the same programme will be given for the American Bankers' Association. The concert is being given by the Association to its members and guests, and not by Major Higginson, as erroneously announced.

NEWS OF MUSIC

Dr. Muck's Announcements for the Symphony Concerts — Mildly Interesting "Novelties" and Promising Revivals and Repetitions — Pieces by Schmitt and Delius Among the Possibilities—Items About Opera

DR. MUCK is notoriously a "mauvais sujet" in the hands of the press agent and the interviewer. He has no "personality" to exploit; he does not overflow with anecdote and petty gossip; he is prone to keep his plans to himself until he is ready to accomplish them and—strange figure in this day and land and in his profession—he prefers to do his work and live his life with as little gabble as possible. Not much, accordingly, could be elicited from him, when he returned to Boston yesterday, about the general scheme of his programmes for the Symphony Concerts this season or about the particular pieces, new and old, that he purposes to include in them. Worse still, from the point of view of press agentry, he yielded no more interesting gossip than comment upon the weather in northern Europe—autumnal rain as usual—and recollection of the announced intention of a manager in Madrid to be the first in the field with his "Parsifal" by beginning the performance at eleven in the evening of Dec. 31—an hour equivalent to midnight in German time and so the very moment at which the copyright expires.

For the programmes of the Symphony Concerts Dr. Muck announced these items:

The symphony, "Vita," by Heinrich Noren, composer of the ingenious and imaginative set of variations for orchestra heard here in 1908.

A symphonic poem, "Peter Schlemihl," by Reznicek, suggested by the classic tale of the man who had lost his shadow.

Two orchestral pieces—"Meergruss" and "Seemorgen"—by Max Schillings of the middle generation of German composers.

A revival of Liszt's symphonic poem, "Ce qu'on Entend sur la Montagne," hitherto overlooked, and undeservingly, at the Symphony Concerts.

A revival of Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor, unusually appreciated here in Mr. Fiedler's time.

A revival of Bruckner's last and unfinished symphony.

A repetition of Mahler's mighty and magnificent fifth symphony, which Dr. Muck revived last year.

A possible performance of "Salome," a love-poem by Florent Schmidt of the rising French composers, and of sundry new pieces by Delius.

It would not be the truth to say that any of these novel pieces, except the "possibilities" from Schmitt and Delius, are the work of men who exemplify the new tendencies, who have shown clear individuality or who enjoy able reputation. Presumably, Dr. Muck is still unwilling that we should hear any of the music of Schönberg, Scriabine or Stravinsky and judge it for ourselves, though meanwhile all Europe that is interested may buzz with it. On the other hand, the repetitions and the revivals that the conductor will make speak for themselves and warmly. Moreover, Dr. Muck once said that when, as a young man, he tried to write articles for the German reviews, an editor told him that he lacked a skilful hand at it. By the same token, he is not skilful in the outgivings of the beginning of a season. Time and again, his programmes, in actual de[illegible]ecution, have proved more [illegible]mulating than his uneasy

---

MONITOR, BOSTON,

SEPTEMBER 30,

MAX SCHELLINGS' SEA PIECES TO BE SYMPHONY WORKS

Works to be presented for the first time by the Boston Symphony orchestra this season, according to an announcement given out Monday night by Karl Muck after his return from Europe, are two sea pieces by Max Schellings, Heinrich Noren's new symphony, "Vita," and Rexnicek's symphonic poem on the story of "Peter Schlemihl." There will be other novelties by Schmidt and Delius.

The early symphonic poem of Liszt's, 'On the Mountain," will be introduced into the repertory, and Bruckner's "Unfinished" symphony and Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor will be revived. Bach, Mozart, Haydn and Beethoven will figure in the programs.

EVENING RECORD,

SEPTEMBER 30.

MUCK FINDS VERY FEW NOVELTIES

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Muck arrived from New York yesterday afternoon. With them came Jack, the Boston terrier, who for the past five years has been their inseparable companion. They went to the Hotel Somerset for a few days, whence they will go to the Brae Burn Country Club and stay there until their apartment at 382 Commonwealth ave. is ready for them.

He remarked at the beginning that in the matter of novelties this was quite the most unfruitful year he had ever known.

DR. KARL MUCK.

Never had there been so few new works published of any merit. He has, however, brought over with him several which will appear on the programmes during the season.

The one largest in bulk is a new symphony by Heinrich Noren. Noren is known here solely by his theme and variations for orchestra which is called "Kaleidoscope," which was played here Dec. 11 and 12, 1908. This new symphony he has named "Vita." It was played for the first time in Dresden last spring.

Another novelty will be a symphonic poem by Reznicek, best known as the composer of the successful opera, "Donna Diana." This symphonic poem is entitled "Peter Schlemihl" and draws its inspiration, of course, from the famous story of the man who lost his shadow.

Max Schillings, the present conductor at Stuttgart, whose name has appeared on the Symphony programmes a number of times, will be represented by two pieces, called "Meergruss' and "Seemorgen."

Another novelty which he may play, and one which is likely to excite much interest, is the symphonic poem "Salome" by the French composer, Florentin Schmidt. Of the younger men now at work in Paris Schmidt is considered, by all odds, the most promising.

He will also play, odd as it may seem, "a novelty" by Liszt. This is a symphonic poem entitled "Ce qu'on entend sur la montagne," founded on the poem of Victor Hugo. Although this is one of the earliest and, from all accounts, the most beautiful of Liszt's symphonic poems, it has never been played by the Symphony Orchestra and it is a question whether it has ever been played in Boston.

MONITOR, BOSTON,

SEPTEMBER 30,

REHEARSAL SEATS SOLD READILY AT PREMIUM RATES

Seats in the back rows of Symphony hall were auctioned off this morning at the second day's season ticket sale for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Boston Symhony orchestra, the bids for the better locations bringing premiums between $20 and $30. The price of all seats was $10.

There was a large attendance and the bidding was brisk, subscribers coming in when the part of the house they preferred was put up. Today's sale finishes the auction for the rehearsal seats. The sale for the Saturday concerts begins Thursday morning.

HERALD, WEDNESDAY

OCTOBER 1.

SYMPHONY FOR BANKERS' GUESTS

Dr. Muck Announces Numbers to Be Given Night of Oct. 9.

Dr. Muck has announced the program for the concert which the Symphony Orchestra will give on the evening of Oct. 9 to the delegates and guests at the convention of the American Bankers Association. The Symphony Orchestra will give these numbers:

Seventh Symphony..............Beethoven
Intermission.
Tragic Overture...................Brahms
Symphonic Poem—Les Preludes......Liszt
Overture, "The Flying Dutchman".Wagner

Alfred Holy, the harpist, who has come from Vienna to succeed the late Mr. Schuecker, will make his American debut in the Symphonic Poem. Dr. Muck will conduct the orchestra at this concert, which will begin at 8:30. As the bankers register they will be given coupons to be exchanged for tickets at the convention headquarters after 9 o'clock Thursday morning. The Boston bankers made this arrangement so that their guests from other cities who might be late in registering should have an equal opportunity to hear the symphony.

JOURNAL—THURSDAY,

OCTOBER 2, 1913.

SYMPHONY AUCTION TO CONTINUE TODAY

The auction sales of season tickets for the Symphony concerts will be continued today, beginning at 10 o'clock, when the $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold. These comprise the entire floor except the last eight rows under the balcony and the entire first balcony except the last five rows in the center, under the second balcony.

The broad aisle (or Row X) will be reached between 1 and 1.30; the right first balcony between 3 and 3.30; the left three-quarters of an hour later, and the center between 4.30 and 5.

GLOBE—THURSDAY. OCTOBER 2. 1913.

SYMPHONY SEAT SALE.

Tickets for This Season's Saturday Evening Concerts to Be Sold Today and Tomorrow.

The auction sales of season tickets for the Symphony concerts will be continued today, beginning at 10 o'clock, when the $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold. These comprise the entire floor except the last eight rows under the balcony, and the entire front balcony, except the last five rows in the center, under the second balcony.

Tomorrow the $10 seats will be sold, the same rules governing the earlier sales this week being in force.

HERALD, THURSDAY,

OCTOBER 2, 1913.

AUCTION OF SYMPHONY TICKETS CONTINUES

The $18 Seats for Saturday Evening Concerts on Sale Today.

The auction of season tickets for the Symphony concerts will be continued today, beginning at 10 o'clock, when the $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold. These are the same seats as were sold for the rehearsals last Monday. These comprise the entire floor except the last eight rows under the balcony and the entire first balcony except the last five rows in the centre under the second balcony.

The schedule of time of the sale will be practically the same as that of Monday. The broad aisle (or row X) will be reached between 1 and 1:30, when there will be an intermission of half an hour for lunch. The right first balcony will be reached between 3 and 3:30, the left three-quarters of an hour later and the centre about three-quarters of an hour after that.

The same rules governing the sale as prevailed on Monday will be in force today.

ADVERTISER,

OCTOBER 1, 1913

SYMPHONY SEATS IN GREATER DEMAND

Over 400 of Those Listed at $10 Each for Public Rehearsal Sold Yesterday.

Over 400 of the $10 seats for the Symphony Orchestra public rehearsal were sold yesterday, considerably more than last year. The seats included the last eight rows on the floor, and the last four rows in the balcony.

The highest premium was $26 for floor seats, and the average premium was $20, making an average price per seat of $30. The lowest premium at this sale was $12 for a few seats in the last row on the floor. There was a crowd of nearly 300 persons at the auction, and the bidding was general. There appeared to be very few purchases by brokers.

On Thursday at 10 a.m. the $18 seats for the Symphony concerts will be put on sale; and on Friday at the same hour the $10 concert seats will be sold. The Friday sale will include the second balcony seats also.

JOURNAL—WEDNESDAY.

OCTOBER 1. 1913.

Dr. Muck Gives Out Symphony Concert Bankers' Program

DR. MUCK has announced the program for the concert which the Symphony Orchestra will give on Thursday evening, Oct. 9, to the delegates and guests at the convention of the American Bankers' Association. The Symphony Orchestra will give the following four numbers:

Seventh Symphony ....Beethoven
Intermission.
Tragic Overture ....Brahms
Symphonic Poem, Les Preludes...........Liszt
Overture, The Flying Dutchman ......Wagner

Alfred Holy, the harpist, who has come from Vienna to succeed the late Mr. Schuecker, will make his American debut in the Symphonic poem. Dr. Muck will conduct the orchestra at this concert, which will be given at 8.30. As the bankers register at convention headquarters they will be given coupons to be exchanged for tickets after 9 o'clock Thursday morning.

BIDDING LIVELY AT SYMPHONY AUCTION

Lively bidding featured the sale yesterday forenoon of the cheaper seats for the Symphony rehearsals. These $10 seats comprising the last eight rows on the floor and the last five in the first balcony, brought higher average prices than last year. The first two rows of the section on the floor went at higher premiums than did the last row, the $18 seats sold Monday afternoon.

The first floor row sold, KK, brought premiums averaging more than $30. Few seats in the section were sold at premiums of less than $20. Only those in the last rows fell below that price. Seats in the last five rows of the first balcony brought premiums ranging from $13 to $28.

BOSTON GLOBE—

OCTOBER 1.

HIGHEST PREMIUM $26.

Regular $10 Season Tickets for Friday Symphony Rehearsals Bring an Average of $30 Per Seat.

The auction sale of seats for the Friday Symphony concert rehearsals at Symphony Hall yesterday only lasted two hours, as the sale was confined to regular $10 season tickets, comprising the last eight rows on the floor and the last five rows in the balcony. The premiums exceeded those of last year for the same seats.

The highest premium on the floor yesterday was $26 a seat, the average premium was $20, the lowest premium was $12 a seat for a few seats in the last row on the floor, and the average price paid per seat was $30. The crowd numbered about 300 and bidding was quite general. It was said there were very few ticket brokers present.

The last five rows in the balcony brought premiums ranging from $13 up to $28 a seat. The sale was regarded as very satisfactory by the management.

Tomorrow morning the sale of $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be resumed.

BOSTON HERALD.

SEPTEMBER 29.

DR. MUCK BRINGS NEW SYMPHONY

[Special Dispatch to The Herald.]

NEW YORK, Sept. 28—Three celebrated orchestra conductors were aboard the George Washington, which arrived here tonight from Bremen, Southampton and Cherbourg. They were Alfred Hertz, who presides over the German opera at the Metropolitan; Dr. Karl Muck, who leads the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Leopold Stokowski of the Philadelphia orchestra.

Dr. Muck said that the chief novelty he obtained abroad was Noren's new symphony. It was played for the first time only four weeks ago.

JOURNAL

SEPTEMBER 29.

SYMPHONY CONCERT SEAT SALE TODAY

The first and in many respects the most important of auction sales of the season tickets for the Symphony concerts will begin in Symphony Hall this morning at 10 o'clock. Today the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold, comprising all but the last eight rows of the seats on the floor and last five rows in the first balcony. The same rules will hold this year as in the past.

Those who wish seats on the floor back of the broad aisle would do well to be on hand this year about 1.30, and those who wish to have seats in the right first balcony, about 3.30, and in the left balcony about 4.15. The entire balcony should be reached in the neighborhood of 5 o'clock.

ADVERTISER,

SEPTEMBER 30.

SYMPHONY SEATS BRING GOOD PRICES

One Seat for the Friday Afternoon Rehearsal Brings Premium of $73 at Yesterday's Auction.

The auction sale of $18 seats for Friday afternoon public rehearsals for 33d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened at Symphony Hall this morning.

The bids for the premium on each seat were to be added to the $18 regular price of seats.

Up to the noon hour only the first nine rows had been auctioned off. In the first five rows premiums commanded compared favorably with last year. In several instances desirable seats on the aisle were bid up sharply.

H row center aisle seat sold at $70 premium. Last year high premium for H row was $58. In row I the highest price was $70 for a center aisle seat. Last year high for row I was $49. Second seat in on center aisle of I row sold at $46 premium. J row seats on center aisle commanded $48 premium each.

The highest price of the morning was $73 for M 18, an end seat, and the seat next to it brought $50.

DR. KARL MUCK RETURNS TO BOSTON

Declares Year Most Unfruitful [illegible] Regard to Novelties That He Has Ever Known.

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Muck arrived from New York yesterday afternoon. With them came Jack, the Boston terrier, who for the past five years has been their inseparable companion. They went to the Hotel Somerset for a few days, whence they will go to the Brae Burn Country Club and stay there until their apartment at 382 Commonwealth ave. is ready for them.

Dr. Muck returns in the best of health and spirits, although his summer was not altogether satisfactory or pleasant. When he left Boston he took the southern route, landing in Genoa, and went i[illegible]

[illegible] he arrived here went directly to Symphony Hall a started work in the library. As has bee his custom in the past, he was rather unwilling to discuss his plans for the season.

He remarked at the beginning that in the matter of novelties this was quite the most unfruitful year he had ever known. Never had there been so few new works published of any merit. He has, however, brought over with him several which will appear on the programmes during the season.

The one largest in bulk is a new symphony by Heinrich Noren. Noren is known here solely by his theme and variations for orchestra which is called "Kaleidoscope," which was played here Dec. 11 and 12, 1908. This new symphony he has named "Vita." It was played for the first time in Dresden last spring.

Another novelty will be a symphonic poem by Reznicek, best known as the composer of the successful opera "Donna Diana." This symphonic poem is entitled "Peter Schlemihl" and draws its inspiration, of course, from the famous story of the man who lost his shadow.

Max Schillings, the present conductor at Stuttgart, whose name has appeared on the Symphony programmes a number of times, will be represented by two pieces, called "Meergruss' and "Seemorgen."

Another novelty which he may play, and one which is likely to excite much interest, is the symphonic poem "Salome" by the French composer, Florentin Schmidt. Of the younger men now at work in Paris Schmidt is considered, by all odds, the most promising.

Dr. Muck said that within two or three weeks there would be three or four new short pieces by Fritz Delius published in Leipsic and they were to be sent to him at once.

He will also play, odd as it may seem "a novelty" by Liszt. This is a symphoni poem entitled "Ce qu'on entend sur l montagne," founded on the poem of Victo Hugo. Although this is one of the earlies and, from all accounts, the most beautif of Liszt's symphonic poems, it has neve been played by the Symphony Orchestr and it is a question whether it has eve been played in Boston.

Dr. Muck's work begins unusually earl this year, because on Thursday nigh October 9, the evening before the fir public rehearsal, he will conduct t orchestra in a concert given by t Bankers' Association of this city as a com pliment to the visiting delegates to t convention.

HERALD. TUESDAY.

SEPTEMBER 30.

TOP FIGURES AT SYMPHONY SAL

Seats for the Friday afternoon r hearsals of the Boston Sympho Orchestra, auctioned off yesterday the first of the sales, brought ev greater premiums in the aggregate th in past years. Walter Jackson, t auctioneer, secured $73 for M 18, an e seat, and the next to it brought $ Both had been purchased by a rep sentative of Clarence W. Barron.

Last year the highest premium w $61, and the year before it was $78. in all, though, the average paid seats was higher this year and throug out the day the demand was heav Most of the bidding was done by tic brokers, although in a few instances actual purchasers were present seemed to enjoy keenly the sharp co petition for certain desired seats.

The aisle seat at the extreme rig brought $26.50, the next one $23, the next two $24.50. Then the pric went up rapidly until No. 19, an ai seat, was reached. Several seem determined to possess this place, a after starting at $20 the persistent valry carried the price to $70. Curiou ly, the corresponding seat across t aisle brought only $35.50. A repetiti of this rivalry occurred in the biddi for No. 19, in the row behind. Wh the central seats were reached one m bid $70, but instead of taking a sing seat he selected three, 17 and 18 one side of the central aisle, and No. opposite. In row D the prices rang from $20.50 to $40. Row E show a better average, as the premiums r from $22 to $43, the latter price bei paid for two end seats. In F the ran was from $26.50 to $36, G, $31 to $43, from $27 to $48, the latter price being paid for those seats which in the row in front had brought $70. The sum of $68 was the highest premium receive for a single seat in K, while $62 eac was paid for four places in the same row. A single sitting in L brought $58, while $48 was the highest price paid in row N, and $54 for places in O.

BOSTON POST

SEPTEMBER 30.

DR. MUCK IS IN BOSTON FOR SEASON

Symphony Conductor Says Novelties Are Scarce

On their arrival in Boston yesterday afternoon, Dr. and Mrs. Muck went immediately out to the Somerset Hotel, where apartments had been prepared for them, and where they will stay for a few days, and then repair to the Brae-Burn Country Club.

Dr. Muck is very fond of this place, where he passed many pleasant hours last spring while recuperating from a serious operation upon his throat.

PROGRAMMES TODAY

Dr. Muck did not announce his programmes yesterday, but they will be published tomorrow. He said in a general way, that good novelties were scarce this year, but that his programmes would contain several of the most promising, while for the rest, the Symphony programmes would offer a blend of the classic and modern schools, and of certain of the most important works produced last season, which in the opinion of Dr. Muck will well bear repetition.

Dr. Muck came over on the North German Lloyd steamer George Washington, landing in New York Sunday afternoon. It was the first of the "musical ships," for with him as fellow passengers were Alfred Hertz, conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, and Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, and Mme. Gadski.

Almost as soon as he arrived in Boston, he went directly to Symphony Hall and started to work in the library. As has been his custom in the past, he was rather unwilling to discuss his plans for the season.

He remarked at the beginning that in the matter of novelties this was quite the most unfruitful year he had ever known. Never had there been so few new works of any merit published. He has, however, brought over with him several which will appear on the programmes during the season. The one largest in bulk is a new symphony by Heinrich Noren. Noren is known here solely by his theme and variations for orchestra, which he called "Kaleidoscope," which was played here Dec. 11 and 12, 1908. This new symphony he has named "Vita." It was played for the first time in Dresden last spring.

Another novelty will be a symphonic poem by Reznicek, best known as the composer of the successful opera, "Donna Diana." This symphonic poem is entitled "Peter Schlemin," and draws its inspiration, of course, from the famous story of the man who lost his shadow.

Max Schillings, the present conductor at Stuttgart, whose name has appeared on the Symphony programmes a number of times, will be represented by two pieces called "Meergruss' and "Seemorgen." Another novelty which he may play, and one which is likely to excite much interest, is the symphonic poem "Salome," by the French composer Florentin Schmidt. Of the younger men now at work in Paris, Schmidt is considered by all odds the most promising.

Dr. Muck said that within two or three weeks there would be three or four new short pieces by Fritz Delius published in Leipsic, and they were to be sent to him at once.

BOSTON GLOBE—

SEPTEMBER 30.

DR MUCK ARRIVES.

Reports Great Dearth o Good Novelties.

Says Impresario at Madrid Wi Begin "Parsifal" at 11 P M.

Dr Karl Muck, accompanied by M Muck, arrived in Boston yesterd afternoon for the new season of Sy phony concerts. Genially imperturba in mood as ever, and quite as amia ironical, he appeared in excellent spi for the Winter's work.

He insisted that he had heard music, had given but little thought it, and had played golf and tramped the mountains near his country home Gratz, to all of which his bronzed f tures gave good proof.

After alighting from [illegible] South Station the doctor's first care, with the aid of Publicity Manager Walter, was to get "Jack" out of the baggage car. "Jack" hadn't been on land long enough in New York "to get some of the Max Reger out of his system," as the doctor said, so he raced along on the leash as any full-blooded, conscientious Boston terrier ought to do who is leading one of the three or four greatest conductors alive a chase through the station on his return to Boston and its greatest orchestra in the world. The precise valuation in money of the two might be a pretty problem to figure out. Anyway, Mrs Muck and others who looked on were amused at the procession.

Arnold Schoenberg, who has succeeded in making his music cause riots in Berlin, would not have been flattered could he have seen Dr Muck and the face he made when asked whether or not he would play some of it here—a face that would promise little immediate hope for Mr Schoenberg at Symphony Hall, a Mephistophelean grimace of scornful disdain that made words pale.

"Then he is as bad as he was last year?"

"Worse." With a heavy cymbal crash on the middle of the word, and then another face.

Mr Schoenberg at any rate may say that he has made a deep impression.

"Did you write any music this Summer, doctor?"

"What, I?"

Another quizzical look out of the eyes that always let you know that they are keeping back more than they say.

"Once when I was 17 I took a prize for a symphony," expressive pantomime with the hands of a kind to express dismissal, conclusion, never again and such sentiments that otherwise suggest absolute finality. To convey the laconic and introspective brevity of this speech without a phonograph is not easy.

"If one ever writes a symphony or opera and wins a prize"—more pantomime—"it is time to stop. These prize symphonies and operas, well"—more shrugs, quizzical looks and pantomime. Mrs Muck and Mr Walter were waiting in the taxi and the valuation of prize pieces must be left to the reader's imagination.

Dr Muck said that he had known Alfred Holy, the new Symphony harpist, for 20 years.

"I have not heard the harpist of the Metropolitan Opera House, but Mr Holy (pronounced by Dr Muck Holly) is the best harpist I know in the world."

The doctor remarked at the beginning that in the matter of novelties this was quite the most unfruitful year he had ever known. Never had there been so few new works published of any merit. He has, however, brought over with him several which will appear on the programs during the season. The one largest in bulk is a new symphony by Heinrich Noren, known here for his "Kaleidoscope" played three seasons ago. There will be other novelties by Reznicek, by Max Schillings, the conductor at Stuttgart; by Florent Schmidt, some new short pieces by Delius, and strangely enough a "novelty" by Liszt, a symphonic poem based upon a poem of Victor Hugo.

Dr Muck says there will be an orgy of "Parsifal" all over Europe beginning the first of the year. The copyright expires at 12 o'clock (midnight) on Dec 31. The impresario at Madrid, Spain, figuring out the difference of time finds he can therefore begin his first performance at 11 o'clock and still be within the law.

As fellow-passengers on his return trip on the George Washington Dr Muck had Alfred Hertz, conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House; Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, and Mme Gadski. The doctor went at once to the orchestra library in Symphony Hall to begin work. For a few days he and Mrs Muck will be at the Somerset, then at the Brae-Burn Country Club until their apartment on Commonwealth av is ready.

BOSTON GLOBE—

SEPTEMBER 30.

PREMIUMS WELL UP.

Spirited Bidding for Symphony Seats.

Many Women Present to Execute Their Own Commissions.

Symphony Orchestra patrons had to pay well for season tickets to the Friday afternoon rehearsals at the auction of seats yesterday at Symphony Hall, some of the prices being well above those of a year ago.

The record morning price was paid by a representative of Clarence W. Barron, whose heart was set on a pair of seats in row M, and he had to pay a premium of $73 above the price of $18 to get one of them. Several others who had special preferences for seats had to pay $70 premium on each of their tickets.

A feature of the sale was the bidding of many women, who, instead of entrusting their commission to agents, themselves attended, making spirited bidding thereby.

The first seat offered proved the bargain of the morning session, A1, going for the small premium of $17. All of A row had lively takers, despite the fact that these seats are near the stage.

The high-priced seats were in the rows behind row G, some of the seats in H going for $70, while others in the same row, close to them, went for about half that figure. The same price was reached in row I, but in rows J, K and L the bidding fell off a bit. In M someone besides Mr Barron desired the seats on the left aisle, and by leaps and bounds the price soared until Mr Barron's representative held the field at $73, making a total price of $91 for the ticket. As last year, the prices for the tickets on the floor did not go higher than $60, it seemed certain that a prosperous year awaited Symphony Orchestra.

All the floor seats in the rear up to the space set aside for $10 seats went with lively bidding, the prices keeping up well.

The balcony seats, highly prized by many people, were auctioned in the late afternoon, the prices being well up. The highest price paid was a $71 premium. The sale will [illegible]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

BOSTON GLOBE—

OCTOBER 1.

HIGHEST PREMIUM $26.

Regular $10 Season Tickets for Friday Symphony Rehearsals Bring an Average of $30 Per Seat.

The auction sale of seats for the Friday Symphony concert rehearsals at Symphony Hall yesterday only lasted two hours, as the sale was confined to regular $10 season tickets, comprising the last eight rows on the floor and the last five rows in the balcony. The premiums exceeded those of last year for the same seats.

The highest premium on the floor yesterday was $26 a seat, the average premium was $20, the lowest premium was $12 a seat for a few seats in the last row on the floor, and the average price paid per seat was $30. The crowd numbered about 300 and bidding was quite general. It was said there were very few ticket brokers present.

The last five rows in the balcony brought premiums ranging from $13 up to $28 a seat. The sale was regarded as very satisfactory by the management.

Tomorrow morning the sale of $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be resumed.

BOSTON HERALD.

SEPTEMBER 29.

DR. MUCK BRINGS NEW SYMPHONY

[Special Dispatch to The Herald.]

NEW YORK, Sept. 28—Three celebrated orchestra conductors were aboard the George Washington, which arrived here tonight from Bremen, Southampton and Cherbourg. They were Alfred Hertz, who presides over the German opera at the Metropolitan; Dr. Karl Muck, who leads the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Leopold Stokowski of the Philadelphia orchestra.

Dr. Muck said that the chief novelty he obtained abroad was Noren's new symphony. It was played for the first time only four weeks ago.

JOURNAL

SEPTEMBER 29.

SYMPHONY CONCERT SEAT SALE TODAY

The first and in many respects the most important of auction sales of the season tickets for the Symphony concerts will begin in Symphony Hall this morning at 10 o'clock. Today the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold, comprising all but the last eight rows of the seats on the floor and last five rows in the first balcony. The same rules will hold this year as in the past.

Those who wish seats on the floor back of the broad aisle would do well to be on hand this year about 1.30, and those who wish to have seats in the right first balcony, about 3.30, and in the left balcony about 4.15. The entire balcony should be reached in the neighborhood of 5 o'clock.

ADVERTISER,

SEPTEMBER 30.

SYMPHONY SEATS BRING GOOD PRICES

One Seat for the Friday Afternoon Rehearsal Brings Premium of $73 at Yesterday's Auction.

The auction sale of $18 seats for Friday afternoon public rehearsals for 33d seasou of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened at Symphony Hall this morning.

The bids for the premium on each seat were to be added to the $18 regular price of seats.

Up to the noon hour only the first nine rows had been auctioned off. In the first five rows premiums commanded compared favorably with last year. In several instances desirable seats on the aisle were bid up sharply.

H row center aisle seat sold at $70 premium. Last year high premium for [illegible] row was $58. In row I the highest price was $70 for a center aisle seat. Last year high for row I was $49. Second seat in on center aisle of I row sold at $46 premium. [illegible] row seats on center aisle commanded $48 premium each.

The highest price of the morning was $73 for M 18, an end seat, and the seat next to it brought $50.

DR. KARL MUCK RETURNS TO BOSTON

Declares Year Most Unfruitful in Regard to Novelties That He Has Ever Known.

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Muck arrived from New York yesterday afternoon. With them came Jack, the Boston terrier, who for the past five years has been their inseparable companion. They went to the Hotel Somerset for a few days, whence they will go to the Brae Burn Country Club and stay there until their apartment at 382 Commonwealth ave. is ready for them.

Dr. Muck returns in the best of health and spirits, although his summer was not altogether satisfactory or pleasant. When he left Boston he took the southern route, landing in Genoa, and went into [illegible]

[illegible] he arrived here went directly to Symphony Hall a started work in the library. As has bee his custom in the past, he was rather un willing to discuss his plans for the season.

He remarked at the beginning that in the matter of novelties this was quite the most unfruitful year he had ever known. Never had there been so few new works published of any merit. He has, however, brought over with him several which will appear on the programmes during the season.

The one largest in bulk is a new symphony by Heinrich Noren. Noren is known here solely by his theme and variations for orchestra which is called "Kaleidoscope," which was played here Dec. 11 and 12, 1908. This new symphony he has named "Vita." It was played for the first time in Dresden last spring.

Another novelty will be a symphonic poem by Reznicek, best known as the composer of the successful opera, "Donna Diana." This symphonic poem is entitled "Peter Schlemihl" and draws its inspiration, of course, from the famous story of the man who lost his shadow.

Max Schillings, the present conductor at Stuttgart, whose name has appeared on the Symphony programmes a number of times, will be represented by two pieces, called "Meergruss' and "Seemorgen."

Another novelty which he may play, and one which is likely to excite much interest, is the symphonic poem "Salome" by the French composer, Florentin Schmidt. Of the younger men now at work in Paris Schmidt is considered, by all odds, the most promising.

Dr. Muck said that within two or three weeks there would be three or four new short pieces by Fritz Delius published in Leipsic and they were to be sent to him at once.

He will also play, odd as it may seem "a novelty" by Liszt. This is a symphoni poem entitled "Ce qu'on entend sur l montagne," founded on the poem of Victo Hugo. Although this is one of the earlies and, from all accounts, the most beautif of Liszt's symphonic poems, it has never been played by the Symphony Orchestra and it is a question whether it has ever been played in Boston.

Dr. Muck's work begins unusually early this year, because on Thursday night, October 9, the evening before the first public rehearsal, he will conduct the orchestra in a concert given by th Bankers' Association of this city as a com pliment to the visiting delegates to t convention.

HERALD. TUESDAY.

SEPTEMBER 30.

TOP FIGURES AT SYMPHONY SAL

Seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, auctioned off yesterday at the first of the sales, brought even greater premiums in the aggregate than in past years. Walter Jackson, the auctioneer, secured $73 for M 18, an end seat, and the next to it brought $50. Both had been purchased by a representative of Clarence W. Barron.

Last year the highest premium was $61, and the year before it was $78. All in all, though, the average paid for seats was higher this year and throughout the day the demand was heavy. Most of the bidding was done by ticket brokers, although in a few instances the actual purchasers were present and seemed to enjoy keenly the sharp competition for certain desired seats.

The aisle seat at the extreme right brought $26.50, the next one $23, and the next two $24.50. Then the prices went up rapidly until No. 19, an aisle seat, was reached. Several seemed determined to possess this place, and after starting at $20 the persistent rivalry carried the price to $70. Curiously, the corresponding seat across the aisle brought only $35.50. A repetition of this rivalry occurred in the bidding for No. 19, in the row behind. When the central seats were reached one man bid $70, but instead of taking a single seat he selected three, 17 and 18 on one side of the central aisle, and No. 19 opposite. In row D the prices ranged from $20.50 to $40. Row E showed a better average, as the premiums ran from $22 to $43, the latter price being paid for two end seats. In F the range was from $26.50 to $36, G, $31 to $43, J, from $27 to $48, the latter price being paid for those seats which in the row in front had brought $70. The sum of $68 was the highest premium received for a single seat in K, while $62 each was paid for four places in the same row. A single sitting in L brought $58, while $48 was the highest price paid in row N, and $54 for places in O.

BOSTON POST

SEPTEMBER 30,

DR. MUCK IS IN BOSTON FOR SEASON

Symphony Conductor Says Novelties Are Scarce

On their arrival in Boston yesterday afternoon, Dr. and Mrs. Muck went immediately out to the Somerset Hotel, where apartments had been prepared for them, and where they will stay for a few days, and then repair to the Brae-Burn Country Club.

Dr. Muck is very fond of this place, where he passed many pleasant hours last spring while recuperating from a serious operation upon his throat.

PROGRAMMES TODAY

Dr. [illegible]uck did not announce his pro[illegible] yesterday, but they will be [illegible]ed tomorrow. He said in a gen[illegible]ay, that good novelties were [illegible] this year, but that his pro[illegible]mes would contain several of the [illegible] promising, while for the rest, the [illegible]mphony programmes would offer a [illegible]end of the classic and modern schools, and of certain of the most important works produced last season, which in the opinion of Dr. Muck will well bear repetition.

Dr. Muck came over on the North German Lloyd steamer George Washington, landing in New York Sunday afternoon. It was the first of the "musical ships," for with him as fellow passengers were Alfred Hertz, conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, and Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, and Mme. Gadski.

Almost as soon as he arrived in Boston, he went directly to Symphony Hall and started to work in the library. As has been his custom in the past, he was rather unwilling to discuss his [illegible]s for the season.

[illegible] remarked at the beginning that in [illegible] matter of novelties this was quite [illegible]most unfruitful year he had ever [illegible]. Never had there been so few works of any merit published. He [illegible]owever, brought over with him [illegible] which will appear on the pro[illegible]s during the season. The one [illegible] in bulk is a new symphony by [illegible]h Noren. Noren is known here [illegible] by his theme and variations for [illegible]tra, which he called "Kaleido[illegible]," which was played here Dec. 11 [illegible]12, 1908. This new symphony he [illegible]amed "Vita." It was played for [illegible]st time in Dresden last spring.

[illegible]other novelty will be a symphonic [illegible] by Reznicek, best known as the [illegible]poser of the successful opera, "Don-Diana." This symphonic poem is [illegible]d "Peter Schlemin," and draws [illegible]piration, of course, from the fa- story of the man who lost his [illegible].

[illegible] Schillings, the present conductor [illegible]gart, whose name has appeared [illegible] Symphony programmes a num- [illegible] times, will be represented by [illegible]s called "Meergruss' and "See- [illegible] Another novelty which he [illegible] and one which is likely to [illegible]ch interest, is the symphonic [illegible]lome," by the French com- [illegible]entin Schmidt. Of the younger [illegible] at work in Paris, Schmidt is [illegible] by all odds the most prom- [illegible]

[illegible] said that within two or [illegible]s there would be three or short pieces by Fritz Delius [illegible]n Leipsic, and they were to [illegible] him at once.

BOSTON GLOBE—

SEPTEMBER 30,

DR MUCK ARRIVES.

Reports Great Dearth o Good Novelties.

Says Impresario at Madrid Wi Begin "Parsifal" at 11 P M.

Dr Karl Muck, accompanied by M Muck, arrived in Boston yesterd afternoon for the new season of Sy phony concerts. Genially imperturba in mood as ever, and quite as amia ironical, he appeared in excellent spir for the Winter's work.

He insisted that he had heard [illegible] music, had given but little thought it, and had played golf and tramped i the mountains near his country home a Grats, to all of which his bronzed features gave good proof.

After alighting from the train at South Station the doctor's first care, with the aid of Publicity Manager Walter, was to get "Jack" out of the baggage car. "Jack" hadn't been on land long enough in New York "to get some of the Max Reger out of his system," as the doctor said, so he raced along on the leash as any full-blooded, conscientious Boston terrier ought to do who is leading one of the three or four greatest conductors alive a chase through the station on his return to Boston and its greatest orchestra in the world. The precise [illegible]aluation in money of the two might [illegible]e a pretty problem to figure out. Anyway, Mrs Muck and others who looked [illegible]n were amused at the procession.

Arnold Schoenberg, who has succeeded in making his music cause riots in Berlin, would not have been flattered could he have seen Dr Muck and the face he made when asked whether or not he would play some of it here—a face that would promise little immediate hope for Mr Schoenberg at Symphony Hall, a Mephistophelean grimace of scornful disdain that made words pale.

"Then he is as bad as he was last year?"

"Worse." With a heavy cymbal crash on the middle of the word, and then another face.

Mr Schoenberg at any rate may say that he has made a deep impression.

"Did you write any music this Summer, doctor?"

"What, I?"

Another quizzical look out of the eyes that always let you know that they are keeping back more than they say.

"Once when I was 17 I took a prize for a symphony," expressive pantomime with the hands of a kind to express dismissal, conclusion, never again and such sentiments that otherwise suggest absolute finality. To convey the laconic and introspective brevity of this speech without a phonograph is not easy.

"If one ever writes a symphony or opera and wins a prize"—more pantomime—"it is time to stop. These prize symphonies and operas, well"—more shrugs, quizzical looks and pantomime.

Mrs Muck and Mr Walter were waiting in the taxi and the valuation of prize pieces must be left to the reader's imagination.

Dr Muck said that he had known Alfred Holy, the new Symphony harpist, for 20 years.

"I have not heard the harpist of the Metropolitan Opera House, but Mr Holy (pronounced by Dr Muck Holly) is the best harpist I know in the world."

The doctor remarked at the beginning that in the matter of novelties this was quite the most unfruitful year he had ever known. Never had there been so few new works published of any merit. He has, however, brought over with him several which will appear on the programs during the season. The one largest in bulk is a new symphony by Heinrich Noren, known here for his "Kaleidoscope" played three seasons ago. There will be other novelties by Reznicek, by Max Schillings, the conductor at Stuttgart; by Florent Schmidt, some new short pieces by Delius, and strangely enough a "novelty" by Liszt, a symphonic poem based upon a poem of Victor Hugo.

Dr Muck says there will be an orgy of "Parsifal" all over Europe beginning the first of the year. The copyright expires at 12 o'clock (midnight) on D[illegible] 31. The impresario at Madrid, Sp[illegible], figuring out the difference of time [illegible] he can therefore begin his first performance at 11 o'clock and still be within the law.

As fellow-passengers on his return trip on the George Washington Dr Muck had Alfred Hertz, conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House; Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, and Mme Gadski. The doctor went at once to the orchestra library in Symphony Hall to begin work. For a few days he and Mrs Muck will be at the Somerset, then at the Brae-Burn Country Club until their apartment on Commonwealth av is ready.

BOSTON GLOBE—

SEPTEMBER 30.

PREMIUMS WELL UP.

Spirited Bidding for Symphony Seats.

Many Women Present to Execute Their Own Commissions.

Symphony Orchestra patrons had to pay well for season tickets to the Friday afternoon rehearsals at the auction of seats yesterday at Symphony Hall, some of the prices being well above those of a year ago.

The record morning price was paid by a representative of Clarence W. Barron, whose heart was set on a pair of seats in row M, and he had to pay a premium of $73 above the price of $18 to get one of them. Several others who had special preferences for seats had to pay $70 premium on each of their tickets.

A feature of the sale was the bidding of many women, who, instead of entrusting their commission to agents, themselves attended, making spirited bidding thereby.

The first seat offered proved the bargain of the morning session, A1, going for the small premium of $17. All of A row had lively takers, despite the fact that these seats are near the stage.

The high-priced seats were in the rows behind row G, some of the seats in H going for $70, while others in the same row, close to them, went for about half that figure. The same price was reached in row I, but in rows J, K and L the bidding fell off a bit. In M someone besides Mr Barron desired the seats on the left aisle, and by leaps and bounds the price soared until Mr Barron's representative held the field [illegible] making a total price of $91 for [illegible] As last year, the prices for [illegible] the floor did not go [illegible] seemed certain that [illegible]ited Symphony [illegible] the rear up to $10 seats went [illegible] prices keeping [illegible] highly prized by [illegible] auctioned in the late [illegible] prices being well up. [illegible] price paid was a $71 pre- [illegible] sale will [illegible]

TRANSCRIPT
SEPTEMBER 29, 1913

SINGLE SYMPHONY SEAT BRING $73 AT TODAY'S SALE

AUCTION PRICES AS A RULE HIGHER THAN THOSE OF LAST YEAR—DR. MUCK REACHES BOSTON TODAY

From indications the premiums for the Symphony rehearsals on Friday afternoons will exceed those of a year ago. At the first of the auction sales in Symphony Hall this morning, as usual conducted by Walter Jackson, $73 was paid for M. 18, an end seat, and the next to it brought $50. Both seats were purchased by a representative of Clarence W. Barron. Last year the highest premium was $61 and the year before the highest was $78. The audience at this morning's sale comprised many women and a few men, and as usual there was careful explanation that the bids simply represented premiums above the regular subscription price of $18 for each ticket.

During the morning there were inquiries for Dr. Karl Muck, the leader of the Symphony band, and friends of the conductor learned that he reached New York Sunday with Mrs. Muck, on the steamship George Washington. W. E. Walter of the Symphony Hall staff left on the noon train for Providence to meet Dr. and Mrs. Muck and upon arriving at the Back Bay Station this afternoon they were escorted to the Brae-Burn Club at Auburndale, where they will make their headquarters for the rest of the week. Dr. Muck is fond of this club and after his illness in December he was taken there to recuperate and was so delighted with the place and its surroundings that he became a member and visited it several times before he left for Europe. In the spring Dr. Muck learned to play golf and he will probably indulge in the game during the week. He will meet his orchestra next Monday morning when the season's rehearsals will begin.

Max Zach, a former member of the Symphony Orchestra, and for several years conductor of the Symphony band in St. Louis, was at the sale and was cordially greeted by many friends. He was present to purchase seats for members of his family. He will return to St. Louis in a fortnight to begin rehearsals.

The auction developed no spirited bidding until row H was reached. The aisle seat at the extreme right brought $26.50, the next one $23, and the next two $24.50. Then the prices went up rapidly until No. 19, an aisle seat, was reached. Several seemed determined to possess this place, and after starting at $20 the persistent rivalry carried the price to $70. Curiously, the corresponding seat across the aisle brought only $35.50. A repetition of this rivalry occurred in the bidding for No. 19, in the row behind. When the central seats were reached one man bid $70, but instead of taking a single seat he selected three, 17 and 18 on one side of the central aisle, and No. 19 opposite In row D the prices ranged from $20.50 to $40. Row E showed a better average, as the premiums ran from $22 to $48, the latter price being paid for two end seats. In F the range was from $26.50 to $36, G, $31 to $43, J, from [illegible] to $48, the latter price being paid for those seats which in the row in front had brought $70. The sum of $68 was the highest premium received for a single seat in [illegible], while $62 each was paid for four places in the same row. A single sitting in L brought $58, while $48 was the highest price paid in row N, and $54 for places in O.

Tomorrow morning the sale will be resumed with the $10 seats.

RECORD. MONDAY. SEPTEMBER 29, 1913

Good Prices for Symphony Seats

The auction sale of $18 seats for Friday afternoon's public rehearsal for 33d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened at Symphony Hall this morning.

The bids for the premium on each seat were to be added to the $18 regular price of seats.

Up to the noon hour only the first nine rows had been auctioned off. In the first five rows premiums commanded compared favorably with last year. In several instances desirable seats on the aisle were bid up sharply.

H row center aisle seat sold at $70 premium. Last year high premium for H row was $58. In row I the highest price was $70 for a center aisle seat. Last year high for row I was $49. Second seat in on center aisle of I row sold at $46 premium. J row seats on center aisle commanded [illegible] premium each.

BOSTON HERALD, TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 1913.

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR RETURNS FROM EUROPE

Dr. Karl Muck, Conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, Who Arrived Yesterday After Passing Summer Abroad.

Dr. Karl Muck Gives Inkling of Some New Works That Will Be Played by Orchestra This Season—He Has Symphonic Poem by Liszt That He Thinks Has Not Been Heard Here.

Refreshed by a long vacation abroad, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Symphony orchestra, arrived in this city yesterday from New York, prepared to give Boston one of the best musical seasons of its history. He was accompanied by Mrs. Muck, and with them was "Jack," the Boston terrier which has been their inseparable companion for the last five years.

Dr. Muck, when met at the train, was rather reticent to discuss his plans for the coming season. Finally, though, he consented to speak of them, and many interesting details concerning the coming Symphony season were disclosed. Among other things, Dr. Muck let it be known that two pieces called "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," by Max Schillings, the present conductor at Stuttgart, would be played this year.

Dr. Muck came over from Europe on the North German Lloyd liner, George Washington, landing in New York on Sunday. It was the first of the "musical ships," for with Dr. Muck as passengers were Alfred Hertz, conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House in New York; Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia orchestra, and Mme. Gadski.

"I'm glad to be here," he declared as he alighted from the train. "And it seems good to see the sun shining. For four weeks while we were in Europe we saw nothing but rain and fog. It was nearly as bad in Gratz, where I spent July."

The Symphony conductor seemed inclined to continue with such generalities indefinitely. But pressed to tell of his plans for the coming season, he declared at first that the year was quite unfruitful of novelties.

In fact," he said, "I have seldom known a year during which there have been so few works of merit published.

"I have brought over several, though," he continued, "which I deem worthy of giving this season. The one in largest bulk is a new symphony by Heinrich Noren. Noren is known here solely by his theme and variations for orchestra, which he called 'Kaleidoscope.' It was played here in December, 1908. The new symphony he has named 'Vita.' It was played for the first time last spring."

Another novelty, he declared, would be a symphonic poem by Rexnicek, best known as the composer of the successful opera "Donna Diana." The new piece is entitled "Peter Schlemihl," and draws its inspiration from the famous story of the man who lost his shadow. Dr. Muck then told of the music of Max Schillings, which would be given.

"We will also play, odd as it may seem, a novelty by Liszt. It will be a symphonic poem entitled "Ce qu'on Entend sur la Montagne," founded on a poem by Victor Hugo. Although it is one of the earliest and, from all accounts, one of the most beautiful of Liszt's symphonic poems, it has never been played by the Symphony Orchestra. And it is a question whether or not it has ever been played in Boston."

Among the interesting revivals that Dr. Muck plans is that of Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor, which enjoyed such remarkable success here under Mr. Fiedler a few years ago. He also will play again the great Mahler symphony, which was, in a sense, the sensation of last season. It is very likely, too, that he will play Bruckner's night symphony, "The Unfinished."

Dr. Muck also has decided to play the Beethoven symphonies that were not on the program last year; the usual Haydn and Mozart symphonies and Bach's Brandenburg concerts. All in all, Dr. Muck plans to distribute his program between the classic and modern, much as he did last season.

The Symphony orchestra leader will begin his work early this year. On Thursday evening, Oct. 9, the evening before the first public rehearsal, he will conduct a concert given by the Bankers' Association of this city as a compliment to the visiting delegates to the convention. He has not, though, made up his mind as to his first program, and yesterday he would not give even an intimation as to what pieces he might choose.

Dr. Muck on his way to this country, stopped only four days in Berlin, and he was unable to say much about musical conditions there. He declared, however, that there was to be an orgy of "Parsifal" all over Europe beginning the first of the year.

"Mme. Wagner is accepting the inevitable," he said. "The copyright of 'Parsifal' expires at 12 o'clock (midnight), on the 31st of December, and the first performance will be given at Madrid on the 31st beginning at 11 o'clock. The Spanish impresario figures that the difference in time between Madrid and Germany will allow him so much leeway to anticipate all the other opera houses on the other side of the Atlantic."

BOSTON POST, SEPTEMBER 30,

SEATS FOR SYMPHONY AUCTIONED

$73 Record Price Paid During Day

The net result of the first auction sale of seats for the 1913-14 season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place yesterday in Symphony Hall, was an average bidding, which totalled up to a figure very close to that of last year's opening sale.

TOOK ALL DAY

The $18 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals were disposed of yesterday, and the process took from 10 a. m. until about 6:30. The bidding was brisk and generally even in the morning. In the afternoon there was some exciting sky-rocketing of prices for certain seats in the first balcony. Thus, seats 49 and 50 in Row B, the second row on the right of the first balcony, brought $71 dollars.

This was $2 less than the premium paid by W. C. Barron of Boston, $73, for seat No. 18, in Row M, on the floor. Four seats, Nos. 27 to 30 in C, the last row on the left of the first balcony, brought $61 each, a very unusual bid, due perhaps, to the values which women who patronize these Friday afternoon functions attach to one of the few places in the house where they can keep on their hats, the last row on each side of the first and second balconies being against the walls of the hall.

$10 Seats Today

In a similar manner No. 19, Row H, on the floor, was bid up from $20 to $70 by someone who had evidently determined to get that seat. Here and there individuals or agents revived interest into a sale which was not of a particularly spectacular nature by such bids. But one of the Symphony officials at the end of the sale was of the opinion that its total results would not differ one way or the other from the results of the same sale last season by more than $500.

The auction sale at Symphony Hall today will be very short, lasting less than two hours, as only a few seats are to be sold. These are the seats for the public rehearsals, on which an upset price of $10 is set. They comprise the last eight rows on the floor and the last five rows in the first balcony.

MONITOR, BOSTON, I SEPTEMBER 9,

SEASON SEATS FOR SYMPHONY BRING A PREMIUM OF $76

Central Locations Among $18 Chairs at $94 Is Far in Lead of Average High Bid—Nearby Seats Go for $50 Premium—Prices High From A Through T

For seats in the center of the house, a subscriber paid a premium of $76 at the auction sale of $18 season tickets for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Boston Symphony orchestra today. This price was far in the lead of the average high bidding. Bids for locations in the neighborhood of these seats were in the neighborhood of $50.

Premiums steadily rose from the first offering of row A and reached high points after row I and continued high through to T. The first seats in A went for a premium of $14.50. Seats in the center of the hall sold all the way from $27 to $53 over the fixed price of $18.

More subscribers appeared in person to buy seats for this season than has been customary in former years, when agents have done a great deal of the bidding. Consequently there was a large attendance.

The places at the ends of the rows sold at lower prices than those in the center, but frequently there was a sharp line of division that the advantage in cation would hardly seem to war
For example, E. 1 and 2 went premium of $22 and seats a little on went for $33. In some cas seats went lower than inside sea

In some cases seats near the c at better rates than those in th of the row. For Q 3 and 4, close to the balcony, right, a premium of $52 was paid and for seats near the middle of the same row the premium was $32.50.

As soon as those who purchased went home, other bidders came in to take their places, knowing from experience with former sales about the time the part of the hall they wanted to buy in would be ready for sale.

The rehearsal sale for the better floor seats and the front rows of the first balcony lasts throughout the day. There will be a short sale on Tuesday to dispose of the back seats of the house. The Saturday concert sale opens Thursday.

tion, have proved more

AY, SEPTEMBER 30, 1913.

DR. KARL MUCK, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Muck, arriving here after spending the summer abroad.

Dr. Karl Muck Here With New Features For the Symphony

DR. KARL MUCK, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived here yesterday afternoon from New York, where he disembarked from the steamer George Washington Sunday evening. He was met at Providence by W. E. Walter of the Symphony Hall staff and taken at once to the Brae-Burn Club at Auburndale, where he will reside for the coming month.

Mrs. Muck accompanied the director, who declared that he is now in perfect health, having taken a complete rest from musical work during his sojourn abroad. He has completely recovered from the throat affection which caused his retirement early last season. During his period of rest Dr. Muck has learned to play golf and will devote much of his spare time to practise at the Brae-Burn Club links.

The season's rehearsals will begin next Monday, and when the regular program is begun Dr. and Mrs. Muck will take up their residence in their former apartments on Commonwealth avenue.

Dr. Muck remarked that in the matter of novelties this was quite the most unfruitful year he had ever known. He has, however, brought over with hi[illegible] several which will appear on the programs during the season. The o[illegible] largest in bulk is a new symphony by Heinrich Noren, known here solely by his theme and variations for orchestra, which he called "Kaleidoscope."

Another novelty will be a symphonic poem by Reznicek, best known as the composer of the successful opera "Donna Diana." This symphonic poem is entitled "Peter Schlemihl," and draws its inspiration, of course, from the famous story of the man who lost his shadow.

Max Schillings, the present conductor at Stuttgart, whose name has appeared on the Symphony programs a number of times, will be represented by two pieces called "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen." Another novelty which he may play, and one which is likely to excite much interest, is the symphonic poem, "Salome," by the French composer, Florentin Schmidt.

Dr. Muck said that within two or three weeks there would be three or four new short pieces by Fritz Dolius published in Leipsic, and they will be sent to him at once.

He will also play "a novelty" by Liszt. This is a symphonic poem, entitled "Ce qu'on entend sur la montagne," founded on the poem of Victor Hugo.

Among the interesting revivals that Dr. Muck plans is that of Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor. He will also play again the great Mahler Symphony and Bruckner's Symphony called "The Unfinished."

High Prices Are Obtained at Sale Of Symphony Seats

HIGH prices prevailed at the auction sale of seats for Friday afternoon Symphony rehearsals, held yesterday in Symphony Hall. An end seat, M 18, brought $73, and the seat next it, $50. Both were bought for Clarence W. Barron. Last year the highest premium was $61. These prices, of course, represent premiums above the regular price of $18 for each seat.

There was no spirited bidding until row H was reached. The aisle seat on the right brought $26.50, the next one $23, and the two beyond $24.50. No. 19, an aisle seat, was the subject of lively bidding, and was finally sold at the premium of $70. Strangely enough, the seat on the other side of the aisle went at only $35.50.

Another instance of keen rivalry occurred in the bidding for No. 19, in the next row. When the central seats were reached, one man bid $70, but instead of taking a single seat he selected three, 17 and 18 on one side of the central aisle, and No. 19 opposite.

The sum of $68 was the highest price received for a single seat in K, but $62 each was paid for four places in the same row. A single seat in L brought $58, one in N $48, and one in O $54.

This morning the sale will cover on[illegible] the $10 seats, comprising the last eig[illegible] rows on the floor and the last five rows in the first balcony. This sale will probably last only about two hours.

BOSTON POST,
OCTOBER 11, 1913

OLD FRIENDS AT REHEARSAL

First Public Performanc of Symphony of Season

BY OLIN DOWNES

Dr. Muck, as is now well-known, prefers to rest the burden of a conce[illegible] upon the effect of well known maste[illegible] pieces, well performed, rather than u[illegible] on some extensively advertised novelt[illegible] Yesterday afternoon the first public rehearsal audience of this season gathered for its first concert by the Bost[illegible] Symphony Orchestra in Symphony H[illegible] The audience was that of last year, t[illegible] year before, and the year before that. The programme was not guilty of new things: The Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, Brahm's "Tragic Overture," Liszt's "Les Preludes," Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

The first two movements of the symphony are undoubtedly among the greatest music that Beethoven composed. The somewhat Haydenish scherzo could be given with fewer repeats, it seems, in spite of the rare beauty of trio. The final movement, in common with the first two, was played with exceptional comprehensiveness and effect, and the opening of this symphony of Beethoven seemed not less noble or profound in its meaning, as, with the great chords of the orchestra, the very portals of another realm seem to swing back, than for instance, that gigantic page of Strauss, the sunrise music from "Zarathustra." Nor did Strauss ever achieve greater things than the sheer rapture of that introduction, as the strings dance up to heaven on a ladder of tone, or the mysterious ushering in of the movement proper. The endless metamorphosis of the rythmic figure that is the subject of this movement the endless wealth of invention, the unending inspiration of this music is pas[illegible] all speech, as is the heavenly melan[illegible] following movement.

[illegible] is concerned [illegible] symphonic which remains one of the best show-pieces for orchestra, stood out brilliantly. The tone poem is old. The utmost was done for it, however, that could be done, and the splurge of the thing captured the fancy of the audience, as it has these many years. Deny Liszt what you please he could and he can arouse his audience. Thanks to Dr. Muck's splendid reading of the music it shone like a rusty but refurbished bit of metal. It galloped about proudly in its old age, and had again some momentary lustiness of youth.

As for the Brahms "Tragic" overture, there are certain heroic pages of it that do indeed suggest the grand and fateful character of classic tragedy. The opening theme is a theme that might be heard in an orchestra for Sophocles. There is a superb objectiveness, aloofness in this music, in spite of its strength, and its dark, brooding character, and finally there is the calmness of fulfilment, of the fates appeased, and deeds fulfilled.

And in spite of the lurid, plunging piece of Listz, the Wagner overture was twice as spectacular, and yet of nature, and of the hectic romanticism that characterizes Liszt's music. Liszt's piece is not less appropriate to its origin—the poem of Lamartine. In fact, it is a most sympathetic echo of this poem in its spirit and its style. But after Liszt the music of Wagner was as refreshing as must have been the music of Weber before Wagner, when it came like a cool breeze from the forests of Germany. The audience at this concert was numerous and respectable and enthusiastic. A tea party or a family gathering would be no more intimate or entirely right.

From EVG. NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT

KARL MUCK BRINGS NEW SYMPHONY SCORE

Boston Orchestra Conductor Says There Is No Novelty This Year.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his return from Europe last Tuesday, said he did not have a brilliant list of novelties to offer to the patrons of the orchestra the coming winter, as the past year had been most unfruitful in this direction.

He has brought back with him the score of the new symphony by Heinrich Noren of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita."

He has a symphonic poem by Reznicek, composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is called "Peter Schlemihl", the source of its inspiration, of course, being the famous story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Schilling, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and he will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachmaninoff's Fifth Symphony in E minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston as well as in Boston Mohler's Fifth Symphony, which had such a sensational success in Boston last spring.

From GLOBE
Address: New York
Date OCT

Music.

New Compositions to Be Heard in New York—Notes.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his return from Europe said that he did not have a brilliant list of novelties to offer to the patrons of the orchestra the coming winter, as the past year had been most unfruitful in this direction. He has brought back with him the score of the new symphony by Heinrich Noren, of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita." He has a symphonic poem by Reznicek, composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is called "Peter Schlemihl," the source of its inspiration, of course, being the famous story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Schillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and he will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston as well as in Boston Mahler's fifth symphony, which had such an extraordinarily sensational success in Boston last spring.

Miss Winnifred Bambrick, a young Canadian harp virtuoso, will make her New York début at Æolian [illegible] on Wednesday, [illegible]

20

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date OCT 5 - 1913

1884

Symphonie-Konzerte.

Dr. Muck, der Leiter des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters, kann diesmal angeſichts der Unfruchtbarkeit der gegenwärtigen Produktion auf keine beſonders imponirende Novitätenliſte hinweiſen. Er kündigt folgende Neuheiten an: eine neue Symphonie von Heinrich Noren, Dresden, „Vita" genannt; „Peter Schlemiehl", ein ſymphoniſches Poëm von Reznicżek; „Meergruß" und „Seemorgen" von Max Schillings und zwei neue kürzere Werke von Fritz Delius. Ferner ſoll Rachmaninoff's zweite und Mahler's Fünfte Symphonie, welche ſich in Boſton im verfloſſenen Frühjahr einer beſonders warmen Aufnahme zu rühmen hatten, dieſes Jahr auch außerhalb Boſton's aufgeführt werden.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date P 28 1913

Estal 84

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts who have renewed for the coming season have until Wednesday, October 1, in which to take up their tickets. The tickets are ready at the office of Miss H. Harris, Heppe's piano rooms, and there can be no guarantee that tickets not taken up by that time can be held any longer. There is a long list of new applicants for tickets whose requirements are to be filled before the opening of the general sale. The general sale of season tickets will open at Miss Harris' office Monday, October 13.

rk, 188

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date OCT 5 191

E 1884

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his return from Europe last Tuesday, said that he did not have a brilliant list of novelties to offer to the patrons of the orchestra the coming winter, as the past year had been most unfruitful in this direction. He has brought back with him the score of the new symphony by Heinrich Noren, of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme, and set of variations which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita." He has a symphonic poem by Reznicek, composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is called "Peter Schlemihl," the source of its inspiration, of course, being the famous story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Schillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and he will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston as well as in Boston Mahler's Fifth Symphony, which had such an extraordinarily sensational success in Boston last spring.

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date OCT 5 1913

Establi 884

Mrs. Katie Wilson-Greene, local manager of the concerts given annually in Washington by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces many renewals of subscriptions for this season. The concerts, five in number, will be given as usual Tuesday afternoons, at 4:30 o'clock. The dates are November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. The soloists make an unusually brilliant list, and comprise Fritz Kreisler, Teresa Carreno, Paderewski and Elizabeth Boehn van Endert, of the principal lyric soprano of the Royal [illegible]ra, Berlin.

[illegible] Karl Muck, the conductor, will [illegible] in this country from his home [illegible] the end of this month.

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date SEP 28 1913

rk, 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

W. A. Albaugh, the local representative of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has now the season tickets for the series which the orchestra will give in this city during the coming winter. Those who have subscribed may now get them. Attention should be called to the fact that season tickets already subscribed for must be taken up before Wednesday, October 1. On that day all tickets which have not been taken by last year's subscribers will be used to fill applications of new subscribers and the general sale of such tickets will open at Albaugh's Ticket Office Monday, October 13.

AY, SEPTEMBER 30, 1913.

DR. KARL MUCK, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Muck, arriving here after spending the summer abroad.

Dr. Karl Muck Here With New Features For the Symphony

DR. KARL MUCK, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived here yesterday afternoon from New York, where he disembarked from the steamer George Washington Sunday evening. He was met at Providence by W. E. Walter of the Symphony Hall staff and taken at once to the Brae-Burn Club at Auburndale, where he will reside for the coming month.

Mrs. Muck accompanied the director, who declared that he is now in perfect health, having taken a complete rest from musical work during his sojourn abroad. He has completely recovered from the throat affection which caused his retirement early last season. During his period of rest Dr. Muck has learned to play golf and will devote much of his spare time to practise at the Brae-Burn Club links.

The season's rehearsals will begin next Monday, and when the regular program is begun Dr. and Mrs. Muck will take up their residence in their former apartments on Commonwealth avenue.

Dr. Muck remarked that in the matter of novelties this was quite the most unfruitful year he had ever known. He has, however, brought over with him several which will appear on the programs during the season. The one largest in bulk is a new symphony by Heinrich Noren, known here solely by his theme and variations for orchestra, which he called "Kaleidoscope."

Another novelty will be a symphonic poem by Reznicek, best known as the composer of the successful opera "Donna Diana." This symphonic poem is entitled "Peter Schlemihl," and draws its inspiration, of course, from the famous story of the man who lost his shadow.

Max Schillings, the present conductor at Stuttgart, whose name has appeared on the Symphony programs a number of times, will be represented by two pieces called "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen." Another novelty which he may play, and one which is likely to excite much interest, is the symphonic poem, "Salome," by the French composer, Florentin Schmidt.

Dr. Muck said that within two or three weeks there would be three or four new short pieces by Fritz Dolius published in Leipsic, and they will be sent to him at once.

He will also play "a novelty" by Liszt. This is a symphonic poem, entitled "Ce qu'on entend sur la montagne," founded on the poem of Victor Hugo.

Among the interesting revivals that Dr. Muck plans is that of Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor. He will also play again the great Mahler Symphony and Bruckner's Symphony called "The Unfinished."

High Prices Are Obtained at Sale Of Symphony Seats

HIGH prices prevailed at the auction sale of seats for Friday afternoon Symphony rehearsals, held yesterday in Symphony Hall. An end seat, M 18, brought $73, and the seat next it, $50. Both were bought for Clarence W. Barron. Last year the highest premium was $61. These prices, of course, represent premiums above the regular price of $18 for each seat.

There was no spirited bidding until row H was reached. The aisle seat on the right brought $26.50, the next one $23, and the two beyond $24.50. No. 19, an aisle seat, was the subject of lively bidding, and was finally sold at the premium of $70. Strangely enough, the seat on the other side of the aisle went at only $35.50.

Another instance of keen rivalry occurred in the bidding for No. 19, in the next row. When the central seats were reached, one man bid $70, but instead of taking a single seat he selected three, 17 and 18 on one side of the central aisle, and No. 19 opposite.

The sum of $68 was the highest price received for a single seat in K, but $62 each was paid for four places in the same row. A single seat in L brought $58, one in N $48, and one in O $54.

This morning the sale will cover only the $10 seats, comprising the last eight rows on the floor and the last five rows in the first balcony. This sale will probably last only about two hours.

BOSTON POST,
OCTOBER 11, 1913

OLD FRIENDS AT REHEARSAL

First Public Performance of Symphony of Season

BY OLIN DOWNES

Dr. Muck, as is now well-known, prefers to rest the burden of a concert upon the effect of well known masterpieces, well performed, rather than upon some extensively advertised novelty. Yesterday afternoon the first public rehearsal audience of this season gathered for its first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. The audience was that of last year, the year before, and the year before that. The programme was not guilty of new things: The Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, Brahm's "Tragic Overture," Liszt's "Les Preludes," Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

The first two movements of the symphony are undoubtedly among the greatest music that Beethoven composed. The somewhat Haydenish scherzo could be given with fewer repeats, it seems, in spite of the rare beauty of trio. The final movement, in common with the first two, was played with exceptional comprehensiveness and effect, and the opening of this symphony of Beethoven seemed not less noble or profound in its meaning, as, with the great chords of the orchestra, the very portals of another realm seem to swing back, than for instance, that gigantic page of Strauss, the sunrise music from "Zarathustra." Nor did Strauss ever achieve greater things than the sheer rapture of that introduction, as the strings dance up to heaven on a ladder of tone, or the mysterious ushering in of the movement proper. The endless metamorphosis of the rythmic figure that is the subject of this movement, the endless wealth of invention, the unending inspiration of this music is past all speech, as is the heavenly melancholy of the following movement.

[illegible] mance is con[illegible] [illegible] phonic which remains one of the best show-pieces for orchestra, stood out brilliantly. The tone poem is old. The utmost was done for it, however, that could be done, and the splurge of the thing captured the fancy of the audience, as it has these many years. Deny Liszt what you please he could and he can arouse his audience. Thanks to Dr. Muck's splendid reading of the music it shone like a rusty but refurbished bit of metal. It galloped about proudly in its old age, and had again some momentary lustiness of youth.

As for the Brahms "Tragic" overture, there are certain heroic pages of it that do indeed suggest the grand and fateful character of classic tragedy. The opening theme is a theme that might be heard in an orchestra for Sophocles. There is a superb objectiveness, aloofness in this music, in spite of its strength, and its dark, brooding character, and finally there is the calmness of fulfilment, of the fates appeased, and deeds fulfilled.

And in spite of the lurid, plunging piece of Liszt, the Wagner overture was twice as spectacular, and yet of nature, and of the hectic romanticism that characterizes Liszt's music. Liszt's piece is not less appropriate to its origin—the poem of Lamartine. In fact, it is a most sympathetic echo of this poem in its spirit and its style. But after Liszt the music of Wagner was as refreshing as must have been the music of Weber before Wagner, when it came like a cool breeze from the forests of Germany. The audience at this concert was numerous and respectable and enthusiastic. A tea party or a family gathering would be no more intimate or entirely right.

From EVG. NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT

KARL MUCK BRINGS NEW SYMPHONY SCORE

Boston Orchestra Conductor Says There Is No Novelty This Year.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his return from Europe last Tuesday, said he did not have a brilliant list of novelties to offer to the patrons of the orchestra the coming winter, as the past year had been most unfruitful in this direction.

He has brought back with him the score of the new symphony by Heinrich Noren of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita."

He has a symphonic poem by Reznicek, composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is called "Peter Schlemihl", the source of its inspiration, of course, being the famous story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Schilling, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and he will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachmaninoff's Fifth Symphony in E minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston as well as in Boston Mohler's Fifth Symphony, which had such a sensational success in Boston last spring.

From GLOBE
Address: New York
Date OCT

Music.

New Compositions to Be Heard in New York—Notes.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the [illegible]ston Symphony Orchestra, on his [illegible]rn from Europe said that he did not have a brilliant list of novelties to offer to the patrons of the orchestra the coming winter, as the past year had been most unfruitful in this direction. He has brought back with him the score of the new symphony by Heinrich Noren, of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita." He has a symphonic poem by Reznicek, composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is called "Peter Schlemihl," the source of its inspiration, of course, being the famous story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Schillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and he will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston as well as in Boston Mahler's fifth symphony, which had such an extraordinarily sensational success in Boston last spring.

Miss Winnifred Bambrick, a young Canadian harp virtuoso, will make her New York début at Æolian [illegible] on Wednesday, Oc[illegible]

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date OCT 5 - 1913

Symphonie-Konzerte.

Dr. Muck, der Leiter des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters, kann diesmal angeſichts der Unfruchtbarkeit der gegenwärtigen Produktion auf keine beſonders imponirende Novitätenliſte hinweiſen. Er kündigt folgende Neuheiten an: eine neue Symphonie von Heinrich Noren, Dresden, „Vita" genannt; „Peter Schlemiehl", ein ſymphoniſches Poëm von Rezniczek; „Meergruß" und „Seemorgen" von Max Schillings und zwei neue kürzere Werke von Fritz Delius. Ferner ſoll Rachmaninoff's zweite und Mahler's Fünfte Symphonie, welche ſich in Boſton im verfloſſenen Frühjahr einer beſonders warmen Aufnahme zu rühmen hatten, dieſes Jahr auch außerhalb Boſton's aufgeführt werden.

1884

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date P 28 1913

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts who have renewed for the coming season have until Wednesday, October 1, in which to take up their tickets. The tickets are ready at the office of Miss H. Harris, Heppe's piano rooms, and there can be no guarantee that tickets not taken up by that time can be held any longer. There is a long list of new applicants for tickets whose requirements are to be filled before the opening of the general sale. The general sale of season tickets will open at Miss Harris' office Monday, October 13.

Estal 84

rk, 1884

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date OCT 5 [illegible]

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his return from Europe last Tuesday, said that he did not have a brilliant list of novelties to offer to the patrons of the orchestra the coming winter, as the past year had been most unfruitful in this direction. He has brought back with him the score of the new symphony by Heinrich Noren, of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme, and set of variations which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita." He has a symphonic poem by Reznicek, composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is called "Peter Schlemihl," the source of its inspiration, of course, being the famous story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Schillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and he will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston as well as in Boston Mahler's Fifth Symphony, which had such an extraordinarily sensational success in Boston last spring.

E 1884

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date OCT 5 1913

Mrs. Katie Wilson-Greene, local manager of the concerts given annually in Washington by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces many renewals of subscriptions for this season. The concerts, five in number, will be given as usual Tuesday afternoons, at 4:30 o'clock. The dates are November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. The soloists make an unusually brilliant list, and comprise Fritz Kreisler, Teresa Carreno, Paderewski and Elizabeth Boehn van Endert, of the principal lyric soprano of the Royal [illegible]ra, Berlin.

[illegible] Karl Muck, the conductor, will [illegible] e in this country from his home [illegible] stria the end of this month.

Establi 884

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date SEP 28 1913

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

W. A. Albaugh, the local representative of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has now the season tickets for the series which the orchestra will give in this city during the coming winter. Those who have subscribed may now get them. Attention should be called to the fact that season tickets already subscribed for must be taken up before Wednesday, October 1. On that day all tickets which have not been taken by last year's subscribers will be used to fill applications of new subscribers and the general sale of such tickets will open at Albaugh's Ticket Office Monday, October 13.

rk, 1884

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. OCT 5 1913
Date

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his return from Europe last Tuesday, said that he did not have a brilliant list of novelties to offer to the patrons of the orchestra the coming winter, as the past year had been most unfruitful in this direction. He has brought back with him the score of the new symphony by Heinrich Noren, of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita."

He has a symphonic poem by Rexnicek, composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is called "Peter Schlemihl," the source of its inspiration, of course, being the famous story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Schillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and he will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston, as well as in Boston, Mahler's Fifth Symphony, which had such a success in Boston last spring.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York
Date

Mr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his return from Europe last Tuesday, brought back with him the score of a new symphony by Heinrich Noren of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita." He has also a symphonic poem by Reznicek, composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is called "Peter Schlemihl," the source of its inspiration, of course, being the famous story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Schillings, "Meergruse" and "Seemorgen," and he will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachamaninoff's symphony in B minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston as well as in Boston Mahler's fifth symphony which was so warmly received in Boston last Spring.

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 4 - 1913

DR. KARL MUCK, coductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has secured few novelties from Europe to offer to the patrons of the orchestra the coming winter, as the past year had been most unfruitful in this direction. He has brought back with him the score of the new symphony by Heinrich Moren, of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita." He has a symphonic poem by Renicek," composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is caled "Peter Schlemihl," the source of its inspiration, of course, being the famous story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Schillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and he will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E Minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play Mahler's Fifth Symphony, which had such an extraordinarily sensational success in Boston last spring.

1884

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
OCT 5 1913
Date

Mrs. Katie Wilson-Green, who is the local manager of the concerts given annually in Washington by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces that re-newals of subscriptions have come such a rate, and such a large nu of new applications for seats have received, that the New National Th will be sold out entirely for the sea The past two or three years have only been a very few seats taken up by subscribers, and this the prospect is that there will be n The concerts, five in number, will given as usual on Tuesday aftern at 4:30 o'clock. The dates are Nov ber 4, December 2, January 6, Febru 17, and March 17.

The soloists make an unusually b liant list. These comprise Fritz Kreisl Teresa Carreno, Paderewski, and Eli beth Boehn van Endert. Mme. v Endert is the principal lyric soprano the Royal Opera, Berlin, and comes this country to make her first appearances here as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In addition to the Boston Symphony concerts to be given under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene, she has the honor to present this season a number of the best artists for the pleasure of the Washington musical public. Among the concerts already arranged for are the following: M. Paderewski, pianist in recital, November 11; Mme. Bloomfield Zeisler, pianist in recital, November 21; Mme. Maggie Teyte, prima donna of the Chicago Grand Opera Company, in recital, December 9; M. Edward Clement, great French tenor of the Metropolitan and Boston Operas, date to be announced later; Mme. Schumann-Heink, contralto, date to be announced later; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, in recital, January 12; Ysaye, Godowsky, and Gerardy, in joint recital, January 23; Miss Alice Neilsen, prima donna of the Metropolitan and Boston Operas, February 4; John McCormack, great Irish tenor, March 20. A number of other concerts to be given under the local [illegible] Wilson-Greene

---

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date OCT 5 - 1913

***

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his return from Europe last Tuesday said that he did not have a brilliant list of novelties to offer to the patrons of the orchestra the coming Winter as the past year had been most unfruitful in this direction. He has brought back with him the score of the new symphony by Heinrich Noren of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita." He has a symphonic poem by Reznicek, composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is called "Peter Schlemihl," the source being the story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Schillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston as well as in Bost-
Mahler's Fi

From SUN
Address: New York City.
Date OCT 5 - 1913

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his return from Europe last Tuesday said that he did not have a brilliant list of novelties to offer to the patrons of the orchestra the coming winter, as the past year has been most unfruitful in this direction. He has brought back with him the score of the new symphony by Heinrich Noren of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita." He has a symphonic poem by Reznicek, composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is called "Peter Schlemihl," the source of its inspiration of course being the famous story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Schillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and he will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston as well as in Boston Mahler's Fifth Symphony, which had such an extraordinarily sensational success in Boston last spring.

Es 1884

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
SEP 28 1913
Date

7010 Germantown Avenue, Mt. Airy.

* * *

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts who have renewed for the coming season have until next Wednesday, October 1, in which to take up their tickets. The tickets are now ready at the office of Miss M. Harris, 1119 Chestnut Street, and there can be no guarantee that tickets not taken up by that time can be held any longer. There is a long list of new applicants for tickets whose requirements are to be filled before the opening of the general sale. The general sale of season tickets will open at Miss Harris' office, Monday, October 13.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City. OCT 5 - 1913
Date

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his return from Europe last Tuesday, said that he did not have a brilliant list of novelties to offer to the patrons of the orchestra the coming winter, as the last year had been most unfruitful in this direction. He has brought back with him the score of the new symphony by Heinrich Noren, of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita." He has a symphonic poem by Reznicek, composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is called "Peter Schlemihl," the source of its inspiration, of course, being the famous story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Schillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and he will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston, as well as in Boston, Mahler's Fifth Symphony.

From POST
Address: New OCT 4 1913
Date

Paderewski will arrive in New York next Tuesday. The great pianist returns after an absence of four years to make an all-season's tour of this country under the direction of C. A. Ellis, of Boston. So far as the greater part of the country is concerned, it will be his first tour in five years, for he was here only a few weeks in the season of 1908-9, having come here chiefly to hear the performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the Symphony which he had just finished. Mr. Paderewski's plans call for between eighty and ninety concerts and he will be in America until the latter part of April. His season begins in Trenton, N. J., October 13, to be followed by a concert in Jersey City on the 14th. His first appearance in New York will be in Aeolian Hall, Saturday afternoon, October 18, under the auspices of the Aeolian Company. Then he will make a short trip Westward, playing in Detroit, Ann Arbor, Toronto, Erie, and Buffalo. Returning to the East, he will give a series of recitals in the principal cities, and on the 1st of January he leaves for the West and the Pacific Coast, where he will be for approximately two months. Reports have it that Mr. Paderewski has not been in so good health for years, and is more than eager to begin the arduous labor of a long American tour.

Dr. Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has brought back from Europe the score of a new symphony by Heinrich Noren, of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of Variations which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita." He has a symphonic poem by Reznicek, composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is called "Peter Schlemihl," the source of its inspiration, of course, being the famous story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Schillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and he will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston as well as in Boston Mahler's Fifth Symphony, which had such an extraordinarily sensational success in Boston last spring.

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md. SEP 27 1913
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

W. A. Albaugh, the local representative of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has now the season tickets for the series which the orchestra will give in this city during the coming winter. Those who have subscribed may now get them. Attention should be called to the fact that season tickets already subscribed for must be taken up before Wednesday, October 1. On that day all tickets which have not been taken by last year's subscribers will be used to fill applications of new subscribers and the general sale of such tickets will open at Albaugh's Ticket Office Monday, October 13.

Es 1884

From EVG. NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date SEP 27 1913

Symphony Orchestra Season Tickets Rea

W. A. Albaugh, the local representative of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now has the season tickets for the series which the Orchestra will give in this city during the coming winter. Those who have subscribed may now get them.

Attention should be called to the fact that season tickets already subscribed for must be taken up before October 1. On that day all tickets which have not been taken by last year's subscribers will be used to fill applications of new subscribers, and the general sale of such tickets will open at Albaugh's ticket office on October 13.

Est 1884

From EVG. TELEGRAPH
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 4 - 1913

Carl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has recently returned from Europe, has announced that during his sojourn he discovered few novelties of sufficient merit to find place on the orchestra's program. Nevertheless, several new works are announced for performance, among them a new symphony, entitled "Vita," by Heinrich Horcn, of Dresden. Other novelties will include two pieces by Max Schillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and some short pieces by Fritz Delius. Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor No. 2 will [illegible] and it is probable that M[illegible] phony, which [illegible] spri[illegible]

From WORLD
Address: New York City.
Date OCT 5 1913

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his return from Europe last Tuesday, says that he will not have a brilliant list of novelties to offer to the patrons of the orchestra the coming winter, as the past year had been most unfruitful in this direction. He has brought back with him the score of the new symphony by Heinrich Noren of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations, which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita."

Dr. Muck has a symphonic poem by Reznicek, composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is called "Peter Schlemihl," the source of its inspiration of course being the famous story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Schillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and he will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius.

Dr. Muck purposes reviving this year Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston as well as in Boston Mahler's Fifth Symphony, which had such an extraordinarily sensational success in Boston last spring.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 5 1913

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his return from Europe last Tuesday, said that he did not have a brilliant list of novelties to offer to the patrons of the orchestra the coming winter, as the past year had been most unfruitful in this direction. He has brought back with him the score of the new symphony by Heinrich Noren, of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita."

He has a symphonic poem by Rexnicek, composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is called "Peter Schlemihl," the source of its inspiration, of course, being the famous story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Schillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and he will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston, as well as in Boston, Mahler's Fifth Symphony, which had such a success in Boston last spring.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York
Date

Mr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his return from Europe last Tuesday, brought back with him the score of a new symphony by Heinrich Noren of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita." He has also a symphonic poem by Reznicek, composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is called "Peter Schlemihl," the source of its inspiration, of course, being the famous story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Schillings, "Meergruse" and "Seemorgen," and he will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachamaninoff's symphony in B minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston as well as in Boston Mahler's fifth symphony which was so warmly received in Boston last Spring.

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 4 - 1913

DR. KARL MUCK, coductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has secured few novelties from Europe to offer to the patrons of the orchestra the coming winter, as the past year had been most unfruitful in this direction. He has brought back with him the score of the new symphony by Heinrich Moren, of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita." He has a symphonic poem by Renicek," composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is caled "Peter Schlemihl," the source of its inspiration, of course, being the famous story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Schillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and he will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachmanihoff's Symphony in E Minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play Mahler's Fifth Symphony, which had such an extraordinarily sensational success in Boston last spring.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C
Date OCT 5

Mrs. Katie Wilson-Green, who is the local manager of the concerts given annually in Washington by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces that renewals of subscriptions have come in at such a rate, and such a large number of new applications for seats have been received, that the New National Theater will be sold out entirely for the season. The past two or three years there have only been a very few seats not taken up by subscribers, and this year the prospect is that there will be none. The concerts, five in number, will be given as usual on Tuesday afternoons at 4:30 o'clock. The dates are November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17, and March 17.

The soloists make an unusually brilliant list. These comprise Fritz Kreisler, Teresa Carreno, Paderewski, and Elizabeth Boehn van Endert. Mme. van Endert is the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and comes to this country to make her first appearances here as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In addition to the Boston Symphony concerts to be given under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene, she has the honor to present this season a number of the best artists for the pleasure of the Washington musical public. Among the concerts already arranged for are the following: M. Paderewski, pianist in recital, November 11; Mme. Bloomfield Zeisler, pianist in recital, November 21; Mme. Maggie Teyte, prima donna of the Chicago Grand Opera Company, in recital, December 9; M. Edward Clement, great French tenor of the Metropolitan and Boston Operas, date to be announced later; Mme. Schumann-Heink, contralto, date to be announced later; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, in recital, January 12; Ysaye, Godowsky, and Gerardy, in joint recital, January 23; Miss Alice Neilsen, prima donna of the Metropolitan and Boston Operas, February 4; John McCormack, great Irish tenor, March 20. A number of other concerts to be given under the local

---

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date OCT 5 - 1913

⁂

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his return from Europe last Tuesday said that he did not have a brilliant list of novelties to offer to the patrons of the orchestra the coming Winter as the past year had been most unfruitful in this direction. He has brought back with him the score of the new symphony by Heinrich Noren of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita." He has a symphonic poem by Reznicek, composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is called "Peter Schlemihl," the source being the story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Schillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston as well as in

---

From SUN
Address: New York City.
Date OCT 5 - 1913

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his return from Europe last Tuesday said that he did not have a brilliant list of novelties to offer to the patrons of the orchestra the coming winter, as the past year has been most unfruitful in this direction. He has brought back with him the score of the new symphony by Heinrich Noren of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita." He has a symphonic poem by Reznicek, composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is called "Peter Schlemihl," the source of its inspiration of course being the famous story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Schillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and he will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston as well as in Boston Mahler's Fifth Symphony, which had such an extraordinarily sensational success in Boston last spring.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date SEP 28 1913

7010 Germantown Avenue, Mt. Airy.

* * *

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts who have renewed for the coming season have until next Wednesday, October 1, in which to take up their tickets. The tickets are now ready at the office of Miss M. Harris, 1119 Chestnut Street, and there can be no guarantee that tickets not taken up by that time can be held any longer. There is a long list of new applicants for tickets whose requirements are to be filled before the opening of the general sale. The general sale of season tickets will open at Miss Harris' office, Monday, October 13.

RIBUNE
New York City.
OCT 5 - 1913

IE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston ony Orchestra, on his return from e last Tuesday, said that he did not brilliant list of novelties to offer patrons of the orchestra the coming inter, as the last year had been unfruitful in this direction. He has ht back with him the score of the symphony by Heinrich Noren, of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita." He has a symphonic poem by Reznicek, composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is called "Peter Schlemihl," the source of its inspiration, of course, being the famous story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Schillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and he will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston, as well as in Boston, Mahler's Fifth Symphony.

From POST
Address: New York
Date OCT 4 1913

Paderewski will arrive in New York next Tuesday. The great pianist returns after an absence of four years to make an all-season's tour of this country under the direction of C. A. Ellis, of Boston. So far as the greater part of the country is concerned, it will be his first tour in five years, for he was here only a few weeks in the season of 1908-9, having come here chiefly to hear the performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the Symphony which he had just finished. Mr. Paderewski's plans call for between eighty and ninety concerts and he will be in America until the latter part of April. His season begins in Trenton, N. J., October 13, to be followed by a concert in Jersey City on the 14th. His first appearance in New York will be in Aeolian Hall, Saturday afternoon, October 18, under the auspices of the Aeolian Company. Then he will make a short trip Westward, playing in Detroit, Ann Arbor, Toronto, Erie, and Buffalo. Returning to the East, he will give a series of recitals in the principal cities, and on the 1st of January he leaves for the West and the Pacific Coast, where he will be for approximately two months. Reports have it that Mr. Paderewski has not been in so good health for years, and is more than eager to begin the arduous labor of a long American tour.

Dr. Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has brought back from Europe the score of a new symphony by Heinrich Noren, of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of Variations which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita." He has a symphonic poem by Reznicek, composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is called "Peter Schlemihl," the source of its inspiration, of course, being the famous story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Schillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and he will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston as well as in Boston Mahler's Fifth Symphony, which had such an extraordinarily sensational success in Boston last spring.

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date SEP 27 1913

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

W. A. Albaugh, the local representative of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has now the season tickets for the series which the orchestra will give in this city during the coming winter. Those who have subscribed may now get them. Attention should be called to the fact that season tickets already subscribed for must be taken up before Wednesday, October 1. On that day all tickets which have not been taken by last year's subscribers will be used to fill applications of new subscribers and the general sale of such tickets will open at Albaugh's Ticket Office Monday, October 13.

From EVG. NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date SEP 27 1913

Symphony Orchestra Season Tickets Rea

W. A. Albaugh, the local representative of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now has the season tickets for the series which the Orchestra will give in this city during the coming winter. Those who have subscribed may now get them.

Attention should be called to the fact that season tickets already subscribed for must be taken up before October 1. On that day all tickets which have not been taken by last year's subscribers will be used to fill applications of new subscribers, and the general sale of such tickets will open at Albaugh's ticket office on October 13.

From EVG. TELEGRAPH
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 4 - 1913

Carl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has recently returned from Europe, has announced that during his sojourn he discovered few novelties of sufficient merit to find place on the orchestra's program. Nevertheless, several new works are announced for performance, among them a new symphony, entitled "Vita," by Heinrich Horen, of Dresden. Other novelties will include two pieces by Max Schillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and some short pieces by Fritz Delius. Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor No. 2, will be and it is probable that phony, which spring

---

From WORLD
Address: New York City.
Date OCT 5 191

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his return from Europe last Tuesday, says that he will not have a brilliant list of novelties to offer to the patrons of the orchestra the coming winter, as the past year had been most unfruitful in this direction. He has brought back with him the score of the new symphony by Heinrich Noren of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations, which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita."

Dr. Muck has a symphonic poem by Reznicek, composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is called "Peter Schlemihl," the source of its inspiration of course being the famous story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Schillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and he will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius.

Dr. Muck purposes reviving this year Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston as well as in Boston Mahler's Fifth Symphony, which had such an extraordinarily sensational success in Boston last spring.

BOSTON GLOBE

OCTOBER 11, 1913.

SYMPHONY BEGINS SEASON

Initial Program Is Finely Played.

Dr Muck Reads Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

Liszt "Preludes" Rouses Ardor of Audience.

Dr Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra launched another musical season yesterday afternoon. The program was a conventional one; it was played in a manner worthy of the best traditions of the orchestra; there were certain movements and numbers that aroused the audience to particular enthusiasm; there was a cordial greeting to Dr Muck as he came on; otherwise the concert had no conspicuous features that distinguished it from those that may follow.

The day had another and a broader significance in the realms of music, although one which could not rightly receive marked observance in a concert of symphonic music. One hundred years ago yesterday occurred the birth of Verdi, an event which has prompted recent celebrations, particularly by his own countrymen.

The absence of any allusion to this event on the program of yesterday could by no means be construed to denote indifference to it. A conductor of symphonic music would be in something of the same predicament in attempting publicly to honor the memory of Verdi by the performance of something from his works as would the impresario of an opera house who attempted like homage to the name and glory of Johannes Brahms.

Verdi's successors have resembled him in this—that they devoted themselves chiefly to the music of the lyric theatre. Two symphonies, a string quartet, six piano concertos, and the list of the master's instrumental works written solely for the concert room is exhausted

The score of "Aida," when written for production at Cairo, included a "symphony for strings." But Verdi was dissatisfied with it, and on the advice of his friend Bottesini, the contra bassist who finally conducted the opera's premiere, he cut it out. Thereupon he wrote a long symphony to take its place, but the symphony was lost.

Last July this interesting score was found by the niece of Verdi, Signora Maria Verdi Corrare, in an old box of the master's papers. It was dirty and crumpled. The date upon it was Dec 23, 1872. At the request of Boito, Verdi's friend and librettist, the signora delivered the score to Mr Toscanini. The composer's first thought appeared to favor a performance at the centenary celebration at Milan. Later he was reported to have disapproved of playing a work which Verdi himself had permitted to remain unheard.

Obviously nothing remains for the program of a symphony orchestra on such an occasion, except medleys or potpourris from the operas, which have their place at best over the glasses at a "pop" concert, or the one or two excerpts that possibly might be made from "Othello," which like "Falstaff," has but a few bars of prelude for an "overture." In the latter case the violence done the operatic frame and context would be considerable, and doubtless prohibitive. Wagner, the orchestral symphonist, while essentially a dramatist and thinking in terms of the theatre, put no such problem upon the symphonic conductor in his centenary observed but a few months past.

All of which implies no search for an apology for Dr Muck's program of yesterday. It contained moments of particular brilliance that evoked great enthusiasm, and it pitched the start of the season upon a high and resonant key.

It began with Beethoven's seventh symphony, continued through Brahms' "Tragic" overture, Liszt's "Preludes" and ended with Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman." All of these have been these years as familiar friends on the Symphony programs, unless it be Liszt's tone poem, with its thundrous and sentiment-laden echoes of palpitating amours. The fervor of a romanticism, by turns languorous, passionate and tempestuous, courses through its veins, until we rejoice that the world ever lived through such an epoch and was able to commit to a yearning posterity something of its thrill. Dr Muck was roundly rewarded for the old piece. The applause would not be stilled until he had brought the men to their feet with him.

Beethoven's symphony was played with a poet's discernment for its play of fancy, the insistent, rugged virility of the first movement, the noble simplicity and dignity of the second and the tempest of exuberance in the last that is fanned to fury, calling to mind the wild abandon of a Hungarian dance. Plausibly the eloquence of its rhythm could have incited Miss Duncan or any gifted interpretative dancer to expression of it in pantomime.

Dr Muck's performance was a beautiful one in its clearness, its fine balance, its subtly graduated transitions from one division of a movement to another. In precision and euphony of tone the playing of the men invited comparison with that in the middle of the season. Mr Holy, the new harpist, was in his place, but there was little to call forth his skill yesterday. His playing in Pierne's "St Francis" at Worcester was one of the principal pleasures to be derived from that work.

Next week the program will be as follows: Glazounoff, symphony in B flat, No. 5; Grieg, overture, "Im Herbst"; Franck, "Les Eolides," Dvorak, "Husitska" overture.

BOSTON JOURNAL

OCTOBER 11, 1913.

SYMPHONY OPENING DRAWS BIG CROWD

Capacity Audience Listens To Fine Performance by New Harpist.

By E. F. Harkins.

A capacity audience attended the opening of the Symphony season at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. It greeted Dr. Karl Muck warmly; it enjoyed a spirited performance of a well-arranged and popular program; it witnessed the debut of the new harpist, A. Holy, and the older patrons noted several new names under the head of "Personnel."

The new first violins who took part in yesterday's performance were A. Baraniecki and H. Suelzen; the new second violins were Messrs. Ringwall and Gewirtz, who, by the way, were chosen from among Boston candidates; F. Wittmann is the new viola, and a stranger named B. Jaenicke appeared in the horn section. Two other new horn players will come later. This is almost as marked a change in the personnel of the orchestra as took place last year. Among those who have retired since last season are Vincent Akeroyd and C. Schumann, which leaves Daniel Kuntz, one of the first violins, as the sole survivor of the original Symphony Orchestra of 1881.

The first program of the season, which will be repeated tonight, comprises Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms's "Tragic Overture," Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman." These are all known as "familiar works," yet this is the first time Dr. Muck has conducted any one of them at a regular Symphony concert since his first season of 1906-7. There were signs of nervousness in the performance yesterday, but these were but casual and inconsequential compared with the splendid spirit that Dr. Muck infused into the playing of the orchestra.

Dr. Muck's interpretations are sympathetic, in the finest sense of the term, rather than showy, and he has the best orchestra in the world to assist him. The new players may be expected before long to make the orchestra better than ever.

Yesterday the performance was appreciatively applauded.

Next week's program will consist of Glazounoff's Fifth Symphony, which has not been heard since Dr. Muck introduced it seven years ago; Grieg's "Im Herbst" Overture; Caesar' Francks Symphonic Poem, "Les Eolides," and Dvorak's "Husitska" Overture.

BOSTON HERALD,

OCTOBER 11, 1913.

REHEARSAL BY SYMPHONY

First Public Performance of 33d Seasop Conducted by Dr. Muck.

By PHILIP HALE.

The first Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (33d season), Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 7	Beethoven
Tragic Overture	Brahms
"The Preludes"	Liszt
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"	Wagner

Dr. Muck was welcomed most heartily by a brilliant audience that completely filled the hall.

It has been the custom for reviewers to make apologies for the first concert of a season. "The members of the orchestra have been dispersed since spring; there have been few rehearsals; there are new members"—and this was the case yesterday; "it is not fair, therefore, to speak of the concert in detail; it is enough to say that while the performance was excellent in many respects, there was not that perfection which will be shown in a month or two."

Yesterday there was no need of any apology, and the old an approved introductory formula must be discarded. The concert was one of unusual interest, although the selections were familiar, and concerning their inherent value there is nothing to be said that is new, unless one delights in extravagance and paradox to make the bourgeois sit up.

For whatever the composition may be Dr. Muck by his demoniacal appreciation of rhythm, his fine sense of proportion, his exquisite taste in phrasing, his singularly impressive and fascinating personality, gives an interpretation that glorifies the work of the composer and the proficiency of the players, and this without any attempt at self-glorification.

It was a pleasure to hear Brahms's tragic overture again, a work that must be ranked among his noblest achievements, music to be put by the side of the introduction to the Finale of the First Symphony. It matters not whether Brahms had in mind "Hamlet" or "Faust," or was moved to lofty musical [illegible] by the daily comedy of life [illegible] poetic a performance [illegible] Seventh Symphony, a performance marked by the utmost clarity and a wealth of contrasts in expression from the preparation for the opening allegro to the end of the Finale, with its Dionysiac revelry and exultation. Liszt's "Preludes" was for once revealed as a masterpiece in construction, finely fanciful, and the reproach of occasional vulgarity in expression could not this time be brought against it.

The program of the concerts next week will include Glazonnoff's Fifth Symphony, Grieg's overture, "In Autumn"; Franck's "Eolides" and Dvorak's overture, "Husitska."

ADVERTISER

OCTOBER 11. 191

SYMPHONY SEASON OPENS BRILLIANTLY

PROGRAMME MAINLY AN ORCHESTRAL ON

Beethoven's Seventh Symphon Chosen by Dr. Muck as Openin Number of Well-Balanced List.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven	Seventh Symphony
Brahms	Tragic Overture
Liszt	"Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem
Wagner	"Flying Dutchman," Overture

Happy are those nations which have no histories, and delightful are those concerts about which little new can be written. The only new thing about this concert was the shape of the season tickets, which is a distinct improvement over the old form, and will save much mailing to and fro, when tickets are used by more than a single person.

To the musical auditor a programme wholly orchestral, such as this one, is the most attractive of all. One can submit to a pianist or a violinist, without diminished enjoyment, for these appear in concertos, which are after all chiefly symphonic. But the great singer, who often is the chief attraction to the general public, is something like a fly in the ointment to the earnest musician. Therefore we were glad to hear our orchestra quite by itself in the opening concert.

Then also, in such a programme, one could forget that there is a fever raging in music at present and that there is a wild chase for novelties among up-to-date conductors. The extreme left of the musical parliament was omitted from this programme. There will be tonal trouble enough later on, but it was a keen pleasure to bathe in the classical stream of the two symphonic Bs and the very moderate radicalism of Liszt and his son-in-law.

Very strange it seemed to think that at one time Liszt was held to be a devil of a fellow, by the chief Boston critic (Mr. Dwight) and although the Harvard Musical Assn. allowed its orchestra to give Wagner it was not without serious misgivings. "Nous avons change tout cela," and today the reviewers take the opposite tack and pretend to find many platitudes in "Les Preludes."

We do not agree with these. To us this is the very best of Liszt's symphonic poems, broad, noble and massive; powerful in its orchestration, grandly harmonized, yet melodic in its themes. Dr. Muck read the work with inspiration and brought out all its exaltation without turning the grandeur into bombast, which is too easily done. The technique of the orchestra has got beyond the stage where the Summer vacation breeds roughness. There will be more of finesse in later concerts, but even this opening one was almost "hors ligne," and Liszt's "Les Preludes" was the best part of it. Splendidly did the trumpets give out their figure, and nobly did the horn and harp play their beautiful melody. Mr. A. Holy seems to be a good artist, perhaps a great one. We shall sing "Holy, Holy, Holy" later in the season when we have heard him in longer obbligati. Tremendous applause followed the performance of "Les Preludes."

Brahms' "Tragic Overture" made a good foil to this work. It was German dignity against French ecstasy, as if Goethe were placed beside Lamartine. We do not hear this overture often, yet it is as strong in its field as the "Academic" (which is not academic) is in another. It is not a tragedy of horror, nor is there great pathos in the number; Brahms could not achieve a "Coriolanus" overture, but the majesty of the work is most impressive, and Dr. Muck and the orchestra brought this out finely.

In spite of the morbid desire for ill-sounding novelties which, like automobiles, present their models of 1914 before 1913 is ended, and claim appreciation in the future because they cannot be understood in the present, it is well to have considerable of Beethoven, Bach, and even Haydn and Mozart on the programmes, if the Symphony concerts are to be a really educational scheme. New generations grow up who do not know the great masters. It would be a distorted musical training for them to begin their auditions entirely with the moderns. There must have been many a student present yesterday who heard the seventh symphony for the first time, and those who heard it for the 20th time also found an undiminished pleasure in it.

What a jovial festivity there is in the first movement, and the brooding monotony of the constant dactyl and spondee of the slow movement is most impressive sorrow, but Beethoven never mourns a la Chopin,—without consolation. The contrast with the tenderly sympathetic Trio of this was finely caught up. Only the repeats in the Scherzo seem unnecessary in these "most brisk and giddy-paced times," and while we are cutting down the repeats of Schubert, Haydn, Mozart, etc. Dr. Muck might cut down the prolix form which Beethoven evolved in Scherzo of this symphony, and the miscalled Minuet (also really a Scherzo) of the fourth, particularly as he cut out the repeat of the [illegible] sympathy with the extreme contrast [illegible] in the first movement; we here prefer rustic simplicity and heartiness to very refined shading; but the great "allegretto" and the brisk finale were excellently interpreted, the last movement being especially fine in spite of an incredibly dashing tempo.

There is more of the atmosphere of the sea in the first 25 measures of "The Flying Dutchman" overture than in the whole of Debussy's "La Mer," and Dr. Muck let the salty gentleman's motive ring out with biting power. There is no fear that this overture will ever be laid on the shelf, or that anyone will inquire whether the Flying Dutchman used a monoplane or a biplane.

But the year 1813 was famous for something besides the birth of Wagner and the beginning of the decline of Napoleon. Exactly a 100 years before this concert a great Italian composer had his birth. Verdi may have been too entirely operatic for commemoration in the symphony concert, and yet we wish that some recognition had been made. A march from "Aida," or the tempest from "Otello" might have been arranged and given as a tribute to the memory of this great master, or even a slow movement by Sgambati. Verdi has shown us that melody is an inalienable part of music and his tunes will be sung quite as long as some of the great symphonies are played. It is true that the real music-lover takes greater delight in a good symphonic concert than in an opera, but Verdi's centennial might have received some recognition even in orchestral concert; since they commemorated John P. Morgan there, last season.

TRAVELER

OCTOBER 11, 1913.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra plays its first concert of the season in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Thursday evening next at 8 o'clock, repeating the program of this week's concerts in Symphony Hall.

Next week's concerts in Symphony Hall by the Symphony orchestra, Friday afternon and Saturday evening, will have the following program:

Glazounoff's Symphony, No. 5, Grieg's overture, "Im Herbst," Caesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," and Dvorak's overture, "Husitska."

RECORD.

OCTOBER 11. 1913

BRILLIANT SYMPHONY OPENING

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven	Seventh Symphony
Brahms	Tragic Overture
Liszt	"Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem
Wagner	"Flying Dutchman," Overture

Happy are those nations which have no histories, and delightful are those concerts about which little new can be written. The only new thing about this concert was the shape of the season tickets, which is a distinct improvement over the old form, and will save much mailing to and fro, when tickets are used by more than a single person, says Louis C. Elson of the opening Symphony performance in The Advertiser.

Very strange it seemed to think that at one time Liszt was held to be a devil of a fellow, by the chief Boston critic (Mr. Dwight) and although the Harvard Musical Assn. allowed its orchestra to give Wagner it was not without serious misgivings. "Nous avons change tout cela," and today the reviewers take the opposite tack and pretend to find many platitudes in "Les Preludes."

We do not agree with these. To us this is the very best of Liszt's symphonic poems, broad, noble and massive; powerful in its orchestration, grandly harmonized, yet melodic in its themes. Dr. Muck read the work with inspiration and brought out all its exaltation without turning the grandeur into bombast, which is too easily done. The technique of the orchestra has got beyond the stage where the Summer vacation breeds roughness. There will be more of finesse in later concerts, but even this opening one was almost "hors ligne," and Liszt's "Les Preludes" was the best part of it. Splendidly did the trumpets give out their figure, and nobly did the horn and harp play their beautiful melody. Mr. A. Holy seems to be a good artist, perhaps a great one. We shall sing "Holy, Holy, Holy" later in the season when we have heard him in longer obbligati. Tremendous applause followed the performance of "Les Preludes."

Brahms' "Tragic Overture" made a good foil to this work. It was German dignity against French ecstasy, as if Goethe were placed beside Lamartine. We do not hear this overture often, yet it is as strong in its field as the "Academic" (which is not academic) is in another. It is not a tragedy of horror, nor is there great pathos in the number; Brahms could not achieve a "Coriolanus" overture, but the majesty of the work is most impressive, and Dr. Muck and the orchestra brought this out finely.

[22]

OCTOBER 11, 1913

THE SYMPHONY CONCER

THE DAY OF BEGINNINGS AN SCRUTINIES

Minor Changes in Routine—Newcomers to the Orchestra—Conductor and Men Begin Where They Ended Last Spring—Beethoven and Brahms for the Classic Composers, and Liszt and Wagner for the Romantic, Make the Programme

SCRUTINY is the prevailing mood at the first Symphony Concert of each new year, and yesterday afternoon in small things and great a considerate management amiably gratified it. At the outset a new form of ticket gave entrance to Symphony Hall. Gone are the yellow rectangular cards, stamped with a skeleton R—for rehearsal—in red outline and garlanded with a thick border of prospective dates. From time beyond recollection those stout and ugly cards have served for every concert in a whole season. Now, a book replaces them containing a detachable red ticket for each concert. In form and aspect, it is the merest commonplace of the theatre or the concert-hall. A few elders shook their heads ruefully because one more "tradition" had vanished. But they will not mislay the new books as often as they did the old cards and the separable tickets are much easier to hand to the youngsters, when Dr. Muck has assembled too many modern pieces. Within the familiar but deceiving covers of the programme books lurked another innovation. A shaded type of the newest fashion has changed the aspect of the pages and again the rueful elders were uneasy until scrutiny assured them that "the historical and descriptive notes" were still written by the eminent hand that has made them unique in the world.

No one finds his seat readily at the first Symphony Concert. Year after year, he—or she—may have occupied it until to go to it is almost instinctive; but for the moment she—and also he—is busy with a reconnoitring inspection of her neighbors. Who has gone from the accustomed place and who has succeeded newly to it? Two mental notes account for each change—one for the departure, one for the arrival. Only the daughters of their mothers, attaining to concert-going age, need no explanation and they usually crowd out no more than a dillettante bachelor with his Friday afternoons on his hands. Then the scrutinizing eyes seek the stage on which the orchestra is assembling. What familiar faces have gone and what unfamiliar rise in their stead? Mr. Strube had vanished and by "The Pops," if not by the regular concerts, most of the parquet and the balcony remembered him. Mr. Mullaly's name—Irish among many Germans—was easy to remember and it stood no longer in the list of the violins. A new harpist was sitting in the regretted Schuecker's place. A new horn-player could be descried under the double-basses, and not all the second violins and the violas could be readily identified. Evidently there had been the "usual changes." The years creep upon the veterans and Dr. Muck is prone to sift them as well as the youngsters. In him, at least, there was no change. Never has he bowed more curtly to welcoming applause; never has the outward aspect of his conducting seemed a juster and smoother mingling of authority and elegance. His music and his men much preoccupied him. He seemed hardly to have a benignant thought for his audience until it clapped the orchestra to its feet at the end of Liszt's symphonic poem.

Then came the higher and subtler scrutinies. Did the orchestra still stand at the pitch of technical mastery and revealing eloquence at which the conductor left it last spring? By many a token—and in the first concert of the new season—it did. Liszt's "Preludes" attested anew the rich and glowing sonorities of trumpets and trombones. The overture to "The Flying Dutchman" summoned their declamatory force. The drums imposed rhythm with the old authority or ran in mysterious under-beat. Beautiful in texture and color was the tone of the horns in the aspiring song of Liszt or the graver and deeper speech of Brahms. The flutes as of old worked glinting tracery upon the air and the clarinets sang in voices smooth and deep. The strings ran the gamut of tone—crystal clear in the first movement of Beethoven's symphony; hushed through the ensuing allegretto; light and bright in the succeeding scherzo; big-voiced, sombre, ominous in Brahms's Tragic Overture; rude as the sea in storm or ecstatic as Senta in vision in the overture to "The Flying Dutchman." And in flawless euphony went the voices of this diversified power.

So far the orchestra was the orchestra as Dr. Muck has remade it in the image of his own standards. It was no less itself in responsiveness to his will. Throughout the concert he asked much of it. He would carve every phrase of Beethoven's symphony upon the air; yet each chiselled line should flow into the whole advancing design. The orchestra understood his purpose and accomplished it. Dr. Muck has an adroit hand with the slowly advancing, the gradually unfolding crescendo. He sees the end from the beginning. He has made the orchestra as adroit and farseeing. He likes the sensitive suspension that seems to poise the music for a new flight, and the orchestra yesterday seemed to hang upon the tips of his staying and releasing fingers. Dr. Muck has an exquisite ear for the quality and the body of tone. A Sembrich herself might have envied the half voice in which the players sang Beethoven's allegretto. They seemed to hear with the conductor's ear. He and they were equal masters of the outflinging tumult of Beethoven's finale. They flooded the music with their exuberance but detail eddied clear in it.

out of an overture and Wagner, Dr. Muck and the orchestra almost set "The Flying Dutchman" in graphic epitome on the bare stage of Symphony Hall—the sea and the storm; the Hollander's fated and fugitive figure; Senta, dreaming through her homely ballad, the glorified ecstasy of the end. Dr. Muck has taught the orchestra to dramatize and characterize. Liszt's symphonic poem of "The Preludes" is kaleidoscopic, turning in changing rhythms, glinting the new shapes of its motives in as changeful colors. With Lisztian swiftness and surety, the conductor and the orchestra made each transition and transformation rhythmically vivid, kept the recurring glamor iridescent and the recurring pomps full blooded and full bodied. Perhaps the music has little substance; it is enough to spread its surface with such glowing rhetoric.

Unless an ironic conductor is contriving ironic contrast, it is not good that "The Preludes" of Liszt should follow in a programme the Tragic Overture of Brahms. Glamor and glow make the symphonic poem; might and almost majesty fill the overture. The one glints with romantic imagining, feverish hot; the other streams with concentrated and sustained power. Not often seemingly did his idea so stir Brahms as did the idea of this Tragic Overture. Into tones—an abstract speech—he would put the abstractions of tragedy; fate foredooming and pursuing; heroic endurance and piteous doom; the hope, the dread, the submission. High abstractions all; cold abstractions perhaps; but they wondrously kindled Brahms's imagination. The incarnating themes leap out of the dark background in stark strength; the course of the tragedy sweeps Brahms through the development of them; he has no time, no will to calculate. Never once does the overture lose its heroic voice; never once does it fall from its bare heights of tragic desolation. And there Brahms's imagination soars. Seldom in all his music are his thoughts in tones so charged with emotion; seldom does he achieve such atmosphere (though he would hate the word) by his harmonic backgrounds; very rarely do his instrumental colors so gleam and darken; as rarely does he sustain such spontaneous and concentrated power. The Tragic Overture is Brahms passionate with high abstractions. Yet the "Brahmsites" seem often to set too little store by it, as the "Lisztians" set over much by the "Preludes." But the ways of musical sects are hard to fathom. Even above itself, Dr. Muck and the orchestra exalted the music in their playing of it.

Throughout the concert, meeting all the scrutinies, Dr. Muck was the conductor whom orchestra and audience have known. He differentiated, as he always differentiates, until he had found the revealing and the characterizing voice for music as diverse of matter and manner as that which the four-fold concert assembled. He found this revealing voice by his choice of pace and accent; he found this characterizing tone by the quality he imposed upon it. Here and there, perhaps, in Beethoven's symphony he etched out a phrase or a progression a little too precisely and by so much stiffened for the instant the plasticity of the music. But it was good to hear the symphony played with thought of the serenity as well as of the elation that is in it; to hear it beginning as in mystery and unfolding beam by beam, as into light; to listen to the allegretto as to song hushed because it is so deep and tender; and to hear the finale tell less by its own tumult than by the contrast of joyous release of the moods that have been pent before. The design of Dr. Muck's performance matched the design of the music.

Above all else, the symphony is a symphony of rhythm, and rhythm tingles from the conductor. No other of our time has his sensitiveness and subtlety in it, scarcely another, as the performance of "The Preludes" proved, has his diversifying and animating power with it. They say that romantic plays of the last century should be acted nowadays only by brilliant virtuosi, who can glamor and glorify them. So also should the kindred music of Liszt's symphonic poems be played. The orchestra was such a troop of virtuosi. Discerning and proportioning, feeling and imparting, the conductor made the piece glow again. There was illusion in the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," and the opera itself is none too illusive nowadays on the stage. Passion of performance in Dr. Muck and the orchestra met the passion of creation in the Brahms of "The Tragic Overture." The scrutiny was passed. Conductor and men has begun where they ended.

H. T. P.

HERALD. BOSTON.

OCTOBER 12. 1913.

2D SYMPHONY CONCERT

The program for the second concerts of the Symphony orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will begin with Glazounoff's Symphony No. 5, which has not been heard here since Dr. Muck introduced it to Boston in 1906. Grieg's overture, "Im Herbst," Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," and Dvorak's overture, "Husitska," make up the rest of the program.

SUNDAY POST,

OCTOBER 5,

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT

Dr. Muck has made a characteristic programme for the opening of the Symphony season next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Symphony in A major, No. 7	Beethoven
Overture, "Tragic"	Brahms
Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes"	Liszt
Overture, "The Flying Dutchman"	Wagner

SUNDAY CONCERTS

The Sunday concerts in Symphony Hall this year will be even more attractive than those of a season ago and there will be more of them. Symphony Hall will be busy practically every Sunday from Oct. 12, when Kubelik gives his recital, to the middle of April. It is impossible at this time to give a complete list of the attractions, for all the negotiations have not yet been closed, but enough can be announced to give an idea of the high quality of artistic excellence that Mr. Mudgett is striving for. In the Sunday series will be included the two concerts in aid of the pension fund and the orchestra, the dates of these being Nov. 16 and March 8. These will be in the afternoon. The Handel and Haydn Society will give three Sunday night concerts. The miscellaneous Sunday afternoon concerts start with Kubelik next Sunday, Oct. 12. Sunday, Oct. 19, will bring Mme. Nellie Melba and Edmond Burke, the baritone. Sunday, Oct. 26, will bring a piano recital by Josef Hofman. The Philharmonic Orchestra of New York, with Fritz Kreisler as soloist, will give the concert of Nov. 2. Frieda Hempl, the brilliant coloratura soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, with an assisting artist to be announced, will be heard in concert here for the first time Sunday afternoon, Nov. 9. A song recital by Mme. Gadski will come on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 30. Fritz Kreisler's recital, Sunday afternoon, Dec. 7. A joint recital by Harold Bauer and Jacques Thibaud is set for Sunday, Dec. 28. In January there will be concerts by Alma Gluck, Ysaye, Teresa Carreno and Julia Culp. In February will come Mme. Schumann-Heink's annual recital. The Philadelphia Orchestra, with Mischa Elman as soloist, and a concert by Mme. Marie Rappold, soprano, Mme. Matzenauer of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Franz Eganieff, the German baritone. In March there will be concerts by Mme. Voenm Van Endert of the Royal Opera, Berlin, John McCormack and Clara Butt. For most of these concerts the popular prices of last winter will rule, but for one or two it will be necessary, on account of the cost of the attraction, slightly to increase the scale.

To Jan Kubelik, the distinguished Bohemian violinist, falls the honor of opening the series. He will give a recital there next Sunday afternoon, Oct. 12, at 3:30 o'clock.

The programme he has arranged is one of great interest and contains much of beauty. It is as follows:

Concerto in B minor, No. 3	Saint-Saens
Chaconne (for violin alone)	Bach
"Legende"	Wieniawski
"Mazurka"	Wieniawski
"Carneval Russe"	Wieniawski
"Caprice"	Paganini
"Scene de la Czardas"	Hubay

---

the trials and tribulations of a young woman with high social ambitions as well as the ultima thule of her desires. It is written in a genuine comedy vein, but and the lines are highly amusing, but underneath it all there is a thread of satire and common sense which gives the poem an added charm. The book is published by Paul Elder & Co. of San Francisco, and is a beautiful piece of typographical work.

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Symphony Orchestra will this season, as usual, give eight concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, under the auspices of Harvard University. The concerts will come, as in the past, on Thursday evenings, and the dates are Oct. 16, Nov. 13, Dec. 11, Jan. 15, Feb. 5, Feb. 26, March 26 and April 23.

Six soloists of high rank have been engaged for the series, there being no soloists at the first and last concert. These artists will be Mme. Teresa Carreno, pianist; Mme. Boehn van Endert, soprano; Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Miss Ruth Deyo, pianist; Mme. Marie Sundelius, soprano, and Mr. George Proctor, pianist. Mme. Carreno, Mme. van Endert and Mr. Kreisler are included in the soloists who will appear with the Symphony Orchestra at its Boston concerts. Miss Ruth Deyo is a brilliant American pianist of whom much is expected. Mr. George Proctor is a Boston pianist, who has many friends in Cambridge. Mme. Marie Sundelius is also a resident of this city, and is regarded as one of the foremost of Boston sopranos.

Subscribers to the series of last season have until tomorrow, Monday, Oct. 6, in which to renew subscriptions and secure the seats they had last year. Application should be made to George Kent, University Bookstore, Harvard square, Cambridge. The unclaimed seats will be offered for sale at the University Bookstore next Saturday morning, Oct. 11. A limited number of seats have been reserved for college officers and invited guests.

HERALD. BOSTON. OCTOBER 5.

FIRST SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck has made a characteristic program for the opening of the Symphony season next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. It has been his habit to reserve new and strange works for later in the autumn, and for his opening program he has chosen nothing to shock the sensibilities of the most conservative.

It is as follows:

Beethoven's Symphony in A major, No. 7; Brahms' overture, "Tragic"; Liszt, Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes"; Wagner, overture, "The Flying Dutchman."

MISS FARRAR'S RECITAL

Miss Geraldine Farrar will give a song recital in Symphony Hall Tuesday afternoon, Oct. 28, at 2:30 o'clock. For the first time in her career she will undertake an entire concert program in New York Saturday, Oct. 25, and in Boston the following Tuesday. Heretofore she has relied upon an assistant; thus two years ago when she last sang here she had as her associate Edmond Clement. She now believes that she can undertake the entire recital of songs. For the past three weeks Miss Farrar has been giving concerts along the Pacific coast, which is hearing her for the first time. Her success has been equal to the highest expectations.

At her concert in Boston she will sing a program of 24 songs, in German, French and English, songs classical and modern. The tickets are now on sale at Symphony Hall.

MME. MELBA

After an absence of several years Mme. Nellie Melba is returning to Boston to give a concert in Symphony Hall on Oct. 19, at 3:30 o'clock. She was last heard here with the orchestra in 1910 and since then has not been in America, for her time has been almost entirely occupied with her operatic ventures in Australia and her work in Great Britain. She is the last of a wonderful generation of singers. Today, from all accounts, the beauty of tone and suavity of delivery which made her famous are unimpaired.

In her concert here she will have the assistance of Mr. Edmond Burke, a young baritone whom she discovered and who has been in her opera company in Australia. His voice and musicianship have been highly praised. The sale of seats for the concert will open at the box office, Symphony Hall, next Friday morning, Oct. 10.

FIRST SUNDAY CONCERT

Jan Kubelik, the distinguished Bohemian violinist, will open the series of Sunday concerts in Symphony Hall this season on next Sunday afternoon, Oct. 12, at 3:30 o'clock. He is an interesting personality. When he first came to this country, about 10 years ago, he was known for his extraordinary technique and wonderful tone. Musicians generally regarded him not so much as a "violinist" as a "fiddler," but Kubelik has grown greatly in recent years. He is now a serious musican to be reckoned with seriously.

The program will be as follows:

Concerto in B minor, No. 3	Saint-Saens
Chaconne	Bach
"Legende"	Wieniawski
"Mazurka"
"Carneval Russe"
"Caprice"	Paganini
"Scene de la Czardas"	Hubay

SUNDAY CONCERTS

The sunday afternoon concert in one year has become an important factor in the musical life of Boston. The popular success of the series surpassed the fondest hopes of those who were instrumental in organizing the concerts, which were of a uniformly high standard.

The concerts this year will be even more attractive than those of a season ago, and there will be more of them, lasting from Mr. Kubelik's recital on Oct. 12 to the middle of April. It is impossible at this time to give a complete list of the attractions, but enough can be announced to give an idea of the artistic excellence for which Mr. Mudgett is striving. In this Sunday series will be included the two concerts in aid of the pension fund and the orchestra on Nov. 16 and March 8. These will be in the afternoon. The Handel and Haydn Society will give three Sunday night concerts. The miscellaneous Sunday afternoon concerts start with Kubelik next Sunday, Oct. 12. Sunday, Oct. 19, will bring Mme. Melba and Edmond Burke, the baritone. Sunday, Oct. 26, will bring a piano recital by Josef Hofmann. The Philharmonic orchestra of New York with Fritz Kreisler as soloist will give the concert of Nov. 2. Frieda Hempl, the brilliant coloratura soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, with an assisting artist, will be heard in concert here for the first time Sunday afternoon, Nov. 9. A song recital by Mme. Gadski will come on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 30; Fritz Kreisler's recital, Sunday afternoon, Dec. 7. A joint recital by Harold Bauer and Jacques Thibaud is set for Sunday, Dec. 28. In January there will be concerts by Alma Gluck, Ysaye, Teresa Carreno and Julia Culp. In February will come Mme. Schumann-Heink's annual recital. The Philadelphia orchestra will come with Mischa Elman as soloist, and there will be a concert by Mme. Marie Rappold, soprano, Mme. Matzenauer of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Franz Eganieff, the German baritone. In March there will be concerts by Mme. Boehn Van Endert of the Royal Opera, Berlin, John McCormack and Clara Butt. For most of these concerts the popular prices of last winter will rule, but for one or two it will be necessary, on account of the cost of the attraction, to change the scale slightly.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

TREMONT TEMPLE CONCERTS

Miss Evelyn Parnell, a Boston coloratura soprano, who has just returned after four years in European opera houses, will be heard for the first time since she left the Boston Opera House at the opening concert of the Tremont Temple Concert Course, with Michael J. Dwyer, tenor, on Thursday evening, Nov. 6. Miss Parnell had a signal success in Dublin with the Quinlan Opera Company last season, and will return to Ireland this winter to fill operatic and concert engagements, after which she will go to La Scala, Milan. The Tremont Temple Course this season will consist of six concerts. The first will be Irish in its general character, the second Scotch, and the third an evening of Home Songs of America and England. The fourth concert will be patriotic, the fifth a Request night and the final concert an operatic night. Miss Evelyn Scotney and Howard White of the Boston Opera Company will be heard at the second concert with Miss Ellen Keller, violinist, Thanksgiving night, Nov. 27. The sale of course tickets will begin Monday, Oct. 13.

BANKERS' CONCERT

For the first time since the dedicatory concert in Symphony Hall in 1900 the Symphony Orchestra will give a concert before the opening of its regular season. This will be on Thursday evening, Oct. 9, and is given by the bankers of Boston as a compliment to the delegates present at the convention of the Bankers' Association of America. The entire Symphony Orchestra will be used, with Dr. Muck as its conductor. He will play the program with which he opens the Symphony season on the following afternoon: Beethoven's 7th Symphony; Brahms's "Tragic" Overture; Liszt's "Preludes" and Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

CAMBRIDGE CONCERTS

The Symphony Orchestra will this season give eight concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, under the auspices of Harvard University. The concerts will come on Thursday evenings and the dates are Oct. 16, Nov. 12, Dec. 11, Jan. 15, Feb. 5, Feb. 26, March 26 and April 23.

Six soloists of high rank have been engaged for the series. There will be no soloists at the first and last concerts. The artists will be Mme. Teresa Carreno, pianist; Mme. Boehn van Endert, soprano; Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Miss Ruth Deyo, pianist; Mme. Marie Sundelius, soprano, and George Proctor, pianist. Mme. Carreno, Mme. van Endert and Mr. Kreisler are included in the soloists who will appear with the Symphony Orchestra at its Boston concerts. Miss Ruth Deyo is a brilliant American pianist of whom much is expected. Mr. Proctor has many friends in Cambridge. Mme. Marie Sundelius is regarded as one of the foremost of Boston sopranos. She will sing several times this season with the Symphony Orchestra.

Subscribers to the series of last season have until tomorrow (Monday), Oct. 6, in which to renew subscriptions and secure the seats they had last year. Applications should be made to George Kent, University bookstore, Harvard square, Cambridge. The unclaimed seats will be offered for sale at the University bookstore next Saturday morning, Oct. 11. A limited number of seats have been reserved for college officers and invited guests.

MR. MUDGETT'S CONCERTS.

An interesting list of midweek concerts is announced by L. H. Mudget for this season. The Kneisel and Flonzaley quartets will give their usual series. The former will give four concerts on Thursday evenings beginnin Nov. 4; the latter on Thursday evenings; beginning Dec. 4. The lis of singers will include Maggi Teyte, Julia Culp, Mme. Sundelius Helen Allen Hunt, Emilio Gorgorza, H Evan Williams and John Chipman. M Chipman is new to this city. The pianists will comprise Miss Katherine Goodson, Miss Ruth Deyo, and Messrs. Backhaus, Harold Henry (new) and Leopol Godowsky. Miss Parlow will give a violin recital. Miss Beatrice Harrison, a English 'cellist, will make her first appearance here, and Jean Gerardy wil give a recital. The Schroeder Trio wil also be heard. As usual, Mr. Elmendor and Mr. Newman will deliver a series o illustrated lectures. More detailed announcement of these concerts will b made later.

TRAVELER

OCTOBER 4,

SYMPHONY HALL SUNDAY CONCERTS

Encouraged by the marked success attending last season's series of Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall, Manager Mudgett is arranging for an even stronger list of attractions this year. He will offer as the opening concert, Sunday afternoon, Oct. 12, the eminent violinist, Jan Kubelik, in the following program:

Concerto in B minor, No. 3, Saint-Saens; Chaconne (for violin alone), Bach; "Legende," "Mazurka," "Carneval Russe," Wieniawski; "Caprice," Paganini; "Scene de la Czardas," Hubay.

Other concerts already planned are as follows: Oct. 19, Mme. Melba, soprano, and Edmond Burke, baritone; Oct. 26, Josef Hoffman, pianist; Nov. 2, the Philharmonic Orchestra of New York, with Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as soloist; Nov. 9, Frieda Hempel, soprano; Nov. 30, Mme. Gadski, soprano; Dec. 7, Fritz Kreisler, and Dec. 28, Harold Bauer, pianist, and Jacques Thibaud. Equally strong attractions are being arranged for January and February.

AMERICAN, SUNDAY, OCTOBER 5,

Jan Kubelik, Famous Bohemian Violinist, Coming Next Sunday

Distinguished virtuoso will open concert season at Symphony Hall.

Kubelik to Play at Symphony Hall

Technique Said to Be Finer Than Ever; Has All Old Charm.

To Jan Kubelik, the distinguished Bohemian violinist, falls the honor of opening the series of Sunday concerts which will be given in Symphony Hall during the coming Winter. He will give a recital there next Sunday afternoon, October 12, at 3:30 o'clock. Kubelik is in every sense of the word an interesting personality. When he first came to this country, a matter of ten years ago, he was known simply as the possessor of an extraordinary technique and a wonderful tone. Musicians generally regarded him not so much as a "violinist" as a "fiddler," but Kubelik has grown greatly in recent years. Today, while still possessor of his technique and his tone, he is decidedly a serious musician, seriously to be reckoned with. His is one of the most beautiful tones ever drawn from a violin, and his personality retains all the charm that it had when he was a younger man.

GLOBE—OCTOBE

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Mr Mudgett's Noted Entertainers.

Kubelik Will Begin Concert Series Next Sunday.

Opening of the Symphony Next Friday.

Kubelik Begins Mudgett Concerts

The most important innovation in recent years in the giving of concerts in Boston, both in the sustained high character of the singers and instrumentalists offered, and the large general public which responded, was the season of Sunday afternoon concerts which Mr Mudgett offered last year at Symphony Hall. The word "artist" is an abused word in musical terminology. All persons who sing or play for a living are necessarily "artists," but here was a series of concerts meriting the name "artists' course." Mr Mudgett gained the success he deserved, and fortunately will continue the scheme this Winter. The manager has made his preparations with the leisure of the Summer and the previous season, and the new list of entertainers is indeed an imposing one.

The season of these concerts will be a long one. Beginning next Sunday afternoon with a recital by Mr Kubelik, it is likely to continue with some entertainment each Sunday until the middle of April. In this series there will be included the two concerts for the pension fund of the orchestra, which will fall on Nov 16 and March 8. There will be an intermission in the afternoon series on the days of the three usual Sunday evening concerts by the Handel and Haydn Society.

Following Kubelik, Mme Melba will give the second concert Oct 19, Edmond Burke, the Canadian baritone, accompanying her. The third Sunday, Oct 26, will bring Josef Hofmann in a piano recital, and Fritz Kreisler and the Philharmonic Orchestra of New York will be here the afternoon of Nov 2.

Frieda Hempel, the coloratura soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, assisted by an artist to be announced later, will give a recital Nov 9. Mme Gadski will have a recital Nov 30, and Fritz Kreisler another Dec 7. Jacques Thibaud, the French violinist, and Harold Bauer will appear together Dec 28. In January there will be concerts by Alma Gluck, Ysaye, Mme Carreno and Julia Culp.

Mme Schumann-Heink will give her annual recital in February. There will also be an opportunity to hear Mr Stokowski and his Philadelphia orchestra, with Mischa Elman as soloist. During this month Mme Matzenauer, as yet unheard in Boston in concert, Mme Rappold and Franz Egenieff, the German baritone.

In March there will be concerts by Mme Boehn Van Endert of the Royal Opera, Berlin; John McCormack and Clara Butt. For most of these concerts the popular prices of last Winter will rule, but for one or two it will be necessary, on account of the cost of the attraction, slightly to increase the scale.

Mr Kubelik began his season last Monday night with a concert at Montreal with Mme Melba. The violinist will begin his recital here next Sunday afternoon at 3:30. His program will be as follows: Saint-Saens, concerto in B minor; Bach, Chaconne; Wieniawski, Legende, Mazurka and Carneval Russe; Paganini, Caprice; Huboy, Scene de la Czardas.

Concerts and Lectures.

The mid-week entertainments arranged by Mr Mudgett include many interesting concerts and lectures. The Kneisel and Flonzaley quartets will have their usual series, the former giving four concerts, beginning Nov 4, and the latter beginning Dec 4. The list of singers will include Maggie Teyte, Julia Culp, Mme Sundelius, Helen Allen Hunt, Emilio Gorgorza, H. Evan Williams and John Chipman.

The pianists will comprise Miss Katherine Goodson, Miss Ruth Deyo, and Messrs Bachaus, Harold Henry and Leopold Godowsky. The violin will be represented by Miss Parlow, and the 'cello by Miss Beatrice Harrison and Mr Gerardy. The Schroeder trio will also be heard, and Mr Elmendorf and Mr Newman will deliver series of illustrated lectures.

First Symphony Program and Bankers' Concert

Dr Muck has made a characteristic program for the opening of the Symphony season next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The symphony will be Beethoven's seventh in A major. His performance of this during his first engagement in Boston will be remembered as one of the most brilliant of his achievements.

The other numbers will be Brahms' "Tragic Overture," Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

For the first time since the dedicatory concert in Symphony Hall in 1900 the Symphony Orchestra is to give a concert before the opening of its regular season. This will be on Thursday evening, Oct 9, and is given by the bankers of Boston as a compliment to the delegates present at the convention of the Bankers' Association of America.

The entire Symphony Orchestra will be used, with Dr Muck as its conductor. He will play the same program with which he opens the Symphony season on the following afternoon.

Novelties For the Symphony Season

When he arrived in Boston the other day Dr Muck was particularly emphatic in his statement that there was a dearth of good new music for orchestra in Germany. For several seasons the several German festivals whose business it is to bring out new works have produced pieces which the reviews pronounced failures or at best commonplace.

Heinrich Noren has already been known here by his theme and variations, "Kaleidoscope." A new symphony, "Vita," played in Dresden last Spring will be one of Dr Muck's novelties. Another will be a symphonic poem by Reznicek, who has written a successful opera, "Donna Diana." This new piece was based upon Hoffmann's character, Peter Schlemihl, the man who cast no shadow. Being a tenuous creature he should have inspired Mr Louis Aubert, composer of "The Blue Forest." Offenbach has made him familiar in his opera.

Max Schillings, now conductor at Stuttgart, will have two pieces on the programs, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," the latter based upon Lenan's poem: "Seawards ho! Proud strength urges us on to new goals! The sails swelling with the morning breeze the ship moves on, rejoicing in the journey, cleaving the onset of the waves with its mighty breast." "Sea morning" means not so much "morning at sea" as "morning of the sea." Schillings, who is Hellenic in type of thought—he has a prologue to Sophocles' Oedipus Rex—has given "Sea Greeting," the companion piece of "Sea Morning," a subtitle, "Thalatte," the Greek for "sea."

Of particular interest will be the "Tragedy of Salome," by Florent Schmitt, the Frenchman with the German sounding name, who was included on Mr Longy's programs last Winter, and whose quartet for mixed voices was heard at an opera concert. It is a pleasure to know that Dr Muck will play Rachmaninoff's 2d symphony, and particularly that he will repeat the titanic fifth symphony of Mahler. His plans include performances of Bruckner's "unfinished" symphony and a symphonic poem of Liszt probably never played in Boston. It is entitled "Ce qu'on entend sur la montagne," and is based upon a poem of Victor Hugo.

Handel and Haydn Society Begins Rehearsals Tonight.

Rehearsals for the 1913-14 season of the Handel and Haydn Society begin tonight in Sleeper Hall, Boylston st. The works to be performed and dates are "Messiah," Dec 21 and 22; "Samson and Delilah" (Saint-Saens), Feb 8; "Redemption" (Gounod), Easter Sunday.

The following soloists have alread been engaged: Mme Wilhelmina Wrig Calvert, Miss Adelaide Griggs, Mi Grace Kerns, Mrs Grace Bonner Wi liams, Dan Beddoe, Earl Cartwrig Willard Flint, Lambert Murphy, W liam H. Pagdin and William Hinshaw.

The board of government and offic for the season are: William F. Bra bury, president; Eugene D. Russe vice president; John C. Brodhead, se retary; George M. Brooks, treasure William N. Eustis, librarian; George Hatch, superintendent of sopranos Samuel L. Hills, superintendent of tenors; James A. Murphy, superintender of altos; Duane White, superintender of basses; Edward P. Boynton, Robe Entwistle, John W. Hall and Henry Turner.

Duane White, 9 Howland st, Roxbur is head of the voice committee, to whor those wishing to join the chorus shoul apply.

Cambridge Symphony Concerts Begin Next Week

The Boston Symphony Orchestra wil this season, as usual, give eight concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, under the auspices of Harvard University. The concerts will come on Thursday evenings, Oct 16, Nov 13, Dec 11, Jan 15, Feb 5, Feb 26, March 26 and April 23.

The solo artists will be Mme Teresa Carreno, pianist; Mme Boehn van Endert, soprano; Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Miss Ruth Deyo, pianist; Mme Marie Sundelius, soprano, and Mr George Proctor, pianist. Mme Carreno, Mme van Endert and Mr Kreisler are included in the soloists who will appear with the Symphony Orchestra at its Boston concerts.

Subscribers to the series of last season have until tomorrow in which to renew subscriptions and secure the seats they had last year. Application should be made to George Kent, University Bookstore, Harvard sq, Cambridge.

The unclaimed seats will be offered for sale next Saturday morning. A limited number of seats have been reserved for college officers and invited guests.

MONITOR, BOSTON, MASS.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 4,

Recital artists to appear in the course of the season in the smaller halls of the city under the direction of L. H. Mudgett include singers as follows: Mme. Maggie Teyte, Mme. Julia Culp, Mrs. Marie Sundelius, Mrs. Helen Allen Hunt, Emilio de Gogorza, H. Evan Williams and John Chipman. The pianists will be Harold Henry and Messrs. Bachaus and Godowsky. Violoncellists to appear are Miss Beatrice Harrison and Mr. Gerardy. Miss Parlow, the violinist, will play. Chamber music organizations to give concerts are the Kneisel and Flonzaley quartets and the Schroeder trio.

* * *

JAN KUBELIK

Violinist who opens series of Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony hall appearing twice and the New York Philharmonic orchestra and the Philadelphia orchestra each appearing once. The first musical artists of the world visiting this winter are to given recitals. Popular prices are to be continued, 1000 seats being offered at $1, as last year, for all but two concerts, at which the scale will be somewhat raised.

Jan Kubelik, the violinist, opens the series Oct. 12, playing the following works: Concerto in B minor, Saint-Saens; chaconne, Bach; "Legende," mazurka and Russian Carnival," Wieniawski; caprice, Paganini; czardas, Hubay.

Among the bookings definitely made are the following: Oct. 19, Mme. Melba, soprano, and Edmond Burke, baritone; Oct. 26, Josef Hofmann, pianist; Nov. 2, Philharmonic orchestra, Mr. Stransky, conductor, with Fritz Kreisler as soloist; Nov. 9, Mme. Frieda Hempel, soprano; Nov. 16, Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor; Nov. 30, Mme. Gadski, soprano; Dec. 7, Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Dec. 28, Harold Bauer, pianist.

January bookings include Mmes. Gluck, Carreno and Culp and Mr. Ysaye. In February Mmes. Schumann-Heink, Rappold and Matzenauer and Franz Egenieff, baritone, are to sing; and the Philadelphia orchestra, Mr. Stowkowski, conductor, with Mischa Elman as soloist, is to play. Artists engaged for March are Mmes. van Endert and Butt and Mr. McCormack.

Three of the Sundays of the season will be taken up with concerts by the Handel and Haydn Society.

* * *

Beethoven's seventh symphony will be the chief work on the program of the opening rehearsal and of the Boston Symphony orchestra Oct. 10 and 11. The other numbers will be the "Tragic" overture of Brahms, the "Preludes" symphonic poem of Liszt and the "Flying Dutchman" overture of Wagner.

* * *

Concerts are to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Sanders theater, Cambridge, on Thursday evenings during the winter as follows: Oct. 16, Nov. 12, Dec. 11, Jan. 15, Feb. 5, Feb. 26, March 26 and April 23. The soloists are Mmes. van Endert, Deyo, Sundelius and Carreno, and Messrs. Kreisler and Proctor.

* * *

Reduced prices on season tickets for the Boston opera performances of the coming season last until Nov. 1, according to announcements of the box office managers. The house is said to be s[illegible] to just about the same extent as was last year at this time. The [illegible]scription for the cheapest [illegible] second balcony has been [illegible] the most expensive [illegible] and at the front of [illegible] been excellent. Th[illegible] [illegible]rted in the $2 [illegible] in the first balco[illegible]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

on account of the cost of the attraction, to change the scale slightly.

TREMONT TEMPLE CONCERTS

Miss Evelyn Parnell, a Boston coloratura soprano, who has just returned after four years in European opera houses, will be heard for the first time since she left the Boston Opera House at the opening concert of the Tremont Temple Concert Course, with Michael J. Dwyer, tenor, on Thursday evening, Nov. 6. Miss Parnell had a signal success in Dublin with the Quinlan Opera Company last season, and will return to Ireland this winter to fill operatic and concert engagements, after which she will go to La Scala, Milan. The Tremont Temple Course this season will consist of six concerts. The first will be Irish in its general character, the second Scotch, and the third an evening of Home Songs of America and England. The fourth concert will be patriotic, the fifth a Request night and the final concert an operatic night. Miss Evelyn Scotney and Howard White of the Boston Opera Company will be heard at the second concert with Miss Ellen Keller, violinist, Thanksgiving night, Nov. 27. The sale of course tickets will begin Monday, Oct. 13.

BANKERS' CONCERT

For the first time since the dedicatory concert in Symphony Hall in 1900 the Symphony Orchestra will give a concert before the opening of its regular season. This will be on Thursday evening, Oct. 9, and is given by the bankers of Boston as a compliment to the delegates present at the convention of the Bankers' Association of America. The entire Symphony Orchestra will be used, with Dr. Muck as its conductor. He will play the program with which he opens the Symphony season on the following afternoon: Beethoven's 7th Symphony; Brahms's "Tragic" Overture; Liszt's "Preludes" and Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

CAMBRIDGE CONCERTS

The Symphony Orchestra will this season give eight concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, under the auspices of Harvard University. The concerts will come on Thursday evenings and the dates are Oct. 16, Nov. 12, Dec. 11, Jan. 15, Feb. 5, Feb. 26, March 26 and April 23.

Six soloists of high rank have been engaged for the series. There will be no soloists at the first and last concerts. The artists will be Mme. Teresa Carreno, pianist; Mme. Boehn van Endert, soprano; Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Miss Ruth Deyo, pianist; Mme. Marie Sundelius, soprano, and George Proctor, pianist. Mme. Carreno, Mme. van Endert and Mr. Kreisler are included in the soloists who will appear with the Symphony Orchestra at its Boston concerts. Miss Ruth Deyo is a brilliant American pianist of whom much is expected. Mr. Proctor has many friends in Cambridge. Mme. Marie Sundelius is regarded as one of the foremost of Boston sopranos. She will sing several times this season with the Symphony Orchestra.

Subscribers to the series of last season have until tomorrow (Monday), Oct. 6, in which to renew subscriptions and secure the seats they had last year. Applications should be made to George Kent, University bookstore, Harvard square, Cambridge. The unclaimed seats will be offered for sale at the University bookstore next Saturday morning, Oct. 11. A limited number of seats have been reserved for college officers and invited guests.

MR. MUDGETT'S CONCERTS.

An interesting list of midweek concerts is announced by L. H. Mudgett for this season. The Kneisel and Flonzaley quartets will give their usual series. The former will give four concerts on Thursday evenings beginning Nov. 4; the latter on Thursday evenings; beginning Dec. 4. The list of singers will include Maggie Teyte, Julia Culp, Mme. Sundelius, Helen Allen Hunt, Emilio Gorgorza, H. Evan Williams and John Chipman. Mr. Chipman is new to this city. The pianists will comprise Miss Katherine Goodson, Miss Ruth Deyo, and Messrs. Backhaus, Harold Henry (new) and Leopold Godowsky. Miss Parlow will give a violin recital. Miss Beatrice Harrison, an English 'cellist, will make her first appearance here, and Jean Gerardy will give a recital. The Schroeder Trio will also be heard. As usual, Mr. Elmendorf and Mr. Newman will deliver a series of illustrated lectures. More detailed announcement of these concerts will be made later.

TRAVELER

OCTOBER 4,

SYMPHONY HALL SUNDAY CONCERTS

Encouraged by the marked success attending last season's series of Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall, Manager Mudgett is arranging for an even stronger list of attractions this year. He will offer as the opening concert, Sunday afternoon, Oct. 12, the eminent violinist, Jan Kubelik, in the following program:

Concerto in B minor, No. 3, Saint-Saens; Chaconne (for violin alone), Bach; "Legende," "Mazurka," "Carneval Russe," Wieniawski; "Caprice," Paganini; "Scene de la Czardas," Hubay.

Other concerts already planned are as follows: Oct. 19, Mme. Melba, soprano, and Edmond Burke, baritone; Oct. 26, Josef Hoffman, pianist; Nov. 2, the Philharmonic Orchestra of New York, with Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as soloist; Nov. 9, Frieda Hempel, soprano; Nov. 30, Mme. Gadski, soprano; Dec. 7, Fritz Kreisler, and Dec. 28, Harold Bauer, pianist, and Jacques Thibaud. Equally strong attractions are being arranged for January and February.

AMERICAN, SUNDAY, OCTOBER 5,

Jan Kubelik, Famous Bohemian Violinist, Coming Next Sunday

Distinguished virtuoso will open concert season at Symphony Hall.

Kubelik to Play at Symphony Hall

Technique Said to Be Finer Than Ever; Has All Old Charm.

To Jan Kubelik, the distinguished Bohemian violinist, falls the honor of opening the series of Sunday concerts which will be given in Symphony Hall during the coming Winter. He will give a recital there next Sunday afternoon, October 12, at 3:30 o'clock. Kubelik is in every sense of the word an interesting personality. When he first came to this country, a matter of ten years ago, he was known simply as the possessor of an extraordinary technique and a wonderful tone. Musicians generally regarded him not so much as a "violinist" as a "fiddler," but Kubelik has grown greatly in recent years. Today, while still possessor of his technique and his tone, he is decidedly a serious musician, seriously to be reckoned with. His is one of the most beautiful tones ever drawn from a violin, and his personality retains all the charm that it had when he was a younger man.

GLOBE—OCTOBER

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Mr Mudgett's Noted Entertainers.

Kubelik Will Begin Concert Series Next Sunday.

Opening of the Symphony Next Friday.

Kubelik Begins Mudgett Concerts

The most important innovation in recent years in the giving of concerts in Boston, both in the sustained high character of the singers and instrumentalists offered, and the large general public which responded, was the season of Sunday afternoon concerts which Mr Mudgett offered last year at Symphony Hall. The word "artist" is an abused word in musical terminology. All persons who sing or play for a living are necessarily "artists," but here was a series of concerts meriting the name "artists' course." Mr Mudgett gained the success he deserved, and fortunately will continue the scheme this Winter. The manager has made his preparations with the leisure of the Summer and the previous season, and the new list of entertainers is indeed an imposing one.

The season of these concerts will be a long one. Beginning next Sunday afternoon with a recital by Mr Kubelik, it is likely to continue with some entertainment each Sunday until the middle of April. In this series there will be included the two concerts for the pension fund of the orchestra, which will fall on Nov 16 and March 8. There will be an intermission in the afternoon series on the days of the three usual Sunday evening concerts by the Handel and Haydn Society.

Following Kubelik, Mme Melba will give the second concert Oct 19, Edmond Burke, the Canadian baritone, accompanying her. The third Sunday, Oct 26, will bring Josef Hofmann in a piano recital, and Fritz Kreisler and the Philharmonic Orchestra of New York will be here the afternoon of Nov 2.

Frieda Hempel, the coloratura soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, assisted by an artist to be announced later, will give a recital Nov 9. Mme Gadski will have a recital Nov 30, and Fritz Kreisler another Dec 7. Jacques Thibaud, the French violinist, and Harold Bauer will appear together Dec 28. In January there will be concerts by Alma Gluck, Ysaye, Mme Carreno and Julia Culp.

Mme Schumann-Heink will give her annual recital in February. There will also be an opportunity to hear Mr Stokowski and his Philadelphia orchestra, with Mischa Elman as soloist. During this month Mme Matzenauer, as yet unheard in Boston in concert, Mme Rappold and Franz Egenieff, the German baritone.

In March there will be concerts by Mme Boehn Van Endert of the Royal Opera, Berlin; John McCormack and Clara Butt. For most of these concerts the popular prices of last Winter will rule, but for one or two it will be necessary, on account of the cost of the attraction, slightly to increase the scale.

Mr Kubelik began his season last Monday night with a concert at Montreal with Mme Melba. The violinist will begin his recital here next Sunday afternoon at 3:30. His program will be as follows: Saint-Saens, concerto in B minor; Bach, Chaconne; Wieniawski, Legende, Mazurka and Carneval Russe; Paganini, Caprice; Huboy, Scene de la Czardas.

Concerts and Lectures.

The mid-week entertainments arranged by Mr Mudgett include many interesting concerts and lectures. The Kneisel and Flonzaley quartets will have their usual series, the former giving four concerts, beginning Nov 4, and the latter beginning Dec 4. The list of singers will include Maggie Teyte, Julia Culp, Mme Sundelius, Helen Allen Hunt, Emilio Gorgorza, H. Evan Williams and John Chipman.

The pianists will comprise Miss Katherine Goodson, Miss Ruth Deyo, and Messrs Bachaus, Harold Henry and Leopold Godowsky. The violin will be represented by Miss Parlow, and the 'cello by Miss Beatrice Harrison and Mr Gerardy. The Schroeder trio will also be heard, and Mr Elmendorf and Mr Newman will deliver series of illustrated lectures.

First Symphony Program and Bankers' Concert

Dr Muck has made a characteristic program for the opening of the Symphony season next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The symphony will be Beethoven's seventh in A major. His performance of this during his first engagement in Boston will be remembered as one of the most brilliant of his achievements.

The other numbers will be Brahms' "Tragic Overture," Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

For the first time since the dedicatory concert in Symphony Hall in 1900 the Symphony Orchestra is to give a concert before the opening of its regular season. This will be on Thursday evening, Oct 9, and is given by the bankers of Boston as a compliment to the delegates present at the convention of the Bankers' Association of America.

The entire Symphony Orchestra will be used, with Dr Muck as its conductor. He will play the same program with which he opens the Symphony season on the following afternoon.

Novelties For the Symphony Season

When he arrived in Boston the other day Dr Muck was particularly emphatic in his statement that there was a dearth of good new music for orchestra in Germany. For several seasons the several German festivals whose business it is to bring out new works have produced pieces which the reviews pronounced failures or at best commonplace.

Heinrich Noren has already been known here by his theme and variations, "Kaleidoscope." A new symphony, "Vita," played in Dresden last Spring will be one of Dr Muck's novelties. Another will be a symphonic poem by Reznicek, who has written a successful opera, "Donna Diana." This new piece was based upon Hoffmann's character, Peter Schlemihl, the man who cast no shadow. Being a tenuous creature he should have inspired Mr Louis Aubert, composer of "The Blue Forest." Offenbach has made him familiar in his opera.

Max Schillings, now conductor at Stuttgart, will have two pieces on the programs, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," the latter based upon Lenan's poem: "Seawards ho! Proud strength urges us on to new goals! The sails swelling with the morning breeze the ship moves on, rejoicing in the journey, cleaving the onset of the waves with its mighty breast." "Sea morning" means not so much "morning at sea" as "morning of the sea." Schillings, who is Hellenic in type of thought—he has a prologue to Sophocles' Oedipus Rex—has given "Sea Greeting," the companion piece of "Sea Morning," a subtitle, "Thalatte," the Greek for "sea."

Of particular interest will be the "Tragedy of Salome," by Florent Schmitt, the Frenchman with the German sounding name, who was included on Mr Longy's programs last Winter, and whose quartet for mixed voices was heard at an opera concert. It is a pleasure to know that Dr Muck will play Rachmaninoff's 2d symphony, and particularly that he will repeat the titanic fifth symphony of Mahler. His plans include performances of Bruckner's "unfinished" symphony and a symphonic poem of Liszt probably never played in Boston. It is entitled "Ce qu'on entend sur la montagne," and is based upon a poem of Victor Hugo.

Handel and Haydn Society Begins Rehearsals Tonight.

Rehearsals for the 1913-14 season of the Handel and Haydn Society begin tonight in Sleeper Hall, Boylston st. The works to be performed and dates are "Messiah," Dec 21 and 22; "Samson and Delilah" (Saint-Saens), Feb 8; "Redemption" (Gounod), Easter Sunday.

The following soloists have already been engaged: Mme Wilhelmina Wright Calvert, Miss Adelaide Griggs, Miss Grace Kerns, Mrs Grace Bonner Williams, Dan Beddoe, Earl Cartwright, Willard Flint, Lambert Murphy, William H. Pagdin and William Hinshaw.

The board of government and officers for the season are: William F. Bradbury, president; Eugene D. Russell, vice president; John C. Brodhead, secretary; George M. Brooks, treasurer; William N. Eustis, librarian; George F. Hatch, superintendent of sopranos; Samuel L. Hills, superintendent of tenors; James A. Murphy, superintendent of altos; Duane White, superintendent of basses; Edward P. Boynton, Robert Entwistle, John W. Hall and Henry H. Turner.

Duane White, 9 Howland st, Roxbury, is head of the voice committee, to whom those wishing to join the chorus should apply.

Cambridge Symphony Concerts Begin Next Week

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will this season, as usual, give eight concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, under the auspices of Harvard University. The concerts will come on Thursday evenings, Oct 16, Nov 13, Dec 11, Jan 15, Feb 5, Feb 26, March 26 and April 23.

The solo artists will be Mme Teresa Carreno, pianist; Mme Boehn van Endert, soprano; Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Miss Ruth Deyo, pianist; Mme Marie Sundelius, soprano, and Mr George Proctor, pianist. Mme Carreno, Mme van Endert and Mr Kreisler are included in the soloists who will appear with the Symphony Orchestra at its Boston concerts.

Subscribers to the series of last season have until tomorrow in which to renew subscriptions and secure the seats they had last year. Application should be made to George Kent, University Bookstore, Harvard sq, Cambridge.

The unclaimed seats will be offered for sale next Saturday morning. A limited number of seats have been reserved for college officers and invited guests.

MONITOR, BOSTON, MASS.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 4,

Recital artists to appear in the course of the season in the smaller halls of the city under the direction of L. H. Mudgett include singers as follows: Mme. Maggie Teyte, Mme. Julia Culp, Mrs. Marie Sundelius, Mrs. Helen Allen Hunt, Emilio de Gogorza, H. Evan Williams and John Chipman. The pianists will be Harold Henry and Messrs. Bachaus and Godowsky. Violoncellists to appear are Miss Beatrice Harrison and Mr. Gerardy. Miss Parlow, the violinist, will play. Chamber music organizations to give concerts are the Kneisel and Flonzaley quartets and the Schroeder trio.

* * *

JAN KUBELIK

inist who opens series of Sunday ternoon concerts in Symphony hall

aring twice and the New York harmonic orchestra and the Philalphia orchestra each appearing once, he first musical artists of the world siting this winter are to given recitals. opular prices are to be continued, 1000 eats being offered at $1, as last year, for all but two concerts, at which the scale will be somewhat raised.

Jan Kubelik, the violinist, opens the series Oct. 12, playing the following works: Concerto in B minor, Saint-Saens; chaconne, Bach; "Legende," mazurka and Russian Carnival," Wieniawski; caprice, Paganini; czardas, Hubay.

Among the bookings definitely made are the following: Oct. 19, Mme. Melba, soprano, and Edmond Burke, baritone; Oct. 26, Josef Hofmann, pianist; Nov. 2, Philharmonic orchestra, Mr. Stransky, conductor, with Fritz Kreisler as soloist; Nov. 9, Mme. Frieda Hempel, soprano; Nov. 16, Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor; Nov. 30, Mme. Gadski, soprano; Dec. 7, Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Dec. 28, Harold Bauer, pianist.

January bookings include Mmes. Gluck, Carreno and Culp and Mr. Ysaye. In February Mmes. Schumann-Heink, Rappold and Matzenauer and Franz Egenieff, baritone, are to sing; and the Philadelphia orchestra, Mr. Stowkowski, conductor, with Mischa Elman as soloist, is to play. Artists engaged for March are Mmes. van Endert and Butt and Mr. McCormack.

Three of the Sundays of the season will be taken up with concerts by the Handel and Haydn Society.

* * *

Beethoven's seventh symphony will be the chief work on the program of the opening rehearsal and of the Boston Symphony orchestra Oct. 10 and 11. The other numbers will be the "Tragic" overture of Brahms, the "Preludes" symphonic poem of Liszt and the "Flying Dutchman" overture of Wagner.

* * *

Concerts are to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Sanders theater, Cambridge, on Thursday evenings during the winter as follows: Oct. 16, Nov. 12, Dec. 11, Jan. 15, Feb. 5, Feb. 26, March 26 and April 23. The soloists are Mmes. van Endert, Deyo, Sundelius and Carreno, and Messrs. Kreisler and Proctor.

* * *

Reduced prices on season tickets for the Boston opera performances of the coming season last until Nov. 1, according to announcements of the box office managers. The house is said to be to just about the same extent as was last year at this time. The scription for the cheapes second balcony has been the most expensive and at the front of been excellent. Th rted in the $2 in the first balc

TRANSCRIPT

OCTOBER 4.

THE CONCERT CALENDAR

The Course of the Symphony Concerts—Mr. Kubelik, Mme. Melba and Joseph Hofmann on Successive Sunday Afternoons—The Promise of October

SUNDAY afternoon, Oct. 12, in Symphony Hall, a concert by Mr. Kubelik, the violinist of delicately masterful technique, finely spun tone and the lighter qualities of expression. He has long had an eager public here.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 17, in Symphony Hall, the second of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra.

Saturday evening, Oct. 18, in Symphony Hall, the second of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra.

Sunday afternoon, Oct. 19, in Symphony Hall, a concert of operatic airs and songs by Mme. Melba, assisted by Edmund Burke, a London baritone of merit. Mme. Melba's voice keeps its richness, roundness and suavity; she is still instinctive and practised mistress of the art of song; as unaffectedly as of old she gives herself to her singing and her audience. Not many more times, since she is disposed to retirement, is she likely to sing here.

Tuesday evening, Oct. 21, in Steinert Hall, a concert by Mme. May Keon, an American singer of Italian training and reputation, assisted by Mr. de Segurola, the excellent bass of the Metropolitan; George Harris, the agreeable tenor and Virginio Capelloni, baritone.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 24, in Symphony Hall, the third of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra.

Saturday evening, Oct. 25, in Symphony Hall, the third of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra.

Sunday afternoon, Oct. 26, in Symphony Hall, a concert by Josef Hofmann, the pianist, at last established in his rightful place among the foremost virtuosi of his instrument in our time. Large and fine mastery of technical resource, multi-colored beauty of tone, clarity and proportion and just and sober masculine feeling meet in his playing.

Tuesday afternoon, Oct. 28, in Symphony Hall, a recital of songs, classic and modern, French, German and American, by Miss Farrar, unassisted, the first concert of the kind that she has ventured in Boston. She will bring to it a voice that has gained in body and color and a skill in song and resources of imagination and expression that are steadily ripening.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 31, in Symphony Hall, the fourth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Miss Farrar for the assisting singer.

Saturday evening, Nov. 1, in Symphony Hall, the fourth of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Miss Farrar assisting.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The First Pair Next Week, with Beethoven, Brahms, Liszt and Wagner on the Programme—Schedule and Soloists for the Concerts in Cambridge

SEEMINGLY Dr. Muck has a formula for the programme of the first pair of Symphony Concerts to begin a new season: First a symphony by Beethoven; next a classic overture; then a symphonic poem by Liszt; and finally an overture to one or another of Wagner's operas. Last year the symphony was "The Eroica"; the classic overture Berlioz's "Roman Carnival"; from Liszt came "Mazeppa," and from Wagner the overture to "Tannhäuser." For Friday afternoon and aSturday evening of next week, the symphony from Beethoven is the seventh symphony of the dance rhythms; the symphonic poem from Liszt is the somewhat hackneyed "Preludes" and the overture out of Wagner is that to "The Flying Dutchman." The classic overture is Brahms's "Tragic Overture," which has been relatively seldom played at the Symphony Concerts. By so much, it is the fresh piece of the programme. as Liszt's "Mazeppa" was last year. But these many years the essential interest of the first pair of Symphony Concerts is the conductor and the orchestra returned again to their expectant audiences. Both will recall to what a pitch of performance Dr. Muck had brought his men in the spring.

The Cambridge Concerts

As usual the Symphony Orchestra with Dr. Muck conducting, will undertake eight concerts in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge for the pleasure and the profit of the collegiate and the non-collegiate public that usually fills every seat. As heretofore, the concerts will fall on Thursday evenings at monthly intervals, viz., on Oct. 16, Nov. 13, Dec. 11, Jan. 19, Feb. 5, Feb. 26, March 26 and April 23. As usual, again, the programmes will consist of pieces recently played at the Symphony Concerts in Boston. From them three "assisting artists" will go also to Cambridge—Mr. Kreisler, the violinist; Mme. Carreño, the pianist, and Mme. Böhm van Endert, the new soprano from the opera houses of Berlin. Mr. Kreisler and Mme. Carreño speak for themselves, while Mme. van Endert is an accomplished singer of charm of voice and presence. Three other "assisting artists" are also to appear in Cambridge: Mme. Sundelius, deservedly engaged for them by the skill and the taste she shows in the use of a voice of light and fine timbre; Miss Deyo, an American pianist of German training and budding reputation in Germany, and Mr. Proctor, the pianist long familiar to the public of Boston and roundabout. At the first and the last concerts of the series, Dr. Muck will have the field to himself. Subscribers

---

RECORD.

OCTOBER 4.

First Symphony Concert.

The season of Symphony concerts will have its formal opening Friday afternoon. Following the custom he has established for himself in the past, Dr. Muck has arranged a simple and easily digested programme for the opening concert, all the concerts being well tried friends. The symphony will be Beethoven's 7th in A maj. There will be three other numbers. These will be the "Tragic" Overture of Brahms; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," and Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

Music Notes.

A most interesting list of midweek concerts is announced by L. H. Mudgett for the present season. The Kneisel and Flonzaley Quartettes will give their usual series, the former giving four concerts on Thursday evenings and the latter three concerts on Thursday evenings. The list of singers will include Maggie Teyte, Julia Culp, Mme. Sundelius. Helen Allen Hunt, Emilio DeGorza, H. Evans Williams and John Chipman. The pianists will comprise Miss Katharine Goodson, Miss Ruth Deyo and Messrs. Bachaus, Harold Henry (new) and Godowsky. while the violinist so far announced will be Miss Parlow. The beautiful music of the 'cello will be brought out by Miss Beatrice Harrison, who is new to Boston, and Mr. Gerardy. The Schroeder Trio will also be heard. As usual, Mr. Elmendorf and Mr. Newman will deliver series of illustrated lectures.

Miss Geraldine Farrar will give a song recital in Symphony Hall, Oct. 28. For the first time in her career Miss Farrar will undertake an entire concert programme in New York Saturday, Oct. 25, and in Boston the following Tuesday. At her concert in Boston she will sing a programme of 24 songs in German, French and English, songs ranging from classical airs to the dramatic tone pictures of the modern composers.

TRAVELER

OCTOBER 4,

SYMPHONY HALL SUNDAY CONCERTS

Encouraged by the marked success attending last season's series of Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall, Manager Mudgett is arranging for an even stronger list of attractions this year. He will offer as the opening concert, Sunday afternoon, Oct. 12, the eminent violinist, Jan Kubelik, in the following program:

Concerto in B minor, No. 3, Saint-Saens; Chaconne (for violin alone), Bach; "Legende," "Mazurka," "Carneval Russe," Wieniawski; "Caprice," Paganini; "Scene de la Czardas," Hubay.

Other concerts already planned are as follows: Oct. 19, Mme. Melba, soprano, and Edmond Burke, baritone; Oct. 26, Josef Hoffman, pianist; Nov. 2, the Philharmonic Orchestra of New York, with Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as soloist; Nov. 9, Frieda Hempel, soprano; Nov. 30, Mme. Gadski, soprano; Dec. 7, Fritz Kreisler, and Dec. 28, Harold Bauer, pianist, and Jacques Thibaud. Equally strong attractions are being arranged for January and February.

SYMPHONY SEASON OPENS FRIDAY NEXT

For the first time since the dedication of the new hall the Boston Symphony orchestra will give a concert before the opening of the regular season. This concert will be given Thursday evening next in Symphony Hall for the Boston convention of the American Bankers' Association. The program will be the same as for the opening pair of concerts for the following Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, namely, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major; Brahm's "Tragic" overture; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

There will be the usual eight concerts given in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, beginning Thursday evening, Oct. 16. All but the first and last concerts in the series will have prominent soloists.

MIDWEEK CONCERTS

For this season's midweek concerts L. H. Mudgett announces the following engagements: the Kneisel quartet, the Flonzaley quartet, Maggie Teyte, Julia Culp, Mme. Sundelius, Helen Allen Hunt, Emilio DeGorgoza, H. Evans Williams and John Chipman, vocalists; Miss Katharine Goodson, Miss Ruth Beyo, and Messrs. Bachaus, Harold Henry and Godowsky, pianists; Miss Parlow, violinist; Miss Beatrice Harrison, Mr. Gerardy, 'cellists. The Schroeder trio and Mr. Elmendorf and Mr. Newman in illustrated lectures.

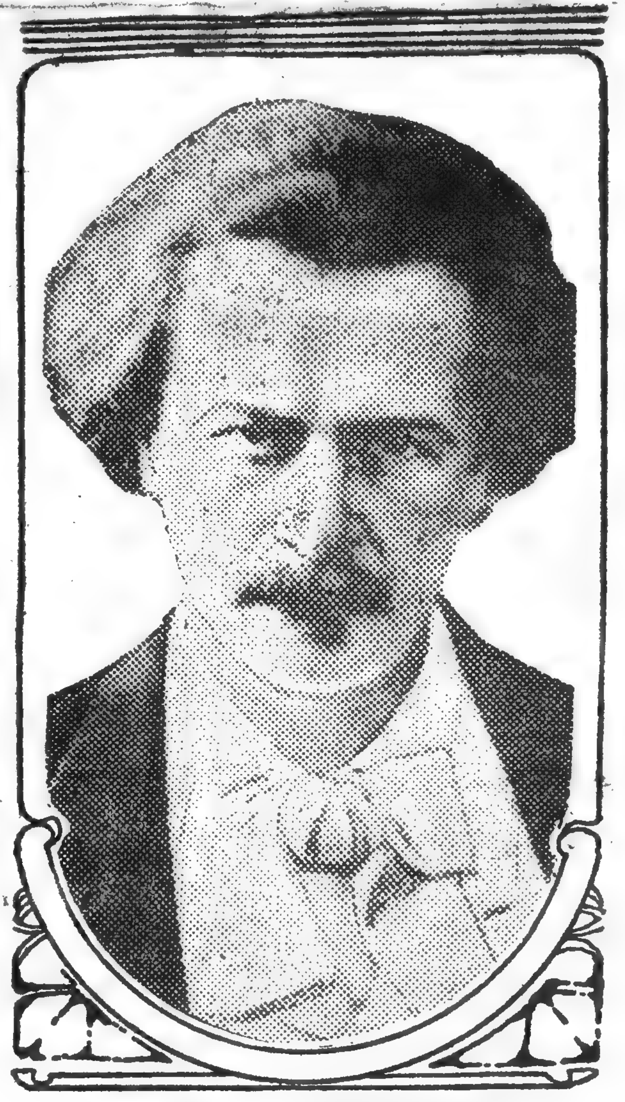
GERALDINE FARRAR COMING

Geraldine Farrar will give a song recital in Symphony Hall, Tuesday afternoon, Oct. 28, at 2:30. She will sing some 24 songs from the works of German, French and English composers, ranging from classical airs to the dramatic tone pictures of the modern composers.

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 5 - 1913

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his return from Europe last Tuesday said that he had brought back with him the score of the new symphony by Heinrich Noren, of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita." He has a symphonic poem by Rennicek, composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is called "Peter Schlemihl," the source of its inspiration, of course, being the famous story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Schillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and he will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston as well as in Boston Mahler's Fifth Symphony, which had such an extraordinarily sensational success in Boston last spring.



IGNACE PADEREWSKI

MADE A NOTE OF

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 5 - 1913

history.

* * *

Dr. Karl Muck, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his return from Europe last Tuesday said that he did not have a brilliant list of novelties to offer to the patrons of the Orchestra the coming Winter as the past year had been most unfruitful in this direction. He has brought back with him the score of the new Symphony by Heinrich Noren, of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new Symphony is entitled "Vida." He has a symphonic poem by Reznicek, composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is callled "Peter Schlemihl," the source of its inspiration of course, being the famous story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Schillings, and he will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor. No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston as well as in Boston Mahler's Fifth Symphony which had such an extraordinarily sensational success in Boston last Spring.

* * *

preparations are being

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date OCT 5 - 1913

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his return from Europe last Tuesday, said that he did not have a brilliant list of novelties to offer to the patrons of the orchestra the coming winter, as the past year had been most unfruitful in this direction. He has brought back with him the score of the new Symphony by Heinrich Noren, of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita." He has a symphonic poem by Reznicek, composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is called "Peter Schlemihl," the source of its inspiration, of course, being the famous story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Schillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and he will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston as well as in Boston, Mahler's Fifth Symphony, which has such an extraordinarily sensational success in Boston last spring.

* * *

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date ~~SEP~~ 5 1913

Madame Melba Now in This City

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony, who arrived in America from Europe last Tuesday, was decidedly less optimistic about new music abroad than Mr. Stokowski is reported to have been. Nevertheless, the New England orchestra's director did bring back with him a number of works which may prove attractive.

One is the score of a new symphony by Heinrich Noren, of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita." Doctor Muck has a symphonic poem by Rexnicak, composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is called "Peter Schlemihl," the source of its inspiration, of course, being Chamisso's famous story of the man who sold his shadow.

He has two pieces by Max Schillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and he will do some new short piece by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston, as well as in Boston, Mahler's Fifth Symphony, which had such a sensational success in Boston last spring.

From EVG. NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 4 1913

TO HAVE NO NOVELTIES

Boston Symphony Found Them Unsuccessful Last Year And Will Omit Them.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his return from Europe last Tuesday said that he did not have a brilliant list of novelties to offer to the patrons of the orchestra this winter, as last year had been most unfruitful in this direction. He has brought back with him the score of the new symphony by Heinrich Noren of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called "kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita."

He has a symphonic poem by Reznicek, composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is called "Peter Schlemihl," the source of its inspiration of course being the famous story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Shillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and he will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachmaninoff's Fifth Symphony in E minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston as well as in Boston Mahler's Fifth Symphony, which had such an extraordinarily sensational success in Boston last spring.

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 4 - 1913

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his return from Europe last Tuesday said that he did not have a brilliant list of novelties to offer to the patrons of the orchestra the coming winter, as the past year has been most unfruitful in this direction. He has brought back with him the score of the new symphony by Heinrich Noren, of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called Kaleidoscope.

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 5 - 1913

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his return from Europe last Tuesday said that he did not have a brilliant list of novelties the coming winter, as the past year has been most unfruitful in this direction. He has brought back with him the score of the new symphony by Heinrich Noren, of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called Kaleidoscope.

[25]

TRANSCRIPT

OCTOBER 4,

THE CONCERT CALENDAR

The Course of the Symphony Concerts—Mr. Kubelik, Mme. Melba and Joseph Hofmann on Successive Sunday Afternoons—The Promise of October

SUNDAY afternoon, Oct. 12, in Symphony Hall, a concert by Mr. Kubelik, the violinist of delicately masterful technique, finely spun tone and the lighter qualities of expression. He has long had an eager public here.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 17, in Symphony Hall, the second of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra.

Saturday evening, Oct. 18, in Symphony Hall, the second of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra.

Sunday afternoon, Oct. 19, in Symphony Hall, a concert of operatic airs and songs by Mme. Melba, assisted by Edmund Burke, a London baritone of merit. Mme. Melba's voice keeps its richness, roundness and suavity; she is still instinctive and practised mistress of the art of song; as unaffectedly as of old she gives herself to her singing and her audience. Not many more times, since she is disposed to retirement, is she likely to sing here.

Tuesday evening, Oct. 21, in Steinert Hall, a concert by Mme. May Keon, an American singer of Italian training and reputation, assisted by Mr. de Segurola, the excellent bass of the Metropolitan; George Harris, the agreeable tenor and Virginio Capelloni, baritone.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 24, in Symphony Hall, the third of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra.

Saturday evening, Oct. 25, in Symphony Hall, the third of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra.

Sunday afternoon, Oct. 26, in Symphony Hall, a concert by Josef Hofmann, the pianist, at last established in his rightful place among the foremost virtuosi of his instrument in our time. Large and fine mastery of technical resource, multi-colored beauty of tone, clarity and proportion and just and sober masculine feeling meet in his playing.

Tuesday afternoon, Oct. 28, in Symphony Hall, a recital of songs, classic and modern, French, German and American, by Miss Farrar, unassisted, the first concert of the kind that she has ventured in Boston. She will bring to it a voice that has gained in body and color and a skill in song and resources of imagination and expression that are steadily ripening.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 31, in Symphony Hall, the fourth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Miss Farrar for the assisting singer.

Saturday evening, Nov. 1, in Symphony Hall, the fourth of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Miss Farrar assisting.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The First Pair Next Week, with Beethoven, Brahms, Liszt and Wagner on the Programme—Schedule and Soloists for the Concerts in Cambridge

SEEMINGLY Dr. Muck has a formula for the programme of the first pair of Symphony Concerts to begin a new season: First a symphony by Beethoven; next a classic overture; then a symphonic poem by Liszt; and finally an overture to one or another of Wagner's operas. Last year the symphony was "The Eroica"; the classic overture Berlioz's "Roman Carnival"; from Liszt came "Mazeppa," and from Wagner the overture to "Tannhäuser." For Friday afternoon and aSturday evening of next week, the symphony from Beethoven is the seventh symphony of the dance rhythms; the symphonic poem from Liszt is the somewhat hackneyed "Preludes" and the overture out of Wagner is that to "The Flying Dutchman." The classic overture is Brahms's "Tragic Overture," which has been relatively seldom played at the Symphony Concerts. By so much, it is the fresh piece of the programme. as Liszt's "Mazeppa" was last year. But these many years the essential interest of the first pair of Symphony Concerts is the conductor and the orchestra returned again to their expectant audiences. Both will recall to what a pitch of performance Dr. Muck had brought his men in the spring.

The Cambridge Concerts

As usual the Symphony Orchestra with Dr. Muck conducting, will undertake eight concerts in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge for the pleasure and the profit of the collegiate and the non-collegiate public that usually fills every seat. As heretofore, the concerts will fall on Thursday evenings at monthly intervals, viz., on Oct. 16, Nov. 13, Dec. 11, Jan. 19, Feb. 5, Feb. 26, March 26 and April 23. As usual, again, the programmes will consist of pieces recently played at the Symphony Concerts in Boston. From them three "assisting artists" will go also to Cambridge—Mr. Kreisler, the violinist; Mme. Carreño, the pianist, and Mme. Böhm van Endert, the new soprano from the opera houses of Berlin. Mr. Kreisler and Mme. Carreño speak for themselves, while Mme. van Endert is an accomplished singer of charm of voice and presence. Three other "assisting artists" are also to appear in Cambridge: Mme. Sundelius, deservedly engaged for them by the skill and the taste she shows in the use of a voice of light and fine timbre; Miss Deyo, an American pianist of German training and budding reputation in Germany, and Mr. Proctor, the pianist long familiar to the public of Boston and roundabout. At the first and the last concerts of the series, Dr. Muck will have the field to himself. Subscribers

---

RECORD.

OCTOBER 4.

First Symphony Concert.

The season of Symphony concerts will have its formal opening Friday afternoon. Following the custom he has established for himself in the past, Dr. Muck has arranged a simple and easily digested programme for the opening concert, all the concerts being well tried friends. The symphony will be Beethoven's 7th in A maj. There will be three other numbers These will be the "Tragic" Overture of Brahms; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," and Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

Music Notes.

A most interesting list of midweek concerts is announced by L. H. Mudgett for the present season. The Kneisel and Flonzaley Quartettes will give their usual series, the former giving four concerts on Thursday evenings and the latter three concerts on Thursday evenings. The list of singers will include Maggie Teyte, Julia Culp, Mme. Sundelius, Helen Allen Hunt, Emilio DeGorza, H. Evans Williams and John Chipman. The pianists will comprise Miss Katharine Goodson, Miss Ruth Deyo and Messrs. Bachaus, Harold Henry (new) and Godowsky, while the violinist so far announced will be Miss Parlow. The beautiful music of the 'cello will be brought out by Miss Beatrice Harrison, who is new to Boston, and Mr. Gerardy. The Schroeder Trio will also be heard. As usual, Mr. Elmendorf and Mr. Newman will deliver series of illustrated lectures.

Miss Geraldine Farrar will give a song recital in Symphony Hall, Oct. 28. For the first time in her career Miss Farrar will undertake an entire concert programme in New York Saturday, Oct. 25, and in Boston the following Tuesday. At her concert in Boston she will sing a programme of 24 songs in German, French and English, songs ranging from classical airs to the dramatic tone pictures of the modern composers.

TRAVELER

OCTOBER 4,

SYMPHONY HALL SUNDAY CONCERTS

Encouraged by the marked success attending last season's series of Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall, Manager Mudgett is arranging for an even stronger list of attractions this year. He will offer as the opening concert, Sunday afternoon, Oct. 12, the eminent violinist, Jan Kubelik, in the following program:

Concerto in B minor, No. 3, Saint-Saens; Chaconne (for violin alone), Bach; "Legende," "Mazurka," "Carneval Russe," Wieniawski; "Caprice," Paganini; "Scene de la Czardas," Hubay.

Other concerts already planned are as follows: Oct. 19, Mme. Melba, soprano, and Edmond Burke, baritone; Oct. 26, Josef Hoffman, pianist; Nov. 2, the Philharmonic Orchestra of New York, with Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as soloist; Nov. 9, Frieda Hempel, soprano; Nov. 30, Mme. Gadski, soprano; Dec. 7, Fritz Kreisler, and Dec. 28, Harold Bauer, pianist, and Jacques Thibaud. Equally strong attractions are being arranged for January and February.

SYMPHONY SEASON OPENS FRIDAY NEXT

For the first time since the dedication of the new hall the Boston Symphony orchestra will give a concert before the opening of the regular season. This concert will be given Thursday evening next in Symphony Hall for the Boston convention of the American Bankers' Association. The program will be the same as for the opening pair of concerts for the following Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, namely, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major; Brahm's "Tragic" overture; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

There will be the usual eight concerts given in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, beginning Thursday evening, Oct. 16. All but the first and last concerts in the series will have prominent soloists.

MIDWEEK CONCERTS

For this season's midweek concerts H. Mudgett announces the following engagements: the Kneisel quartet, the Flonzaley quartet, Maggie Teyte, Julia Culp, Mme. Sundelius, Helen Allen Hunt, Emilio DeGorgoza, H. Evans Williams and John Chipman, vocalists; Miss Katharine Goodson, Miss Ruth Beyo, and Messrs. Bachaus, Harold Henry and Godowsky, pianists; Miss Parlow, violinist; Miss Beatrice Harrison, Mr. Gerardy, 'cellists. The Schroeder trio and Mr. Elmendorf and Mr. Newman in illustrated lectures.

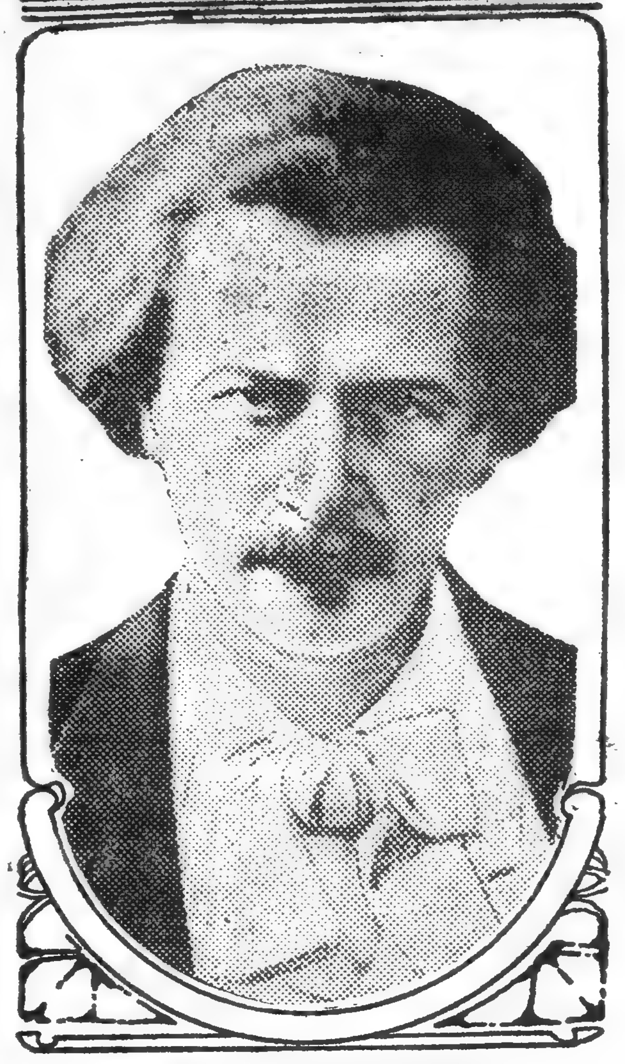
GERALDINE FARRAR COMING

Geraldine Farrar will give a song recital in Symphony Hall, Tuesday afternoon, Oct. 28, at 2:30. She will sing some 24 songs from the works of German, French and English composers, ranging from classical airs to the draamtic tone pictures of the modern composers.

QUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 5 - 1913

Symphony Orchestra

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his return from Europe last Tuesday said that he had brought back with him the score of the new symphony by Heinrich Noren, of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita." He has a symphonic poem by Rennicek, composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is called "Peter Schlemihl," the source of its inspiration, of course, being the famous story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Schillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and he will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston as well as in Boston Mahler's Fifth Symphony, which had such an extraordinarily sensational success in Boston last spring.



IGNACE PADEREWSKI

MADE A NOTE OF

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 5 - 1913

history.

* * *

Dr. Karl Muck, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his return from Europe last Tuesday said that he did not have a brilliant list of novelties to offer to the patrons of the Orchestra the coming Winter as the past year had been most unfruitful in this direction. He has brought back with him the score of the new Symphony by Heinrich Noren, of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new Symphony is entitled "Vida." He has a symphonic poem by Reznicek, composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is callled "Peter Schlemihl," the source of its inspiration of course, being the famous story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Schillings, and he will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston as well as in Boston Mahler's Fifth Symphony which had such an extraordinarily sensational success in Boston last Spring.

* * *

preparations are being

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date ~~OCT 5 - 1913~~

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his return from Europe last Tuesday, said that he did not have a brilliant list of novelties to offer to the patrons of the orchestra the coming winter, as the past year had been most unfruitful in this direction. He has brought back with him the score of the new Symphony by Heinrich Noren, of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita." He has a symphonic poem by Reznicek, composer of the opera "Donna is called "Peter Schlemihl," its inspiration, of course, mous story of the man who dow. He has two pieces by ings, "Meergruss" and "See- and he will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston as well as in Boston, Mahler's Fifth Symphony, which has such an extraordinarily sensational success in Boston last spring.

* * *

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date ~~SEP~~ 5 - 1913

Madame Melba Now in This City

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony, who arrived in America from Europe last Tuesday, was decidedly less optimistic about new music abroad than Mr. Stokowski is reported to have been. Nevertheless, the New England orchestra's director did bring back with him a number of works which may prove attractive.

One is the score of a new symphony by Heinrich Noren, of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita." Doctor Muck has a symphonic poem by Rexnicak, composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is called "Peter Schlemihl," the source of its inspiration, of course, being Chamisso's famous story of the man who sold his shadow.

He has two pieces by Max Schillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and he will do some new short piece by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston, as well as in Boston, Mahler's Fifth Symphony, which had such a sensational success in Boston last spring.

From EVG. NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 4 - 1913

TO HAVE NO NOVELTIES

Boston Symphony Found Them Unsuccessful Last Year And Will Omit Them.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his return from Europe last Tuesday said that he did not have a brilliant list of novelties to offer to the patrons of the orchestra this winter, as last year had been most unfruitful in this direction. He has brought back with him the score of the new symphony by Heinrich Noren of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called "kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita."

He has a symphonic poem by Reznicek, composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is called "Peter Schlemihl," the source of its inspiration of course being the famous story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Shillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and he will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachmaninoff's Fifth Symphony in E minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston as well as in Boston Mahler's Fifth Symphony, which had such an extraordinarily sensational success in Boston last spring.

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 4 - 1913

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphouy Orchestra, on his return from Europe last Tuesday said that he did not have a brilliant list of novelties to offer to the patrons of the orchestra the coming winter, as the past year has been most unfruitful in this direction. He has brought back with him the score of the new symphony by Heinrich Noren, of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called Kaleidoscope.

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 5 - 1913

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his return from Europe last Tuesday said that he did not have a brilliant list of novelties the coming winter, as the past year has been most unfruitful in this direction. He has brought back with him the score of the new symphony by Heinrich Noren, of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called Kaleidoscope.

From Providence, R. I.
Address OCT 4 - 1913
Date

k, 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, arrived in Boston last Monday where he has been making final preparations for his season's work. On the same ship with him were several new members of the orchestra. Altogether there will be seven new members in the orchestra. These comprise Alfred Holy, the new first harp, who succeeds the late Heinrich Schuecker; Bruno Jaenicke, a new first horn; two new first violins, to take the places of Messrs. Strube and Mullaly; two new second violins, and a new viola. Mr. Gustav Strube, so well known in Providence and for many years in the orchestra, has become the professor of harmony and counterpoint in the Peabody Institute at Baltimore. Mr. Mullaly has retired on a pension; likewise Mr. Akroyd and Mr. Marble of the second violins. Mr. Jaenicke, the new horn, is regarded as one of the most celebrated horns in Europe and comes from the celebrated Royal Opera House in Weisbaden. The orchestra will start the season in superb condition and greater results than ever are expected from it. As already announced, the general sale of season tickets for the Providence series will open at Seddon's newsstand, Butler's Exchange, 123 Westminster street, Monday morning, Oct. 13.

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 4 1913

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his return from Europe last Tuesday, said that he did not have a brilliant list of novelties to offer to the patrons of the orchestra the coming winter, as the past year had been most unfruitful in this direction. He has brought back with him the score of the new symphony by Heinrich Noren, of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita." He has a symphonic poem by Rexnicek, composer of the opera, "Donna Diana," which is called "Peter Schlemihl," the source of its inspiration, of course, being the famous story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Schillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and he will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston as well as in Boston Mahler's Fifth Symphony, which had such an extraordinarily sensational success in Boston last spring.

Est

1884

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 5 1913

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his return from Europe last Tuesday said that he did not have a brilliant list of novelties to offer to the patrons of the Orchestra the coming winter, as the past year had been most unfruitful in this direction. He has brought back with him the score of the new symphony by Heinrich Noren, of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita." He has a symphonic poem by Renicek, composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is called "Peter Schlemihl," the source of its inspiration, of course, being the famous story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Schillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and he will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachomaninoff's symphony in E minor, No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston as well as in Boston Hahler's Fifth Symphony, a success in Boston last spring.

ork, 1884

BRINGS MANY NOVELTIES

GLOBE

OCTOBER 13,

KUBELIK GIVEN A ROUSING RECEPTION

Delighted Audience Makes Him Play Overtime.

Symphony Hall Crowded at First of Sunday Concerts.

Jan Kubelik's magnetic personality and splendid playing have always made him exceedingly popular in Boston, but it is doubtful if the brilliant Bohemian violinist was ever accorded such a demonstrative reception as he was yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. To begin with, the hall was filled beyond its seating room, and when Mr Kubelik played the last selection on his program every person in the audience insisted, by applause, that he play again. This he did, giving Sarasate's "Spanish Dance." But instead of letting him off with that, the audience demanded more, and Mr Kubelik finally responded with Rubinstein's "Romance."

So exquisitely did Mr Kubelik handle this beautiful melody that, far from satiated, his listeners became even more vociferous in showing their appreciation than before. There was nothing to do but respond, and this time Mr Kubelik played "Abendlied," one of the lesser known, and too infrequently heard compositions by Robert Schumann.

This time, Mr Kubelik felt sure, his audience had had enough, and after several acknowledgements of the applause, he retired to his room, out of hearing range of the auditorium, packed away his violin, and prepared to depart. It was perhaps four or five minutes later that word was brought to him that his audience was still at it applauding more earnestly than ever. Whereupon he unpacked his violin again took the stage, and played Wieniawski's "Carneval Russe," and this time his listeners relented and let him retire.

Mr Kubelik's appearance marked the opening of the Fall and Winter Sunday afternoon concerts at Symphony Hall, and if yesterday's attendance means anything, the success of the season is already assured.

Mr Kubelik opened with Saint-Saens' Concerto in B Minor, No. 3, in three movements, allegro non troppo, andante quasi allegretto and molto moderato e maestoso: allegro non troppo. This opening number was perhaps as much enjoyed as anything he played. His next selection, Bach's "Chaconne," he played without accompaniment, George Falkenstein adding much to the enjoyment of all the other numbers by his excellent work at the piano.

Then followed a suite from Henri Wieniawski, "Legende," "Mazurka" and "Polonaise in A Major." These were all played with the perfect execution that has placed Mr Kubelik among the world's greatest violinists, and so delighted were his hearers that this time they insisted on more, Mr Kubelik responding with "Poem Fibich," arranged by himself.

Next on the program was "Caprice," by Paganini, and Mr Kubelik closed his regular program with Hubay's "Scene de la Czardas." But by now his wonderful playing had put his audience in a mood for more, and more they did have until he had played four other selections, enumerated above.

Next Sunday afternoon Mme Melba is to sing at Symphony Hall, and assisting her will be Edmund Burke, baritone, from the Covent Garden Opera, London; Gabriel Lapierre, pianist, and Marcel Moyse, flutist. The third concert in the series will be given Oct 26, when Josef Hofmann will be the attraction.

OCTOBER 13
JOURNAL

Great Crowd Hears Kubelik in Concert In Symphony Hal

By E. F. Harkins

KUBELIK, perhaps the most brilliant exponent of the bravura school of violinists, opened the Sunday afternoon concert season at Symphony Hall yesterday before an audience that lacked only a small number to equal the largest ever crowded into that well-known home of music. The few seats vacant were among the best in the house.

The young Bohemian violinist—he is now 33—has not changed materially in appearance or performance. His form is still youthful, his physiognomy impassive and inscrutable, his dress remains made up of the old-fashioned frock coat, with stand-up collar and plain black tie; his temperament is still cool and his technique retains its unique brilliancy. The sobriquet of "20th century Paganini" seems to fit him better every time he comes. He is a singular personality and an equally singular virtuoso. The cognoscenti may proclaim that he is not a great artist, yet they flock to hear him just the same. They were there in Symphony Hall yesterday. The public likes him frankly for his spectacular style.

[illegible]

[illegible] commentary on Kubelik's art that not until the program had been two-thirds played was there anything like an imperative call for an encore. That was after his performance of Wieniawski's fireworks piece, the Polonaise in A major; and in response to the applause he gave his own arrangement of the "Poem" by Fibich, originally a piano piece. Then, as if to justify the opinion that classifies him with the sensational virtuosos of long ago, he gave a wonderful performance of the Paganini "Caprice." It was enough to take the violin student's breath away. There was something uncanny about it, which is what the commentators of long-gone days used to say of Paganini's playing, for it seemed as if unseen hands were sweeping the strings with feathery lightness.

There was lttle to evoke applause in the uninspired performance of the Saint-Saens Concerto in B minor, No. 3, which opened the recital, for not until the last movement was there any evidence of the brilliant tone that has always distinguished Kubelik's playing. In this movement, too, the audience heard the flalgeolet tone—the harmonics—that the extraordinary Bohemian has cultivated more effectively, perhaps, than any of his contemporaries. The Bach Chaconne gave him an opportunity to display his superb technical power. Only a master of the violin can compass the difficulties of that work and make them at once clear and harmonious. This Kubelik did without any show of effort, in his own cool, confident, almost enigmatic manner.

But the first number that unmistakably appealed to the audience in general was the Wieniawski "Legende," a melody that Kubelik played with unwonted feeling and with generally beautiful tone. The last number on the program was Hubay's "Scene de la Czardas."

It was a holiday for Kubelik, even though his tone and technique showed flaws now and then.

Next Sunday the soloist at Symphony Hall will be Mme. Melba, who will have as her assistants Edmund Burke, barytone; Gabriel LaPierre, pianist, and Marcel Moyse, flute.

BOSTON POST,
OCTOBER 13,

KUBELIK THE MASTER HEARD

Big Audience Hears Unusually Sweet Violin Tone

BY OLIN DOWNES

The first of the Sunday concerts which will be given throughout this season, under the direction of Mr. Mudgett, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The audience was a very large one, with many standing, for Jan Kubelik, violinist, returned, and in his manner Mr. Kubelik has changed little since he was last in Boston. In performance he is not less modest and sincere than of yore. He is even a somewhat "retiring" personage, dignified, deprecating in the face of applause. And always, it appears to some of us, a trifle stiff, a trifle ill at ease. The head of hair is with some artists a professional affectation going out of fashion. It is part of Mr. Kubelik, with his dark, Slavic features. And always he looks as if he did not belong in a concert hall. He is genuinely a "personality," and requires no gallery plays to prove it.

Mr. Kubelik has never had so beautiful a tone, and his instrument appeared to be an unusually fine one. From the low G to the highest harmonic this tone is uncommonly sweet, pure and expressive. Under ordinary circumstance, too. Mr. Kubelik's intonation is uncommonly sure. Yesterday momentary conditions caused a string to slip now and then, but this was a passing matter. The curious part of it all was the musicianship, the well-thought-out character of each passage, the unaffected simplicity and expressiveness of the playing, yet the comparative listlessness of it all.

Mr. Kubelik has surely, on previous occasions in Boston, been in better vein. Even in a technical sense he has played more boldly and brilliantly. The Saint-Saens B-minor concerto, with the circus tunes of the finale, the Bach Chaconneall was dutifully, musically played, without exaggeration, with entire and comprehending subservience of the conceptions of the individual to the intentions of the composer—and nearly all the playing was of a piece. The old "Legende" of Wieniawski was for once a pleasure, for it was played so simply. The other pieces, also old and out-worn, lacked the compelling fire that causes even old war-horses to prance again.

Mr. Kubelik should be heard again soon. He is far more than a technician, which adjective was applied to him in a rather exclusive manner when he first visited America. With him there is always seriousness, sincerity. The tone is lacking neither in quality, warmth nor refinement. But the question arises whether the fault is not in the prescribed formula of violin recital programmes and in much music that the concert violinist studies which may not be congenial to Mr. Kubelik. We might find that small pieces by Dvorak, or the showy and emotional music of a Hungarian rhapsody, or even the little "Poeme" of Fibich which he played as an encore yesterday after the last Wieniawski piece, were more to him than a chaconne of Bach, a concerto of Saint-Saens, a sonata, say, of Beetho- [illegible]

[26]

om SUN
ddress: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 12 1913

With Five Soloists, Boston Symphony Promis

FOR some days now the straws of musical advertising have been indicating the direction of the zephers of the musical season which we are actually approaching very rapidly. In a week or two we will doubtless be overrun with announcements of concerts, recitals and operas. In the meantime, however, the word goes forth that Geraldine Farrar, the popular prima donna, is to be the soloist at the first of the season's Boston Symphony concerts and that other musicians of equal fame and importance in their several walks of musical life will either play or sing at the series.

The first of the winter's grand operas is to be "Mme Butterfly," and this will be heard in the first week of November, as will the first of the Peabody artist recitals, the particular artist, however, not having been announced at this writing. Before long we are to have the first of the winter's concerts of this Philharmonic Society of New York, which announces two noted singers and its own concert master as its season's soloists. All of which will serve to plunge Baltimore into the very midst of the harmonic maelstrom in short order.

❖ ❖ ❖

IT is as yet quite impossible to learn from reading the three of closely-typed pages of laudatory effusions concerning the forthcoming Boston Orchestra season, just what the policy of the organization will be here in regard to its programs. Much space is devote to commenting on the fact that the orchestra last season was criticized for presenting so much modern music—though how we are to hear new music if the visiting orchestras do not play it is not apparent, as we certainly have no organization in Baltimore to play it for us—but whether Dr. Muck, the interesting conductor of the famous band proposes to give us more classic than modern music this season is not stated.

❖ ❖ ❖

A SOMEWHAT remarkable list of soloists for the five Boston concerts is presented. At the November concert Geraldine Farrar will sing, the date being November 5. On December 3 Fritz Kreisler, the noted violinist, will play with the orchestra. On January 7 that most interesting of musical figures, Teresa Carreno, will play. At the February concert a newcomer will be heard in Baltimore, Mme. Van Endert, of the Royal Berlin Opera. February 18 is the date of this concert. At the final Boston concert of the present series, which takes place on March 18, Paderewski will play, although some little of the value will be taken from the importance of this announcement by the fact that Paderewski is scheduled for a recital at the Lyric at a much earlier date.

❖ ❖ ❖

OF all these artists none except the German singer is unknown here, but as they are all musicians of the very highest distinction they should, if our local music lovers are at all interested in celebrities, draw even larger houses than usual. Farrar is regarded by many persons as the most beautiful prima donna in the world She is a singer of rare gifts, although her operatic performances certainly have uneven values. She seems so essentially an opera singer that it will be somewhat strange to be listening to her in concert, but this will have a special interest in that she will be "herself," rather than some character, and it is to be remembered that she is passing fair to look upon!

KREISLER is one of the truly great violinists, Carreno a pianist of splendid individualism and power. Paderewski, naturally, must be regarded as the most importan acquisition of the series, because he is the greater celebrity of all, and it is not every day that one can hear the most talked-of pianist in the world with the most famous orchestra that plays in our American concert halls.

❖ ❖ ❖

SPEAKING of the Boston Orchestra, Reginald de Koven, who was in town last week assisting at the early performances of his new opera, "Her Little Highness," said that he regarded it as one of the finest organizations in the world, if not the very finest, for this season; that the instruments had been so long in each other's company that they had become mysteriously affiliated, and that—he was speaking of the violins in particular, pointing out that two violins being played for a number of years at the same desk seemed to become amalgamated—they actually vibrated together and that this amalgamation was more apparent in the Boston Orchestra than in any that he had heard, except possibly one in Berlin.

This is a thing that one does not often consider, this affiliation of instruments, but it is a thing that probably accounts for much, because the personnel of the Boston Orchestra has changed comparatively little for many years and it is very evident that this close relationship between the players and the instruments on which they play would in the natural course of events make fo. tonal unity that would not be apparent in a younger or less perfectly developed band. Other orchestras may have more appealing choirs, but none is more perfectly balanced, so that the Boston concerts this season will rightly attract the greatest amount of attention as they recur from month to month.

❖ ❖ ❖

MME. VAN ENDERT, who is the only unfamiliar soloist of the group, is called the successor, at the Royal Opera in Berlin, of Geraldine Farrar, whose roles she now sings there. It is said that until three years ago the management of the Berlin Opera was unable to find a singer that it regarded as being of sufficient height in the stellar horizon to fill Miss Farrar's place. Then one day Count von Huelson, the intendent of the opera house, happened to hear Mme. Van Endert sing at the Royal Opera in Dresden. He immediately secured her release and placed her under a long contract with the Berlin house. She is described as being young, comely and magnetic, as well as the possessor of a warm, rich soprano voice, which she uses with the greatest skill in singing Mozart and the music of the eighteenth century. She will only be heard in America with the Boston Orchestra.

❖ ❖ ❖

MME. ROSA RAISA, the Polish soprano who is to make her American debut in Baltimore on the evening of Friday, November 7, when she will appear as Cho Cho San in Puccini's "Madame Butterfly," is heralded as a singer of very unusual equipment, quite as much at home in dramatic as in lyric roles. She also is described as young and handsome. For several years she has been singing with pronounced success in Europe. She was engaged for the Chicago Grand Opera Company by Campanini himself, who is said to have been deeply impressed with her beautiful voice and with the enthusiastic manner in which she was received at the Parma Verdi Centennial celebration. Giovanni Martinelli, who is to sing the role of Pinkerton, will also make his American debut on this occasion. He is the Italian tenor who for several seasons has been the "first" tenor of La Scala in Milan and who last summer alternated with Caruso at Covent Garden.

IT HAS BEEN since "Madam given a really wor
timore with a grea always be the lea opera, and with rate settings for t coming productio and we are promi effects" never be dame Butterfly," tirely apart from be taken in the A ers who have bee pearances in Euro crowds to the Ly night, and it seem that it has been premiere.

❖

THE Philadelphia few days befo
Mary Garden in he tion of Tosca, and Baltimore on our s vember 14, when tenor role and Po donic Scarpia. Fo
spectus of the Ph
third Baltimore op
vember 21, will be Julia Claussen, th prano, will sing t
others in the cast
Stevens, Mme. Os
mores, Whitehill a

❖

THE concerts of ciety of New

MME TERESA CARREÑO

PADEREWSKI

GERALDINE FARRAR

FRITZ KR

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 12 1913

Boston Orchestra Season Here

In a few weeks the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its Philadelphia season. The first concert in the series of five is scheduled for the Academy of Music on the evening of November 3. Philadelphia has always evinced a deep interest in the highly artistic contributions of the Boston organization. This was the first of the large eastern cities to be included in a tour of the orchestra. The first concert was given here in 1886, and Philadelphia has thus heard these fine players under all of its conductors, since the days of Henschel. Dr. Karl Muck continues as the director this year. After November 3 the dates for the concerts are December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16.

The soloist at the opening concert will be Geraldine Farrar. Then will come Teresa Careno, the Venezuelan pianist; Elisabeth Boehm Van Endert, a new soprano, and Paderewski, in the order named.

Mme. Van Endert will make her first appearance in America under the exclusive auspices of the Boston Symphony. She is the successor of Geraldine Farrar at the Royal Opera, Berlin. After Miss Farrar left, many were tried in her position in Berlin, but all were found wanting until the "Intendant," Count Von Huelson, went to Dresden and heard Mme. Van Endert singing in the opera there. He secured her release from the Dresden contract, and is now strongly intrenched in the popular favor of the German capital.

She is said to be young and comely, possessed of much personal charm and vocal gifts of unwonted beauty. She has been before the public for only seven years. For the last three Mme. Van Endert has been in Berlin. Her greatest triumph came with the production of Richard Strauss' opera, "Der Rosenkavalier," in which she had the principal soprano role. She sang the part under Doctor Muck's direction fifty-seven times during the first season of the music drama.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 12 1913

The announcements for Philadelphia's musical season the coming winter are now practically completed with the arrival of the prospectus for the five concerts to be given here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The orchestra has never been in better physical condition, and, under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, is reaching a higher point of perfection in performance than ever in its history. The concerts will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evenings, November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16. The general sale of season tickets will open tomorrow morning at Miss Harris' ticket office in Heppe's piano rooms, No. 1119 Chestnut street.

The soloist at the first concert will be Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan Opera Company; at the second concert, Fritz Kreisler; at the third concert, Teresa Carreno; at the fourth concert, Elizabeth Boehn Van Endert, and at the fifth concert Paderewski.

Mme. Van Endert is a newcomer who is making her first appearance in America under the auspices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. She is the successor in the Royal Opera House, Berlin, of Miss Farrar. When Miss Farrar left many were tried, but all were found wanting to fill her place until Count von Huelson, intendant, heard Mme. Van Endert singing in Dresden, where she was the principal lyric soprano. He secured her release from her Dresden contract and took her to Berlin. Mme. Van Endert, from all accounts, is young, comely and with much charm of manner. She is said to possess a voice of great beauty and to sing with unusual skill. She has been singing in public but seven years. Her first was devoted to concert work. Then for three years she was in Dresden and for the past three years she has been in Berlin. In Berlin among other things she created the name part in Richard Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier," and under Dr. Muck's direction sang it 56 times during its first season there.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The general sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Washington this season will open at Droop's music store next Wednesday morning, October 15. There is but a limited number of such tickets to be disposed of this year. As has been the case for several years, nearly the whole house has been taken by subscription before the opening of the sale. The concerts will be given at the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoons at 4:30 o'clock. The dates are November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17, and March 17. Mme. Teresa Carreno, Mme. Boehm Van Endert, Kreisler, and Paderewski will be the soloists this season.

Symphony Promises A Rare Season or less perfectly de- orchestras may have but none is more that the Boston con- rightly attract the ention as they recur

❖

T, who is the only st of the group, is t the Royal Opera in Farrar, whose roles It is said that until management of the able to find a singer ng of sufficient height to fill Miss Farrar's Count von Hueison, pera house, happened ert sing at the Royal He immediately se- placed her under a e Berlin house. She young, comely and the possessor of a voice, which she uses ll in singing Mozart and the music of the eighteenth century. She will only be heard in America with the Boston Orchestra.

❖ ❖ ❖

MME. ROSA RAISA, the Polish soprano who is to make her American debut in Baltimore on the evening of Friday, November 7, when she will appear as Cho Cho San in Puccini's "Madame Butterfly," is heralded as a singer of very unusual equipment, quite as much at home in dramatic as in lyric roles. She also is described as young and handsome. For several years she has been singing with pronounced success in Europe. She was engaged for the Chicago Grand Opera Company by Campanini himself, who is said to have been deeply impressed with her beautiful voice and with the enthusiastic manner in which she was received at the Parma Verdi Centennial celebration. Giovanni Martinelli, who is to sing the role of Pinkerton, will also make his American debut on this occasion. He is the Italian tenor who for several seasons has been the "first" tenor of La Scala in Milan and who last summer alternated with Caruso at Covent Garden.

IT HAS BEEN a number of years now since "Madame Butterfly" has been given a really worthy presentment in Baltimore with a great orchestra, which must always be the leading factor in a Puccini opera, and with a big chorus and elaborate settings for the first act. The forthcoming production will be entirely new and we are promised a number of "novel effects" never before attempted. "Madame Butterfly," on its own merits, entirely apart from any interest that may be taken in the American debut of singers who have been making successful appearances in Europe, should attract large crowds to the Lyric on this first opera night, and it seems especially good news that it has been chosen for the season's premiere.

❖ ❖ ❖

THE Philadelphia opera season opens a few days before our local one, with Mary Garden in her wonderful impersonation of Tosca, and this we are to have in Baltimore on our second opera night, November 14, when Giorgini will sing the tenor role and Polese that of the sardonic Scarpia. Following closely the prospectus of the Philadelphia season, the third Baltimore opera, scheduled for November 21, will be "Die Walkuere," when Julia Claussen, the famous German soprano, will sing the role of Bruenhilde, others in the cast being Mme. Saltzman-Stevens, Mme. Osborn-Hannah and Dalmores, Whitehill and Scott.

❖ ❖ ❖

THE concerts of the Philharmonic Society of New York, under the direction of Josef Stransky, will take place, as usual, on three Monday evenings, the dates being November 24, when Leopold Kramer, the new concertmeister, will play; Feb-ruary 9, when Julia Culp will sing, and March 9, when the soloist will be Alma Gluck.

❖ ❖ ❖

ON Tuesday next, at the Florestan Club, there will be an "Evening of French Songs," presented by Lucien Odend'hal, barytone, assisted by Felice Lula, harpist, who was formerly associated with the Savage Opera Company and who is now residing in Baltimore. Howard R. Thatcher will be at the piano.

❖ ❖ ❖

ON November 10, Emmanuel Wad, pianist, and Bart Wirtz, violoncellist, both of the Peabody Conservatory, will start on a recital tour of the South. They will be absent from Baltimore from time to time to meet the demands of their itinerary.

❖ ❖ ❖

ON the afternoon of Monday, October 27, Harold Randolph, the director of the Peabody Conservatory, will give a piano recital at the new Æolian Hall, in New York. It was stated at the Conservatory yesterday that this concert was not to be regarded as indicating that Mr. Randolph was entering the concert field, but that it was in line with the somewhat general movement agitating the musical centres of the country at this time, a movement intended to demonstrate the theory that it is not necessary to study in Europe in order to become a musician of the first rank. As every one in Baltimore knows, Mr. Randolph's pianistic achievement is entirely the result of work done in this country, so that his recital in New York should be a practical demonstration of the doctrine of "America for Americans," of which we are hearing so much.

❖ ❖ ❖

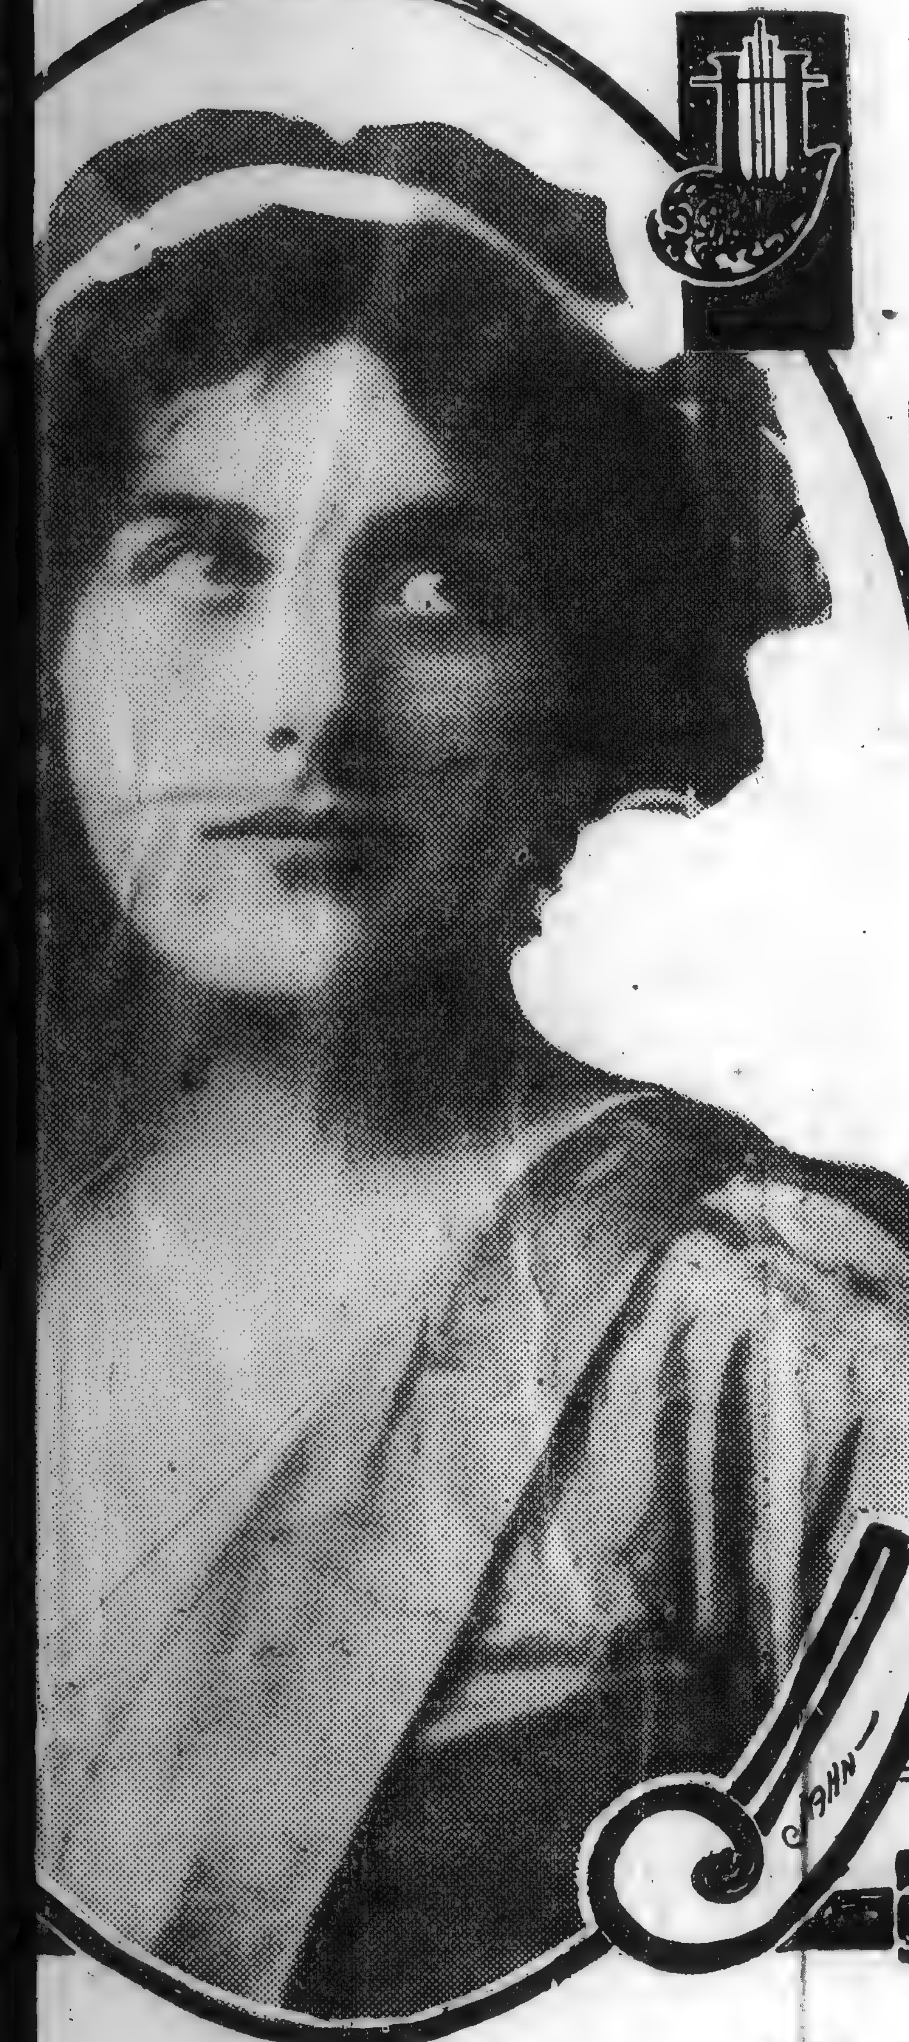
THE musical journals are full of "musical America for musical Americans" just now, and the feeling that there are as skillful, if not more skillful, teachers of music in its many branches on this side of the ocean as ever lived "abroad" is taking a very firm root here. Hence this movement, if movement it may be called, or perhaps it had best be described as "co-operation," among the dwellers in the realms of harmony who are interesting themselves in American musical things in general and in musical pedagogy in particular. Hence, also this recital in New York, at which Mr. Randolph will "demonstrate."

❖ ❖ ❖

I DO not think that anyone who knows questions for a moment the ability of teachers in America to teach, nor does anyone doubt that absolute technical perfection can be attained in this part of the world. Particularly is this so of instrumental music. For example, beautiful pianists, technically regarded, are constantly being turned out of our conservatories, as why should they not be?

But the general public who does the supporting of musicians has, up to this time, been somewhat slow to recognize art that has not the cachet of European approval. Fortunately this same public is becoming a bit more sprightly in this respect. American artists no longer sing or play to empty benches merely because they have not been "made in Europe." If they fail to attract audiences, it is because they do not measure up to the standard of perfection demanded, whether they gained their schooling at home or in Europe.

J. O. L.



FRITZ KREISLER

©AIME DUPONT

MME VAN ENDERT

From ENQUIRER

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date OCT 12 1913

Est 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The announcements for Philadelphia's musical season the coming winter are now practically completed with the arrival of the prospectus for the five concerts to be given here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. These promise to be the most successful in the history of the orchestra. The subscription for the series which now consists almost entirely of renewals by last year's subscribers is already very large. The orchestra has never been in better physical condition and under the skilled leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, a giant among the conductors of today, it is reaching a higher point of perfection in performance than ever in its history. Moreover, the list of soloists engaged for this year is extraordinarily attractive. A soloist for each concert, each of the artists is of supreme excellence.

The concerts as usual will be five in number and will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evenings. The dates are November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16. The general sale of season tickets will young, comely and with much charm of manner. She is said to possess a voice of great beauty and to sing with unusual skill. She has been singing in public only seven years.

DR. KARL MUCK

From CITIZEN

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date OCT 1 - 1913

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give its regular series of five Philharmonic concerts at the Academy of Music this winter announces three soloists,—Fritz Kreisler, Mme. Boehn van Endert and Paderewski. The concerts will be given on Friday evenings; the dates being Nov. 7, Dec. 5, Jan. 9, Feb. 20 and March 20.

Holders of season tickets of the year 1912-13 who have not already renewed their subscription for the coming concerts may do so and secure seats occupied by them last year respectively at any time on or before next Saturday, Oct. 18, at 6 o'clock in the afternoon. Old subscribers of 1912-13 who renew their subscription or or before that date may exchange their sittings for others that may not at that time be taken by making request in writing at the time of renewal of the old subscription. Applications for changes will be considered in the order in which they are received.

The opening general sale of season tickets for all will be on Friday, Oct. 24, at 4:00 p. m., at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Building and will continue daily thereafter at the hour when the ticket offices of the institute are open.

Lecture recitals on the programme at these concerts will be given as in recent years on Thursday afternoons just preceding the concerts.

---

m POST

dress: Washington, D. C.

te 6 1913

1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The general sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Washington this season will open at Droop's music store next Wednesday morning, October 15. There is but a limited number of such tickets to be disposed of this year. As has been the case for several years, nearly the whole house has been taken by subscription before the opening of the sale. The concerts will be given at the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoons at 4:30 o'clock. The dates are November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17, and March 17. Mme. Teresa Carreno, Mme. Boehm Van Endert, Kreisler, and Paderewski will be the soloists this season.

From TIMES

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date OCT 11 1913

Estal 4

The Boston Smphony Orchestra, which is to give its regular series of five Philharmonic concerts in the Academy of Music this winter, announces three soloists—Fritz Kreisler, Mme. Koehn van Endert and Paderewski. The concerts will be given on Friday evenings, the dates being November 7, December 5, January 9, February 29 and March 20. Holders of season tickets of the year 1912-13 who have not already renewed their subscription for the coming concerts may do so on or before next Saturday, October 18, at 6 o'clock in the afternoon.

The opening general sale of season tickets for all will be on Friday, October 24, at 4 P. M., at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Building, and will continue daily thereafter at the hour when the ticket offices of the institute are open.

Lecture recitals on the programme at these concerts will be given as in recent years, on Thursday afternoons, just preceding the concerts.

From

Address Ph

Date OCT 4 - 1913

Est 1884

NEW SYMPHONY BY HEINRICH NOREN IS TO BE HEARD HERE

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his return from Europe last Tuesday said that he did not have a brilliant list of novelties to offer to the patrons of the orchestra the coming winter, as the past year had been most unfruitful in this direction. He has brought back with him the score of the new symphony by Heinrich Noren, of Dresden, best known in this country as the composer of the theme and set of variations, which he called "Kaleidoscope." The new symphony is entitled "Vita." He has a symphonic poem by Renecik, composer of the opera "Donna Diana," which is called "Peter Schlemihl," the source of its inspiration, of course, being the famous story of the man who lost his shadow. He has two pieces by Max Schillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen," and he will do some new short pieces by Fritz Delius. He purposes reviving this year Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor No. 2, and it is likely that he will play outside of Boston as well as in Boston Mahler's fifth symphony, which had [illegible]

---

rom STANDARD UNION

Address Brooklyn, N. Y. OCT 1 1913

Date

Esta 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give its regular series of five Philharmonic concerts in the Academy of Music this winter, announces three soloists, Fritz Kreisle, Mme. Boehn van Endert and Paderewski. The concerts will be given on Friday evenings, the dates being Nov. 7, Dec. 5, Jan. 9, Feb. 20 and March 20. Holders of season tickets of the year 1912-13 who have not already renewed their subscription for the coming concerts, may do so and secure seats occupied last year, respectively, at any time on or before next Saturday, Oct. 18, at 6 o'clock in the afternoon. The opening general sale of season tickets for all will be on Friday, Oct. 24, at 4 P. M., at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Building, and will continue daily thereafter at the hour when the ticket offices of the Institute are open. Lecture recitals on the programmes at these concerts will be given as in recent years on Thursday afternoons just preceding the concerts.

TELEPHONE 929 CHELSEA

Intended for

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.
106-110 Seventh Ave., N. Y. City
NEW YORK
CABLE ADDRESS:
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 12 1913

Three B

GERALDINE F
MLLE PAVLOWA
MME BOEHM VAN E

The announcements for Philadelphia's musical season the coming Winter are now practically completed with the arrival of the prospectus for the five concerts to be given here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Philadelphia has, in a sense, a proprietary interest in this great institution because this city was the first of the large cities in the East to be visited by the Boston Symphony, and since its first concert in the Spring of 1886 no year has failed to bring the Orchestra here. It has known it under all of its conductors since Henschel, and while conditions from time to time have more or less affected its patronage, it has always had a large body of devoted and loyal friends who have made it always a pleasure for the Orchestra to play here.

The five concerts to be given this year promise to be the most successful in the history of the Orchestra. The subscription for the series which now consists almost entirely of renewals by last year's subscribers is already very large. The Orchestra has never been in better physical condition and under the skilled leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, a giant among the conductors of to-day, it is reaching a higher point of perfection in performance than ever in its history. Moreover, the list of soloists engaged for this year is extraordinarily attractive. A soloist for each concert, each of the artists is of supreme excellence.

The concerts as usual, five in number, will be given in the Academy of Music, Monday evening. The dates are November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16. The general sale of season tickets will open to-morrow (Monday) morning at Miss Harris' ticket office at 1119 Chestnut Street. The soloist at the first concert will be Geraldine Farrar, the fascinating prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

* * *

From EVENING SUN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date T 19

SOLOIST AT THE SYMPHONY OPENING

GERALDINE FARRAR

SHE is one of the most popular members of the Metropolitan Opera Company in New York, and has been called "the most beautifud woman in opera." She will sing at the Lyric on November 5, when the Boston orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Muck, gives its first concert in this season.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

ork, 1884

The general sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Washington the coming season will open at Droop's Music Store next Wednesday morning, October 15. There is but a limited number of such tickets to be disposed of for this year, as in several years past, nearly the whole house has been taken by subscription before the opening of the sale. The concerts will be given, as in the past, in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoons at 4:30. The dates are November 5, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17.

The Washington concerts of the famous orchestra are not only the most important musical afternoons of the season, but they have come to be social functions of the first quality. It is quite the thing for people of social importance to be subscribers to the concerts and consequently the Washington audiences are always of unusual distinction. This year the series from an artistic point of view promise to be exceptionally brilliant. The orchestra itself is in the best of physical condition and its discipline and perfection of ensemble have been brought to the highest point of its history by the skill and inspired leadership of its conductor, Dr. Karl Muck. Thirty-two years of arduous and conscientious endeavor to maintain the orchestra at the highest point of artistic and technical proficiency are now reaping their just reward. Recognition of its orchestral performance is universal. Its position as leader is accepted without dispute. Its patronage is limited only by the capacity of the hall in which it plays and its audiences everywhere are marked in their keenness of musical discernment and justness of appreciation. If it is a pleasure to listen to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it is an honor to the orchestra to play to such a public as it attracts.

The orchestra itself must always be, so to say, the principal soloist at its concerts, but the public demands, and rightly so, that there be assisting artists in order that it may observe celebrated personalities in music and likewise listen to music which demands a soloist. To secure soloists of a rank fitted to appear with the orchestra is not an easy task, but for Washington this year the management believes that it has been exceptionally fortunate in its soloists.

It announces for soloists Mme. Teresa Carreno, Mme. Boehm van Endert, Kreisler, and Paderewski. The first and last two names are household words wherever music is loved. Carreno, the most wonderful of women pianists, Kreisler, supreme master of the violin, and Paderewski need no introduction. Carreno, now in her sixtieth year, has only her crown of snow-white hair to show that nearly forty years have passed since she first played to an American public. Her fingers are as supple, her strength as great, and her temperament as romantic as when she first appeared here. Kreisler stands alone among the younger violinists of the world. A complete artist in every sense of the word, he easily maintains the glorious traditions of the past. As for Paderewski, now as when he first came to America twenty- years ago, he is unique. There was like him before he came. There is like him now, and in all probability will be none like him to follow. at the height of his mature power, art is more compelling than it has been in the past.

Mme. Elizabeth Boehm van Endert is a newcomer. The principal lyric soprano of Royal Opera, Berlin, where she is the successor of Geraldine Farrar, she comes America for a few weeks this winter special arrangement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has exclusive command of her services in the East. She is young, comely, and charming of manner, and is the possessor of a warm, rich soprano, which she is said to use with great skill. She is particularly adept in the music of Mozart and the other classis masters of the Eighteenth century.

Dr. Muck has arranged an interesting scheme of programs for the Washington concerts, of which more will be said later. The regular season of the orchestra opened last Friday in Boston with great success.

Carl Muck

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date 12 1913

Establi

Geraldine Farrar, the fascinating prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera Company; at the second concert, Fritz Kreisler; at the third onncert, Teresa Carreno; at the fourth concert, Mme. Elisabeth Boehn van Endert, and at the fifth concert, Paderewski. It would be supererogatory to discuss the merits of such artists as Miss Farrar, Mme. Carreno, Mr. Kreisler and Mr. Paderewski. All of them are known and affectionately admired here. Each stands at the topmost rung of the ladder of fame. Each represents supreme excellence in a particular branch of the art of music.

Mme. van Endert is a newcomer, who is making her first appearance in America next winter, under the auspices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. With this large number of important concerts in the principal cities of the East, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is able to offer to artists such inducements as to enable it to command their services exclusively for a short tour. Last year it brought to America under such conditions Fritz Kreisler, and the year before Josef Hofmann. This year it has the honor to introduce the principal lyric soprano of Germany.

Mme. van Endert is the successor in the Royal Opera House, Berlin, of Miss Farfar. When Miss Farrar left many were tried, but all were found wanting to fill her place until Count von Huelson, Intendant, heard Mme. van Endert singing in Dresden where she was the principal lyric soprano. He secured her release from her Dresden contract and took her to Berlin where she now is. Mme. van Endert, from all acounts, is young, comely and with much charm of manner. She is said to possess a voice of great beauty and to sing with unusual skill. She has been singing in public but seven years. Her first was devoted to concert work. Then for three years she was in Dresden and for the last three years she has been in Berlin. In Berlin, among other things, she created the name part in Richard Strauss' most successful opera, "Der Rosenkavalier," and under Dr. Muck's direction sang it 66 times during its first season there. Dr. Muck has planned for Philadelphia an unusually interesting series of programmes. There

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as usual, will be five in number, and will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evenings. The dates are November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16. The general sale of season tickets will open tomorrow (Monday) morning at Heppe's.

The soloist at the first concert will be

INFORMATION OBSCURED

76 Perlm

TELEPHONE 929 CHELSEA

Intended for

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

77 Sheehan

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.
-th Ave., N. Y. City
NEW YORK

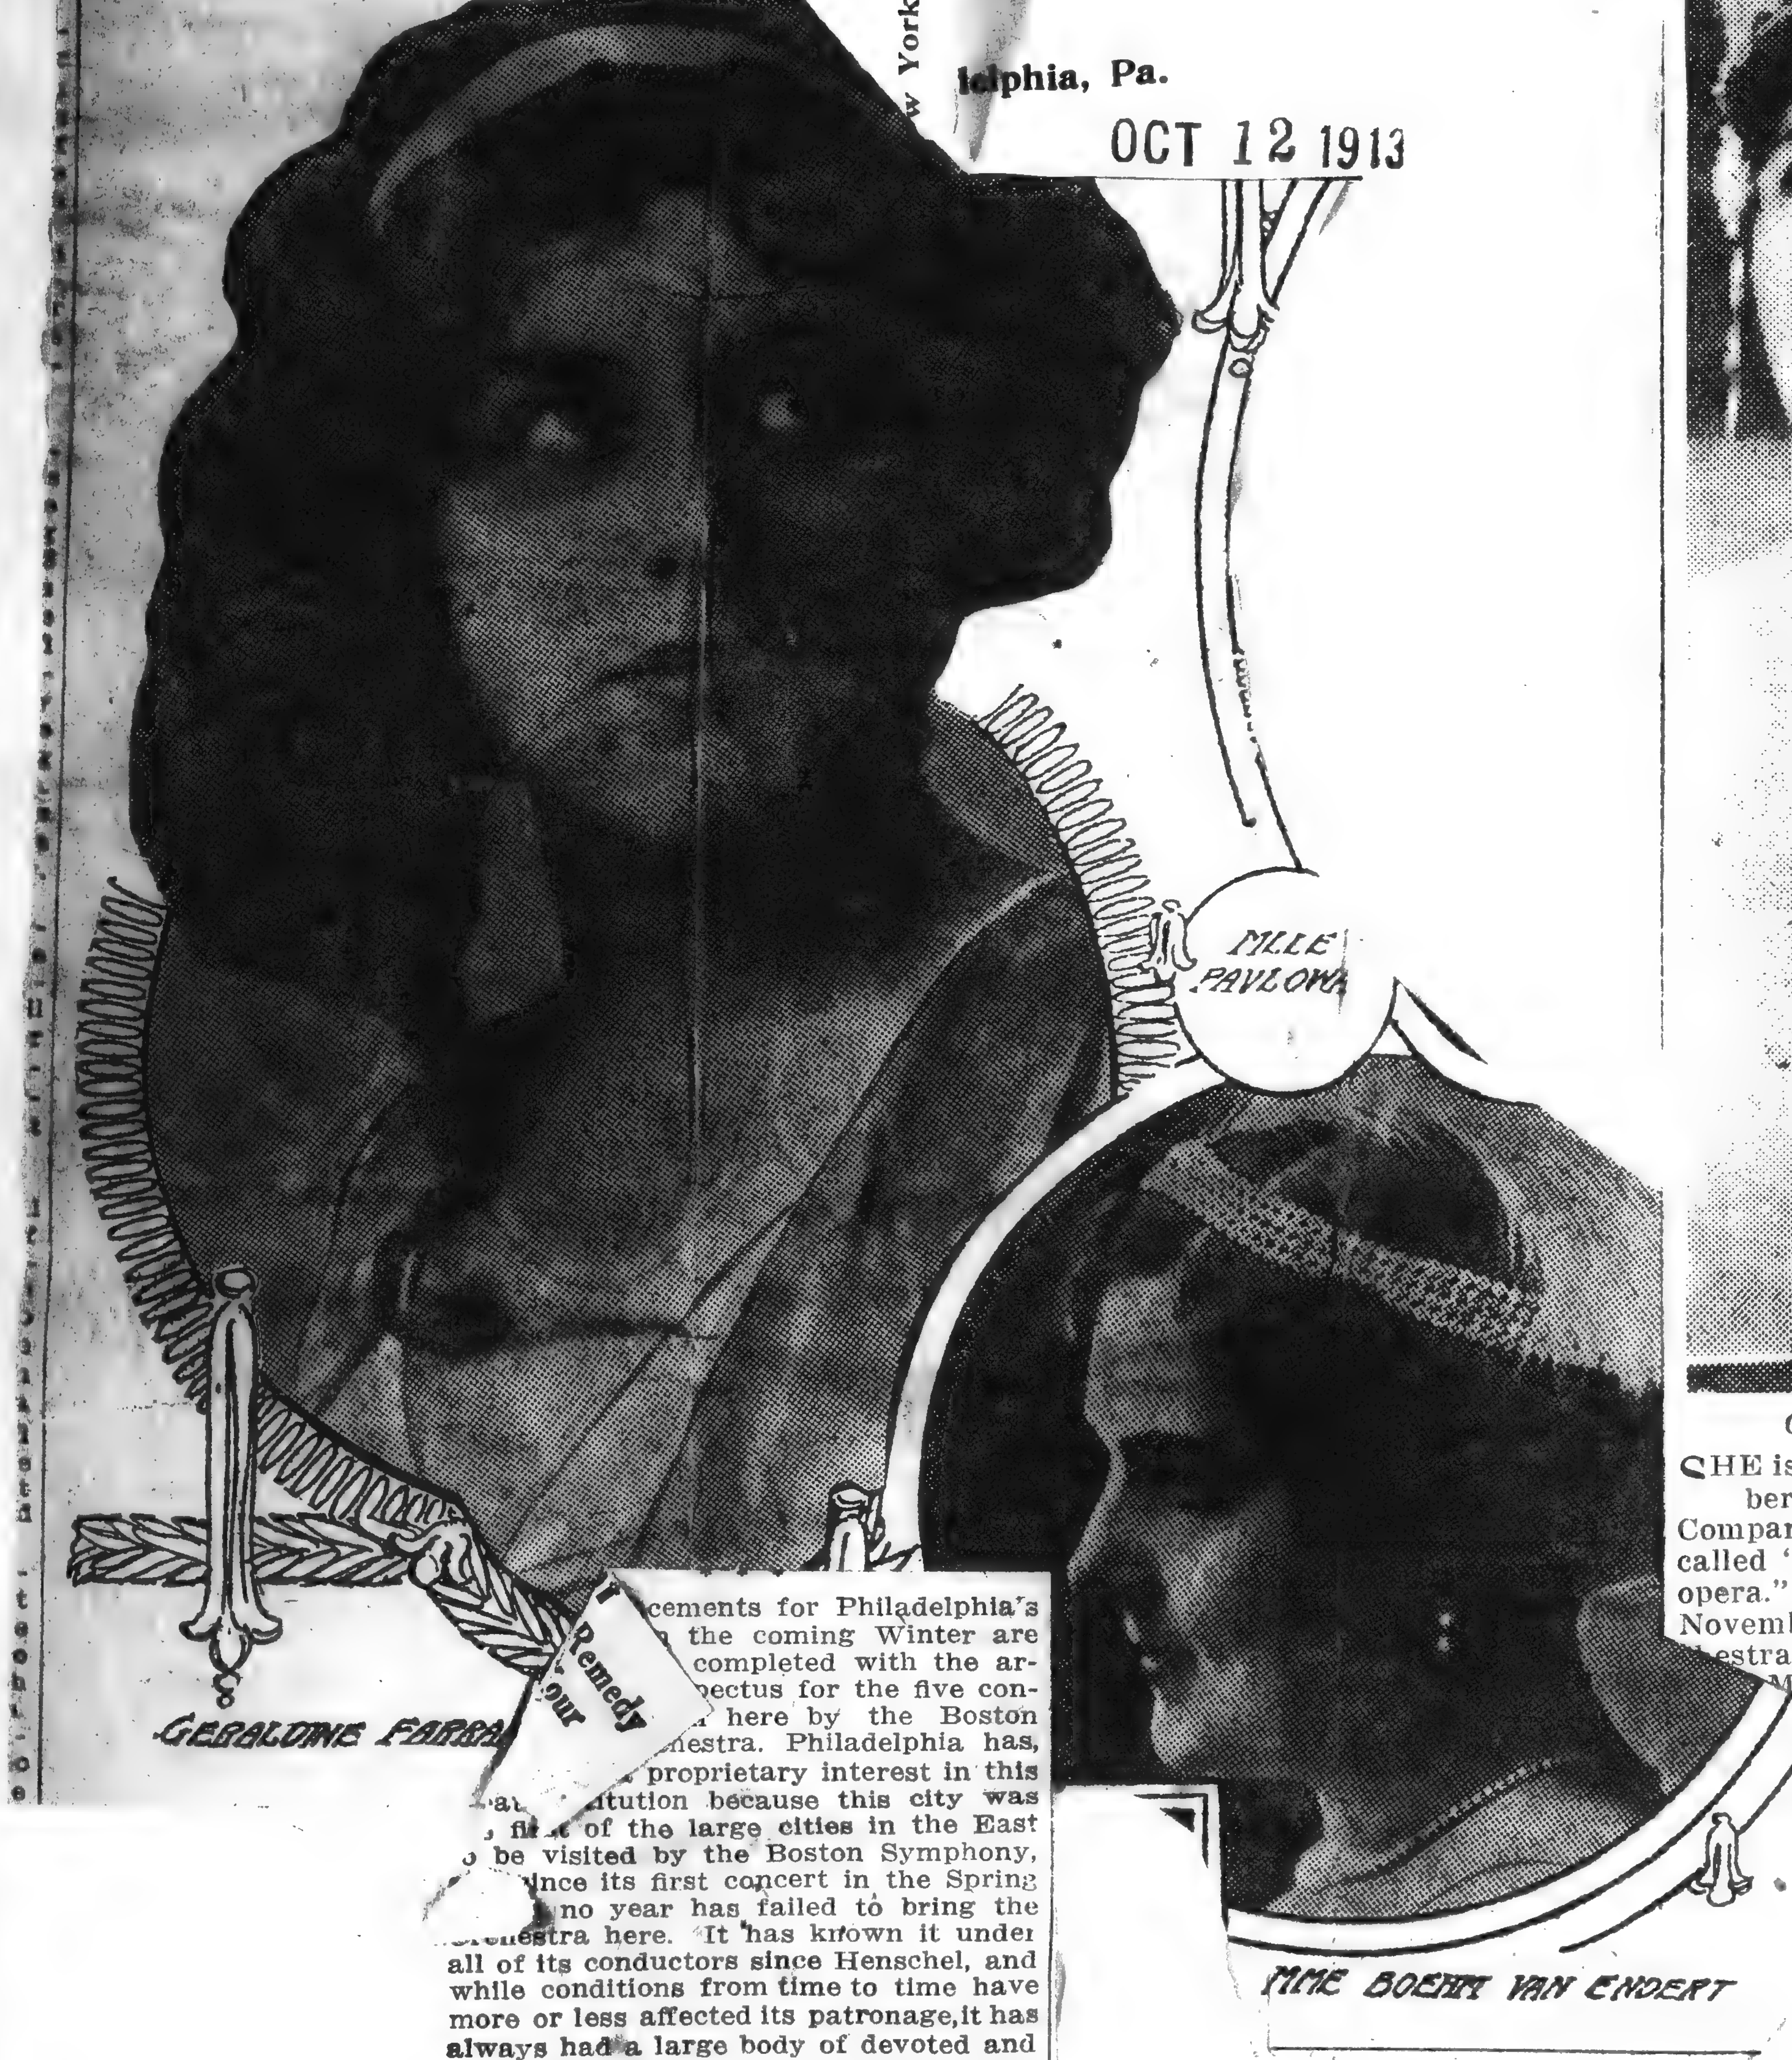
-d and Most Complete
; Bureau in the World

York, 1884

-lphia, Pa.

OCT 12 1913

Three Brillian



-cements for Philadelphia's the coming Winter are completed with the ar- -pectus for the five con- here by the Boston -chestra. Philadelphia has, proprietary interest in this -itution because this city was first of the large cities in the East to be visited by the Boston Symphony, since its first concert in the Spring no year has failed to bring the Orchestra here. It has known it under all of its conductors since Henschel, and while conditions from time to time have more or less affected its patronage, it has always had a large body of devoted and loyal friends who have made it always a pleasure for the Orchestra to play here.

The five concerts to be given this year promise to be the most successful in the history of the Orchestra. The subscription for the series which now consists almost entirely of renewals by last year's subscribers is already very large. The Orchestra has never been in better physical condition and under the skilled leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, a giant among the conductors of to-day, it is reaching a higher point of perfection in performance than ever in its history. Moreover, the list of soloists engaged for this year is extraordinarily attractive. A soloist for each concert, each of the artists is of supreme excellence.

The concerts as usual, five in number, will be given in the Academy of Music, Monday evening. The dates are November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16. The general sale of season tickets will open to-morrow (Monday) morning at Miss Harris' ticket office at 1119 Chestnut Street. The soloist at the first concert will be Geraldine Farrar, the fascinating prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

* * *

From EVENING SUN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date T 16 19

SOLOIST AT THE SYMPHONY OPENING

GERALDINE FARRAR

SHE is one of the most popular members of the Metropolitan Opera Company in New York, and has been called "the most beautifud woman in opera." She will sing at the Lyric on November 5, when the Boston orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Muck, gives its first concert in this season.

-IC LEDGER
Philadelphia

Establi

-r, the fascinating prin- Metropolitan Opera Com- the second concert, Fritz Kreis- at the third onncert, Teresa Carreno; at the fourth concert, Mme. Elisabeth Boehn van Endert, and at the fifth concert, Paderewski. It would be supererogatory to discuss the merits of such artists as Miss Farrar, Mme. Carreno, Mr. Kreisler and Mr. Paderewski. All of them are known and affectionately admired here. Each stands at the topmost rung of the ladder of fame. Each represents supreme excellence in a particular branch of the art of music.

Mme. van Endert is a newcomer, who is making her first appearance in America next winter, under the auspices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. With this large number of important concerts in the principal cities of the East, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is able to offer to artists such inducements as to enable it to command their services exclusively for a short tour. Last year it brought to America under such conditions Fritz Kreisler, and the year before Josef Hofmann. This year it has the honor to introduce the principal lyric soprano of Germany.

Mme. van Endert is the successor in the Royal Opera House, Berlin, of Miss Farfar. When Miss Farrar left many were tried, but all were found wanting to fill her place until Count von Huelson, Intendant, heard Mme. van Endert singing in Dresden where she was the principal lyric soprano. He secured her release from her Dresden contract and took her to Berlin where she now is. Mme. van Endert, from all acounts, is young, comely and with much charm of manner. She is said to possess a voice of great beauty and to sing with unusual skill. She has been singing in public but seven years. Her first was devoted to concert work. Then for three years she was in Dresden and for the last three years she has been in Berlin. In Berlin, among other things, she created the name part in Richard Strauss' most successful opera, "Der Rosenkavalier," and under Dr. Muck's direction sang it 66 times during its first season there. Dr. Muck has planned for Philadelphia an unusually interesting series of programmes. There

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as usual, will be five in number, and will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evenings. The dates are November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16. The general sale of season tickets will open tomorrow (Monday) morning at Heppe's.

The soloist at the first concert will be

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

-ork, 1884

The general sale of season tickets for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Washington the coming season will open at Droop's Music Store next Wednesday morning, October 15. There is but a limited number of such tickets to be disposed of for this year, as in several years past, nearly the whole house has been taken by subscription before the opening of the sale. The concerts will be given, as in the past, in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoons at 4:30. The dates are November 5, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17.

The Washington concerts of Boston's famous orchestra are not only the most important musical afternoons of the season, but they have come to be social functions of the first quality. It is quite the thing for people of social importance to be subscribers to the concerts and consequently the Washington audiences are always of unusual distinction. This year the series from an artistic point of view promise to be exceptionally brilliant The orchestra itself is in the best of physical condition and its discipline and perfection of ensemble have been brought to the highest point of its history by the skill and inspired leadership of its conductor, Dr. Karl Muck. Thirty-two years of arduous and conscientious endeavor to maintain the orchestra at the highest point of artistic and technical proficiency are now reaping their just reward. Recognition of its orchestral performance is universal. Its position as leader is accepted without dispute. Its patronage is limited only by the capacity of the hall in which it plays and its audiences everywhere are marked in their keenness of musical discernment and justness of appreciation. If it is a pleasure to listen to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it is an honor to the orchestra to play to such a public as it attracts.

The orchestra itself must always be, so to say, the principal soloist at its concerts, but the public demands, and rightly so, that there be assisting artists in order that it may observe celebrated personalities in music and likewise listen to music which demands a soloist. To secure soloists of a rank fitted to appear with the orchestra is not an easy task, but for Washington this year the management believes that it has been exceptionally fortunate in its soloists.

It announces for soloists Mme. Teresa Carreno, Mme. Boehm van Endert, Kreisler, and Paderewski. The first and last two names are household words wherever music is loved. Carreno, the most wonderful of women pianists, Kreisler, supreme master of the violin, and Paderewski need no introduction. Carreno, now in her sixtieth year, has only her crown of snow-white hair to show that nearly forty years have passed since she first played to an American public. Her fingers are as supple, her strength as great, and her temperament as romantic as when she first appeared here. Kreisler stands alone among the younger violinists of the world. A complete artist in every sense of the word, he easily maintains the glorious traditions of the past. As for Paderewski, now as when he first came to America twenty-two years ago, he is unique. There was none like him before he came. There is none like him now, and in all probability there will be none like him to follow. Now at the height of his mature power, his art is more compelling than it has ever been in the past.

Mme. Elizabeth Boehm van Endert is a newcomer. The principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin. where she is the successor of Geraldine Farrar, she comes to America for a few weeks this winter by special arrangement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has exclusive command of her services in the East. She is young, comely, and charming of manner, and is the possessor of a warm, rich soprano, which she is said to use with great skill. She is particularly adept in the music of Mozart and the other classis masters of the Eighteenth century.

Dr. Muck has arranged an interesting scheme of programs for the Washington concerts, of which more will be said later. The regular season of the orchestra opened last Friday in Boston with great success.

Carl Muck

From JOURNAL

Address: Providence, R. I.

Date OCT 12 1913

The sale of season tickets for the six concerts the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in this city the coming winter will open to-morrow morning. A considerable part of the house has already been taken by subscription, and with the brilliant list of soloists the orchestra announces, the series is expected to be the most successful the orchestra has ever given in this city. The increase in number of concerts from five to six was in deference to the expressed wishes of a large number of the regular subscribers. They will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evenings, Oct. 21, Nov. 18, Dec. 30, Feb. 3, March 24 and April 14.

It was considered at the close of last season that Dr. Muck had brought the orchestra up to the highest point of virtuosity it had ever attained since its organization. He starts in this fall practically where he left off and it may be assumed that he will secure even more brilliant results during the coming winter since the Boston Symphony Orchestra is undoubtedly one of the most perfect ensemble instrument in the world.

The six soloists that have been engaged are Mme. Gadski, Ruth Deyo, Fritz Kreisler, Teresa Carreno, Paderewski and Florence Hinkle. Two of these are brilliantly successful American women. Ruth Deyo is a pianist who has already had a remarkable career which promises still greater things in the future, and Florence Hinkle, who has twice sung here with the University Glee Club, is the possessor of a soprano voice of more than usual beauty which she uses with most uncommon skill.

Their appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be the only occasion on which Paderewski and Kreisler will be heard in this city. To Mme. Gadski, the dramatic soprano with the Metropolitan Opera, New York, who is known and admired in this city, will fall the honor of opening the season.

* * *

From

Address Providence, R. I.

Date OCT 11 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has already announced that it will give six concerts in Providence the coming season and the general sale of season tickets for these will open at Seddon's news stand, Butler Exchange, 123 Westminster street, Monday morning, Oct. 13. The concerts will be given on Tuesday evenings in Infantry hall. The dates are Oct. 21, Nov. 18, Dec. 30, Feb. 3, March 24 and April 14. A considerable part of the hall has been taken by last year's subscribers, and with the brilliant array of artists the management announces the season should altogether be the most successful the orchestra has ever had in this city. The soloist at the first concert will be Mme. Gadsk, principal dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. This remarkable artist is unquestionably the foremost dramatic soprano of our time. She has risen gradually but surely in her art until today her services are in demand, not merely for the great opera produced in New York, but all her spare time must be given to concert work. Practically her whole career has been in America for it was America who discovered and first appreciated her and who has given her the greatest rewards.

At the second concert the soloist will be Miss Ruth Deyo. Miss Deyo belongs to that constantly increasing group of American women who are making fame for themselves in music. She is a pianist of unusually brilliant attainments and while she has accomplished much, a still more brilliant future awaits her.

The great violinist, Fritz Kreisler, has been engaged for the third concert. This will be his only appearance in Providence. His performance a year ago of the Beethoven concert with the orchestra was one of the memorable events of the season. A supreme artist he stands today without rival amongst the violinists of our time.

For the fourth concert that most remarkable woman, Teresa Carreon, has been engaged. Still youthful in figure, still beautiful in face, only her snow-white hair betrays the fact that she is nearly 60 and for 38 years has been playing from time to time in America. She is the last of that generation of great women pianists that glorified the end of the 19th century. Her two contemporaries, Essipoff and Menter, have retired but Mme. Carreno still retains the fire and skill of her youth.

The March concert will bring as soloist Paderewski, the greatest pianist probably the world has ever known and, by all odds, the most fascinating and interesting figure among contemporary musicians. He is in this country for a long tour but this is his only appearance in Providence with the Boston Symphony orchestra. Now at the height of his mature poweds, his art is said to be more compelling than ever. The soloist engaged for the last concert is Florence Hinkle, a most delightful singer who has come forward in recent years, and has attained a richly deserved popularity. A beautiful voice, she uses it with uncommon skill and is one of the most popular of the American singers now before the public. The orchestra is in magnificent condition. Its achivements under Dr. Muck last season were remarkable but even more may be expected this year.

From TRIBUNE

Address: Providence, R.

Date OCT

Established: Lond

Musical Circle Have Busy

Attractive Programmes Arranged for Steinert Series and Boston Symphony Concerts. — Other Musical Events in Prospect.

MUSIC lovers, throughout this city and State are looking forward with keen anticipation to the opening of the musical season here with the opening concerts of the Boston Sympnony Orchestra and the Steinert series. Meanwhile the various musical clubs are beginning the season with notably attractive programmes. The Chopin Club, of which Mrs. C. L. Harris is President, opened its season at Churchill House on Thursday morning with an audience of members and guests which taxed the capacity of the ball room.

The Chaminade Club, of which Mrs. George Hall is President, will open its season in Froebel Hall on Thursday morning. The programme will be devoted to folk songs and dances of the world.

The Scotney Concert Trio will give a concert in Pawtucket on the evening of Nov. 4, when Mr. Howard White, Mme. Scotney White and Mr. Waller, violinist, will appear.

In arranging his second series of Steinert concerts for the coming season, Mr. Albert Steinert of Providence is pursuing further the project which he inaugurated successfully last season and which bids fair to have a revolutionary influence in the future management of concerts. Mr. Steinert, it will be remembered, desired to arrange a series of concerts by means of which the public at the lowest possible prices might find itself in a position to profit by the talent of the greatest concert artists of the day. "Good music," he said, "should become as popular as the 'movies.'".

The principal difficulty was the prices of admission. The solution reached by Mr. Steinert is the solution that has worked such tremendous changes in business and art as well in the last few years. To-day the Metropolitan, Boston and Chicago opera companies are practically different stations of one enterprise. The singers go from one opera house to another. They are paid by each institution according to a fixed scale of prices. This is of inestimable value to each opera house, because the singers can be engaged for a greater numbr of performancs than would otherwise be possible through the division of their services, which lightens greatly the financial and artistic responsibility of each theatre. Mr. Steinert, after some calculation and experiment, found this arrangement equally practicable in the concert field. Through his initiative it became possible to inaugurate a series of exceptionally fine concerts, given by the greatest artists, within a limited terrriory, and this first venture proved a pronounced success. For the coming season the advance sales have already more than indicated a sympathetic attitude on the part of the public.

The first concert of the series in Providence will be given in Infantry Hall on the evening of October 28. The artists will be Maud Powell, who has no peer among the violinists of to-day, either in this country or in Europe, as every one of her contemporaries, from Ysaye down, recognizes most warmly; Yolande Mero, whose two concert tours in this country have already made her favorite with the concert public in America as well as in Europe; and Lambert Murphy, very popular among the concert singers of today. The program is one of exceptional interest. The program of the first concert is as follows:

Sonata, G Major op. 13..............Grieg
Lento doloroso. Allegro vivace
Allegretto tranquillo
Allegro animato
Mme. Powell and Mme. Mero.
Aria: "Voir Griselidis"..........Massenet
from prologue to Griselidis.
Mr. Lambert Murphy.
(a) Cappriccio, B minor .... Brahms
(b) Arabesque .... Debussy
Mme. Yolande Mero.
First Movement from D minor
Concerto .... Wieniawski
Mme. Maud Powell.
(a(Jung Frau und Kind, Peterson-Berger
(b) Sogno d'Amore .... Brogi
(c) Mattinata .... Leoncavallo
Mr. Lambert Murphy.
(a) Scherzo .... Chopin
(b) Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2......Liszt
Mme. Yolande Mero.
(a) Larghetto, A major .... Nardini
(b) Minute Waltz .... Chopin-Powell
(c) Zapateado .... Sarasate
Mme. Maud Powell.
(a) Morning Hymn .... Henschel
(b) Her Rose .... Coombs
(c) Daybreak .... Daniels
Mr. Lambert Murphy.

EVENING NEWS

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date OCT 11 1913

NOTED SOLOISTS TO BE HEARD AT LYRIC

Boston Symphony Prospectus Shows Plans For This Season.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has issued its prospectus for the five concerts which that famous organization will give in Baltimore during the coming winter. The concerts will come as usual on Wednesday evenings and will be given in the Lyric Theater. The dates are November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18.

People who have heard the Boston Symphony in other cities are a unit in declaring that the Baltimore audiences are the most brilliant it has anywhere in the country. Certainly the concerts themselves are among the most brilliant it gives, because there are not half a dozen auditoriums in the United States which have such perfect acoustics for orchestral music as the Lyric.

The management in engaging soloists for the concerts of this season has fairly outdone itself. Never since the orchestra has been coming to Baltimore has such a list of soloists been announced. There will be five concerts and five artists. The soloist at the first concert will be the ever-fascinating Geraldine Farrar of the Metroplitan Opera Company, New York; at the second concert the soloist will be the great Kreisler; Teresa Carreno, the most wonderful of women pianists, will be the soloist at the third concert. The fourth concert will introduce to Baltimore Mme. Boehn van Endert, principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, whose coming to America is exciting much interest among lovers of singers, and the closing concert will have as its soloist Paderewski.

In Mme. van Endert the management of the orchestra believes that it will introduce to America a singer of most unusual qualities. When Geraldine Farrar left the Berlin Opera to become a member of the Metropolitan Opera in New York it was for a number of years impossible to find a successor entirely satisfactory. Many were called, but none were chosen.

In the spring of 1907 a young singer made her debut at a Guerzenich concert in Cologne with the most sensational success. Directly as the result of it, although she was entirely without operatic experience, she was engaged for five years by Count von Seebach, intendant of the Royal Opera of Dresden. This was Mme. van Endert. After she had been in the Dresden Opera for three years Count von Huelson secured her release and took her to Berlin to assume the roles which once fell to Geraldine Farrar, and there she has since stayed. Two years ago she created the name part in Richard Strauss' most successful opera, "Der Rosenkavalier," and sang it 56 times in one season under the leadership of Dr. Muck. Mme. van Endert is young, comely and of

---

From EVG. STAR

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date OCT 11 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA DATES

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has issued its prospectus for the five concerts which that famous organization will give in Baltimore during the coming winter. The concerts will come as usual on Wednesday evenings and will be given in the Lyric Theater. The dates are November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18. A considerable part of the house has already been taken for the season by subscription. The remaining seats will go on sale at Albaugh's Tickett Office, Fayette and Charles streets, next Monday morning, October 13. The management in engaging soloists for the concerts of this season has fairly outdone itself.

BOSTON HERALD.

OCTOBER 20.

MELBA SINGS IN SYMPHONY HALL

Popular Artist Welcomed by Large and Enthusiastic Audience.

VOICE CHARMING AS OF OLD

Performance Marked by Habitual Respect for Composer, Hearers and Art.

By PHILIP HALE.

Mme. Melba and her company yesterday afternoon gave the second of the Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall. The audience, numbering about 3000, filled the hall in every part and nearly 300 sat upon the stage. Mme. Melba was assisted by Edmund Burke, baritone; Marcel Moyse, flutist; Gabriel Lapierre, accompanist. The program as announced was as follows:

Saint-Saens, Romance, Handel, Allegro from the third sonata (Mr. Moyse); Diaz, Aria from "Benvenuto Cellini" (Mr. Burke); Charpentier "Depuis le Jour" (Mme. Melba); Leveridge "When Dull Care," Hatton, "To Anthea" (Mr. Burke); Debussy, Romance and Mandoline (Mme. Melba); Ganne, Andante and Scherzo (Mr. Moyse); Puccini, "Addio" from "La Boheme," Verdi "Ave Maria" from "Otello" (Mme. Melba); Duparc, "Vague et la Cloche" (Mr. Burke); Bishop, "Lo, Here the Gentle Lark" with flute (Mme. Melba); Caldari, "Come raggio di Sol," Tirandelli, "Nina Nanna" (Mr. Burke).

It was over 19 years ago that Mme. Melba began to delight thousands in this city by the splendor and beauty of her voice and by the perfection of her art. Three years ago next December she sang at a Symphony Concert and appeared in "La Boheme" at the Boston Opera House. During these years the great public has been faithful to her. She deserved and deserves this admiration. In opera and on the concert stage she has never displayed the airs and graces of the spoiled prima donna. She was never kittenish, after the manner of certain stout sopranos. She did not run impatiently toward the footlights to greet effusively the dear public. She did not take liberties with her hearers and give them pinchbeck for gold, relying on her reputation and their good nature. She has always respected her audiences the composer and her art.

Time is a thief, but if he takes away he often gives something in return. It is not to be expected when a soprano has been singing for 26 years in opera that her upper tones retain fully their brilliance; that her trill is still marvellously clear and even; that she sings with the ease that long excited wonder. But if the years are thus inexorable, the singer sometimes gains in other ways. The middle and lower tones become fuller and richer; they gain in emotional significance. This is singularly true in Mme. Melba's case. There is still that delicious quality in the "working-part" of her voice that set her apart, supreme and glorious. Never was her voice more beautiful, never was it so golden as when she sang the music of Marguerite in "The Damnation of Faust," some years ago at a Cecilia concert—and this music if for a mezzo-soprano.

Yesterday while the work of Time was noticeable—thus the extreme upper notes did not always have the pure, full quality that long distinguished them, the trill was not the wondrous feat of former years, and in the air from "Louise" there was apparent effort—Mme. Melba nevertheless was again the accomplished artist and richly deserved the enthusiastic applause to which she generously responded with songs—French, Italian and also in English—the inevitable "Comin' thro' the Rye" which some unknown Scot long ago composed for the use of prima donnas, as Mortimer Collins said of the poet Horace that he wrote to be quoted in the House of Commons. There was the beautiful attack of a phrase, there was the admirable sustaining and ending of a melodic line, there was the careful phrasing, the adorable simplicity in expression, the peculiar tonal quality in the middle and lower registers that is in itself emotional. Witness her singing of Mimi's "Farewell."

Mr. Burke has a virile, resonant voice. He is a sturdy singer, inclined to force tone and he has his moments of sentimentalism. When he sang in English, as in other languages, his enunciation was not always distinct.

Mr. Moyse has an unusually large tone and facile execution, he phrases as a musician. Mr. Lapierre was a sympathetic accompanist.

The concert next Sunday will be a piano recital by Josef Hofmann.

[30]

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 12 1913

Es 1884

The sale of season tickets for the six concerts the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in this city the coming winter will open to-morrow morning. A considerable part of the house has already been taken by subscription, and with the brilliant list of soloists the orchestra announces, the series is expected to be the most successful the orchestra has ever given in this city. The increase in number of concerts from five to six was in deference to the expressed wishes of a large number of the regular subscribers. They will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evenings, Oct. 21, Nov. 18, Dec. 30, Feb. 3, March 24 and April 14.

It was considered at the close of last season that Dr. Muck had brought the orchestra up to the highest point of virtuosity it had ever attained since its organization. He starts in this fall practically where he left off and it may be assumed that he will secure even more brilliant results during the coming winter since the Boston Symphony Orchestra is undoubtedly one of the most perfect ensemble instrument in the world.

The six soloists that have been engaged are Mme. Gadski, Ruth Deyo, Fritz Kreisler, Teresa Carreno, Paderewski and Florence Hinkle. Two of these are brilliantly successful American women. Ruth Deyo is a pianist who has already had a remarkable career which promises still greater things in the future, and Florence Hinkle, who has twice sung here with the University Glee Club, is the possessor of a soprano voice of more than usual beauty which she uses with most uncommon skill.

Their appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be the only occasion on which Paderewski and Kreisler will be heard in this city. To Mme. Gadski, the dramatic soprano with the Metropolitan Opera, New York, who is known and admired in this city, will fall the honor of opening the season.

* * *

From
Address Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 11 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has already announced that it will give six concerts in Providence the coming season and the general sale of season tickets for these will open at Seddon's news stand, Butler Exchange, 123 Westminster street, Monday morning, Oct. 13. The concerts will be given on Tuesday evenings in Infantry hall. The dates are Oct. 21, Nov. 18, Dec. 30, Feb. 3, March 24 and April 14. A considerable part of the hall has been taken by last year's subscribers, and with the brilliant array of artists the management announces the season should altogether be the most successful the orchestra has ever had in this city. The soloist at the first concert will be Mme. Gadsk, principal dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. This remarkable artist is unquestionably the foremost dramatic soprano of our time. She has risen gradually but surely in her art until today her services are in demand, not merely for the great opera produced in New York, but all her spare time must be given to concert work. Practically her whole career has been in America for it was America who discovered and first appreciated her and who has given her the greatest rewards.

Es 1884

At the second concert the soloist will be Miss Ruth Deyo. Miss Deyo belongs to that constantly increasing group of American women who are making fame for themselves in music. She is a pianist of unusually brilliant attainments and while she has accomplished much, a still more brilliant future awaits her.

The great violinist, Fritz Kreisler, has been engaged for the third concert. This will be his only appearance in Providence. His performance a year ago of the Beethoven concert with the orchestra was one of the memorable events of the season. A supreme artist he stands today without rival amongst the violinists of our time.

For the fourth concert that most remarkable woman, Teresa Carreon, has been engaged. Still youthful in figure, still beautiful in face, only her snow-white hair betrays the fact that she is nearly 60 and for 38 years has been playing from time to time in America. She is the last of that generation of great women pianists that glorified the end of the 19th century. Her two contemporaries, Essipoff and Menter, have retired but Mme. Carreno still retains the fire and skill of her youth.

The March concert will bring as soloist Paderewski, the greatest pianist probably the world has ever known and, by all odds, the most fascinating and interesting figure among contemporary musicians. He is in this country for a long tour but this is his only appearance in Providence with the Boston Symphony orchestra. Now at the height of his mature poweds, his art is said to be more compelling than ever. The soloist engaged for the last concert is Florence Hinkle, a most delightful singer who has come forward in recent years, and has attained a richly deserved popularity. A beautiful voice, she uses it with uncommon skill and is one of the most popular of the American singers now before the public. The orchestra is in magnificent condition. Its achivements under Dr. Muck last season were remarkable but even more may be expected this year.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R.
Date OCT

Musical Circles t Have Busy Seas

Est

Attractive Programmes Arranged for Steinert Series and Boston Symphony Concerts. — Other Musical Events in Prospect.

MUSIC lovers throughout this city and State are looking forward with keen anticipation to the opening of the musical season here with the opening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Steinert series. Meanwhile the various musical clubs are beginning the season with notably attractive programmes. The Chopin Club, of which Mrs. C. L. Harris is President, opened its season at Churchill House on Thursday morning with an audience of members and guests which taxed the capacity of the ball room.

The Chaminade Club, of which Mrs. George Hall is President, will open its season in Froebel Hall on Thursday morning. The programme will be devoted to folk songs and dances of the world.

The Scotney Concert Trio will give a concert in Pawtucket on the evening of Nov. 4, when Mr. Howard White, Mme. Scotney White and Mr. Waller, violinist, will appear.

In arranging his second series of Steinert concerts for the coming season, Mr. Albert Steinert of Providence is pursuing further the project which he inaugurated successfully last season and which bids fair to have a revolutionary influence in the future management of concerts. Mr. Steinert, it will be remembered, desired to arrange a series of concerts by means of which the public at the lowest possible prices might find itself in a position to profit by the talent of the greatest concert artists of the day. "Good music," he said, "should become as popular as the 'movies.'".

The principal difficulty was the prices of admission. The solution reached by Mr. Steinert is the solution that has worked such tremendous changes in business and art as well in the last few years. To-day the Metropolitan, Boston and Chicago opera companies are practically different stations of one enterprise. The singers go from one opera house to another. They are paid by each institution according to a fixed scale of prices. This is of inestimable value to each opera house, because the singers can be engaged for a greater numbr of performancs than would otherwise be possible through the division of their services, which lightens greatly the financial and artistic responsibility of each theatre. Mr. Steinert, after some calculation and experiment, found this arrangement equally practicable in the concert field. Through his initiative it became possible to inaugurate a series of exceptionally fine concerts, given by the greatest artists, within a limited terrriory, and this first venture proved a pronounced success. For the coming season the advance sales have already more than indicated a sympathetic attitude on the part of the public.

The first concert of the series in Providence will be given in Infantry Hall on the evening of October 28. The artists will be Maud Powell, who has no peer among the violinists of to-day, either in this country or in Europe, as every one of her contemporaries, from Ysaye down, recognizes most warmly; Yolande Mero, whose two concert tours in this country have already made her favorite with the concert public in America as well as in Europe; and Lambert Murphy, very popular among the concert singers of today. The program is one of exceptional interest. The program of the first concert is as follows:

Sonata, G Major op. 13 .... Grieg
Lento doloroso. Allegro vivace
Allegretto tranquillo
Allegro animato
Mme. Powell and Mme. Mero.
Aria: "Voir Griselidis" .... Massenet
from prologue to Griselidis.
Mr. Lambert Murphy.
(a) Cappriccio, B minor .... Brahms
(b) Arabesque .... Debussy
Mme. Yolande Mero.
First Movement from D minor
Concerto .... Wieniawski
Mme. Maud Powell.
(a(Jung Frau und Kind, Peterson-Berger
(b) Sogno d'Amore .... Brogi
(c) Mattinata .... Leoncavallo
Mr. Lambert Murphy.
(a) Scherzo .... Chopin
(b) Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2 .... Liszt
Mme. Yolande Mero.
(a) Larghetto, A major .... Nardini
(b) Minute Waltz .... Chopin-Powell
(c) Zapateado .... Sarasate
Mme. Maud Powell.
(a) Morning Hymn .... Henschel
(b) Her Rose .... Coombs
(c) Daybreak .... Daniels
Mr. Lambert Murphy.

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 11 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA DATES

Esta 1884

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has issued its prospectus for the five concerts which that famous organization will give in Baltimore during the coming winter. The concerts will come as usual on Wednesday evenings and will be given in the Lyric Theater. The dates are November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18. A considerable part of the house has already been taken for the season by subscription. The remaining seats will go on sale at Albaugh's Tickett Office, Fayette and Charles streets, next Monday morning, October 13. The management in engaging soloists for the concerts of this season has fairly outdone itself.

EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 11 1913

NOTED SOLOISTS TO BE HEARD AT LYRIC

Boston Symphony Prospectus Shows Plans For This Season.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has issued its prospectus for the five concerts which that famous organization will give in Baltimore during the coming winter. The concerts will come as usual on Wednesday evenings and will be given in the Lyric Theater. The dates are November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18.

People who have heard the Boston Symphony in other cities are a unit in declaring that the Baltimore audiences are the most brilliant it has anywhere in the country. Certainly the concerts themselves are among the most brilliant it gives, because there are not half a dozen auditoriums in the United States which have such perfect acoustics for orchestral music as the Lyric.

The management in engaging soloists for the concerts of this season has fairly outdone itself. Never since the orchestra has been coming to Baltimore has such a list of soloists been announced. There will be five concerts and five artists. The soloist at the first concert will be the ever-fascinating Geraldine Farrar of the Metroplitan Opera Company, New York; at the second concert the soloist will be the great Kreisler; Teresa Carreno, the most wonderful of women pianists, will be the soloist at the third concert. The fourth concert will introduce to Baltimore Mme. Boehn van Endert, principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, whose coming to America is exciting much interest among lovers of singers, and the closing concert will have as its soloist Paderewski.

In Mme. van Endert the management of the orchestra believes that it will introduce to America a singer of most unusual qualities. When Geraldine Farrar left the Berlin Opera to become a member of the Metropolitan Opera in New York it was for a number of years impossible to find a successor entirely satisfactory. Many were called, but none were chosen.

In the spring of 1907 a young singer made her debut at a Guerzenich concert in Cologne with the most sensational success. Directly as the result of it, although she was entirely without operatic experience, she was engaged for five years by Count von Seebach, intendant of the Royal Opera of Dresden. This was Mme. van Endert. After she had been in the Dresden Opera for three years Count von Huelson secured her release and took her to Berlin to assume the roles which once fell to Geraldine Farrar, and there she has since stayed. Two years ago she created the name part in Richard Strauss' most successful opera, "Der Rosenkavalier," and sang it 56 times in one season under the leadership of Dr. Muck. Mme. van Endert is young, comely and of

---

BOSTON HERALD.

OCTOBER 20.

MELBA SINGS IN SYMPHONY HALL

Popular Artist Welcomed by Large and Enthusiastic Audience.

VOICE CHARMING AS OF OLD

Performance Marked by Habitual Respect for Composer, Hearers and Art.

By PHILIP HALE.

Mme. Melba and her company yesterday afternoon gave the second of the Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall. The audience, numbering about 3000, filled the hall in every part and nearly 300 sat upon the stage. Mme. Melba was assisted by Edmund Burke, baritone; Marcel Moyse, flutist; Gabriel Lapierre, accompanist. The program as announced was as follows:

Saint-Saens, Romance, Handel, Allegro from the third sonata (Mr. Moyse); Diaz, Aria from "Benvenuto Cellini" (Mr. Burke); Charpentier, "Depuis le Jour" (Mme. Melba); Leveridge, "When Dull Care," Hatton, "To Anthea" (Mr. Burke); Debussy, Romance and Mandoline (Mme. Melba); Ganne, Andante and Scherzo (Mr. Moyse); Puccini, "Addio" from "La Boheme," Verdi, "Ave Maria" from "Otello" (Mme. Melba); Duparc, "Vague et la Cloche" (Mr. Burke); Bishop, "Lo, Here the Gentle Lark" with flute (Mme. Melba); Caldari, "Come raggio di Sol," Tirandelli, "Nina Nanna" (Mr. Burke).

It was over 19 years ago that Mme. Melba began to delight thousands in this city by the splendor and beauty of her voice and by the perfecttion of her art. Three years ago next December she sang at a Symphony Concert and appeared in "La Boheme" at the Boston Opera House. During these years the great public has been faithful to her. She deserved and deserves this admiration. In opera and on the concert stage she has never displayed the airs and graces of the spoiled prima donna. She was never kittenish, after the manner of certain stout sopranos. She did not run impatiently toward the footlights to greet effusively the dear public. She did not take liberties with her hearers and give them pinchbeck for gold, relying on her reputation and their good nature. She has always respected her audiences the composer and her art.

Time is a thief, but if he takes away he often gives something in return. It is not to be expected when a soprano has been singing for 26 years in opera that her upper tones retain fully their brilliance; that her trill is still marvellously clear and even; that she sings with the ease that long excited wonder. But if the years are thus inexorable, the singer sometimes gains in other ways. The middle and lower tones become fuller and richer; they gain in emotional significance. This is singularly true in Mme. Melba's case. There is still that delicious quality in the "working-part" of her voice that set her apart, supreme and glorious. Never was her voice more beautiful, never was it so golden as when she sang the music of Marguerite in "The Damnation of Faust," some years ago at a Cecilia concert—and this music if for a mezzo-soprano.

Yesterday while the work of Time was noticeable—thus the extreme upper notes did not always have the pure, full quality that long distinguished them, the trill was not the wondrous feat of former years, and in the air from "Louise" there was apparent effort—Mme. Melba nevertheless was again the accomplished artist and richly deserved the enthusiastic applause to which she generously responded with songs—French, Italian and also in English—the inevitable "Comin' thro' the Rye" which some unknown Scot long ago composed for the use of prima donnas, as Mortimer Collins said of the poet Horace that he wrote to be quoted in the House of Commons. There was the beautiful attack of a phrase, there was the admirable sustaining and ending of a melodic line, there was the careful phrasing, the adorable simplicity in expression, the peculiar tonal quality in the middle and lower registers that is in itself emotional. Witness her singing of Mimi's "Farewell."

Mr. Burke has a virile, resonant voice. He is a sturdy singer, inclined to force tone and he has his moments of sentimentalism. When he sang in English, as in other languages, his enunciation was not always distinct.

Mr. Moyse has an unusually large tone and facile execution, he phrases as a musician. Mr. Lapierre was a sympathetic accompanist.

The concert next Sunday will be a piano recital by Josef Hofmann.

BOSTON GLOBE

OCTOBER 20,

MELBA'S CONCERT.

Great Soprano Recalls the Days of Her Prime.

Edmund Burke, Baritone, and Marcel Moyse, Flautist, Assist.

Mme Melba returned to Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon and gave a concert in which excerpts from the operas had a considerable place, a concert of the type which appears to have been more common 25 or 30 years ago. There was a baritone, Edmund Burke, who is a Canadian by birth, has sung at Covent Garden, and was appearing for the first time in this city, and there was a flautist, Marcel Moyse.

Symphony Hall had been entirely sold out as early as Friday. The audience overflowed to the outer aisle on the floor and to all available space to be found on the platform. The welcome which these hundreds gave Mme Melba was a demonstrative and affectionate one, and after "John Anderson My Jo," "Comin' Through the Rye" and Tosti's "Goodby," the applause was tumultous. The last had followed the final number, Bishop's "Lo! Hear the Gentle Lark" (with flute). When the demand insistently continued, Mme Melba appeared in her traveling coat, said she was hurrying to catch a train to New York and bade her audience "Goodby."

It is not necessary at this time to say how many years it is since Mme Melba came to dwell in this world of song. There are dictionaries that name the year and month and day. Not more than a season ago a once great singer, who first saw the light in America, just seven days [illegible]fore Mme Melba first set foot in Australia, gave a similar concert here, which was a source more of regret and disappointment than of pleasure.

There were moments in yesterday's program that recalled Mme Melba in the glory of her prime and others which gave the warning that even this rare and perfect voice must pay the toll [illegible] time which her sisters already have paid in greater measure. The mellow, golden color that made the voice a unique and precious instrument is still to be heard, particularly in the middle tones, and as yesterday in the old familiar songs when the singer found an ardor, an intensity of feeling and even a hint at characterization which has not always been associated with her.

While singing such as this contains cause for regretful comparison and memories of other days, as in the unsteady coloratura and trills, and the lack of superb authority as of old, it also makes one consider how kind a mistress is nature to those who treat a young voice according to her bidding rather than with contempt or disregard for it.

Mme Melba has adhered to the music which suited her through these years, and by her singing yesterday proved that she has not neglected the fundamental principles of vocal art. Many of her younger sisters in the noonday of their careers as lyric declamationists would be fortunate to sustain a melodic ine with the economy and even flow of the breath, and the searching, illuminating poise of tone that Mme Melba in more than one instance yesterday proved to be still at her command.

The best singing was not in the "Depuis le jour" from "Louise" nor the wo songs of Debussy in the first part, or in Desdemona's piteous prayer rom "Otello," an excerpt which fares adly when taken out of the opera, for e piano is a poor substitute for the chestra, and the recitative, even when hortened as it was yesterday, is rupt and incongruous without the eceding scene.

Mimi's pathetic song of farewell to odolfo from the third act of "La Bome" gave Mme Melba music which is teful to her and which always has peal. With the exception of a florid itz in which Mme Melba toiled lariously, it was the pieces not on the ogram that found her best disposed d that pleased her audience most.

Mr Burke sings with great energy. ere are times when more vocal art uld serve him to better purpose. His nner of singing is a present impedint, for he finds it necessary to push tones into place to the injury of ir quality and of his effectiveness as interpreter. The audience was genus and induced him to add to the gram.

Mr Moyse played flute solos in which exhibited considerable dexterity in gering. His tone and style were lly of exemplary purity, but he evily gave his hearers pleasure. Mr pierre accompanied faithfully.

osef Hofmann will give a piano real next Sunday afternoon at the third ncert of the series.

ADVERTISER,

OCTOBER 20

MME. MELBA AT SYMPHONY HALL

TALENTED VOCALIST DRAWS GREAT THRONG

Assisting Artists Far Above Average Usually Presented With First Magnitude Stars.

At her concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon Mme. Melba was assisted by Edmund Burke, baritone; Marcel Moyse, flutist, and Gabriel Lapierre, accompanist. The programme was:—

1. Flute Solos: (a) Romance.........Saint-Saens
   (b) Allegro (Third Sonata)..........Handel
   Mr. Moyse.
2. Aria: "Benvenuto Cellini"................Diaz
   Mr. Burke.
3. Aria: "Depuis le jour" ("Louise"). Charpentier
   Mme. Melba.
4. Songs: (a) "When dull care" (Old English). Leveridge
   (b) "To Anthea"....................Hatton
   Mr. Burke.
5. Songs: (a) "Romance"...............Debussy
   (b) "Mandoline"..................Debussy
   Mme. Melba.
6. Flute Solo: Andante et Scherzo.........Ganne
   Mr. Moyse.
7. Arias: (a) "Addio" from "La Boheme" Puccini
   (b) "Ave Maria" from "Otello"......Verdi
   Mme. Melba.
8. Song: "Vague et la cloche"...........Duparc
   Mr. Burke.
9. Song: "Lo! here the gentle lark"......Bishop
   Mme. Melba.
   (Flute obbligato, Mr. Moyse.)
10. Songs: (a) "Com e raggio di sol".....Caldari
    (b) "Nina Nanna"................Tirandelli
    Mr. Burke.

Usually at a concert of this character the prima donna is the center of interest. This was no less so yesterday, but apparently Mme. Melba in her choice of assisting artists has exercised more generosity in the matter than is usual. The artists on the programme were far above the standard of the average performer classed as "assisting artists," who, as a rule, simply shine by whatever reflected light may be shed by the one bright star. Both Mr. Burke and Mr. Moyse and in no less degree, Mr. Lapierre, acquitted themselves creditably, winning favor and applause on their own account for really commendable artistry.

The hall was taxed to capacity with an extremely enthusiastic audience. This fact not only attested to the admiration of the great artist and as a fine tribute to her consummate artistry and splendid achievements, but also proves the popularity of the Sunday concerts. The programme was one of unusual interest and variety. Mme. Melba seemed to be in good vocal condition. Her voice and artistry are familiar and need no further comment. The great beauty and purity of her remarkable voice was again greatly enjoyed. Her singing of the "Aria from Louise" was marked by fine finish in phasing and nuance. The moods of the Debussy songs were differentiated with expressive and appropriate color. Of the two songs, "Mandoline" was sung with extreme delicacy and gave the most pleasure. For excellent legato, great breadth and warm brilliancy of tone the "Ave Maria" was an example of rare artistry and to us was the climax of the concert. The song by Bishop gave Mme. Melba an opportunity to display a wealth of light high and extremely delicate tones. The florid passages and roulades were splendidly sung in her inimitable style with agility and flexibility. The flute obbligato so well played by Mr. Moyse added to the charm of the song. It was a case of the human voice versus the flute and the voice won. As a last encore Mme. Melba sang Tosti's "Good Bye." We have so often heard this "classic" sung in mutilated English by all sorts and conditions of foreign singers that it was refreshing to hear the clear, distinct and unbroken language in which the song was written. Mme. Melba graciously added several songs to the programme in response to insistent applause.

Mr. Burke, whom we believe is new to Boston, possesses a voice of much beauty and power. This voice lends itself to strong dramatic utterance rather than to songs that are lyric in character. In the former style his vigorous vocalism was effective as in the song by Duparc, which, by the way, was his best effort. When Mr. Burke essayed a song in the lighter vein his diction lacked clarity. He is to be commended for his fine legato and sincerity.

The playing of Mr. Moyse was highly enjoyed. His tone is pure, rich and warm and his technique fluent. His selections were attractive and were of a nature calculated to reach and be comprehended by the so-called popular ear. The innate charm of the Handel "Allegro" and Mr. Moyse's exquisite tone combined to make this piece the favorite. The fine ensemble in the obbligato in the song by Bishop likewise deserves praise.

The accompaniments played by Mr. Lapierre gave evidence of rare skill in this art.

F. M. W.

DAY GLOBE—OCTOBER 19.

Mme Melba's Concert Today at Symphony Hall

Mme Melba will return this afternoon to Symphony Hall for a concert in which she will sing various arias from the operas. She will be assisted by Edmund Burke, the Canadian baritone, who has appeared at Covent Garden, and by Marcel Moyse, flutist. The concert will begin at 3:30. The following is the program:

Flute solos:
(a) Andalouse..............................Pessard
(b) Sixth Solo....................Demersseman
Mr Moyse.
Aria, Benvenuto Cellini......................Diaz
Mr Burke.
Aria, Mad Scene (Lucia di Lammermoor) Donizetti
Mme Melba.
(Flute obbligato by Mr Moyse.)
Songs:
(a) To Anthea..............................Hatton
(b) Trottin' to the Fair.................Stanford
Mr Burke.
Aria, Depuis le Jour (Louise)......Charpentier
Mme Melba.
Flute solo, Andante et Scherzo..........Ganne
Mr Moyse.
Song, Magdalen at Michael's Gate, Liza Lehmann
(Specially composed for Mme Melba's American tour.)
Mme Melba.
Mephistopheles' Song in Auerbach's Cellar Moussorgsky
Mr Burke.
Aria:
(a) Addio from La Boheme...........Puccini
(b) Aubade du Roi d'Ys..................Lalo
Mme Melba.
Song, Rolling Down to Rio....Edward German
Mr Burke.

Dr Muck Will Play Fourth Symphony of Sibelius

The first novelty of the Symphony season will occur at the concerts this week, when Dr Muck promises to bring forward the fourth symphony of Jean Sibelius. The opening movement of the first, which Dr Muck played here last year, will be recalled for its fine seriousness and grave beauty. The second was played by Mr Fiedler, and its austerity is remembered. The third was accounted a failure when played in London.

When the fourth was heard in New York last Spring (March 2) the reviews indicated that Sibeluis had lost none of the aloof, stern, bleak individuality in musical expression which has characterized him. Produced first at Helsingfors, Finland, where Sibelius teaches in the Institute and Orchestral School, this symphony has been played in Vienna by Mr Weingartner, and was heard for the first time in England a year ago early this month at the Birmingham festival.

The second half of the program will be purely classical. It will comprise a concerto for two wind choirs by Handel, three charming pieces by Gluck—Tambourin, Gavotte and Chaconne, which were arranged by the Belgian Geveart, and finally Haydn's Symphony in D Major, No. 2.

BOSTON POST,

OCTOBER 20,

MELBA SINGS TO FULL HOUSE

Voice Heard Again in All Its Beauty

BY OLIN DOWNES

Mme. Melba's concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon brought an audience which filled the auditorium to its capacity She was assisted by Edmund Burke, baritone; Marcel Moise, flutist, and Gabrielle Lapierre, accompanist. The demand for seats was such that many were placed on the platform about the piano and the aisles were packed with standees.

A week before this concert took place the celebrated singer had changed the programme originally announced, so that in place of accustomed "numbers" of her repertory there were two songs by Debussy, the "Romance" and "Mandoline," and there was also the air "Pepuis le jour," from "Louise." Other music was the "Addio' of Mimi from the last act of "La Boheme," and the "Ave Maria" from "Otello," which Mme. Melba again sang with a purity of style and a simple eloquence and tonal beauty that made her interpretation of the passage far finer than any performance of it by any singer who has recently appeared in Boston in the opera.

Mme. Melba's final song was Bishop's "Lo! Hear the Gentle Lark," with the flute obligato.

From Covent Garden

Mr. Burke, whose reputation at Covent Garden is of the highest, sang a conventional Gounodish fragment from an opera by the composer Diaz, who is a son of the painter; also the songs in English, "When Dull Care," of Leveridge, and Hatton's "To Anthea"; Dupare's effective song, "Vague et la Cloche"; the noble air by Caldara, "Com e raggio di sol," and Tirandelli's "Nina Nanna."

It fell to the lot of Mr. Moise not only to play Mme. Melba's obligato, but to entertain her audience, more than once, with his solo performances. His pieces were a romance of Saint-Saens, the allegro movement from Handel's third sonata for the flute, and Andante and Scherzo by Ganne. Mr. Moise, too, was warmly applauded for his musicianly performances, and was later obliged to add to the programme

Mme. Melba's singing was uneven in its quality. The final lines of the air of Louise were interpreted with memorable sentiment. The phrasing was notable, not merely for the treatment of each phrase, but for the manner in which each phrase, even after a pause was related to that which followed. In other words, continuity of thought as well as continuity of line was there, and in addition Mme. Melba colored her tones with rare richness and a variety of nuance, so that for the moment [illegible] spring time in [illegible]

Lacking in Atmosphere

The songs of Debussy are comparatively new departures for this singer, and estimable as their performance was from certain standpoints they lacked atmosphere and true conviction on the part of the interpreter. There is a more elusive quality, even in the "Mandoline," than was felt yesterday. It was in the music of Puccini and Verdi that Mme. Melba especially excelled, and that her voice showed again in all its beauty. The naivete of Mimi's simple and pathetic leave-taking was exactly the right touch, and in the music from Otello Mme. Melba is, as has been said, the one great artist who has been heard of Boston of late years. It is unnecessary to describe the audience's enjoyment of the lilting song of Bishop with the brilliant passages for the flute and the voice.

Old Songs fro Encores

As for the singing of "Se saran Rose," which was added as an encore—the famous waltz song that was Melba's own—it is unnecessary to dwell upon it. The song is no longer the best medium for Mme. Melba's voice, nor are affected and exaggerated mannerisms most fitting for an old familiar friend such as "Comin' Through the Rye," even when a famous prima donna is the singer. Other encores were "John Anderson My Joe" and Tosti's "Goodbye." The latter song was an earnest of Mme. Melba's next move. She appeared on the stage in a heavy fur overcoat and announced to an audience that would not have enough that she was compelled to leave for a train. Nor was this the only kittenish thing that Mme. Melba did that afternoon.

Mr. Burke has a sonorous baritone voice which he often employs to excellent advantage, whereas in his earlier performances his delivery was marred by some technical shortcomings and also, in the English songs, by a lack of simplicity, of unaffected sincerity. In the songs by Duparc and in the fine old melody of Caldara he was fortunate, sustaining an admirable legato in the latter song and interpreting it with feeling for its classic beauty and emotion, and treating the song by Duparc in a dramatic manner. Mr. Burke, too, added to the programme.

SUNDAY HERALD.

OCTOBER 19.

MR. HOFMANN'S RECITAL

Josef Hofmann will give his only recital in Boston in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon, Oct. 26. He is in America for a comparatively short stay; that is to say, while he will be here until the late winter, he plans to spend the most of his time in North Carolina, and will not give very many concerts.

PROGRAM.

Variations.............................Handel
Bagatellen, E flat major, G major, Beethoven
Sonate, Op. 106...................Beethoven
Two Nocturnes......................Chopin
Two Mazurkas.......................Chopin
Two Waltzes.........................Chopin
Sonata...................................Liszt
Preludes A minor, B minor..Rachmaninoff
Polichinelle..................Rachmaninoff
Barcarolle ....Dvorsky
Poeme.................................Scriabin
Etude, D sharp minor.............Scriabin

MISS FARRAR'S RECITAL

Miss Geraldine Farrar will give her only recital here this season in Symphony Hall Tuesday afternoon, Oct. 28. Aside from her appearances with the Symphony orchestra this will be the only opportunity to hear her. Miss Farrar will bear the whole burden of the concert. In the past she has had an assistant but this will be a song recital pure and simple. The program was made largely with the advice of Lilli Lehmann, who coached Miss Farrar in many of the songs.

Wonnevoller Mai...........................Gluck
Le Partenza.................. }
Mit einem gemalten Bande........ } Beethoven
Oh! had I Jubal's Lyre.................Handel
Alleluja.....................................Mozart
Non t' accostar all' Urna............ }
Heidenroslein .... } Schubert
Ach! wenn ich doch ein Immchen war.. }
Der Schmetterling.......................... } Franz
Gute Nacht.................................. }
Der Edelfalk.......................... }
Walpurgisnacht...................... } Loewe
Sternlein..............................Mussorgsky
Die Lerche.......................... }
Sprodes Kind........................ } Rubinstein
Er liebte mich.....................Tschaikowsky
Sylvelin...................................Sinding
Zueignung...............................R. Strauss
Paix du Soir........................Grechaninoff
Le Train des Amours........................Grieg
Ouvre tes yeux bleus (request).......Massenet
I'm Not as Other Lassies..........Hugo Wolf
The Maiden and the Butterfly.......Chadwick
The Bluebell...........................MacDowell
Arthur Rosenstein will be the accompanist.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Dr. Muck has placed the first novelty of the season in the program of the concerts of Oct. 24 and 25. This is the fourth symphony of Sibelius, whose music has created a profound impression here. This fourth symphony, which has had its first performance abroad within a year and half, is said to show a wide divergence from his former style. The second half of the program will comprise a Concerto for two wind choirs by Handel, three charming pieces by

---

Gluck—Tambourin, Gavotte and Chaconne, arranged in suite form by Gevaert, and Haydn's Symphony in D major No. 2.

MME. MELBA'S CONCERT

Mme. Melba has made some rather important changes in the program of her concert in Symphony Hall this afternoon, and so has Mr. Burke. The concert will begin at 3:30 o'clock. The revised program is as follows:

Flute Solos:
(a) Romance........................Saint-Saens
(b) Allegro (Third Sonata)..........Handel
Aria, "Benvenuto Cellini"................Diaz
Mr. Burke.
"Depuis le jour" from "Louise"........ Charpentier
Mme. Melba.
Songs:
(a) "When Dull Care" (Old English) Leveridge
(b) "To Anthea"......................Hatton
Mr. Burke.
Songs:
(a) "Romance".......................Debussy
(b) "Mandoline"......................Debussy
Mme. Melba.
Flute Solo, Andante et Scherzo.........Ganne
Mr. Moyse.
Arias:
(a) "Addio" (from "La Boheme")........Puccini
(b) "Ave Maria" (from "Otello")........Verdi
Mme. Melba.
Song, "Vague et la Cloche"..........Duparc
Mr. Burke.
Song, "Lo, Here the Gentle Lark".Bishop
Mme. Melba.
Flute Obbligato, Mr. Moyse.
Songs:
(a) "Come Raggio di Sol"..........Caldari
(b) "Nina Nanna"...................Tirandelli
Mr. Burke.

[32]

SUNDAY POST, OCTOBER 19

Sibelius' 4th Symphony

New and Strange Work from North to Be Played at Symphony Concert of This Week—Some Prominent Characteristics of Latest Symphony of a Leading Modern Composer.

The time is coming—and it is not far off—when Jean Sibelius, present head of the Finnish school of composition, will be generally recognized as one of the most original and significant composers of this period. It is thus with special interest that the Sibelius following in this city look forward to the performance of the Fourth Symphony, for the first time in Boston, at the Symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Since the Fourth Symphony was published, two years ago, its fortunes have been various. In England the reviewers were for the most part frankly antagonistic, while others were as evidently at a loss for a definite opinion after hearing for the first time a new and strange piece of music. Last season in New York, in a city that had not extended a particularly warm welcome to the new Finnish music, the symphony fared better. It was discovered that at least the composer wrote with intense conviction and clearness of purpose; that he had at his command a masterly technic and highly individual conception of harmony and orchestration. And the mood of the music made itself felt, even if there was not complete understanding or acceptance of its idioms.

The Fourth Symphony, certainly one of the most singular compositions that has come out of the North, might well puzzle even experienced musicians and sympathetic admirers of Sibelius—at least on paper.

An examination of the printed score will show this. It would take an accomplished score-reader, indeed, to "hear" with the "inner ear" as he reads this music, and it would be rash to attempt to describe the impression that the symphony will make. But in advance of the work there should be mentioned some of the most obvious features of the score.

The orchestra is rather less in its proportions than that employed by the average composer of today, lacking the tuba, asking only the ordinary proportion of "wood" and "strings," and employing, for a single exceptional demand, bells in the last movement. The four movements may be said to follow generally established forms of musical composition, but more than once in a manner that will be outrageous to some and puzzling to others. The scoring is very clear and compact. This in spite of passages of genuine complexity—a complexity not dependent upon the simultaneous employment of great numbers of instruments, but the result of logical and extremely skilful combinations of themes, harmonies, rhythms.

The musical ideas are often of a singular physiognomy, but they are simple, powerful and basic. There is no ornamentation in this symphony, any more than in earlier works of Sibelius. There is always the strength and directness of style consequent upon conviction, clear thinking and the inborn talent for great effects brought about by the smallest expenditure of material. And it is not going too far to say that in this work Sibelius is more of an impressionist than ever before, experimenting with the utmost daring and apparent mastery with mixed harmonies, clashing tonalities and instrumental "timbres," and resulting color effects; that he has here achieved a new and highly individual advance in style, whether for better or worse, remains to be heard.

Of the four movements of this symphony the first is freest in its form. There is a sombre, lowering introduction. Bold, harsh progressions for the brass lead from an opening that has hovered about from E minor through various minor keys to the key of F-sharp major. This place might be called the opening of the movement proper. The mood is gentle and melancholy. The passage leads in turn to a very curious, shifting background in counterpoint for the strings, against which various wood-wind instruments call strangely. Later there is a return to the gentle mood of the F-sharp major section, and this brief movement, the first movement of a symphony described as in "A minor," comes to an end in the lovely and pastoral key of A major.

The scherzo is not less singular, although its form is clear enough. It is wild and restless. The extraordinary juxtapositions of certain instruments and tonalities remain to be heard before the effect can be described. After a curious climax, built chiefly on two notes of one of the themes, a motive shouted repeatedly by many instruments, this movement ends softly and suddenly.

The slow movement has more sheer beauty than any of the others. It commences with dialogue of the wind instruments and the free preluding of various choirs. Then, under a shimmering accompaniment of the upper strings, the 'celli intone the real theme of the movement, a broad and noble song, almost Bruckner-like in these qualities, which, with some episodic interruptions, is repeatedly proclaimed by the orchestra and always more impressively. The movement ends mysteriously, C-sharp held by violas and muted horns, with wood and stringed instruments echoing fragments from an earlier passage.

But of the four movements the last is, perhaps, the most brusque and fantastical. The first phrase of the theme, at once given out by the violins is ation, and a brief motive taken from it is the predominant thought of the movement. This motive consists, first of four notes composed of a triplet and a quarter, followed by a sort of rejoinder of three quarter notes, often sounded on the bells, or stopped horns. Then there is the passage when the strings, tremolo, ascend gradually over a vibrating bass, and the flutes and oboes, practically in another key, call eerily. After the clashings of reiterated successive chords of the dominant seven and tonic of A flat, a curious chant in three-part harmony and in march-like ryhthm is developed by the woodwind.

Very curious and interesting should this effect be, although not more so than many other passages of the symphony. With a theme and an accompaniment presumably in the key of F minor, certain of the strings insist on the fifth and the tonic of G major, and this is repeated in sequence, and later in the movement. Farther on occurs a passage where the horns and woodwind instruments sustain the chord of C major in its second position, while the strings whirr up and down the scale, the bells ring exultantly and a trumpet swelling the initial tone of its figure from "P P P" to "F F F" throws out the fragment of the opening theme previously mentioned. The march-like theme is resumed and developed. The string passage with the off-key cries of the woodwind recurs, rondo fashion, and finally this remarkable movement comes to an end in a most gray and arid manner—a complaint of the oboe—the skip of a seventh—and soft despondent chords from the strings—always softer—always more gray, in the key of A minor. Very singular, at the least, very moody and introspective, is this most recent symphony of Sibelius.

FARRAR'S RECITAL

The coming of Geraldine Farrar will mean the mustering of the numerous clans of her devoted admirers at Symphony Hall, Tuesday afternoon, Oct. 28. This will be her only concert in Boston this season and aside from her appearances with the Symphony Orchestra will be the only opportunity to hear her. Here, as in New York, Miss Farrar will bear the whole burden of the concert. In the past she has always had an assistant, but this will be a song recital pure and simple. She will sing altogether 24 songs, divided into four groups, and a most attractive list it is. The programme was made largely with the valuable advice of Lilli Lehmann, who personally coached Miss Farrar in many of the songs. The programme is as follows:

"Wonnevoller Mai"	Gluck
"La Partenza"	Beethoven
"Mit Einem Gemalten Bande"	Beethoven
"Oh! Had I Jubal's Lyre"	Handel
"Alleluja"	Mozart
"Non t' Accostar all' Urna"	Schubert
"Heidenroslein"	Schubert
"Ach! wenn ich doch ein Immchen war'"	Franz
"Der Schmetterling"	Franz
"Gute Nacht"	Franz
"Der Edelfalk"	Loewe
"Walpurgisnacht"	Loewe
"Sternlein"	Mussorgsky
"Die Lerche"	Rubinstein
"Sprodes Kind"	Rubinstein
"Er Liebte Mich"	Tschaikowsky
"Sylvelin"	Sinding
"Zueignung"	R. Strauss
"Paix du Soir"	Gretschaninoff
"Le Train des Amours"	Grieg
"Ouvre tes Yeux Bleus" (request)	Massenet
"I'm Not as Other Lassies"	Hugo Wolf
"The Maiden and the Butterfly"	Chadwick

MADAME MELBA'S CONCERT

Mme. Melba has made some important changes in the programme of the concert which she is giving in Symphony Hall this afternoon at 3:30. She has taken off the mad scene from "Lucia" and put in its stead two Debussy songs, "Mandoline" and "Romance." She has taken off the Liza Lehmann number and put in its stead Bishop's "Lo, Here the Gentle Lark." Mr. Burke has made some changes in his numbers also. The revised programme of the concert is as follows:

Allegro (third sonata)	Handel
Mr. Moyse.
Aria, "Benvenuto Cellini"	Diaz
Mr. Burke.
Aria, "Depuis le jour," from "Louise"	Charpentier
Mme. Melba.
Songs: (a) "When Dull Care" (old English)	Leveridge
(b) "To Anthea"	Hatton
Mr. Burke.
Songs: (a) "Romance"	Debussy
(b) "Mandoline"	Debussy
Mme. Melba.
Flute solo, "Andante et Scherzo"	Ganne
Mr. Moyse.
Arias: (b) "Addio" from "La Boheme"	Puccini
(b) "Ave Maria" from "Othello"	Verdi
Mme. Melba.
Song, "Vague et la Cloche"	Duparc
Mr. Burke.
Song, "Lo, Here the Gentle Lark"	Bishop
Mme. Melba.
Flute obligato, Mr. Moyse.
Songs: (a) "Come Raggio di Sol"	Caldari
(b) "Nina Nanna"	Tirandelli
Mr. Burke.

THIRD BOSTON PROGRAMME

Dr. Muck has placed the first novelty of the season in next week's programme, which will be played on Oct. 24 and 25. This is the fourth symphony of Sibelius, described in another column. The music of Sibelius, what of it that has been played here, has created a profound impression, particularly his first and second symphonies.

The second half of the programme will be purely classical. It will comprise a concerto for two wind choirs, by Handel, three charming pieces by Gluck—"Tambourin," "Gavotte" and "Chaconne"—which were arranged by [illegible]

PADE[illegible]

Paderewski, who has begun [illegible] tour of America, will give a recital in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, Nov. 7. The principal numbers on the programme will be Beethoven's sonata in E-major, opus 109, and Schumann's "Carnaval." All accounts have it that he is playing as magnificently as ever, and his return to Boston after an absence of four and a half years will be warmly welcomed.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY

Fritz Kreisler, the eminent violinist, will make his first appearance of the season in Boston in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, Nov. 2, at 3:30 as soloist with the Philharmonic Society of New York. He will play Bruch minor concerto. The principal item on the programme of the orchestra will be the fifth symphony of Tschaikowsky. Tickets for this concert will go on sale at Symphony Hall next Friday, Oct. 24.

MAY KEON'S CONCERT

The programme of May Keon's concert in Steinert Hall, on the 21st of the month, when Miss Keon will be assisted by Andrea de Segurola, George Harris and Virginio Capelloni, will include the following songs and operatic excerpts: "Vissi d'Arte," from Puccini's "La Tosca"; Micaela's romanza from third act of "Carmen," "Ah, fors è lui," and "Che l'anima," from "La Traviata," sung by Miss Keon; duet from the first act of "La Boheme," sung by Miss Keon and Mr. Harris; tenor aria from third act of Massenet's "Werther"; "An einem Bach," Grieg, "Fussreise," Hugo Wolf; "Song of the Nile," Countland Palmer; "When Celia Sings," Moir, sung by Mr. Harris. Mr. Capelloni's numbers will soon be announced. They will complete a well-arranged programme.

HOFMANN'S RECITAL

Josef Hofmann, the most admired of the younger pianists, will give his only recital in Boston in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon, Oct. 26. Mr. Hofmann is in America for a comparatively brief stay; that is to say, while he will be here until the late winter he plans to spend the most of his time on his estate in North Carolina, and is not going to give very many concerts. His last recital here was one of the most successful of the season, and it was sufficient to establish him firmly in the favor of the public.

He has arranged a programme of very great interest, especially the last group, which will be devoted to Russian composers. Hofmann is very popular in Russia. Last season he spent the greater part of the winter in that country, and gave 10 recitals in St. Petersburg alone. Such unfamiliar names as Dvorsky and Scriabine appear in this group. The programme in its entirety is as follows:

Variations	Handel
Bagatellen, E flat major; G major	Beethoven
Two nocturnes	Chopin
Two mazurkas	Chopin
Two waltzes	Chopin
Sonate	Chopin
Prelude, A minor; D minor	Rachmaninoff
Polichinelle	Dvorsky
Barcarolle	Dvorsky
Poeme	Scriabine
Etude, D sharp minor	Scriabine

MONITOR,

OCTOBER 18,

PIANO muisc will make a high b this season for the interest the popular audience that patro ize the Symphony hall concert offering at the outset two of its grea est interpreters in Ignace Paderews and Josef Hofmann. Later in the sea son it will seek to win the public ear i the work of Harold Bauer and Mme. Te resa Carreno.

Through these players, four distin styles of performance, four characteris tic ways of looking at art, four plain differentiated studies of life will enri the experience of Boston listeners. B individual though the visitors are, the are all moderate in their interpreti views. The most progressive of them unquestionably Mr. Bauer, but even is more of an adjuster of new scho of expression to old than an essential i novator. Mme. Carreno is doubtless t most unwilling of the four to yield t modern tendencies, and next to h comes Mr. Paderewski.

Thus, putting radicalism at the t of the scale and conservatism at the bottom, Mr. Bauer sounds the highest note and Mme. Carreno the lowest, but all of them are within the middle register, in the comfortable, easily-understood range of sentiment where applause and popularity are found. And so we may say of the audience that enjoys their playing, that it accepts inherited artistic dividends, it clips the coupons of a nineteenth century investment, it lives on an esthetic system which listeners of the past 50 years have built up. Such an audience cannot claim, as can the one that enjoys the playing of a radical like Ferrucio Busoni, to be venturing capital for the pleasure of its musical descendants.

Qualities Indicated

Contemplating the two artists who are to appear first, Mr. Hofmann and Mr. Paderewski, we find individual qualities strikingly indicated in the leading numbers of their programs. Each is to present a sonata of the late period of Beethoven, Mr. Hofmann the long and impressive twenty-[illegible] Mr. Pade [illegible]

Of course these renowned players might easily be be imagined as exchanging roles. Mr. Hofmann could conceivably present himself as interpreter of the variations of the thirtieth sonata, the F major, with their sudden shifts of mood, with their delicate comedy, their romantic glow. Mr. Paderewski could be imagined mounting a warhouse and leading the tonal squadrons that Beethoven marshals for him in the twenty-ninth, the B flat major. But the choice which the two men have made from the works of the master sonata writer agrees better with their temperaments as revealed in former concerts. Let us have Mr. Hofmann in the piece which the composer himself designates as in the grand style, in the one which tells of big numbers of people in common action, that demands a large stage whereon to unfold its tragedy. Let us, on the other hand, have Mr. Paderewski in the piece which talks of intimate social experience.

Mr. Hofmann in order to express himself completely must tell us a story of epic dimensions. He must have sparkling episode, with brave or humorous adventure. He must have a large scheme of action. But Mr. Paderewski prefers a small frame. One definite point that he can hold our attention too without a chance of distraction better suits him. Mr. Hofmann likes to appeal to the world in its organized character. Mr. Pederewski likes to get hold of each listener separately. When we are at a Hofmann concert we are always conscious of the rest of the house. At a Paderewski recital we think of only the player and ourselves.

Neither man commands all that there is in expression through piano interpretation. After they have had their turns there will be plenty left for Mr. Bauer and Mme. Carreno to say at the Symphony hall concerts. And their work by no means exhaust their principal composer, Beethoven. There will still be much opportunity for pianists in the opus 106 after Mr. Hofmann has exercised his skill in octaves on it and there will remain much opportunity in the opus 109 after Mr. Paderewski has executed its passage for double trill and has given its right and left hand melodies and harmonies contrast through his crystalline tone. But both these players coming together within one week can arouse our appreciation of the piano in a way that should make the autumn of 1913 an important time in our emotional record.

JOURNAL—

OCTOBER 20,

Melba Is Greeted by 3000 Music Lovers Who Fill Symphony Hall

NEARLY 3000 music-lovers and heroine-worshipers crowded into Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon to welcome Mme. Melba back after her absence of more than two and a half years.

Incidentally this absolute capacity audience—a record-breaking $5600 audience—witnessed the Boston debut of Edmund Burke, the Canadian barytone; of Marcel Moyse, flutist, and Gabriel Lapierre, accompanist, two newcomers from France.

Enthusiasm ruled all through the concert, for the program, on the whole, was well chosen and well performed. Not only the star of the concert, but her assistants, Mr. Burke and Mr. Moyse, were applauded until they responded to encores.

Mr. Burke, a tall, fine-looking young man with a robust, expressive voice and a sympathetic manner of singing, was happiest in the English ballads that he chose to give. His French and Italian selections were not so popular, but undoubtedly they would have been more enjoyable to the majority in the audience if the program had thrown a little light on them.

Mr. Moyse, another young stranger, played his flute solos artistically. Naturally the more brilliant ones were the most pleasing to the popular taste, just as Mme. Melba excited the greatest outburst of applause with her rather labored delivery of the blithesome, sparkling song by Bishop, "Lo! hear the gentle lark." She was at her best in less showy selections.

Mme. Melba looked handsome. So far as appearances go, time is dealing kindly with her. As when she was here in 1911, she sang with variable effectiveness. The middle register of her voice retains much of its pristine beauty, and when she does not force her upper tones they, too, still have a haunting charm. In one respect she is now more impressive than she was when her voice was matchless; she sings with new expressiveness. In former days her voice would have caressed the old tune of "Coming thro' the Rye," but yesterday there was more sentiment than silver in her singing of this ever popular ditty.

In "Depuis le jour," from Charpentier's "Louise," the famous cantatrice was as pleasing as ever, for the restrained, dreamy character of the song brought out the pearly quality of her voice. Delightful, also, in spirit and artistry, was her singing of the "Ave ia" from Verdi's "Otello." Such s as these, along with Debussy's mance" and "Mandoline," revealed remaining loveliness of her voice the increasing strength of her art.

GLAZOUNOFF SYMPHONY PLAYED

Presenting its second program of th season, the Boston Symphony orchestr Karl Muck, conductor, played to the ap plause of a full hall Friday afternoo the selections being as follows: Glazoun off, symphony in B flat, No. 5, op. 55 Grieg, overture, "Autumn"; Franck, sym phonic poem, "Daughters of Aeolus" Dvorak, overture, "The Hussites," op. 6

It was a genial task for Dr. Muck present the work of the Russian syn phonist. For although the composition not great compared with any symphon of Beethoven, with the "Spring" syr phony of Schumann or the "Pathetic" Tschaikowsky, or with the general r of the tone poems of Liszt and Strau still it has the merit of picturing fait fully the times to which it belongs. It a masterfully wrought structure and is instinct with the enthusiasms and p poses of the second half of the ni teenth century. The objection may made to it that it contains many c ventionally 20-odd [illegible]

bers are stiffly set and because they interfere with an open arrangement of floor spaces. Answer may be made that the whole edifice stands up well to the use for which it was intended and that as a piece of old-school engineering, as an example of stanchly laid-up masonry work, it holds its place unobjectionably in the city musical.

By no means does the Glazounoff fifth look foolish amidst the towering steel of modern tone-draughtsmen. Indeed it dignifies the street and cheers it up. And that is why Dr. Muck entered so genially into the leading part of his program of Friday afternoon, for he and his men are at their best when dignity and cheerfulness are the sentiments to which they give voice.

Nobility, not the pompous kind that we stand off and admire, but the kind we all intimately feel as a part of our civic and national inheritance, is the emotion that stirs us as we listen to the first movement of this symphony. We may think we have heard at the Wagnerian opera the determined main theme which violins announce and which brasses reply to; but we have never heard it say just what it says under these circumstances. For unmistakably we are in symphonic surroundings, removed a long way from drama. Here is meditation, not action. The guiding melody of Glazounoff's opus 55 has one harmonic quality, the sword motive of "Siegfried" another.

Academic music many call it; but that does not argue its grandeur of style out of it. Doubtless it is the work of a composer who found his inspiration at fashionable concerts rather than at folk gatherings. It is a professional product. The maker of it, instead of going to fundamental human sources, like a municipal pageant and a rustic dance, for his leading sentiments, went to the pages of other music writers.

Just as he studied dignity for his first movement from the orchestra of Wagner, so he studied cheerfulness for his second from the orchestra of Beethoven. And he found what he sought in Beethoven with even more certainty than he did in Wagner. He could conceivably have intended the second movement as his real message and he might pardonably have confessed in a preface that he composed the first, third and fourth movements to go with the second in order to fill out the requirements of the form of a classic symphony.

But whether the composer could have done this or not, the conductor might in good countenance admit that he put the work on the program just because of its admirable scherzo. Humorous in theme, witty in instrumentation, saucy in rhythm, this portion of the symphony brought out all that is piquant in the beat of Dr. Muck, all that is bewitching in his phrasing. The close attention with which the house is wont to prepare itself for applause began when the orchestra set into the passage for harp bells and plucked strings. Here Glazounoff gets out of the manner of his [illegible]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

[32]

SUNDAY POST, OCTOBER 19,

Sibelius' 4th Symphony

New and Strange Work from North to Be Played at Symphony Concert of This Week—Some Prominent Characteristics of Latest Symphony of a Leading Modern Composer.

The time is coming—and it is not far off—when Jean Sibelius, present head of the Finnish school of composition, will be generally recognized as one of the most original and significant composers of this period. It is thus with special interest that the Sibelius following in this city look forward to the performance of the Fourth Symphony, for the first time in Boston, at the Symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Since the Fourth Symphony was published, two years ago, its fortunes have been various. In England the reviewers were for the most part frankly antagonistic, while others were as evidently at a loss for a definite opinion after hearing for the first time a new and strange piece of music. Last season in New York, in a city that had not extended a particularly warm welcome to the new Finnish music, the symphony fared better. It was discovered that at least the composer wrote with intense conviction and clearness of purpose; that he had at his command a masterly technic and highly individual conception of harmony and orchestration. And the mood of the music made itself felt, even if there was not complete understanding or acceptance of its idioms.

The Fourth Symphony, certainly one of the most singular compositions that has come out of the North, might well puzzle even experienced musicians and sympathetic admirers of Sibelius—at least on paper.

An examination of the printed score will show this. It would take an accomplished score-reader, indeed, to "hear" with the "inner ear" as he reads this music, and it would be rash to attempt to describe the impression that the symphony will make. But in advance of the work there should be mentioned some of the most obvious features of the score.

The orchestra is rather less in its proportions than that employed by the average composer of today, lacking the tuba, asking only the ordinary proportion of "wood" and "strings," and employing, for a single exceptional demand, bells in the last movement. The four movements may be said to follow generally established forms of musical composition, but more than once in a manner that will be outrageous to some and puzzling to others. The scoring is very clear and compact. This in spite of passages of genuine complexity—a complexity not dependent upon the simultaneous employment of great numbers of instruments, but the result of logical and extremely skilful combinations of themes, harmonies, rhythms.

The musical ideas are often of a singular physiognomy, but they are simple, powerful and basic. There is no ornamentation in this symphony, any more than in earlier works of Sibelius. There is always the strength and directness of style consequent upon conviction, clear thinking and the inborn talent for great effects brought about by the smallest expenditure of material. And it is not going too far to say that in this work Sibelius is more of an impressionist than ever before, experimenting with the utmost daring and apparent mastery with mixed harmonies, clashing tonalities and instrumental "timbres," and resulting color effects; that he has here achieved a new and highly individual advance in style, whether for better or worse, remains to be heard.

Of the four movements of this symphony the first is freest in its form. There is a sombre, lowering introduction. Bold, harsh progressions for the brass lead from an opening that has hovered about from E minor through various minor keys to the key of F-sharp major. This place might be called the opening of the movement proper. The mood is gentle and melancholy. The passage leads in turn to a very curious, shifting background in counterpoint for the strings, against which various wood-wind instruments call strangely. Later there is a return to the gentle mood of the F-sharp major section, and this brief movement, the first movement of a symphony described as in "A minor," comes to an end in the lovely and pastoral key of A major.

The scherzo is not less singular, although its form is clear enough. It is wild and restless. The extraordinary juxtapositions of certain instruments and tonalities remain to be heard before the effect can be described. After a curious climax, built chiefly on two notes of one of the themes, a motive shouted repeatedly by many instruments, this movement ends softly and suddenly.

The slow movement has more sheer beauty than any of the others. It commences with dialogue of the wind instruments and the free preluding of various choirs. Then, under a shimmering accompaniment of the upper strings, the 'celli intone the real theme of the movement, a broad and noble song, almost Bruckner-like in these qualities, which, with some episodic interruptions, is repeatedly proclaimed by the orchestra and always more impressively. The movement ends mysteriously, a C-sharp held by violas and muted horns, with wood and stringed instruments echoing fragments from an earlier passage.

But of the four movements the last is, perhaps, the most brusque and fantastical. The first phrase of the theme, at once given out by the violins, is ation, and a brief motive taken from it is the predominant thought of the movement. This motive consists, first of four notes composed of a triplet and a quarter, followed by a sort of rejoinder of three quarter notes, often sounded on the bells, or stopped horns. Then there is the passage when the strings, tremolo, ascend gradually over a vibrating bass, and the flutes and oboes, practically in another key, call eerily. After the clashings of reiterated successive chords of the dominant seven and tonic of A flat, a curious chant in three-part harmony and in march-like ryhthm is developed by the woodwind.

Very curious and interesting should this effect be, although not more so than many other passages of the symphony. With a theme and an accompaniment presumably in the key of F minor, certain of the strings insist on the fifth and the tonic of G major, and this is repeated in sequence, and later in the movement. Farther on occurs a passage where the horns and woodwind instruments sustain the chord of C major in its second position, while the strings whirr up and down the scale, the bells ring exultantly and a trumpet swelling the initial tone of its figure from "P P P" to "F F F" throws out the fragment of the opening theme previously mentioned. The march-like theme is resumed and developed. The string passage with the off-key cries of the woodwind recurs, rondo fashion, and finally this remarkable movement comes to an end in a most gray and arid manner—a complaint of the oboe—the skip of a seventh—and soft despondent chords from the strings—always softer—always more gray, in the key of A minor. Very singular, at the least, very moody and introspective, is this most recent symphony of Sibelius.

FARRAR'S RECITAL

The coming of Geraldine Farrar will mean the mustering of the numerous clans of her devoted admirers at Symphony Hall, Tuesday afternoon, Oct. 28. This will be her only concert in Boston this season and aside from her appearances with the Symphony Orchestra will be the only opportunity to hear her. Here, as in New York, Miss Farrar will bear the whole burden of the concert. In the past she has always had an assistant, but this will be a song recital pure and simple. She will sing altogether 24 songs, divided into four groups, and a most attractive list it is. The programme was made largely with the valuable advice of Lilli Lehmann, who personally coached Miss Farrar in many of the songs. The programme is as follows:

"Wonnevoller Mai" ....Gluck
"La Partenza" ....Beethoven
"Mit Einem Gemalten Bande"......Beethoven
"Oh! Had I Jubal's Lyre"..........Handel
"Alleluja" ....Mozart
"Non t' Accostar all' Urna"........Schubert

"Heidenroslein" ....Schubert
"Ach! wenn ich doch ein Immchen war'"
Franz
"Der Schmetterling" ....Franz
"Gute Nacht" ....Franz
"Der Edelfalk" ....Loewe
"Walpurgisnacht" ....Loewe
"Sternlein" ....Mussorgsky
"Die Lerche" ....Rubinstein
"Sprodes Kind" ....Rubinstein
"Er Liebte Mich" ....Tschaikowsky
"Sylvelin" ....Sinding
"Zueignung" ....R. Strauss
"Paix du Soir"................Gretschaninoff
"Le Train des Amours"..................Grieg
"Ouvre tes Yeux Bleus" (request)..Massenet
"I'm Not as Other Lassies"......Hugo Wolf
"The Maiden and the Butterfly"..Chadwick

MADAME MELBA'S CONCERT

Mme. Melba has made some important changes in the programme of the concert which she is giving in Symphony Hall this afternoon at 3:30. She has taken off the mad scene from "Lucia" and put in its stead two Debussy songs, "Mandoline" and "Romance." She has taken off the Liza Lehmann number and put in its stead Bishop's "Lo, Here the Gentle Lark." Mr. Burke has made some changes in his numbers also. The revised programme of the concert is as follows:

Allegro (third sonata) ....Handel
Mr. Moyse.
Aria, "Benvenuto Cellini" ....Diaz
Mr. Burke.
Aria, "Depuis le jour," from "Louise"..
Charpentier
Mme. Melba.
Songs: (a) "When Dull Care" (old English) ....Leveridge
(b) "To Anthea" ....Hatton
Mr. Burke.
Songs: (a) "Romance" ....Debussy
(b) "Mandoline" ....Debussy
Mme. Melba.
Flute solo, "Andante et Scherzo"......Ganne
Mr. Moyse.
Arias: (b) "Addio" from "La Boheme"..
Puccini
(b) "Ave Maria" from "Othello"....Verdi
Mme. Melba.
Song, "Vague et la Cloche" ....Duparc
Mr. Burke.
Song, "Lo, Here the Gentle Lark"....Bishop
Mme. Melba.
Flute obligato, Mr. Moyse.
Songs: (a) "Come Raggio di Sol"....Caldari
(b) "Nina Nanna" ....Tirandelli
Mr. Burke.

THIRD BOSTON PROGRAMME

Dr. Muck has placed the first novelty of the season in next week's programme, which will be played on Oct. 24 and 25. This is the fourth symphony of Sibelius, described in another column. The music of Sibelius, what of it that has been played here, has created a profound impression, particularly his first and second symphonies.

The second half of the programme will be purely classical. It will comprise a concerto for two wind choirs, by Handel, three charming pieces by Gluck—"Tambourin," "Gavotte" and "Chaconne"—which were arranged by [illegible] interweavings [illegible]

Paderewski, who has begun [illegible] tour of America, will give a recital in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon Nov. 7. The principal numbers on the programme will be Beethoven's sonata in E-major, opus 109, and Schumann's "Carnaval." All accounts have it that he is playing as magnificently as ever, and his return to Boston after an absence of four and a half years will be warmly welcomed.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY

Fritz Kreisler, the eminent violinist, will make his first appearance of the season in Boston in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, Nov. 2, at 3:30 as soloist with the Philharmonic Society of New York. He will play Bruch minor concerto. The principal item on the programme of the orchestra will be the fifth symphony of Tschaikowsky. Tickets for this concert will go on sale at Symphony Hall next Friday, Oct. 24.

MAY KEON'S CONCERT

The programme of May Keon's concert in Steinert Hall, on the 21st of the month, when Miss Keon will be assisted by Andrea de Segurola, George Harris and Virginio Capelloni, will include the following songs and operatic excerpts: "Vissi d'Arte," from Puccini's "La Tosca"; Micaela's romanza from third act of "Carmen," "Ah, fors è lui," and "Che l'anima," from "La Traviata," sung by Miss Keon; duet from the first act of "La Boheme," sung by Miss Keon and Mr. Harris; tenor aria from third act of Massenet's "Werther"; "An einem Bach," Grieg; "Fussreise," Hugo Wolf; "Song of the Nile," Courtland Palmer; "When Celia Sings," Moir, sung by Mr. Harris. Mr. Capelloni's numbers will soon be announced. They will complete a well-arranged programme.

HOFMANN'S RECITAL

Josef Hofmann, the most admired of the younger pianists, will give his only recital in Boston in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon, Oct. 26. Mr. Hofmann is in America for a comparatively brief stay; that is to say, while he will be here until the late winter he plans to spend the most of his time on his estate in North Carolina, and is not going to give very many concerts. His last recital here was one of the most successful of the season, and it was sufficient to establish him firmly in the favor of the public.

He has arranged a programme of very great interest, especially the last group, which will be devoted to Russian composers. Hofmann is very popular in Russia. Last season he spent the greater part of the winter in that country, and gave 10 recitals in St. Petersburg alone. Such unfamiliar names as Dvorsky and Scriabine appear in this group. The programme in its entirety is as follows:

Variations ....Handel
Bagatellen, E flat major; G major.......
Beethoven
Two nocturnes ....Chopin
Two mazurkas ....Chopin
Two waltzes ....Chopin
Sonate ....Liszt
Prelude, A-minor; D minor....Rachmaninoff
Polichinelle ....Dvorsky
Barcarolle ....Dvorsky
Poeme ....Scriabine
Etude, D sharp minor..............Scriabine

MONITOR,

OCTOBER 18,

PIANO muisc will make a high b this season for the interest the popular audience that patro ize the Symphony hall concert offering at the outset two of its grea est interpreters in Ignace Paderewsl and Josef Hofmann. Later in the sea son it will seek to win the public ear i the work of Harold Bauer and Mme. Te resa Carreno.

Through these players, four distinc styles of performance, four characteris tic ways of looking at art, four plainl differentiated studies of life will enric the experience of Boston listeners. Bu individual though the visitors are, they are all moderate in their interpretive views. The most progressive of them is unquestionably Mr. Bauer, but even he is more of an adjuster of new schools of expression to old than an essential innovator. Mme. Carreno is doubtless the most unwilling of the four to yield to modern tendencies, and next to her comes Mr. Paderewski.

Thus, putting radicalism at the top of the scale and conservatism at the bottom, Mr. Bauer sounds the highest note and Mme. Carreno the lowest, but all of them are within the middle register, in the comfortable, easily-understood range of sentiment where applause and popularity are found. And so we may say of the audience that enjoys their playing, that it accepts inherited artistic dividends, it clips the coupons of a nineteenth century investment, it lives on an esthetic system which listeners of the past 50 years have built up. Such an audience cannot claim, as can the one that enjoys the playing of a radical like Ferrucio Busoni, to be venturing capital for the pleasure of its musical descendants.

Qualities Indicated

Contemplating the two artists who are to appear first, Mr. Hofmann and Mr. Paderewski, we find individual qualities strikingly indicated in the leading numbers of their programs. Each is to present a sonata of the late period of Beethoven, Mr. Hofmann the long and impressive twenty-[illegible] and Mr. Pade

Of course these renowned players might easily be be imagined as exchanging roles. Mr. Hofmann could conceivably present himself as interpreter of the variations of the thirtieth sonata, the F major, with their sudden shifts of mood, with their delicate comedy, their romantic glow. Mr. Paderewski could be imagined mounting a warhouse and leading the tonal squadrons that Beethoven marshals for him in the twenty-ninth, the B flat major. But the choice which the two men have made from the works of the master sonata writer agrees better with their temperaments as revealed in former concerts. Let us have Mr. Hofmann in the piece which the composer himself designates as in the grand style, in the one which tells of big numbers of people in common action, that demands a large stage whereon to unfold its tragedy. Let us, on the other hand, have Mr. Paderewski in the piece which talks of intimate social experience.

Mr. Hofmann in order to express himself completely must tell us a story of epic dimensions. He must have sparkling episode, with brave or humorous adventure. He must have a large scheme of action. But Mr. Paderewski prefers a small frame. One definite point that he can hold our attention too without a chance of distraction better suits him. Mr. Hofmann likes to appeal to the world in its organized character. Mr. Pederewski likes to get hold of each listener separately. When we are at a Hofmann concert we are always conscious of the rest of the house. At a Paderewski recital we think of only the player and ourselves.

Neither man commands all that there is in expression through piano interpretation. After they have had their turns there will be plenty left for Mr. Bauer and Mme. Carreño to say at the Symphony hall concerts. And their work by no means exhaust their principal composer, Beethoven. There will still be much opportunity for pianists in the opus 106 after Mr. Hofmann has exercised his skill in octaves on it and there remain much opportunity in the 109 after Mr. Paderewski has ex- d its passage for double trill and given its right and left hand melo- and harmonies contrast through his lline tone. But both these players g together within one week can our appreciation of the piano in that should make the autumn of important time in our emotional

---

C JOURNAL— OCTOBER 20,

Melba Is Greeted by 3000 Music Lovers Who Fill Symphony Hall

NEARLY 3000 music-lovers and heroine-worshipers crowded into Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon to welcome Mme. Melba back after her absence of more than two and a half years.

Incidentally this absolute capacity audience—a record-breaking $5600 audience—witnessed the Boston debut of Edmund Burke, the Canadian barytone; of Marcel Moyse, flutist, and Gabriel Lapierre, accompanist, two newcomers from France.

Enthusiasm ruled all through the concert, for the program, on the whole, was well chosen and well performed. Not only the star of the concert, but her assistants, Mr. Burke and Mr. Moyse, were applauded until they responded to encores.

Mr. Burke, a tall, fine-looking young man with a robust, expressive voice and a sympathetic manner of singing, was happiest in the English ballads that he chose to give. His French and Italian selections were not so popular, but undoubtedly they would have been more enjoyable to the majority in the audience if the program had thrown a little light on them.

Mr. Moyse, another young stranger, played his flute solos artistically. Naturally the more brilliant ones were the most pleasing to the popular taste, just as Mme. Melba excited the greatest outburst of applause with her rather labored delivery of the blithesome, sparkling song by Bishop, "Lo! hear the gentle lark." She was at her best in less showy selections.

Mme. Melba looked handsome. So far as appearances go, time is dealing kindly with her. As when she was here in 1911, she sang with variable effectiveness. The middle register of her voice retains much of its pristine beauty, and when she does not force her upper tones they, too, still have a haunting charm. In one respect she is now more impressive than she was when her voice was matchless; she sings with new expressiveness. In former days her voice would have caressed the old tune of "Coming thro' the Rye," but yesterday there was more sentiment than silver in her singing of this ever popular ditty.

In "Depuis le jour," from Charpentier's "Louise," the famous cantatrice was as pleasing as ever, for the restrained, dreamy character of the song brought out the pearly quality of her voice. Delightful, also, in spirit and artistry, was her singing of the "Ave ia" from Verdi's "Otello." Such s as these, along with Debussy's mance" and "Mandoline," revealed remaining loveliness of her voice the increasing strength of her art.

GLAZOUNOFF SYMPHONY PLAYED

Presenting its second program of th season, the Boston Symphony orchestra Karl Muck, conductor, played to the ap plause of a full hall Friday afternoon the selections being as follows: Glazoun off, symphony in B flat, No. 5, op. 55 Grieg, overture, "Autumn"; Franck, sym phonic poem, "Daughters of Aeolus" Dvorak, overture, "The Hussites," op. 6

It was a genial task for Dr. Muck present the work of the Russian syn phonist. For although the composition not great compared with any symphon of Beethoven, with the "Spring" syn phony of Schumann or the "Pathetic" Tschaikowsky, or with the general r of the tone poems of Liszt and Strau still it has the merit of picturing fait fully the times to which it belongs. It a masterfully wrought structure and is instinct with the enthusiasms and p poses of the second half of the ni teenth century. The objection may made to it that it contains many c ventionalis[illegible] 20-odd [illegible]

bers are stiffly set and because they interfere with an open arrangement of floor spaces. Answer may be made that the whole edifice stands up well to the use for which it was intended and that as a piece of old-school engineering, as an example of stanchly laid-up masonry work, it holds its place unobjectionably in the city musical.

By no means does the Glazounoff fifth look foolish amidst the towering steel of modern tone-draughtsmen. Indeed it dignifies the street and cheers it up. And that is why Dr. Muck entered so genially into the leading part of his program of Friday afternoon, for he and his men are at their best when dignity and cheerfulness are the sentiments to which they give voice.

Nobility, not the pompous kind that we stand off and admire, but the kind we all intimately feel as a part of our civic and national inheritance, is the emotion that stirs us as we listen to the first movement of this symphony. We may think we have heard at the Wagnerian opera the determined main theme which violins announce and which brasses reply to; but we have never heard it say just what it says under these circumstances. For unmistakably we are in symphonic surroundings, removed a long way from drama. Here is meditation, not action. The guiding melody of Glazounoff's opus 55 has one harmonic quality, the sword motive of "Siegfried" another.

Academic music many call it; but that does not argue its grandeur of style out of it. Doubtless it is the work of a composer who found his inspiration at fashionable concerts rather than at folk gatherings. It is a professional product. The maker of it, instead of going to fundamental human sources, like a municipal pageant and a rustic dance, for his leading sentiments, went to the pages of other music writers.

Just as he studied dignity for his first movement from the orchestra of Wagner, so he studied cheerfulness for his second from the orchestra of Beethoven. And he found what he sought in Beethoven with even more certainty than he did in Wagner. He could conceivably have intended the second movement as his real message and he might pardonably have confessed in a preface that he composed the first, third and fourth movements to go with the second in order to fill out the requirements of the form of a classic symphony.

But whether the composer could have done this or not, the conductor might in good countenance admit that he put the work on the program just because of its admirable scherzo. Humorous in theme, witty in instrumentation, saucy in rhythm, this portion of the symphony brought out all that is piquant in the beat of Dr. Muck, all that is bewitching in his phrasing. The close attention with which the house is wont to prepare itself for applause began when the orchestra set into the passage for harp bells and plucked strings. Here Glazounoff gets out of the [illegible] in which the Russian orchestral novelist wrote.

In the third movement Glazounoff returns to the respectable methods of the first, giving a professionally proper treatment to his romantic and sentimental song theme. Dr. Muck phrased the repetitions of the melody with Teutonic earnestness, and his French wood-wind players entered into the tone color ideas of the composer with the ardor of true Russophiles. In the last movement, toward the end of it, the symphonist gets back into the inspiration of his scherzo, and he sets forth some strong pages of instrumentation which almost makes us regret that the work must go back to the shelf for another lustrum. Most of the music might have been composed in Berlin as well as in St. Petersburg, but not the outburst of tone with which Glazounoff says his farewell. That is a genuine moment of national eloquence.

And from this point onward in the concert nationalism was turned loose. Russian in the final word of Glazounoff, it became Norwegian in the "Autumn" overture, French in the symphonic poem and Bohemian in the Hussite hymn, with all the meaning that composers belonging to the decades just past knew how to put into the word. Handsomely wrought tapestries Grieg, Franck and Dvorak made of these small works. Such pieces are sure of their places in the repertory because of the clearness of their descriptive purpose, their perfect adaptation of pattern to space and their faultless blending and contrast of colors.

HERALD, SATURDAY,

OCTOBER 18, 1913.

GLAZOUNOFF HAS CHANGED

When He Was Young He Composed with Individuality—Now Is Decorative.

HIS 5TH SYMPHONY HEARD

Franck's Exquisite "Aeolidae" Given at Second Public Rehearsal.

By PHILIP HALE.

The second public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony, B flat major, No. 5........ Glazounoff
Overture, "In Autumn"..............Grieg
Symphonic poem, "The Aeolidae"..Franck
Dramatic overture, "Husitska".....Dvorak

Alexander Glazounoff was a young man of unusual promise. He is now in his 48th year and this promise has not been fulfilled. We have heard one of his compositions that revealed what he might have been: the symphonic poem "Stenka Razine." It was not well played in Chickering Hall nearly 10 years ago, yet the wild, barbaric music with passages of singular beauty and gorgeous coloring made an impression that still remains. If this music is at times crude in workmanship, a pardonably youthful failing, when there is a show of imagination, it possesses the ine quality of youth, enthusiasm. There s the melancholy song of the bargemen on the Volga; there is the savage theme that typifies the savage hero; there is the enchanting oriental melody that pictures the captive Persian Princess; and in this music there is the constant flow of the Volga; the mighty river is personified.

"Stenka Razine," written in memory Borodin, who died in 1887, was a thful work. No doubt, Glazounoff regrets it and blushes at the recoltion of his imprudence. He would not easily agree to the statement of con that "there is no excellent beauty at hath not some strangeness in the oportion." For many years he has itten formal, sonorous compositions. the Kremlin, which he chose for sical expression, did not lift him ove empty routine. He has composed e after page of decorative music, phonies, ballets, overtures, concertos the utmost glibness. He is a Rus professor and the great majority is later compositions might bear the "Made in Germany."

ke this fifth symphony, which by of superficial and obvious qualiand the excellence of the perance, evidently pleased the large ice. Glazounoff is here as elsere a master of his trade: The workship is solid; there are no rough s; the corners are carefully pol; there is technical dexterity; the zo has the piquancy that we exof a modern scherzo; but only n ast movement is there a sugges of the Russian character.

the most part the themes are comlace and in the first movement they stand excessive repetition in the ent. The Andante is the weakest four movements; it is sonorous entalism. And Glazounoff has of euphony; even his most platistatements are plausible, as soul

---

The musical feature of the program was Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, inspired by verses of Leconte de Lisle. It is not to be ranked with Franck's symphony, the string quartet, piano quintet, violin sonata and the chorals for organ; but "The Aeolidae" displays an exquisite fancy and a most skilful employment of a short generative theme, a theme that is like unto Leconte de Lisle's opening line: "O floating breezes of the skies." There is no foolish attempt at a literal translation into music of the poem which is stuffed with geographical and mythological allusions. There is a poetic impression made on a sensitive musician by a poet whose body was in France while his soul wandered delighted in ancient Greece and venerable India. Nor is there any thought of the composer's labor in the infinite variation of the chief phrase—the music comes and rises and dies as the "sweet breaths of the fair spring that caress the hills and plains with freakish kisses."

Grieg's overture should be put away. Let us remember him by songs and piano pieces, cameos and miniatures, by the music for Anitra's dance, and certain pages of the piano concerto. "In Autumn" is based on one of his songs. Let the song itself be sung; the overture is episodic, disjointed, badly orchestrated and often ineffectively ugly.

Dvorak's overture was written for an occasion, and he thought it his duty to celebrate the wars of the Hussites by using a phrase of a Hussite hymn and composing battle music. It should be arranged for a brass band, if this has not already been done, and then played out of doors. The Hussites were, indeed, terrible fellows, unwholesome companions in a concert hall.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Sibelius, Symphony No. 4 (first time here), Handel, Concerto for strings and two wind choirs; Gluck—Gevaert, Tambourin, Gavotte and Chaconne; Haydn, Symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 2.)

BOSTON GLOBE—

OCTOBER 18.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Glazounoff's Fifth Is Chief Number.

Other Pieces by Grieg, Cesar Franck and Dvorak

The program of the second orchestra rehearsal was as follows: Dr Muck conducted.

Glazounoff......Symphony No. 5, B flat major
Grieg ....Overture, "In Autumn"
Franck......Symphonic poem, "The Aeolidae" Dvorak ....Overture, "Husitska"

Glazounoff's predisposition as a composer and his intent were strangely opposed one to the other. Notwithstanding his later allegiance to classical form, his imagination was pictorial and answered to life as his inspiration. He needed the impetus of a scene: personage, event, to enkindle an originality within him, which, if not always of high distinction, often had spontaneity and a glow and variety of color.

When he remembered the ballet or, in his tone poems, bethought him, for example of Stenka Razine, the Cossack rebel and outlaw who added to the terrors of the 17th century, or when he pondered upon that grim and historic citadel at Moscow known as the Kremlin and heard its bells, he recalled Moussorgsky at times in his pictorial realism, although he far surpassed his predecessor in technic and polish of style.

His success in symphonic was more variable. Despite his alleged devotion to Brahms and to the "absolute form" in the seven symphonies, the sustained loftiness, seriousness and vital concreteness of thought is not there. It is music of the surface, decorative, facile, usually graceful and in good taste, reflective of a complacent and well-groomed prosperity, even as Glazounoff himself yas favored in life by pleasant and gracious fortune. He knew neither the deep and goading melancholy of his friend Tschaikowsky nor the cosmopolitanism which Rimsky-Korsakoff, as a young Naval officer, had acquired in his world journeys.

There are moments in this symphony, as in the exclamatory passage of chords for trombones and tuba in the third movement, which is impressively echoed in horns and bassoons, when the composer seems about to drop his pleasantries and commonplaces and expose a deeper, more serious mood, but the temptation passes and he remains noncommittal of more than the obvious.

The themes themselves are not of striking character. They reflect Glazounoff's usual fluency in the writing of melody, but a fluency that leaves the conclusion of a phrase or figure with little that convinces the ear or haunts the memory.

His allusions to Wagner's "sword" motive and the opening phrase of Radame's air, "Celeste Aida," are not difficult to identify. More apparent than these is the quotation from "Il Trovatore" in the second theme of the first movement, where flute and clarinet give out an even dozen of notes wholly identical in interval and rhythm with as many in the furious octave passage heard early in the overture to Verdi's opera.

Dr Muck gave a performance of the symphony that would have given charm and even significance to far more mediocre music than this. The superb proportion in the approach and treatment of climaxes, the vivid contrasts, the variety and plasticity of nuance, and beside these, the searching and electrifying sense of rhythm and accentuation that not only kept the last movement from vulgarity, but made it a song of triumph. The scherzo, which is as tenuous in ideas as at times it is in tones, was played with the utmost grace and imagination. The opening figure as done by the vertuosi of the wood wind choir was as light as the dancing of butterflies.

In his aim at clearness Glazounoff fell into repetition in his treatment of themes. He could have noted to his advantage the variety and elasticity with which Grieg molded his. The sketch of Autumn shows delightful freshness in of ideas. It not put

---

Cesar Frank's poem to the daughte of the ruler of the winds has a class serenity and beauty in its freedom form. A clear radiance illumines eac page. How abrupt the contrast Dvorak's bombastic overture, whic even the recreating performance it r ceived yesterday could not save.

The program next week, the fourt symphony of Sibelius, will be playe for the first time in Boston, and with a concerto for two wind choirs by Handel, three dances by Gluck and a symphony in D major by Haydn.

JOURNAL—

OCTOBER 18, 191

BRILLIANCY MARKS SYMPHONY CONCERT

Brief Program Includes Numbers Outside of "Familiar" Class.

By E. F. Harkins

With the exception of Dvorak's "Husitska" overture, the numbers on this week's Symphony program are outside of the "familiar" class. This exceptionally interesting program, representing Modern Russian, Norwegian, French and Bohemian music, could hardly be shorter and contain a symphony, for it runs less than an hour and a half; but if there is brevity, there is also much brilliancy.

Dr. Muck has given the place of honor to Glazounoff's fifth symphony, a generaly melodious and richly colored work, introduced here seven years ago by Dr. Muck himself. Many music-lovers prefer the romantic Russian's sixth symphony, which has not been played at these concerts for more than a decade; but the fifth has many admirers, nevertheless, especially because of the individuality and the splendor o much of the orchestration. Best o all, it is work that, under a magneti baton like Dr. Muck's, brings out th peculiar brilliancy of the Symphon Orchestra.

Yesterday afternoon the second movement, a scherzo suggesting a ballet and the third movement, an andante i the style of a romance, were particularly enjoyed by the audience.

Grieg's "In Autumn" overture, which followed, was added to the repertoire of the Boston orchestra by Dr. Muck in 1907. Like the Glazounoff work, it is dramatic as well as tuneful. This number, too, had a brilliant performance. Then came the ethereal beauties of Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Aeolidae," last heard here in 1902, to which Dr. Muck gave a poetical reading; and the matinee closed impressively with a spirited performance of the dramatic overture, "Husitska," which Dvorak composed for the dedication of the Bohemian Theater in Prague twenty years ago.

The same program will be given again tonight.

Next week Dr. Muck will present the first novelty of the season, the fourth symphony by Sibelius, the famous Finnish composer, which was first heard of last year. Haydn's second symphony, the Handel concerto for wind choir, and three dance pieces by Gluck will complete the program.

THE EVENING TIMES

PAWTUCKET, R. I.,

OCTOBER 22, 1913.

SYMPHONY CONCERT SEASON IS OPENED

Mme. Gadski is Soloist at First of Series in Infantry Hall.

Returning to Providence to open its 33d concert season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, and Mme. Johanna Gadski, soloist, was greeted last evening by an audience that tested the seating capacity of Infantry Hall, Providence. Providence and Pawtucket musicians and music lovers who rarely miss a Symphony concert, with hundreds of others who make it a particular point to be present at the opening of a season, combined to make an inspiring assemblage, well calculated to bring out the best efforts of the Symphony players if any outside influence were needed by this remarkable company.

It was a happy opening of the musical season—for the first Symphony concert is and must be accepted as the season's opening. After days and days of dreary drizzle or torrential downpour the night was cool and clear, a most enjoyable condition for the first concert. The programme, including a most popular Beethoven symphony and solo numbers by one of the most charming and undoubtedly one of the greatest dramatic sopranos of the time, was happily chosen. What more could be desired by the most captious of musical enthusiasts?

The programme follows:

Beethoven..Symphony in A major, No. op. 92.

Poco sostenuto, Vivace.
2. Allegretto.
3. Presto; Presto meno assai.
4. Allegro con brio.

Weber..Scene and aria "Ocean! Thou Mighty Monster," from "Oberon" (act 3, No. 13.)
Franck..Symphonic poem, "Les Eolides." ("The Aeolidae.")
Wagner..Three poems, "Im Treibhaus," "Traume," "Schmerzen."
Grieg ...."Im Herbst" ("In Autumn"), op. 11

Many beautiful things have been said and written of the Beethoven Seventh, undoubtedly one of the most charming symphonies ever written. It is 100 years old, first played on Dec. 8, 1813, and a century of change in the world of music has made no change in the power of this piece, nor has its hold on the lover of music loosened. The charm of its melodic beauty, so compellingly portrayed in the opening movement, is carried through to the stormy finish without halt or faltering. It is a wonderful work, and played by a wonderful body of players such as the Boston Symphony Orchestra it made a most profound impression on the audience. Dr. Muck and his players were greeted with round after round of applause at the close of the symphony, and the conductor was obliged to return to the desk several times and bow his acknowledgments.

The other two orchestral numbers were undoubtedly dwarfed by the symphony, but they were splendidly played, particularly the familiar Grieg overture, "Im Herbst," which closed the concert.

Mme. Gadski, dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Orchestra, made her second visit to Providence in two years, and it is a cause for profound thankfulness to know that she is to come again in a few weeks. It is not only the splendid art of this woman, her powerfully colorful soprano tones or her undoubted dramatic ability that captivates. She has a personal charm entirely outside and above her individuality as an artist, a compelling unobtrusiveness which attracts and would go far to sustain the popularity of an artist with less ability than this gifted singer. Her rendition of the great Oberon aria, "Ocean! Thou Mighty Monster," was a splendid performance which was equalled by her singing of the three Wagner songs on her second appearance. Mme. Gadski, it is pleasing to note, is to sing in the Steinert course of concerts, and no doubt she will at that time repeat her triumph of last evening, when she was recalled several times.

The next Symphony concert will be given Tuesday evening, Nov. 18, and Miss Ruth Deyo, pianist, will be the soloist. There will be six concerts this season, one more than last year.

BOSTON POST,

OCTOBER 18,

OLD FRIENDS AT SYMPHONY

Glazounoff, Grieg and Dvorak on Programme

Glazounoff's Symphony No. 5, which has not been heard here since Dr. Muck introduced it to Boston in 1906, was the first number of the programme given at the second public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon.

The other numbers were: Grieg's overture, "Im Herbst"; Franck's symphononic poem, "Les Eolides," and Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitka."

Glazounoff's symphony is unfamiliar to many American music-lovers, and there were doubtless many in the audience yesterday afternoon who heard it for the first time. It was first produced in St. Petersburg in 1896, and it was 10 years later when patrons of the symphony concerts in Boston were given their first opportunity to hear it.

Two Reminiscences

The first theme which has been likened to the sword movement in the "Ring" is announced by bassoon and violoncellos, while the clarinets sustain chords. The second theme is developed to a mighty fortissimo, and the final movement begins at once with the full orchestra with a martial theme. The third movement is one of the most beautiful. Here, the chief and expressive theme bears a marked resemblance to the opening measures of Radames' famous air "Celeste Aida."

Grieg's beautiful overture "In Autumn" was received with marked favor. Here again, Dr. Muck, while adhering to his policy of giving the preference to the old favorites rather than extensively advertised novelties, repeated an overture that was introduced by him in Boston April 20, 1897.

Franck Uses Chromatic Idea

In marked contrast to the third number on the programme, Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," which is free in form, with the chief theme a short chromatic phrase, from which other melodic phrases are derived, was the closing number, Dvorak's dramatic overture "Husitka."

This overture, with its stirring battle cry, was written by Dvorak to celebrate in music the wars of the Hessians. The theme is solemn, defiant and of almost fanatical spirit, with the war cry ringing through all the passages.

Solemn Opening

The overture, which was beautifully played yesterday, begins with a theme, solemn in its tone, played by wo wind instruments with horns add later. The melody is played by t English horn and is later augment by the flute and clarinet, with the fu orchestra heard in its later movements.

---

An agitated first theme, played by the violas, begins the main body o the overture. The movement is the taken up by the violins, and later e ergetically developed by the wood-win instruments. A subsidiary theme wi the dominant note a war-tone, is ploye by the brass. The solemn theme of t introduction returns at the end.

TRAVELER

OCTOBER 18, 1913.

RUSSIAN WORK CONCERT FEATURE

Dr. Muck and Orchestra Impart Interest to Familiar Compositions.

By FRANK BERTWALL

One came away from the second public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon with the feeling that Dr. Muck and his players had by their skill imparted interest to compositions that in themselves were not of the first order. True there was Glazounoff's fifth symphony, ever interesting, but falling short of being a grand symphony, and yet as played yesterday afternoon holding the closest attention and arousing noticeable enthusiasm. It's Russian music that could well smack considerably more of the Russian school with profit.

The Grieg "In Autumn" overture evidently depicts another season than what New England knows as the finest part of the year. Dvorak's "Husitska" overture gains nothing on rehearsing.

THIRD SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Dr. Muck has placed the first novelty of the season in next week's program, which will be played Oct. 24 and 25. This is the fourth symphony of the Finnish composer, Sibelius. The music of Sibelius, what of it has been played here, has created a profound impression, particularly his first and second symphonies. His third symphony, never played in Boston, was generally admitted a failure. This fourth symphony, which has had its first performance abroad within a year and a half, is said to show a wide divergence from his former style.

The second half of the program will be purely classical. It will comprise a concerto for two wind choirs by Handel, three pieces by Gluck—Tambourin, Gavotte and Chaconne, which were arranged by the Belgian Geveart—and, finally, Haydn's Symphony in D major No. 2.

TRANSCRIPT,

OCTOBER 18,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

GLAZOUNOFF'S POMPS AND FRANCK'S FANCIES

Between Whiles, Dvorak and Grieg—The Russian's Empty Symphony—Two Contrasting Overtures—Franck's Tone-Poem of the Bodiless Breezes

WHAT a pity that Dr. Muck did not put Liszt's tone-poem, "The Preludes" on the programme for the second pair of Symphony Concerts, instead of the first! A week ago Liszt had, perforce, to keep company with Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner. Yesterday he would have had no more than Glazounoff, Grieg, Franck and Dvoràk beside him. Last Saturday some were saying in their haste that "The Preludes" was only glow and glitter, sonority and show. Instrumental, harmonic, even melodic rhetoric filled the music, but beyond that Liszt had taken no grave thought and experienced no deep emotion. His imagination lay all on the surface; it worked only in effects. So to some seemed romantic, sensuous, striving Liszt in the company of Beethoven and Brahms, while he could no more than hold up his head against the Wagner of the overture to "The Flying Dutchman"—a Wagner, by the way, who had not yet discovered how many happy inventions he could borrow from his prospective father-in-law.

Per contra set the Liszt of "The Preludes" or of any of his surviving orchestral music beside the Glazounoff of the symphony in B-flat that began the concert yesterday and in the comparison his shortcomings become almost virtues beside the greater and often similar shortcomings of the Russian. Glazounoff's symphony is "absolute" music. No programme explains its substance and its course; no hint of any suggestion from without accompanies it. None the less it might have been written with deep and ardent emotion releasing its voice in the tones. From the first measures of the introduction to the last measures of the finale there is hardly a hint of such feeling. Glazounoff is songful and melancholy through the slow movement, as countless composers have been and countless will be in that division of a symphony. Glazounoff imagines his scherzo lightly and fantastically. To do so is the prescription for scherzi in a contemporary symphony. The finale is sonorous, tumultuous, vigorously rhythmed and colored—all in the expected and becoming Russian way. The first movement makes play with contrasts of timbres and tonal masses, with orotund or suave progressions.

Throughout the symphony the melodies are transparent, but not one of them arrests the ear or the imagination. Glazounoff manipulates them harmonically, instrumentally and rhythmically [illegible] many process is [illegible] hand played over and over again; but neither head nor heart [illegible] it. Some of the strokes are wholly conventional, like the songful horns at the beginning of the slow movement. Some of them are ingeniously fanciful, like the liquid tones of the scherzo and the recurring flicker and flutter of light phrases in them. Some of them are only stout music-making like the pompous sonorities of the brass choir in the first allegro. Some yet again are only empty sound and fury like the reiterated tumults of the finale. It is an old saying that a symphony should be a "musical action," in the play and the interplay—the battle even—of its melodies and the thought and emotion behind. Glazounoff makes an insistent show of such action, but neither in the music nor in the listening imagination does anything ever happen.

Instead, Glazounoff outpours his tonal pomp as though he were a master of musical ceremonies; makes play with his harmonies and progressions as though he were a master of tonal revels; and luxuriates in his instrumental colors as though he were hanging tapestries for all this show. But first, last and all the time it is show and little else. Perhaps the symphony deserved to be taken from the shelves as a "vehicle" for the tonal magnificence and brilliance of the orchestra; but there are other and better media for those glories. Anyhow Glazounoff owed much to the orchestra and the conductor. Time and again they persuaded the listeners that there were more than pomps and fancies of sound in the symphony, as no doubt Glazounoff, when he was writing it, believed himself. The Liszt of "The Preludes" had weighty thoughts and deep emotions beside the Russian. He also imagined as well as repeated.

The Dvoràk of the "Husitzkà Overture," at the other end of the concert, wrote at least with kindled emotion. The devotion, the exaltation, the battles, the hymns, the sufferings of the Hussites thrilled him. They were bone of his bone, flesh of his flesh and his Bohemia was also theirs. So enkindled and commanding the speech of music, he found tones in which to express the emotions of the Hussites and his own as he contemplated them. Being rich in harmonic and instrumental resource he made these tones an ample and deep-hued vesture. Stirred emotion summoned eloquence and power. The "Husitzka Overture" is no masterpiece, but it seemed almost such in the puissant and expanding voice that Dr. Muck gave to it, with his mastery of the long progression and the sweeping climax. It seemed yet more a masterpiece in contrast with the empty pomps and the fictitious brilliance of Glazounoff's symphony. Dvoràk's overture is orotund enough; but emotion makes the oratory eloquence. Dvoràk's music glows brightly or darkly, expands, gathers, cumulates, recedes, according to the imaginings behind. Very seldom is it merely manipulated. And Hussite hymns or no hymns Dvoràk's could invent melodies that quicken responsive feeling.

Moreover, what Dvoràk would say in tones in these years of his prime, he could say freely and fully. In contrast, the moment in which Grieg attempts to use the larger forms and resources of music, then does a sense of his helplessness with them begin to steal upon the hearer. Time and again in the course of the overture, "In Autumn," that Dr. Muck first made known in Boston and rediscovered yesterday, ten or twenty or fifty measures quicken the ear and stir the answering fancy. They bear the wistful voice of Norwegian folk-song; or they move in pungent harmonies to sharp-set rhythms; or some clear and stirring mood plays through them. Then the mood dwindles; the harmonies lose their tang, the rhythms their zest; the melodies wither in dry pale phrases. Invention, imagination, even manipulation halt before a form that is too big and too exacting for Grieg to fill. The music goes in gasps. He becomes almost inarticulate. Then up spring melodies, harmonies, rhythms and mood again, and Grieg is sufficient and more to his task. In turn breath fails him and so on in the fitfulness that is half the charm of his pieces in the smaller forms but that leaves him nervously helpless when he essays the larger. Not until he leads in his sturdy folk-tune does he go forward with a sure hand. Grieg is a water-colorist in tones and in the overture he is trying to make a fresco of autumn. Grieg's imagination and the tones in which he released it almost always flutter—unless he braces himself nervously to a momentary show of force—and a concert overture asks sustained flight. His own song, from which he drew the overture excels it. Grieg could be safely short-breathed, fitful and moody there.

Into the concert, between the reverberating emptiness of Glazounoff, the eloquence of Dvoràk and the restless strivings of Grieg, crept the finely imaginative, the finely expressive, the delicately and subtly attuned Franck of the symphonic poem, "The Daughters of Æolus." It is the custom to say that music is not half itself until it is heard in actual performance, and yet on the engraved page this music of Franck seemed more lovely and fanciful than it did as Dr. Muck and the orchestra gave it, so to say, speaking voice. And through no fault of theirs. Read, these phrases of Franck often seem as zephyr-like as the breezes that were Æolus's daughters. They twine and intertwine like those breezes in the lightest play. They touch the ear of the imagination as tenderly and flittingly as they touched youth and maiden, leaf and flower in the poetry of Leconte de Lisle that was the spark to Franck's fancy. The harmonic and the instrumental shadings are the soft iridescent, quivering light in which these airs should blow. Read, the symphonic poem seems the very lightest tracery of imagination and of tones. Even when the phrases coalesce and the breezes are winds, the tones have only a little deepened.

Yet a big orchestra must play "The Daughters of Æolus" in a big hall before a big audience. Even when the conductor is Dr. Muck and the orchestra the Boston Symphony Orchestra there is no subduing it to the gossamer lightness of some of Franck's phrases, and no making his interweavings seem as whispers interlaced [illegible]. Besides, it is the fashion nowadays to give Franck's [illegible] body as is possible. We that listen must understand that he was man as well as mystic; that he could be largely eloquent as well as exquisitely fanciful. He must speak out, even where his music seems only to whisper. Out of the diaphanous world of his imagination in "The Daughters Æolus" he was writing for the ears of an actual world that he must persuade to his music. Yet even that music seems sometimes too stout-bodied for the fancies, the motions, the images it would bear. The breezes are bodiless; light is bodiless; bodiless almost was Franck's imagining of the touch of these breezes and the play of this light. But music must have form and body or else be not music that men can hear. The choir of Ariel in "The Tempest" that filled the isle with strange and lovely sounds, with the voices of the air, ought to be the orchestra since all things are possible to such beings—for Franck's tone-poem.

H. T. P.

ADVERTISER,

OCTOBER 18,

SECOND CONCERT IN SYMPHONY SERIES

AGAIN A PURELY ORCHESTRAL PROGRAMME

Intellectual Flavor to Week's Offering Given by Franck's Symphonic Poem,

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Glazounoff. Symphony in B-flat. No. 5.
Grieg. Overture "In Autumn."
Franck. Symphonic Poem. "Les Eolides."
Dvorak. "Husitska" overture.

Again a purely orchestral programme without a soloist. And like the programme of a week ago it gave a display of the moderate moderns, composers of our time who have not tried to evolve Cubist music, but have held to form, coherency and melody.

Dr. Muck was the first to introduce Glazounoff's fifth symphony to Boston during his previous regime. It has several of the characteristics of the true Russian school. Powerful orchestration, folk music effects, some touches of ferocious hilarity, and melody too. It belongs to the best modern school.

In the introduction there is a foreshadowing of the resolute chief theme, and this study theme with its heavy unison passage is impressively worked up in the first movement, and also well-contrasted with the beginning of the subordinate theme on the wood-wind. The two themes are strongly developed, sometimes perhaps with a little too much of fortissimo brass, but interestingly nevertheless.

But the popular movement is the Scherzo. The wood-wind has plenty to do here, and flutes and clarinettes deserve praise for the manner in which it was done. There is a march movement here which is about as popular in style as anything that we have had in symphony since Raff. It is sugared up with tinklings on the Glockenspiel (tiny bars of steel struck with a mallet), and is as rhythmic as if it had been made by Sousa himself. Naturally this pleasant-tasting number was much applauded. It was, however, somewhat too sweet to be entirely symphonic, and we believe that the first and third movements will wear better. Consider the fate of Raff's "Lenore" symphony with its excessively popular march. Musical confectionery grows stale very rapidly.

The third movement (Andante), is better, even while popular in its vein. It is a Romance which begins with a phrase somewhat like the first tenor song in "Aida," but neither the resemblance to "Celeste Aida," nor the more remote kinship of the theme of the first movement to the Swordmotif of the Trilogy, are sufficient to base the remotest charge of plagiarism upon, for when it comes to treating these phrases Glazounoff is most sincere and individual. A sudden change in this romantic movement, from the singing of violins and violoncellos to a portentous and sinister subject upon the trombones suggests that the course of true love is not running quite smoothly. The movement was finely given and this striking contrast strongly brought out.

In Nijni-Novgorod, in Russia, there is an annual fair. There is in that city a district called Kunavina; which during the Fair-time is the most dissipated place on earth, a condensation of the vices of a dozen different countries. We would suggest "Kunavina" as a title for the last movement of this symphony. It is Russian revelry at its worst. But the very frankness of the orgie has its peculiar charm. One may readily believe that Dr. Muck did not make a Sunday School picnic out of this. Its savage carousing gave an excellent picture of a Muscovite alcoholiday. It is fortunate that this is the last movement of the work. If there were another movement it would need to picture cracked ice, soda water, and a headachy repentance. But, all in all, the Glazounoff symphony is a virile and sterling work, and we have too few like it in the modern symphonic repertoire.

"In Autumn," is scarcely the true title for Grieg's striking overture, for it is founded upon his song entitled "Autumn Storm," which pictures the premonitions of Winter, and has one sombre re-echoing upon a single note—"Summer is over! Summer is over!" To New Englanders, to whom Autumn is the loveliest season of the year and Indian Summer its climax, the title would be especially misleading. The song ends with a promise of Spring, a suggestion of the joy with which one will find—

"Den forste Blomst i den sidste Sne,"— the first of the flowers in the last of the snow. But Grieg ends his overture with a real Norwegian Harvest song, easily recognizable with its drone bass, and giving a characteristic Coda to a very worthy overture, a work, by the way, which Gade, who could [illegible] write anything half as Cesar Franck gave the intellectual flavor to the programme. He was like Saul among the prophets, among this dramatic company, for in spite of his "Chasseur Maudit," and a few other attempts at intensity, Franck was by nature intellectual rather than dramatic. Take for example the simple chromatic theme which is the foundation of "Les Eolides," and which is so often repeated; it is not nearly as graphic as the themes used by the other three composers in this programme. But when it comes to the working of it, that is quite another story, and not one of the three shows such resource and skill in repeated presentation of the same melody. There was more violin work in this than we had anticipated, for the Eolides were the daughters of the wind, and not of the strings. One would have liked Debussy to have set this ethereal subject. It is the least among Franck's large orchestral works.

Dvorak's "Husitska" overture has not been lately heard in Boston. It does not wear well. Of course our conductor and orchestra did all that was possible with its clangor and intensity, but some of Dvorak's works are fading. He may have had the "fatal facility" which has caused the works of Raff to gradually disappear from the orchestral repertoire. Dvorak's teacher, Smetana, was deeper, more intensely patriotic, and also a greater sufferer, which may make it possible that his works may yet take precedence of his celebrated pupil.

Nevertheless form and time and coherency were there, and military ardor and roughness too. The Chorale was thundered out grandly in the centre and in the Coda of the work, and the reading was grand enough to make one believe that "Husitska" is a masterpiece—which it is not.

Next week we have another purely orchestral programme. We have often stated that these are in general the best and most truly artistic of the series. The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck are worthy of standing alone, although some of the rush-seaters may dissent from this; at least the waiting line is larger when there is a famous vocalist on the programme.

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

ork, 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sale of season tickets for the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore, which has been in progress at Albaugh's Agency since last Monday, is fully up to expectations. When the sale opens for the first concert there will be very few tickets indeed to offer to the public. The prestige of the orchestra, enhanced by the extraordinary list of soloists provided, means an absolutely sold out house for every concert. The concerts will, of course, be given on Wednesday evenings, November 5, December 3, January 7, February 16 and March 18. Geraldine Farrar is the soloist at the first concert. Kreisler will be the soloist in December; Carreno in January; Mme. Van Endert in February and Paderewski in March.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT [illegible] 1913

, 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sale of season tickets for the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore, which has been in progress at Albaugh's Agency since last Monday, is fully up to expectations. When the sale opens for the first concert there will be very few tickets indeed to offer to the public. The prestige of the orchestra, enhanced by the extraordinary list of soloists provided, means an absolutely sold out house for every concert. The concerts will, of course, be given on Wednesday evenings, November 5, December 3, January 7, February 16 and March 18. Geraldine Farrar is the soloist at the first concert. Kreisler will be the soloist in December; Carreno in January; Mme. Van Endert in February and Paderewski in March.

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date

ork, 1884

Symphonie-Orcheſter.

Die dreiunddreißigſte Saiſon des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters wurde am 11. d. Mts. in feierlicher Weiſe eingeleitet. Das Programm brachte Beethoven's Siebente Symphonie, die Tragiſche Ouverture von Brahms, Liszt's „Préludes" und die „Fliegende Holländer"-Ouverture. Es iſt wahrſcheinlich, daß Dr. Muck Beethoven's Siebente anläßlich des New Yorker Eröffnungs-Konzerts in Carnegie Hall am Abend des 6. November dirigiren wird.

[34]

TRAVELER

OCTOBER 18, 1913.

RUSSIAN WORK CONCERT FEATURE

Dr. Muck and Orchestra Impart Interest to Familiar Compositions.

By FRANK BERTWALL

One came away from the second public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon with the feeling that Dr. Muck and his players had by their skill imparted interest to compositions that in themselves were not of the first order. True there was Glazounoff's fifth symphony, ever interesting, but falling short of being a grand symphony, and yet as played yesterday afternoon holding the closest attention and arousing noticeable enthusiasm. It's Russian music that could well smack considerably more of the Russian school with profit.

The Grieg "In Autumn" overture evidently depicts another season than what New England knows as the finest part of the year. Dvorak's "Husitska" overture gains nothing on rehearsing.

THIRD SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Dr. Muck has placed the first novelty of the season in next week's program, which will be played Oct. 24 and 25. This is the fourth symphony of the Finnish composer, Sibelius. The music of Sibelius, what of it has been played here, has created a profound impression, particularly his first and second symphonies. His third symphony, never played in Boston, was generally admitted a failure. This fourth symphony, which has had its first performance abroad within a year and a half, is said to show a wide divergence from his former style.

The second half of the program will be purely classical. It will comprise a concerto for two wind choirs by Handel, three pieces by Gluck—Tambourin, Gavotte and Chaconne, which were arranged by the Belgian Geveart—and, finally, Haydn's Symphony in D major No. 2.

TRANSCRIPT,

OCTOBER 18,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

GLAZOUNOFF'S POMPS AND FRANCK'S FANCIES

Between Whiles, Dvorak and Grieg—The Russian's Empty Symphony—Two Contrasting Overtures—Franck's Tone-Poem of the Bodiless Breezes

WHAT a pity that Dr. Muck did not put Liszt's tone-poem, "The Preludes" on the programme for the second pair of Symphony Concerts, instead of the first! A week ago Liszt had, perforce, to keep company with Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner. Yesterday he would have had no more than Glazounoff, Grieg, Franck and Dvoràk beside him. Last Saturday some were saying in their haste that "The Preludes" was only glow and glitter, sonority and show. Instrumental, harmonic, even melodic rhetoric filled the music, but beyond that Liszt had taken no grave thought and experienced no deep emotion. His imagination lay all on the surface; it worked only in effects. So to some seemed romantic, sensuous, striving Liszt in the company of Beethoven and Brahms, while he could no more than hold up his head against the Wagner of the overture to "The Flying Dutchman"—a Wagner, by the way, who had not yet discovered how many happy inventions he could borrow from his prospective father-in-law.

Per contra set the Liszt of "The Preludes" or of any of his surviving orchestral music beside the Glazounoff of the symphony in B-flat that began the concert yesterday and in the comparison his shortcomings become almost virtues beside the greater and often similar shortcomings of the Russian. Glazounoff's symphony is "absolute" music. No programme explains its substance and its course; no hint of any suggestion from without accompanies it. None the less it might have been written with deep and ardent emotion releasing its voice in the tones. From the first measures of the introduction to the last measures of the finale there is hardly a hint of such feeling. Glazounoff is songful and melancholy through the slow movement, as countless composers have been and countless will be in that division of a symphony. Glazounoff imagines his scherzo lightly and fantastically. To do so is the prescription for scherzi in a contemporary symphony. The finale is sonorous, tumultuous, vigorously rhythmed and colored—all in the expected and becoming Russian way. The first movement makes play with contrasts of timbres and tonal masses, with orotund or suave progressions.

Throughout the symphony the melodies are transparent, but not one of them arrests the ear or the imagination. Glazounoff manipulates them harmonically, instrumentally, and rhythmically, so [illegible] process is [illegible] hand played over and over again; but neither head nor heart [illegible] it. Some of the strokes are wholly conventional, like the songful horns at the beginning of the slow movement. Some of them are ingeniously fanciful, like the liquid tones of the scherzo and the recurring flicker and flutter of light phrases in them. Some of them are only stout music-making like the pompous sonorities of the brass choir in the first allegro. Some yet again are only empty sound and fury like the reiterated tumults of the finale. It is an old saying that a symphony should be a "musical action," in the play and the interplay—the battle even—of its melodies and the thought and emotion behind. Glazounoff makes an insistent show of such action, but neither in the music nor in the listening imagination does anything ever happen.

Instead, Glazounoff outpours his tonal pomp as though he were a master of musical ceremonies; makes play with his harmonies and progressions as though he were a master of tonal revels; and luxuriates in his instrumental colors as though he were hanging tapestries for all this show. But first, last and all the time it is show and little else. Perhaps the symphony deserved to be taken from the shelves as a "vehicle" for the tonal magnificence and brilliance of the orchestra; but there are other and better media for those glories. Anyhow Glazounoff owed much to the orchestra and the conductor. Time and again they persuaded the listeners that there were more than pomps and fancies of sound in the symphony, as no doubt Glazounoff, when he was writing it, believed himself. The Liszt of "The Preludes" had weighty thoughts and deep emotions beside the Russian. He also imagined as well as repeated.

The Dvoràk of the "Husitzkà Overture," at the other end of the concert, wrote at least with kindled emotion. The devotion, the exaltation, the battles, the hymns, the sufferings of the Hussites thrilled him. They were bone of his bone, flesh of his flesh and his Bohemia was also theirs. So enkindled and commanding the speech of music, he found tones in which to express the emotions of the Hussites and his own as he contemplated them. Being rich in harmonic and instrumental resource he made these tones an ample and deep-hued vesture. Stirred emotion summoned eloquence and power. The "Husitzka Overture" is no masterpiece, but it seemed almost such in the puissant and expanding voice that Dr. Muck gave to it, with his mastery of the long progression and the sweeping climax. It seemed yet more a masterpiece in contrast with the empty pomps and the fictitious brilliance of Glazounoff's symphony. Dvoràk's overture is orotund enough; but emotion makes the oratory eloquence. Dvoràk's music glows brightly or darkly, expands, gathers, cumulates, recedes, according to the imaginings behind. Very seldom is it merely manipulated. And Hussite hymns or no hymns Dvoràk's could invent melodies that quicken responsive feeling.

Moreover, what Dvoràk would say in tones in these years of his prime, he could say freely and fully. In contrast, the moment in which Grieg attempts to use the larger forms and resources of music, then does a sense of his helplessness with them begin to steal upon the hearer. Time and again in the course of the overture, "In Autumn," that Dr. Muck first made known in Boston and rediscovered yesterday, ten or twenty or fifty measures quicken the ear and stir the answering fancy. They bear the wistful voice of Norwegian folk-song; or they move in pungent harmonies to sharp-set rhythms; or some clear and stirring mood plays through them. Then the mood dwindles; the harmonies lose their tang, the rhythms their zest; the melodies wither in dry pale phrases. Invention, imagination, even manipulation halt before a form that is too big and too exacting for Grieg to fill. The music goes in gasps. He becomes almost inarticulate. Then up spring melodies, harmonies, rhythms and mood again, and Grieg is sufficient and more to his task. In turn breath fails him and so on in the fitfulness that is half the charm of his pieces in the smaller forms but that leaves him nervously helpless when he essays the larger. Not until he leads in his sturdy folk-tune does he go forward with a sure hand. Grieg is a water-colorist in tones and in the overture he is trying to make a fresco of autumn. Grieg's imagination and the tones in which he released it almost always flutter—unless he braces himself nervously to a momentary show of force—and a concert overture asks sustained flight. His own song, from which he drew the overture excels it. Grieg could be safely short-breathed, fitful and moody there.

Into the concert, between the reverberating emptiness of Glazounoff, the eloquence of Dvoràk and the restless strivings of Grieg, crept the finely imaginative, the finely expressive, the delicately and subtly attuned Franck of the symphonic poem, "The Daughters of Æolus." It is the custom to say that music is not half itself until it is heard in actual performance, and yet on the engraved page this music of Franck seemed more lovely and fanciful than it did as Dr. Muck and the orchestra gave it, so to say, speaking voice. And through no fault of theirs. Read, these phrases of Franck often seem as zephyr-like as the breezes that were Æolus's daughters. They twine and intertwine like those breezes in the lightest play. They touch the ear of the imagination as tenderly and flittingly as they touched youth and maiden, leaf and flower in the poetry of Leconte de Lisle that was the spark to Franck's fancy. The harmonic and the instrumental shadings are the soft iridescent, quivering light in which these airs should blow. Read, the symphonic poem seems the very lightest tracery of imagination and of tones. Even when the phrases coalesce and the breezes are winds, the tones have only a little deepened.

Yet a big orchestra must play "The Daughters of Æolus" in a big hall before a big audience. Even when the conductor is Dr. Muck and the orchestra the Boston Symphony Orchestra there is no subduing it to the gossamer lightness of some of Franck's phrases, and no making his interweavings seem as whispers interlaced [illegible]. Besides, it is the fashion nowadays to give Franck's [illegible] body as is possible. We that listen must understand that he was man as well as mystic; that he could be largely eloquent as well as exquisitely fanciful. He must speak out, even where his music seems only to whisper. Out of the diaphanous world of his imagination in "The Daughters Æolus" he was writing for the ears of an actual world that he must persuade to his music. Yet even that music seems sometimes too stout-bodied for the fancies, the motions, the images it would bear. The breezes are bodiless; light is bodiless; bodiless almost was Franck's imagining of the touch of these breezes and the play of this light. But music must have form and body or else be not music that men can hear. The choir of Ariel in "The Tempest" that filled the isle with strange and lovely sounds, with the voices of the air, ought to be the orchestra since all things are possible to such beings—for Franck's tone-poem.

H. T. P.

ADVERTISER,

OCTOBER 18,

SECOND CONCERT IN SYMPHONY SERIES

AGAIN A PURELY ORCHESTRAL PROGRAMME

Intellectual Flavor to Week's Offering Given by Franck's Symphonic Poem,

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Glazounoff. Symphony in B-flat. No. 5.
Grieg. Overture "In Autumn."
Franck. Symphonic Poem. "Les Eolides."
Dvorak. "Husitska" overture.

Again a purely orchestral programme, without a soloist. And like the programme of a week ago it gave a display of the moderate moderns, composers of our time who have not tried to evolve Cubist music, but have held to form, coherency and melody.

Dr. Muck was the first to introduce Glazounoff's fifth symphony to Boston during his previous regime. It has several of the characteristics of the true Russian school. Powerful orchestration, folk music effects, some touches of ferocious hilarity, and melody too. It belongs to the best modern school.

In the introduction there is a foreshadowing of the resolute chief theme, and this study theme with its heavy unison passage is impressively worked up in the first movement, and also well-contrasted with the beginning of the subordinate theme on the wood-wind. The two themes are strongly developed, sometimes perhaps with a little too much of fortissimo brass, but interestingly nevertheless.

But the popular movement is the Scherzo. The wood-wind has plenty to do here, and flutes and clarinettes deserve praise for the manner in which it was done. There is a march movement here which is about as popular in style as anything that we have had in symphony since Raff. It is sugared up with tinklings on the Glockenspiel (tiny bars of steel struck with a mallet), and is as rhythmic as if it had been made by Sousa himself. Naturally this pleasant-tasting number was much applauded. It was, however, somewhat too sweet to be entirely symphonic, and we believe that the first and third movements will wear better. Consider the fate of Raff's "Lenore" symphony with its excessively popular march. Musical confectionery grows stale very rapidly.

The third movement (Andante), is better, even while popular in its vein. It is a Romance which begins with a phrase somewhat like the first tenor song in "Aida," but neither the resemblance to "Celeste Aida," nor the more remote kinship of the theme of the first movement to the Swordmotif of the Trilogy, are sufficient to base the remotest charge of plagiarism upon, for when it comes to treating these phrases Glazounoff is most sincere and individual. A sudden change in this romantic movement, from the singing of violins and violoncellos to a portentous and sinister subject upon the trombones suggests, that the course of true love is not running quite smoothly. The movement was finely given and this striking contrast strongly brought out.

In Nijni-Novgorod, in Russia, there is an annual fair. There is in that city a district called Kunavina; which during the Fair-time is the most dissipated place on earth, a condensation of the vices of a dozen different countries. We would suggest "Kunavina" as a title for the last movement of this symphony. It is Russian revelry at its worst. But the very frankness of the orgie has its peculiar charm. One may readily believe that Dr. Muck did not make a Sunday School picnic out of this. Its savage carousing gave an excellent picture of a Muscovite alcoholiday. It is fortunate that this is the last movement of the work. If there were another movement it would need to picture cracked ice, soda water, and a headachy repentance. But, all in all, the Glazounoff symphony is a virile and sterling work, and we have too few like it in the modern symphonic repertoire.

"In Autumn," is scarcely the true title for Grieg's striking overture, for it is founded upon his song entitled "Autumn Storm," which pictures the premonitions of Winter, and has one sombre re-echoing upon a single note—"Summer is over! Summer is over!" To New Englanders, to whom Autumn is the loveliest season of the year and Indian Summer its climax, the title would be especially misleading. The song ends with a promise of Spring, a suggestion of the joy with which one will find—

"Den forste Blomst i den sidste Sne,"—the first of the flowers in the last of the snow. But Grieg ends his overture with a real Norwegian Harvest song, easily recognizable with its drone bass, and giving a characteristic Coda to a very worthy overture, a work, by the way, which Gade, who could not write anything half as [illegible]

César Franck gave the intellectual flavor to the programme. He was like Saul among the prophets, among this dramatic company, for in spite of his "Chasseur Maudit," and a few other attempts at intensity, Franck was by nature intellectual rather than dramatic. Take for example the simple chromatic theme which is the foundation of "Les Eolides," and which is so often repeated; it is not nearly as graphic as the themes used by the other three composers in this programme. But when it comes to the working of it, that is quite another story, and not one of the three shows such resource and skill in repeated presentation of the same melody. There was more violin work in this than we had anticipated, for the Eolides were the daughters of the wind, and not of the strings. One would have liked Debussy to have set this ethereal subject. It is the least among Franck's large orchestral works.

Dvorak's "Husitska" overture has not been lately heard in Boston. It does not wear well. Of course our conductor and orchestra did all that was possible with its clangor and intensity, but some of Dvorak's works are fading. He may have had the "fatal facility" which has caused the works of Raff to gradually disappear from the orchestral repertoire. Dvorak's teacher, Smetana, was deeper, more intensely patriotic, and also a greater sufferer, which may make it possible that his works may yet take precedence of his celebrated pupil.

Nevertheless form and time and coherency were there, and military ardor and roughness too. The Chorale was thundered out grandly in the centre and in the Coda of the work, and the reading was grand enough to make one believe that "Husitska" is a masterpiece—which it is not.

Next week we have another purely orchestral programme. We have often stated that these are in general the best and most truly artistic of the series. The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck are worthy of standing alone, although some of the rush-seaters may dissent from this; at least the waiting line is larger when there is a famous vocalist on the programme.

MERICAN

Baltimore, Md.

ork, 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sale of season tickets for the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore, which has been in progress at Albaugh's Agency since last Monday, is fully up to expectations. When the sale opens for the first concert there will be very few tickets indeed to offer to the public. The prestige of the orchestra, enhanced by the extraordinary list of soloists provided, means an absolutely sold out house for every concert. The concerts will, of course, be given on Wednesday evenings, November 5, December 3, January 7, February 16 and March 18. Geraldine Farrar is the soloist at the first concert. Kreisler will be the soloist in December; Carreno in January; Mme. Van Endert in February and Paderewski in March.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 18 1913

, 1884

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sale of season tickets for the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore, which has been in progress at Albaugh's Agency since last Monday, is fully up to expectations. When the sale opens for the first concert there will be very few tickets indeed to offer to the public. The prestige of the orchestra, enhanced by the extraordinary list of soloists provided, means an absolutely sold out house for every concert. The concerts will, of course, be given on Wednesday evenings, November 5, December 3, January 7, February 16 and March 18. Geraldine Farrar is the soloist at the first concert. Kreisler will be the soloist in December; Carreno in January; Mme. Van Endert in February and Paderewski in March.

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date

ork, 1884

Symphonie-Orcheſter.

Die dreiunddreißigſte Saiſon des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters wurde am 11. d. Mts. in feierlicher Weiſe eingeleitet. Das Programm brachte Beethoven's Siebente Symphonie, die Tragiſche Ouverture von Brahms, Liszt's „Préludes" und die „Fliegende Holländer"-Ouverture. Es iſt wahrſcheinlich, daß Dr. Muck Beethoven's Siebente anläßlich des New Yorker Eröffnungs-Konzerts in Carnegie Hall am Abend des 6. November dirigiren wird.

[34]

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date OCT 19 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The thirty-third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has already begun in its home city. So much praise was tendered its performance of the Beethoven Seventh Symphony that Dr. Muck will probably include that composition in his opening programme at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 6. On his return from Europe Dr. Muck made a statement deploring the lack of novelties obtainable for [illegible] few dese[illegible] Among the new sy[illegible] is a of Dr[illegible] [illegible]rich Noren, count[illegible] er[illegible] town in this scop[illegible] his "kaleidophon[illegible] tions; the symphon[illegible] ita." The Boston conductor also has secured a symphonic poem, "Peter Schlemihl," by Reznicek, and two new pieces by Max Schillings, called "Meergrus" and "Seemorgan." Rachmaninoff's Symphony No. 2 in E minor will be revived and Mahler's Fifth Symphony may appear upon the out-of-town programmes.

Establi 84

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 19 1913

* * *

The sale of season tickets for the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia, which has been in progress at Miss Harris' office, 1119 Chestnut Street, since last Monday, is fully up to expectations. When the sale opens for the first concert there will be very few tickets indeed to offer to the public. The prestige of the orchestra, enhanced by the extraordinary list of soloists provided, means an absolutely sold-out house for every concert. The concerts will, of course, be given on Monday evenings, November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16.

Geraldine Farrar, who is the soloist at the first concert, is ending a most successful tour of the Pacific Coast, which she has made under the direction of C. A. Ellis, who is also the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Kreisler will be the soloist in December; Carreno in January; Mme. van Endert in February, [illegible] in March.

Esta 884

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 19 1913

Scriabine.

The season for renewing subscriptions for the Philharmonic concerts to be given in the Academy of Music this winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has passed and general sales to new subscribers will open at the box office of the Academy of Music, on Friday afternoon, October 24, at four o'clock. The choice of seats will not be large for a great majority of last year's subscribers have indicated their intention of holding their seats. The concerts will be given on Friday evenings in the Academy of Music, on November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. In December, Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist; in February Mme. van Endert, and in March Paderewski will make his only appearance in Brooklyn with an orchestra. Mme. van Endert is a new-comer. It will be her first appearance in this country. She is the first lyric soprano of the Berlin Opera and is young, comely and attractive. She has been singing in public but seven years. Her first season was devoted to concert work. The next three years she was the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera in Dresden, and has been the most valued member of the Berlin Opera. She is said to have a warm, rich soprano particularly adapted to the suave, placid music of the eighteenth century. She created in Berlin the role of Octavia in Richard Strauss' opera "Der Rosenkavalier," and in its first season sang it fifty-six times under the direction of Dr. Muck.

Estal 84

From SUN
Address: New York OCT 19 1913
Date

The thirty-third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened in Boston on Saturday evening, October 11, with its wonted brilliance. The programme comprised the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, the "Tragic" overture of Brahms, Liszt's "Les Preludes," and "The Flying Dutchman" overture. The comment of the public was that the orchestra had begun this season where it left off last and was playing with that surety and precision that is usually expected only after several weeks of rehearsal. It is probable that Dr. Muck will play the Seventh Symphony at the opening concert in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, November 6.

Estab 84

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 19 1913

The season for renewing subscriptions for the Philharmonic concerts to be given in the Academy of Music this winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has passed and the general sales to new subscribers will open at the box office of the Academy of Music next Friday afternoon, October 2[illegible], at 4 o'clock. With the return of Dr. Muck the orchestra is once more its old time brilliant self. The five concerts will be given on Friday evenings in the Academy of Music. Their dates are November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. Three soloists are announced. In December Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist; in February Mme. Van Endert, and in March Paderewski will make his only appearance in Brooklyn with an orchestra. Mme. Van Endert is a newcomer. Following the custom that has worked out so well of bringing each year to America some distinguished artist who will appear exclusively with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Ellis, the manager of the company this year, made arrangements whereby Mme. Van Endert should visit America. It will be her first appearance in this country. She is at present the first lyric soprano of the Berlin Opera where she holds the place left open by Geraldine Farrar when that [illegible] Metropolitan Opera in Manhattan. Mme. Van Endert is young, comely and altogether attractive. She is said to have a warm, rich soprano, particularly adapted to the suave placid music of the eighteenth century. She created in Berlin the role of "Octavia" in Richard Strauss' opera "Der Rosenkavalier." [illegible] Muck is in the best of health and spirits, and he is arranging some interesting programmes for this city.

Est 1884

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date [illegible] 1913

Messenger ....John [illegible]omie, Jr.

* * *

The sale of season ticke[illegible] the five concerts of the Boston S[illegible]ony Orchestra in Philadelphia [illegible] been in progress at Miss Harr[illegible] office in Heppe's Piano Rooms sinc[illegible] last Monday, and is fully up to expectation. When the sale opens for the [illegible]rst concert there will be very few tickets indeed to offer to the public. The prestige of the Orchestra, enhanced [illegible] the extraordinary list of soloists provided, is believed to mean an absolutely [illegible]ld-out house for every concert. The concerts will be given on Monday evenings, November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16.

Geraldine Farrar, who is the soloist at the first concert, is ending a tour of the Pacific coast, which she has made under the direction of C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Kreisler will be the soloist in December, Carreno in January, Mme. van Endert in February and Paderewski in March.

* * *

Establis

From HERALD
Address: New York
Date

THE season for renewing subscriptions for the Philharmonic concerts to be given in the Academy of Music this winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has passed and the general sales to new subscribers will open at the box office of the Academy of Music next Friday afternoon, October 24, at four o'clock. The choice of seats open to the general public will not be large, for the great majority of last year's subscribers have indicated their intention of holding their seats. The prosperity of these concerts has never reached such a high point as the last year, and the coming season will at least equal it. With the return of Dr. Muck the orchestra is once more its old-time brilliant self, and the concerts already played in Boston show that it has begun its work of the season of 1913-14 where it left off in the season of 1912-13.

The five concerts will be given on Friday evenings in the Academy of Music. The dates are November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20.

Three soloists are announced. In December Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist, in February Mme. van Endert and in March Paderewski will make his only appearance in Brooklyn with an orchestra.

No words need be used in commending Kreisler and Paderewski to the Brooklyn public. Both of them have been coming to this city for years, and each of them has his own loyal, devoted public. Mme. van Endert, however, is a newcomer. Following the custom that has worked out so well of bringing each year to America some distinguished artist who will appear exclusively with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Ellis, the manager of the company, this year made arrangements whereby Mme. van Endert should come to America. It will be her first appearance in this country. She is at present the first lyric soprano of the Berlin Opera, where she holds the place left open by Miss Geraldine Farrar when the latter came to the Metropolitan Opera in New York. Mme. van Endert is young, comely and altogether attractive. She has been singing in public but seven years. Her first season was devoted to concert work. The next three years she was the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera in Dresden, and since she left Dresden she has been the most valued member of the Berlin Opera. She is said to have a warm, rich soprano particularly adapted to the suave, placid music of the eighteenth century. She created in Berlin the rôle of Octavia in Richard Strauss' opera "Der Rosenkavalier," and in its first season sang it fifty-six times under the direction of Dr. Muck.

E 1884

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City.
Date [illegible] 19 1913

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The thirty-third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened in Boston last Saturday evening, October 11, with its wonted brilliance. The programme comprised the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, the "Tragic" Overture of Brahms, Liszt's "Les Preludes," and "The Flying Dutchman" Overture. It is probable that Dr. Muck will play the Seventh Symphony at the opening concert, in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 6.

rk, 1884

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 1[illegible] 1913

Boston Symphony

The sale of season tickets for the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore, which has been in progress at Albaugh's agency since last Monday, is fully up to expectations. The prestige of the orchestra, enhanced by the extraordinary list of soloists provided, means, it is said, an absolutely sold-out house for every concert. The concerts will, of course, be given on Wednesday evenings November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18.

Geraldine Farrar, who is the soloist at the first concert, is ending a tour of the Pacific coast.

Kreisler will be the soloist in December; Carreno in January; Mme. van Endert in February, and Paderewski in March.

Establ

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 1[illegible] 1913

At the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here next Tuesday Beethoven's Seventh Symphony will be played and Mme. Gadski will be the soloist, singing an aria from Von Weber's Oberons and several German songs.

Est 884

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 18 1913

MADAME GADSKI WILL SING AT SYMPHONY

Musical Season to Have Brilliant Opening Tuesday Evening.

Madame Gadski will appear before the music lovers of Providence on Tuesday evening at Infantry Hall, when she will be the soloist at the first of the Boston Symphony's winter concerts. She is known as one of the world's leading soprano soloists.

The increased number of concerts to be given by the orchestra has resulted in a larger number of subscribers than ever before, and, with the brilliant array of soloists arranged, the series promised to be the best ever offered in this city.

Madame Gadski is the possessor of a voice of unusual power and beauty, and is a complete mistress of the mechanics of singing. Although she is German by birth she came to this country before she was 20 and has been here since that time, appearing each year more than 100 times at the Metropolitan Opera House.

At the concert Tuesday night she will sing "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's opera, "Oberon." This is one of the most difficult arias in the whole range of musical literature. She will follow this with Wagner's three songs, written while in Zurich. "Im Treibhaus," "Traume" and "Schmerzen."

The orchestral numbers are also attractive, including Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, in A-major.

The full programme is as follows: Symphony No. 7, in A-major, Beethoven; solo, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster." Weber; orchestra, "Les Eolides," Cesar Franck; solos, "Im Treibhaus," "Traume" and "Schmerzen," Weber; orchestra overture, "Im Herbst," Grieg.

Establ

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, always first and last in the music field, opened its thirty-third season in its home town last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Dr. Karl Muck's programme had for its principal number Beethoven's seventh symphony.

Est 1884

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York
Date OCT 21 1913

THE thirty-third season of the Boston Symphony recently opened with

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date OCT 19 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The thirty-third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has already begun in its home city. So much praise was tendered its performance of the Beethoven Seventh Symphony that Dr. Muck will probably include that composition in his opening programme at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 6. On this return from Europe Dr. Muck made a statement deploring the lack of [illegible] novelties obtainable for [illegible] few dese[illegible] Among the new sy[illegible] is a of Dr[illegible] [illegible] rich Noren, count[illegible] er [illegible] town in this scop[illegible] of his "kaleidophon[illegible] tions; the symphon[illegible] ita." The Boston conductor also has secured a symphonic poem, "Peter Schlemihl," by Reznicek, and two new pieces by Max Schillings, called "Meergrus" and "Seemorgan." Rachmaninoff's Symphony No. 2 in E minor will be revived and Mahler's Fifth Symphony may appear upon the out-of-town programmes.

Establi 34

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 19 1913

* * *

The sale of season tickets for the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia, which has been in progress at Miss Harris' office, 1119 Chestnut Street, since last Monday, is fully up to expectations. When the sale opens for the first concert there will be very few tickets indeed to offer to the public. The prestige of the orchestra, enhanced by the extraordinary list of soloists provided, means an absolutely sold-out house for every concert. The concerts will, of course, be given on Monday evenings, November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16.

Geraldine Farrar, who is the soloist at the first concert, is ending a most successful tour of the Pacific Coast, which she has made under the direction of C. A. Ellis, who is also the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Kreisler will be the soloist in December; Carreno in January; Mme. van Endert in February, and Paderewski in March.

Esta 884

AGLE
s: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 19 1913

Scriabine.

The season for renewing subscriptions for the Philharmonic concerts to be given in the Academy of Music this winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has passed and general sales to new subscribers will open at the box office of the Academy of Music, on Friday afternoon, October 24, at four o'clock. The choice of seats will not be large for a great majority of last year's subscribers have indicated their intention of holding their seats. The concerts will be given on Friday evenings in the Academy of Music, on November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. In December, Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist; in February Mme. van Endert, and in March Paderewski will make his only appearance in Brooklyn with an orchestra. Mme. van Endert is a new-comer. It will be her first appearance in this country. She is the first lyric soprano of the Berlin Opera and is young, comely and attractive. She has been singing in public but seven years. Her first season was devoted to concert work. The next three years she was the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera in Dresden, and has been the most valued member of the Berlin Opera. She is said to have a warm, rich soprano particularly adapted to the suave, placid music of the eighteenth century. She created in Berlin the role of Octavia in Richard Strauss' opera "Der Rosenkavalier," and in its first season sang it fifty-six times under the direction of Dr. Muck.

Esta 34

From SUN
Address: New York OCT 19 1913
Date

The thirty-third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened in Boston on Saturday evening, October 11, with its wonted brilliance. The programme comprised the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, the "Tragic" overture of Brahms, Liszt's "Les Preludes," and "The Flying Dutchman" overture. The comment of the public was that the orchestra had begun this season where it left off last and was playing with that surety and precision that is usually expected only after several weeks of rehearsal. It is probable that Dr. Muck will play the Seventh Symphony at the opening concert in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, November 6.

Estab 84

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 19 1913

The season for renewing subscriptions for the Philharmonic concerts to be given in the Academy of Music this winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has passed and the general sales to new subscribers will open at the box office of the Academy of Music next Friday afternoon, October 2[illegible] at 4 o'clock. With the return of Dr. Muck the orchestra is once m[illegible] its old time brilliant self. The fi[illegible] concerts will be given on Friday [illegible]ings in the Academy of Music. [illegible]eir dates are November 7, De[illegible]r 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. Three soloists are announced. In December Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist; in February Mme. Van Endert, and in March Paderewski will make his only appearance in Brooklyn with an orchestra. Mme. Van Endert is a newcomer. Following the custom that has worked out so well of bringing each year to America some distinguished artist who will appear exclusively with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Ellis, the manager of the company this year, made arrangements whereby Mme. Van Endert should visit America. It will be her first appearance in this country. She is at present the first lyric soprano of the Berlin Opera where she holds the place left open by Geraldine Farrar when that [illegible] Metropolitan Opera in Manhattan. Mme. Van Endert is young, comely and altogether attractive. She is said to have a warm, rich sopr[illegible] particularly adapted to the s[illegible] placid music of the eighteenth [illegible]tury. She created in Berlin the r[illegible] of "Octavia" in Richard Str[illegible] opera "Der Rosenkavalier." [illegible] Muck is in the best of health [illegible] spirits, and he is arranging s[illegible] interesting programmes for this city.

Est 1884

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Messenger ......John omic, Jr.

* * *

The sale of season ticke[illegible] the five concerts of the Boston S[illegible]ony Orchestra in Philadelphia [illegible] b[illegible]en in progress at Miss Harr[illegible] office in Heppe's Piano Rooms sinc[illegible] last Monday, and is fully up to [illegible]pectation. When the sale opens for the [illegible]rst concert there will be very few tick[illegible]s indeed to offer to the public. The [illegible]restige of the Orchestra, enhanced [illegible] the extraordinary list of soloists provided, is believed to mean an absolutely [illegible]ld-out house for every concert. The [illegible]oncerts will be given on Monday evenings, November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16.

Geraldine Farrar, who is the soloist at the first concert, is ending a tour of the Pacific coast, which she has made under the direction of C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Kreisler will be the soloist in December, Carreno in January, Mme. van Endert in February and Paderewski in March.

* * *

Establis

From HERALD
Address: New York
Date

THE season for renewing subscriptions for the Philharmonic concerts to be given in the Academy of Music this winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has passed and the general sales to new subscribers will open at the box office of the Academy of Music next Friday afternoon, October 24, at four o'clock. The choice of seats open to the general public will not be large, for the great majority of last year's subscribers have indicated their intention of holding their seats. The prosperity of these concerts has never reached such a high point as the last year, and the coming season will at least equal it. With the return of Dr. Muck the orchestra is once more its old-time brilliant self, and the concerts already played in Boston show that it has begun its work of the season of 1913-14 where it left off in the season of 1912-13.

The five concerts will be given on Friday evenings in the Academy of Music. The dates are November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20.

Three soloists are announced. In December Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist, in February Mme. van Endert and in March Paderewski will make his only appearance in Brooklyn with an orchestra.

No words need be used in commending Kreisler and Paderewski to the Brooklyn public. Both of them have been coming to this city for years, and each of them has his own loyal, devoted public. Mme. van Endert, however, is a newcomer. Following the custom that has worked out so well of bringing each year to America some distinguished artist who will appear exclusively with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Ellis, the manager of the company, this year made arrangements whereby Mme. van Endert should come to America. It will be her first appearance in this country. She is at present the first lyric soprano of the Berlin Opera, where she holds the place left open by Miss Geraldine Farrar when the latter came to the Metropolitan Opera in New York. Mme. van Endert is young, comely and altogether attractive. She has been singing in public but seven years. Her first season was devoted to concert work. The next three years she was the principal lyric soprano of the Royal Opera in Dresden, and since she left Dresden she has been the most valued member of the Berlin Opera. She is said to have a warm, rich soprano particularly adapted to the suave, placid music of the eighteenth century. She created in Berlin the rôle of Octavia in Richard Strauss' opera "Der Rosenkavalier," and in its first season sang it fifty-six times under the direction of Dr. Muck.

E 1884

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City.
Date 19 1913

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The thirty-third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened in Boston last Saturday evening, October 11, with its wonted brilliance. The programme comprised the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, the "Tragic" Overture of Brahms, Liszt's "Les Preludes," and "The Flying Dutchman" Overture. It is probable that Dr. Muck will play the Seventh Symphony at the opening concert, in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 6.

rk, 1884

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date 1 1913

Boston Symphony

The sale of season tickets for the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore, which has been in progress at Albaugh's agency since last Monday, is fully up to expectations. The prestige of the orchestra, enhanced by the extraordinary list of soloists provided, means, it is said, an absolutely sold-out house for every concert. The concerts will, of course, be given on Wednesday evenings November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 18.

Geraldine Farrar, who is the soloist at the first concert, is ending a tour of the Pacific coast.

Kreisler will be the soloist in December; Carreno in January; Mme. van Endert in February, and Paderewski in March.

Establ

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 16 1913

At the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here next Tuesday Beethoven's Seventh Symphony will be played and Mme. Gadski will be the soloist, singing an aria from Von Weber's Oberons and several German songs.

Est 884

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 18 1913

MADAME GADSKI WILL SING AT SYMPHONY

Musical Season to Have Brilliant Opening Tuesday Evening.

Madame Gadski will appear before the music lovers of Providence on Tuesday evening at Infantry Hall, when she will be the soloist at the first of the Boston Symphony's winter concerts. She is known as one of the world's leading soprano soloists.

The increased number of concerts to be given by the orchestra has resulted in a larger number of subscribers than ever before, and, with the brilliant array of soloists arranged, the series promised to be the best ever offered in this city.

Madame Gadski is the possessor of a voice of unusual power and beauty, and is a complete mistress of the mechanics of singing. Although she is German by birth she came to this country before she was 20 and has been here since that time, appearing each year more than 100 times at the Metropolitan Opera House.

At the concert Tuesday night she will sing "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's opera, "Oberon." This is one of the most difficult arias in the whole range of musical literature. She will follow this with Wagner's three songs, written while in Zurich. "Im Treibhaus," "Traume" and "Schmerzen."

The orchestral numbers are also attractive, including Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, in A-major.

The full programme is as follows: Symphony No. 7, in A-major, Beethoven; solo, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," Weber; orchestra, "Les Eolides," Cesar Franck; solos, "Im Treibhaus," "Traume" and "Schmerzen," Weber; orchestra overture, "Im Herbst," Grieg.

Establ

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, always first and last in the music field, opened its thirty-third season in its home town last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Dr. Karl Muck's programme had for its principal number Beethoven's seventh symphony.

Est 1884

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York
Date OCT 21 1913

THE thirty-third season of the Boston Symphony recently opened with

---

plausible, as sketch of Autumn shows freshness in

Capt. Gardner

[35]

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 19 1913

The time for renewing subscriptions for the Philharmonic concerts to be given in the Academy of Music this winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has passed and the general sales to new subscribers will open at the box office of the Academy of Music next Friday afternoon, Oct. 24, at 4 o'clock. The choice of seats open to the general public will not be large, for the great majority of last year's subscribers have indicated their intention of holding their seats.

With the return of Dr. Muck, the orchestra is once more its old-time brilliant self and the concerts already played in Boston show that it has begun its work of the season of 1913-14 where it left off in the season of 1912-13.

The five concerts will be given on Friday evenings in the Academy of Music. The dates are Nov. 7, Dec. 5, Jan. 9, Feb. 20 and March 20.

Three soloists are announced. In December Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist; in February, Mme. Van Endert, and in March Paderewski will make his only appearance in Brooklyn with an orchestra.

Mme. Van Endert is a new comer. Following the custom that has worked out so well of bringing each year to America some distinguished artist who will appear exclusively with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Ellis, the manager, has made arrangements whereby Mme. Van Endert should visit America. She is at present the first lyric soprano of the Berlin Opera, where she holds the place left open by Geraldine Farrar. She is said to have a warm, rich soprano particularly adapted to the suave, placid music of the eighteenth century.

The Philharmonic Society of New York, whose Sunday afternoon concerts in the Academy of Music have grown so strongly in popular favor, is enlarging its educational purposes, and has announced that during the coming concert season it will affiliate itself with the Wage Earners' League in three concerts at Madison Square Garden.

These concerts will be given with an increased orchestra and celebrated artists as assisting soloists, and they are intended to further the educational policy of the Philharmonic Society by placing the highest class of music within reach of wage-earners of limited means.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date OCT 19 1913

* * *

The sale of season tickets for the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia, which has been in progress at Miss Harris' office since last Monday, is fully up to expectations. When the sale opens for the first concert there will be very few tickets, indeed, to offer to the public. The prestige of the orchestra, enhanced by the extraordinary list of soloists provided, mean a house sold out for every concert. The concerts will be given on Monday evenings, November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16. Geraldine Farrar, who is the soloist at the first concert, is ending a most successful tour of the Pacific coast, which she has made under the direction of C. A. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Kreisler will be the soloist in December, Carreno in January, Mme. van Endert in February and Paderewski in March.

* * *

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 1913

NO RESERVED SEATS LEFT.

Boston Orchestra Sets Record for the Academy of Music.

Established

The pre-eminent position that is held by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is thoroughly appreciated in Brooklyn. The old subscribers, who have maintained the concerts through the trying period which followed the destruction of the old Academy of Music in Montague street until the new Academy of Music was erected, have subscribed for all of the seats in the new Academy of Music, including all of the boxes, for the entire season of 1913-1914.

This is the first time since the Boston Symphony Orchestra began giving concerts in Brooklyn some twenty-three years ago that the entire house has been sold out to old subscribers. It is the first time that it is impossible to sell tickets to new subscribers. The date that was fixed for new subscribers to purchase tickets was Saturday, Oct. 25, but, unfortunately for those who would be new subscribers, there are no reserved seats which they may purchase. A limited number of admission tickets will be sold for the main floor and the first balcony at $1 and for the second balcony at 75 cents.

All those who were not subscribers last year, and who have made written application for tickets, if any were to be had, may renew their application for the season of 1914-1915, and in case there are any vacant seats another season, the seats will be assigned to them in the order in which the applications are received and at prices that will be fixed by the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the management of the orchestra, in due

---

While the opera house of the Academy of Music had been large enough for most of the audiences during the first few years, it has been certain from the first that it would not be large enough to accommodate audiences after the people have gotten into the habit of coming to the Academy. It will be desirable in time that another balcony be added to the opera house to accommodate the audiences at the many important concerts given at the Academy.

The increased demand for tickets is a testimonial not only to the position which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has held, but also to Dr. Muck as conductod. He proceeds in a dignified manner, not seeking to acclaim himself or his orchestra from the audience, giving programmes the first year upon which he will be able to improve from year to year. In other words, Dr. Muck did not last year play all of his "trump cards." The programmes for the coming season will be found to be even more interesting than those of last, and the soloists engaged are of the highest standing possible.

POLITICAL AND

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 21 191

adjudication.

GADSKI HERE TO-NIGHT AS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Operatic Soprano to Sing in First Concert of Season.

1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first concert of the season in Infantry Hall at 8:15 to-night, with Madame Johanna Gadski, the leading dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, as soloist.

Madame Gadski will sing as her first number the well-known aria "Ocean Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's opera "Oberon." Her second selection will be three songs by Wagner, "Im Treibhaus," "Traume," and "Schmerzen."

The orchestral numbers are to be Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony," Desar Franck's symphonic poem "Les Eolides" and Grieg's overture "In Autumn."

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 191

MUSICAL NOTES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, which has been in progress since Monday, has quite come up to the highest expectations of the management and shows that there was no mistake made in giving Providence six instead of five concerts. The first concert will come next Tuesday night in Infantry Hall and the seats for this will go on sale at Seddon's news stand, Butler Exchange, 123 Westminster street, next Saturday morning.

The soloist at this concert will be Mme. Johanna Gadski, the greatest dramatic soprano of our time, and the leading singer of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Mme. Gadski will sing twice. Her first number will be the big aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's opera "Oberon," and her second number will be three songs of Wagner, "Im Treibhaus," "Traume" and "Schmerzen," all of which were studies of parts of "Tristan and Isolde." She will sing these with orchestral accompaniment.

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 19 1913

WITH the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening, in Infantry Hall, the musical season here will be fittingly opened. The principal orchestral number will be Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A-major, with which the programme will begin. It was the last movement of this symphony that Richard Wagner termed the "Apotheosis of the dance." Dr. Muck played it at his opening concert in Boston and won four recalls from the enthusiastic audience. The other numbers will be the symphonic poem, "Les Eolides" of Cesar Franck, one of the finest examples of French music, and the "Autumn" music of the Norwegian, Edvard Greig. The programme in its proper order is as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 7 in A-major; Weber, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from "Oberon"; Cesar Franck, "Les Eolides"; Wagner, three poems, "Im Treibhaus," "Traume," "Schmerzen"; Grieg overture, "Im Herbst."

The soloist will be Madame Gadski, who is a favorite in Providence, where she has sung a number of times in past years. She is the possessor of a voice of unusual power and beauty, and she is a complete mistress of the mechanics of singing. Madame Gadski, although she is a German, might almost be counted among American artists, for her entire career has been spent in this country. Since she first came to America in the spring of 1895, as a young woman of less than 20, she has spent every season here and sings in the neighborhood of one hundred times each winter in the Metropolitan Opera House. On Tuesday night she will sing as her first number the aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's "Oberon," and her second number will be the three songs written by Wagner when a resident of Zurich at the time he was at work on his "Tristan and Isolde." These songs, the words of which were written by Madame Wesendonck, are studies for different parts of the opera.

Mme. Gadski.
Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra This Week.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 19 1913

Established

THE first important event of the musical season comes this week, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives the first Providence concert of its 33d year. In the 32 years of its existence this venerable society has seen two other symphony orchestras rise and take rival positions at the top of the list of American orchestral organizations, falling below the Boston Symphony only slightly, and many believe only in the department of strings. Six or seven other symphony societies have also sprung up in this time to command attention, as well as many other less known and less worthy orchestras in the smaller cities of the country. But still the Boston Symphony rightly holds an impregnable position on the Atlantic coast, and in the estimation of European connoisseurs.

Perhaps never before in the history of the society—certainly not within several years—have the players as a unified body accomplished such marvellous results as last year under the baton of Dr. Muck. The members play with an enthusiasm seldom if ever equalled before, even some of the familiarly stolid faces seeming in the concluding concerts of last year to have taken on an unwonted light of inspiration.

Dr. Muck's policy seems to be to revive many of the pieces long forgotten but deserving a rehearing. He seems particularly fond of producing again some of the works which were given their first hearing during his first term of service several years ago. This policy is to be commended, as it enables interested listeners to hear works partaking somewhat the nature of novelty, which were formerly heard with enjoyment. While Dr. Muck's interpretation does not always pass unchallenged, it at least never fails to be infused with an enthusiasm that is elsewhere lacking.

At the opening concert on Tuesday evening Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony" will be the piece de resistance. This symphony of the dance rhythms has not been heard here in some time and will be welcome.

PADEREWSKI,
Who Will Be Heard in the Concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The soloist of the first Boston Symphony concert on Tuesday evening next is to be Mme. Johanna Gadski, the foremost of Wagnerian dramatic sopranos. Announcement has been made that Mme. Gadski will sing an aria from Weber's fairy opera, "Oberon," as well as several other German songs. Mme. Gadski is also scheduled to sing in Providence at the third concert of the Steinert series on Nov. 25, when she will doubtless include some songs from her greater Wagnerian roles.

Mme. Gadski, who was born at Anclam, Prussia, in 1871, made her debut at an early age in Lortzing's opera, "Undine," in Berlin. She first sang in America in 1895 under the direction of Walter Damrosch, appearing under his management for three years. Mme. Gadski has always been a prime favorite at the Metropolitan under the direction of Grau and later of Conried, and is still a most valued member of the Metropolitan forces. She has also won a large clientele of admirers in London, where she has sung at Covent Garden, and wherever she has been on her extensive concert tours. Her beautiful voice possesses strength as well as smoothness and clarity.

advertiser
Oct 26

SYMPHONY NO. 4 BY SIBELIUS

HEARD FOR FIRST TIME IN CITY YESTERDAY

Somewhat Morose Composition Leads Off Weekly Concert by Dr. Muck's Charges.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Sibelius. Symphony No. 4. (First time in Boston)
Handel. Concerto for two Wind Choirs.
Gluck. Tambourin, Gavotte, Chaconne. (Arr. by Gevaert.)
Haydn. Symphony in D major.

Dr. Muck has given us three purely orchestral concerts, all in a row. The present writer is supremely contented with this and is glad to have the solo display conspicuous by its absence. Judging by the long waiting line yesterday for second balcony seats, the public are satisfied with it, also. The programme on this occasion was, however, not without its contrasts; in fact the first and second parts were as wide apart as the poles. Before the walk in the corridor the audience had the most modern dissonances and progressions; after their promenade they had plain and undistorted melody and absolutely symmetrical musical form.

Sibelius has, it seems, broken into Debussy's pasture. He is not as delicate as the Frenchman, but he has whole-tone progressions galore. But, after all, these progressions have been in use in at least one Oriental country for lo, these many years, wherefore it is possible that the next composer of the future may come from Siam.

The score of the Sibelius Symphony is not extreme in its instrumental demands. With the exception of bells, introduced in the finale, it is almost the "classical orchestra," but the "classical" ends there: for the treatment is of the 20th, or perhaps the 21st century. The work begins with a passage of great promise, sombre, and with the picturesque and monotonous reiteration that is typical of Scandinavia. Evil is suggested, and the muted horns blow very dismal blasts. There are "sounds and lamentations heard in the air,"—that is if there were any air, which there is not, for mere tune is left out of this mis-called symphony. There were dissonant and doleful mutterings, generally leading nowhere.

One could understand the feelings of the Frenchman who once asked, after a piece of music—"Ce Sonate, que me vent-il?" So we were tempted more than once to ask—"What does this Symphony want?"

The second movement was as fragmentary as the first and ended, like its predecessor, for no apparent reason. The third movement, on the contrary, wound up with an everlasting organ-point which suggested an end several minutes before it came.

Finding how easy this trick was to do, Sibelius continued the organ-point business (an organ-point is a continuous bass-note against changing harmonies), a long way through the finale, and this last movement contained some of the most discordant effects ever achieved even in modern music.

The symphony is nominally in A minor; practically it is in all known, and some unknown, keys. Yet it is not, on the whole, a repulsive work. It has moments of greatness. It seems to be the work of a genius who has not yet found himself. He is still groping, and often ineffectually.

Could it have been delicate sarcasm which caused Dr. Muck to place the most formal, the most melodic, the most dainty music against this fragmentary mass of good intentions?

Handel's two choirs of wind made us think that the Longy Club had captured the orchestra. We have had so much that is interesting and valuable in this field from the above-mentioned organization, that they seem to have the right of eminent domain in wind music, but, in this instance, the two bands of wind instruments were tied together with strings.

The second and fifth movements of the Handelian Concerto had some superb horn passages which were nobly played, and it is worth remembering that Handel was the first to use the horn in orchestra and was roundly criticised for doing so. Nevertheless the fanfares in the rollicking finale made a splendid effect, and the applause was hearty and continuous after this concerto.

Old Father Gevaert, most assiduous of musical antiquaries, retouched the Tambourin, Gavotte, and Chaconne of Gluck with reverent hand. All of these dance are old forms. One can find charming Ga vottes long before Gluck's time, or eve that of Bach. The so-called "Amaryllis," which is ascribed to Louis XIII. and wa composed by Baltazarini, is the daintiest o avottes, and was written in 1581. This se three dances took one back to the tim en most music meant either serenity o lity, and both emotions were here pre nted in turn.

There was French piquancy and grace i ese old dance numbers and their precis form, and clear symmetry, were not detrimental to their popular success. Dr. Muc brought out the flavor of each perfectly; th rollick of the Tambourin, the genialit of the Gavotte and the dignity of the Cha onne were all perfectly caught up, an e audience abundantly testified its enjoy ent at the end of each number

---

Haydn's pretty symphony sent everybo ome in a good humor. We always main ain that, as a whole, Haydn's sym onies wear better than those of Moza ozart often attempted dramatic effec hich seem very tame in this 20th ce ry, while Haydn is content to pratt in a simple 18th-century manner, which wins everybody because of its naturalness and lack of pretension. The little innovations in strict form seem very innocuous in these days. The evolving of a subordinate theme out of the chief theme in the first movement, or the changes in the return in the finale, would not now cause sleeplessness to the strictest critic.

The variations of the chief theme in the slow movement (Rondo-form) were dainty, although it is in the slow movements and in the Minuets that Haydn has faded most. The contrast between the minor introduction and the jolly first theme in the first movement was effectively drawn, and the drone bass of the finale was given its full rustic flavor.

Dr. Muck does not play this music with an air of condescension, but enters heartily into its rollicking spirit and shows the modern auditor that there is much more in it than he would have imagined. We do not wish Music to retrogress to the style of Haydn, but we frequently wish that our composers of today had one-quarter of his melodic invention, and we still take a hearty enjoyment in the music of the epoch represented in the second part of this concert, the time when people had quiet nerves and hearty appetites.

GLOBE—SATURDA

OCTOBER 25.

SIBELIUS' FOURTH SYMPHONY HEARD

Rugged, Convincing Work, Superbly Played.

Handel, Haydn and Gluck Complete Program of Classic Length.

The program of the third Symphony rehearsal, conducted by Dr Muck, was as follows:

Sibelius........................Symphony No. 4
First time in Boston.
Handel...Concerto in F major for strings and two wind choirs.
Gluck...Three dances from Ballet Suite, No. 2
Haydn. Symphony in D major (B and H, No. 2)

Some will call the symphony incoherent, chaotic, insufferably dissonant, the music of a madman. Some will be in doubt what to think. There will be some who may have found its stern originality too disquieting to arrive at any conclusion and are grateful to Dr Muck for the liberal hour of Handel, Gluck and Haydn to wash its acrid sounds from their ears.

Some will discover that it is the last word of a musical science that steadily has sought to endow the material instruments of an orchestra with an increasing subtlety and spirituality of expression, so that illusion of things imagined may be more vivid, more stimulating, more saturated with poetic truth, than reality itself. Mrs Newmarch has said that Sibelius wrote much of this symphony in communion with Nature in his northland. Some will discover that it has elements of greatness, others that it is epoch making, and should be held aloft as a torch in the path of the future.

Of the two earlier symphonies by Sibelius heard in Boston, the second showed a cunning in color which some mistake for depth or significance of ideas. The first possessed a virile and noble style that warrants frequent hearings of it. Sibelius attained a lofty and sustained beauty of epic character in the first movement which he almost duplicates in some of these pages.

Some one of the other arts may hold a recompense for those who find no pleasure, no spur to the imagination, no enkindling, transporting power in such a work as this, that is to say, when conducted and played with the amazing insight, understanding and virtuosity with which it was given yesterday. There are some for whom music, books and the drama must be a concord of sweet sounds.

Sibelius has written certain of these measures as a poet, as the first man upon the first day, to whom the voice of every living thing was fresh with the keenness of youth. He has here a wider and more constant play of fancy than in the two preceding symphonies, but these sudden transitions, this troop of new ideas in development do not suggest incongruity and unfinished abruptness, but rather vividity of contrast in rhythms, timbres, choirs and above all in tonality. Whereas the academician is disturbed at the freedom of form, the composer has spoken in the vein of rhapsody, at times with the abandon and spontaneity of improvisation.

Much will be said of the harshness of many passages. The hearer speedily is conscious of a masterful use of dissonance. There in an instance in the final movement, when Sibelius appears to revel in a needless orgy of cacophony, but the symphony generally is remarkable for the arresting emotional force of the passing train of tonalities, a perspective of them, with one advancing and clashing upon another. There are nuances of harmonic color, an ebb and flow of dissonance comparable to nuances in degree of tone.

There is a personality in nature as portrayed in this music that is filled with strangeness and mystery. The opening pages of the first movement recall Rachmaninoff's "Isle of the Dead," not so much by any repeated outline or formula, as by the kinship in the brooding ominous unrest, while there is no hint at any "program," this first movement [illegible] images. It speaks o[illegible]d outlines of rocks, of [illegible]ing of the sea, of the [illegible] upon [illegible]s, of strange and sinister beings [illegible] forest.

It is no[illegible] music [illegible]e saddled with a prescribed meaning, nor is it to be told off in a rhetorical flourish of futile words. It is music to be heard repeatedly to be understood. Its meanings may be as varied as the tragedies and caprices of life itself, and the hearer will translate for himself its passing moods—the noble sombreness, the flaming, sharply punctuated outcrys as of a soul in anguish, the grim irony, the impish sardonic humor with its peasant flavor as the prankish ending of the scherzo, the unending conflict in tonalities as the impact of foe upon foe, the struggle and the recoil, the deep vein of melancholy and lament, at times fierce and consuming, again almost tender, as the song for 'cellos in the slow movement.

and interest. May it be repeated during the year.

The Gluck dances were played with exquisite delicacy. The horn quartet, including prominently Mr Jaenicke and Messrs Longy and Mueller in the oboe duet, added to the pleasure of the Handel concerto. Haydn made the classical antidote for Sibelius of three numbers and 12 movements somewhat long.

HERALD

OCTOBER 25.

NEW SYMPHONY BY SIBELIUS

Strangely Original Work Performed at Third Public Rehearsal.

CHEER UP, SIBELIUS!

Your Melancholy Finland Is Said to Have a Good Climate in Summer.

By PHILIP HALE.

The third Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 4........................Sibelius
Concerto for string and two wind choirs
Handel
Tambourin, Gavotte and Chaconne....
Gluck-Gevaert
Symphony in D major, No. 2......Haydn

The symphony of Sibelius was performed here for the first time. The excellent Mrs. Newmarck, who hovers over the Finn composer with a protective wing, has uttered cries of admiration over this strange work, believing that "there are moments when we feel ourselves alone with Nature's breathing things." It may not be irreverent to remark that the wind instruments in this symphony do indeed have much to do.

The first performance was probably at Helsingfors in 1911. A little over a year ago the symphony was performed in England at the Birmingham Festival, and critics and general public did not know what to make of it. When the symphony was performed last March in New York, Mr. Damrosch, who in the opinion of some is a more fluent talker than a skilled conductor, made prefatory remarks of an apologetic nature, and begged the audience to know that he did not necessarily like this music because he put it on the program. Mr. Henderson found much that was original and impressive in the symphony. Mr. Krehbiel spoke of cubists in music, and the Evening Past was reminded of a drunkard's ravings. In art it is not a good thing for brethren to dwell together in unity.

A work like this symphony, music that is unconventional and indisputably original, is performed once and then put away for a season or two. This is not fair to the composer or the audience. Nor would a diligent study of the score before the concert assist materially the hearer of one performance; for the music is interesting by reason of its unexpected effect on the ears. Passages that would apparently be cacophonous occasionally turn out t be impressive—although there are ma passages of ineffective ugliness—an passages that lead the hearer to expec rejoicing euphony pass for nothin when they are heard.

Of course, we shall be told by th disciples of Henry Thomas Buckle th Sibelius is under the control of Finni scenery, climate and diet. Yet we a informed by travellers returning fr Finland that the scenery is charmin that the weather of last summer w favorable; that there is an uncommon good hotel at Helsingfors, although t waiters speak no other language th the native. There are Fins on Cape C industrious, cheery souls, not at all f bidding or sinister, and when they si their scale is normal enough and th folk songs no more melancholy than a old folk song. If Finland were as ho lessly dreary as Sibelius paints it music there would not be many left rage against Russian oppression and chant the glory of Kalevala, the land heroes.

If a composer works continually u his village belfry and strives to be tional at any cost, his music in course of time will have chiefly ethnological interest. Beethoven's n is in the catalogue, German-Austr but no one thinks first of his nation or dwelling place, and this may be of the old Italian church writers, G Handel, Mozart, Couperin, the Ba the Prelude and Fugues. No one to argue whether Cesar Franck Flemish or a Walloon. The cyn indifferent Auber never went to but the glow and vivacity of Napl in his "Muette de Portici."

The question is whether Sibelius ever leave Finland. Ferdinand David was reproached for not dismounting from his camel, and his music, when it is played today, is praised only for a certain exotic charm. Charpentier is still on Montmartre and his "Julien," from all accounts, is not equal to the preceding "Louise" with its wholesome flavor of onion soup.

It would be foolish to speak as Sir Oracle about this symphony after so short an acquaintance. To me it was a disappointment. When an English audience at a music festival cannot understand a work there should be at once a burning desire to hear it. The symphony suffers first of all from a monotony in mood. The melodic line drawn at length or only suggested is too often without strength or beauty. In music where a monotony of expression reigns any unexpected passage, as a few measures for lightly tripping flutes or for [illegible] Symphony an attentive and favorable hearing. The performance merited the applause. The other pieces on the program were greatly enjoyed, especially Gluck's dance tunes and the movement of Handel's concerto in which the solo oboes, admirably played by Messrs. Longy and Mueller, have an important part. The performance of the orchestra throughout the concert was fully up to the high standard that has made this body famous.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Mozart, Symphony in E flat major; Mozart, "Come Scogia" from "Cosi fan tutte" (Miss Geraldin Farrar); Schillings, Two orchestra fantasies, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen" (first time here); Wagner, "Im Treibhaus, Traeume, Schmerzen (Miss Farrar); Weber, "Jubel" overture.

TON POST,

OCTOBER 25, 1913

SIBELIUS' 4TH BY SYMPHONY

Remarkable Extreme of Northern Impressionism

BY OLIN DOWNES

The Fourth Symphony ~~of Jean Sibell~~us was performed for the first time in Boston yesterday afternoon at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. This symphony is in certain respects the most remarkable work which has yet been produced by one of the most original and interesting composers of the present period. It is, for instance, the extreme of northern impressionism, and this is very far from the delicate impressionism of, let us say, a Debussy, with his tone-pictures of moonshine, floating clouds, the summer night on the sea, the rain falling in a garden. Sibelius speaks of gray skies and silent expanses of lakes and forests, or bristling crags and winds and supernatural sounds in a wild land. And, if he ever knew, he has now forgotten how to please.

The fourth symphony is the soliloquy of a man alone with nature, bitter against fate, cursing the heavens. Sibelius had ere this given offence by reason of the brusque and unvarnished character of his superb music, but in this last symphony he has developed the gentle art of making enemies to a point hitherto unsuspected by even his most enthusiastic admirers.

It is not the intention of this writer to review the work in detail until after the second performance this evening. The fourth symphony is the work of a master which at least merits this consideration. In fact, such a vital and impressive composition should be repeated at these concerts, and repeated soon. It is not easy to absorb after one or two hearings. The Sibelius of the fourth symphony is a hundred miles away from the composer we in Boston have known up to this day, and bold and virile as is his earlier music, there is little in any of it that has been heard here to account for the extremely advanced manner of the new work. Here the composer has elaborated harmonic idioms of his own which place him in the very vanguard of the leading innovators of today.

Look at the work on paper, and looking, "hear" the music, if you can. There are very few indeed who will be capable of this feat. Sibelius juxtaposes, not only instruments, but harmonies, not only harmonize, but keys, with a mastery and audacity which according to at least the majority will be ridiculous, and perhaps, to a small minority, sublime. His absolute mastery of his medium at least, is apparent on every page. We have here, not a young experimenter dabbling in modern effects, but a mature artist who expresses with absolute precision exactly what he wishes to say. It is easy to believe Mrs. Rosa Newmarch, quoted in the programme book as remarking that the fourth symphony was composed in the midst of nature. We can also feel reasonably sure that there was not a grand piano handy; that the composer heard strange new harmonies which he was evidently able to put down accurately and immediately on paper. Uncompromising, powerful and imaginative the music is.

Whether, in exchange for a surprisingly individual manner hardly hinted at before Sibelius has not sacrificed other most valuable features of his earlier style — the splendid, long-breathed themes, the breadth and power of structure, the simple, yet haunting harmonies—this is a matter yet to be decided. Sufficient for the day that Dr. Muck, so far as one could judge, gave an admirable performance of a singular and most interesting work, and that to him attaches the credit of first introducing that music in this city.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

advertiser
Oct 24

SYMPHONY NO. 4 BY SIBELIUS

HEARD FOR FIRST TIME IN CITY YESTERDAY

Somewhat Morose Composition Leads Off Weekly Concert by Dr. Muck's Charges.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Sibelius. Symphony No. 4. (First time in Boston)
Handel. Concerto for two Wind Choirs.
Gluck. Tambourin. Gavotte, Chaconne. (Arr. by Gevaert.)
Haydn. Symphony in D major.

Dr. Muck has given us three purely orchestral concerts, all in a row. The present writer is supremely contented with this and is glad to have the solo display conspicuous by its absence. Judging by the long waiting line yesterday for second balcony seats, the public are satisfied with it, also. The programme on this occasion was, however, not without its contrasts; in fact the first and second parts were as wide apart as the poles. Before the walk in the corridor the audience had the most modern dissonances and progressions; after their promenade they had plain and undistorted melody and absolutely symmetrical musical form.

Sibelius has, it seems, broken into Debussy's pasture. He is not as delicate as the Frenchman, but he has whole-tone progressions galore. But, after all, these progressions have been in use in at least one Oriental country for lo, these many years, wherefore it is possible that the next composer of the future may come from Siam.

The score of the Sibelius Symphony is not extreme in its instrumental demands. With the exception of bells, introduced in the finale, it is almost the "classical orchestra," but the "classical" ends there: for the treatment is of the 20th, or perhaps the 21st century. The work begins with a passage of great promise, sombre, and with the picturesque and monotonous reiteration that is typical of Scandinavia. Evil is suggested, and the muted horns blow very dismal blasts. There are "sounds and lamentations heard in the air,"—that is if there were any air, which there is not, for mere tune is left out of this mis-called symphony. There were dissonant and doleful mutterings, generally leading nowhere.

One could understand the feelings of the Frenchman who once asked, after a piece of music—"Ce Sonate, que me vent-il?" So we were tempted more than once to ask—"What does this Symphony want?"

The second movement was as fragmentary as the first and ended, like its predecessor, for no apparent reason. The third movement, on the contrary, wound up with an everlasting organ-point which suggested an end several minutes before it came.

Finding how easy this trick was to do. Sibelius continued the organ-point business (an organ-point is a continuous bass-note against changing harmonies), a long way through the finale, and this last movement contained some of the most discordant effects ever achieved even in modern music.

The symphony is nominally in A minor; practically it is in all known, and some unknown, keys. Yet it is not, on the whole, a repulsive work. It has moments of greatness. It seems to be the work of a genius who has not yet found himself. He is still groping, and often ineffectually.

Could it have been delicate sarcasm which caused Dr. Muck to place the most formal, the most melodic, the most dainty music against this fragmentary mass of good intentions?

Handel's two choirs of wind made us think that the Longy Club had captured the orchestra. We have had so much that is interesting and valuable in this field from the above-mentioned organization, that they seem to have the right of eminent domain in wind music, but, in this instance, the two bands of wind instruments were tied together with strings.

The second and fifth movements of the Handelian Concerto had some superb horn passages which were nobly played, an d it is worth remembering that Handel was the first to use the horn in orchestra and was roundly criticised for doing so. Nevertheless the fanfares in the rollicking finale made a splendid effect, and the applause was hearty and continuous after this concerto.

Old Father Gevaert, most assiduous of musical antiquaries, retouched the Tambourin, Gavotte, and Chaconne of Gluck, with reverent hand. All of these dances are old forms. One can find charming Gavottes long before Gluck's time, or even that of Bach. The so-called "Amaryllis," which is ascribed to Louis XIII. and was composed by Baltazarini, is the daintiest of gavottes, and was written in 1581. This set three dances took one back to the time en most music meant either serenity or lity, and both emotions were here prented in turn.

There was French piquancy and grace in these old dance numbers and their precise form, and clear symmetry, were not detrimental to their popular success. Dr. Muck brought out the flavor of each perfectly; the rollick of the Tambourin, the geniality of the Gavotte and the dignity of the Chaconne were all perfectly caught up, and the audience abundantly testified its enjoyment at the end of each number Haydn's pretty symphony sent everybody home in a good humor. We always maintain that, as a whole, Haydn's symphonies wear better than those of Mozart. Mozart often attempted dramatic effects which seem very tame in this 20th century, while Haydn is content to prattle on in a simple 18th century manner, which wins everybody because of its naturalness and lack of pretension. The little innovations in strict form seem very innocuous in these days. The evolving of a subordinate theme out of the chief theme in the first movement, or the changes in the return in the finale, would not now cause sleeplessness to the strictest critic.

The variations of the chief theme in the slow movement (Rondo-form) were dainty, although it is in the slow movements and in the Minuets that Haydn has faded most. The contrast between the minor introduction and the jolly first theme in the first movement was effectively drawn, and the drone bass of the finale was given its full rustic flavor.

Dr. Muck does not play this music with an air of condescension, but enters heartily into its rollicking spirit and shows the modern auditor that there is much more in it than he would have imagined. We do not wish Music to retrogress to the style of Haydn, but we frequently wish that our composers of today had one-quarter of his melodic invention, and we still take a hearty enjoyment in the music of the epoch represented in the second part of this concert, the time when people had quiet nerves and hearty appetites.

GLOBE—SATURDA

OCTOBER 25.

SIBELIUS' FOURTH SYMPHONY HEARD

Rugged, Convincing Work, Superbly Played.

Handel, Haydn and Gluck Complete Program of Classic Length.

The program of the third Symphony rehearsal, conducted by Dr Muck, was as follows:

Sibelius....................Symphony No. 4
First time in Boston.
Handel...Concerto in F major for strings and two wind choirs.
Gluck...Three dances from Ballet Suite, No. 2
Haydn. Symphony in D major (B and H, No. 2)

Some will call the symphony incoherent, chaotic, insufferably dissonant, the music of a madman. Some will be in doubt what to think. There will be some who may have found its stern originality too disquieting to arrive at any conclusion and are grateful to Dr Muck for the liberal hour of Handel, Gluck and Haydn to wash its acrid sounds from their ears.

Some will discover that it is the last word of a musical science that steadily has sought to endow the material instruments of an orchestra with an increasing subtlety and spirituality of expression, so that illusion of things imagined may be more vivid, more stimulating, more saturated with poetic truth, than reality itself. Mrs Newmarch has said that Sibelius wrote much of this symphony in communion with Nature in his northland. Some will discover that it has elements of greatness, others that it is epoch making, and should be held aloft as a torch in the path of the future.

Of the two earlier symphonies by Sibelius heard in Boston, the second showed a cunning in color which some mistake for depth or significance of ideas. The first possessed a virile and noble style that warrants frequent hearings of it. Sibelius attained a lofty and sustained beauty of epic character in the first movement which he almost duplicates in some of these pages.

Some one of the other arts may hold a recompense for those who find no pleasure, no spur to the imagination, no enkindling, transporting power in such a work as this, that is to say, when conducted and played with the amazing insight, understanding and virtuosity with which it was given yesterday. There are some for whom music, books and the drama must be a concord of sweet sounds.

Sibelius has written certain of these measures as a poet, as the first man upon the first day, to whom the voice of every living thing was fresh with the keenness of youth. He has here a wider and more constant play of fancy than in the two preceding symphonies, but these sudden transitions, this troop of new ideas in development do not suggest incongruity and unfinished abruptness, but rather vividity of contrast in rhythms, timbres, choirs and above all in tonality. Whereas the academician is disturbed at the freedom of form, the composer has spoken in the vein of rhapsody, at times with the abandon and spontaneity of improvisation.

Much will be said of the harshness of many passages. The hearer speedily conscious of a masterful use of sonance. There in an instance in final movement, when Sibelius ap to revel in a needless orgy of hony, but the symphony gens remarkable for the arresting l force of the passing train ties, a perspective of them, advancing and clashing upon There are nuances of harr, an ebb and flow of dismparable to nuances in dee.

personality in nature as his music that is filled with d mystery. The opening first movement recall "Isle of the Dead," not ny repeated outline or he kinship in the broodest, while there is no am," this first move images. It speaks d outlines of rocks. ing of the sea, of s, of strange and orest. saddled with a is it to be told rish of futile heard repeat its meanings agedies and the hearer ts passing the flams as of a ony, the peasant of the tonalie, the vein times umost tennos in the slow al up 1½ it, 1

ry.

ir cup
I have ous.
1874.

mn—Will ands are Summer nch thick
How much om cottage w so many ich we have e, but alas!
al condition ny one know water. This t seems hard ne one tell us nd if it is for nd of stores?
it will help a Contributor.

S.

and interest. May it be repeated during the year.

The Gluck dances were played with exquisite delicacy. The horn quartet, including prominently Mr Jaenicke and Messrs Longy and Mueller in the oboe duet, added to the pleasure of the Handel concerto. Haydn made the classical antidote for Sibelius of three numbers and 12 movements somewhat long.

HERALD

OCTOBER 25.

NEW SYMPHONY BY SIBELIUS

Strangely Original Work Performed at Third Public Rehearsal.

CHEER UP, SIBELIUS!

Your Melancholy Finland Is Said to Have a Good Climate in Summer.

By PHILIP HALE.

The third Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 4....................Sibelius
Concerto for string and two wind choirs
Handel
Tambourin, Gavotte and Chaconne....
Gluck-Gevaert
Symphony in D major, No. 2......Haydn

The symphony of Sibelius was performed here for the first time. The excellent Mrs. Newmarck, who hovers over the Finn composer with a protective wing, has uttered cries of admiration over this strange work, believing that "there are moments when we feel ourselves alone with Nature's breathing things." It may not be irreverent to remark that the wind instruments in this symphony do indeed have much to do.

The first performance was probably at Helsingfors in 1911. A little over a year ago the symphony was performed in England at the Birmingham Festival, and critics and general public did not know what to make of it. When the symphony was performed last March in New York, Mr. Damrosch, who in the opinion of some is a more fluent talker than a skilled conductor, made prefatory remarks of an apologetic nature, and begged the audience to know that he did not necessarily like this music because he put it on the program. Mr. Henderson found much that was original and impressive in the symphony. Mr. Krehbiel spoke of cubists in music, and the Evening Past was reminded of a drunkard's ravings. In art it is not a good thing for brethren to dwell together in unity.

A work like this symphony, music that is unconventional and indisputably original, is performed once and then put away for a season or two. This is not fair to the composer or the audience. Nor would a diligent study of the score before the concert assist materially the hearer of one performance; for the music is interesting by reason of its unexpected effect on the ears. Passages that would apparently be cacophonous occasionally turn out t be impressive—although there are man passages of ineffective ugliness—an passages that lead the hearer to expec rejoicing euphony pass for nothin when they are heard.

Of course, we shall be told by th disciples of Henry Thomas Buckle th Sibelius is under the control of Finnis scenery, climate and diet. Yet we a informed by travellers returning fro Finland that the scenery is charming, that the weather of last summer was favorable; that there is an uncommonly good hotel at Helsingfors, although the waiters speak no other language than the native. There are Fins on Cape Cod, industrious, cheery souls, not at all forbidding or sinister, and when they sing, their scale is normal enough and their folk songs no more melancholy than a old folk song. If Finland were as ho lessly dreary as Sibelius paints it music there would not be many left rage against Russian oppression and chant the glory of Kalevala, the land of heroes.

If a composer works continually under his village belfry and strives to be national at any cost, his music in the course of time will have chiefly an ethnological interest. Beethoven's music is in the catalogue, German-Austrian; but no one thinks first of his nationality or dwelling place, and this may be said of the old Italian church writers, Gluck, Handel, Mozart, Couperin, the Bach of the Prelude and Fugues. No one stops to argue whether Cesar Franck was Flemish or a Walloon. The cynically indifferent Auber never went to Italy, but the glow and vivacity of Naples is in his "Muette de Portici."

The question is whether Sibelius will ever leave Finland. Ferdinand David was reproached for not dismounting from his camel, and his music, when it is played today, is praised only for a certain exotic charm. Charpentier is still on Montmartre and his "Julien," from all accounts, is not equal to the preceding "Louise" with its wholesome flavor of onion soup.

It would be foolish to speak as Sir Oracle about this symphony after so short an acquaintance. To me it was a disappointment. When an English audience at a music festival cannot understand a work there should be at once a burning desire to hear it. The symphony suffers first of all from a monotony in mood. The melodic line drawn at length or only suggested is too often without strength or beauty. In music where a monotony of expression any unexpected passages, as a features for lightly tripping flutes Symphony an attentive and favorable hearing. The performance merited the applause. The other pieces on the program were greatly enjoyed, especially Gluck's dance tunes and the movement of Handel's concerto in which the solo oboes, admirably played by Messrs. Longy and Mueller, have an important part. The performance of the orchestra throughout the concert was fully up to the high standard that has made this body famous.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Mozart, Symphony in E flat major; Mozart, "Come Scogia" from "Cosi fan tutte" (Miss Geraldine Farrar); Schillings, Two orchestra fantasies, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen" (first time here); Wagner, "Im Treibhaus, Traeume, Schmerzen (Miss Farrar); Weber, "Jubel" overture.

TON POST,

OCTOBER 25, 1913

SIBELIUS' 4TH BY SYMPHONY

RemarKable Extreme of Northern Impressionism

BY OLIN DOWNES

The Fourth Symphony ~~of Jean Sibelius~~ was performed for the first time in Boston yesterday afternoon at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. This symphony is in certain respects the most remarkable work which has yet been produced by one of the most original and interesting composers of the present period. It is, for instance, the extreme of northern impressionism, and this is very far from the delicate impressionism of, let us say, a Debussy, with his tone-pictures of moonshine, floating clouds, the summer night on the sea, the rain falling in a garden. Sibelius speaks of gray skies and silent expanses of lakes and forests, or bristling crags and winds and supernatural sounds in a wild land. And, if he ever knew, he has now forgotten how to please.

The fourth symphony is the soliloquy of a man alone with nature, bitter against fate, cursing the heavens. Sibelius had ere this given offence by reason of the brusque and unvarnished character of his superb music, but in this last symphony he has developed the gentle art of making enemies to a point hitherto unsuspected by even his most enthusiastic admirers.

It is not the intention of this writer to review the work in detail until after the second performance this evening. The fourth symphony is the work of a master which at least merits this consideration. In fact, such a vital and impressive composition should be repeated at these concerts, and repeated soon. It is not easy to absorb after one or two hearings. The Sibelius of the fourth symphony is a hundred miles away from the composer we in Boston have known up to this day, and bold and virile as is his earlier music, there is little in any of it that has been heard here to account for the extremely advanced manner of the new work. Here the composer has elaborated harmonic idioms of his own which place him in the very vanguard of the leading innovators of today.

Look at the work on paper, and looking, "hear" the music, if you can. There are very few indeed who will be capable of this feat. Sibelius juxtaposes, not only instruments, but harmonies, not only harmonize, but keys, with a mastery and audacity which according to at least the majority will be ridiculous, and perhaps, to a small minority, sublime. His absolute mastery of his medium at least, is apparent on every page. We have here, not a young exter dabbling in modern effects, nature artist who expresses with e precision exactly what he wishay. It is easy to believe Mrs. Newmarch, quoted in the proe book as remarking that the symphony was composed in the midst of nature. We can also feel reasonably sure that there was not a grand piano handy; that the composer heard strange new harmonies which he was evidently able to put down accurately d immediately on paper. Uncompro verful and imaginative the exchange for a surprisal manner hardly hinted lius has not sacrificed uable features of his — the splendid, longs, the breadth and ure, the simple, yet ies—this is a matter Sufficient for the k, so far as one an admirable perular and most in that to him at first introducing ity.

d.
1 0½ 2⅝ 0¼
81
5 7⅜ 46¼ 83¼ 10⅝ 91 ad its ear in Mem-er, en-

JOURNAL—

OCTOBER 25,

AUDIENCE DAZED BY CUBIST MUSIC

But Several Enthusiasts Applaud Symphony by Sibelius.

By E. F. Harkins

Several persons in Symphony yesterday afternoon applauded the performance of the first novelty of the season, the Sibelius Symphony No. 4, in A minor. Most of those in the large audience sat amused, smiling, wondering what to make of it. They had tasted Cubist music at last and were not quite sure whether they liked it.

It was the faintest applause for a novelty since the Lendvai symphony had its American premiere at these same concerts last February.

To one unbridled Sibelius enthusiast in the second balcony this symphony was a source of quite delirious delight. But his frantic handclaps were diametrically opposed by the general silence and surprise.

There were gleams of sunshine and melody in the third and fourth movements, but for the most part this latest symphony from the pen of Finland's foremost composer is a tangle of the most dismal dissonances. It eclipses the saddest and sourest moments of Debussy. Compared with this, the once cryptic Wagner's music must seem like so many jubilee songs.

When the Sibelius work was played last winter by the New York Symphony Orchestra the conductor felt constrained to tell the audience that he washed his hands of it. Dr. Muck did nothing of the kind. He was as silent as the sphinx, and no trace of distress or amusement appeared on his face as he returned to the stage to acknowledge the ardent applause of the very small minority.

But how fortunate that minority if cacophony is to prevail in the future and the mind of the music lover is to be uplifted to the seventh heaven with music almost if not quite as lovely as that furnished by a Chinese band!

And what a jar it must have been to these doters upon dissonance to hear the Handel concerto for strings and wind choirs, the Gluck ballet suite and the second Haydn symphony! Nothing could have been more Philistine than such a trio of numbers after the maudlin meandering of Sibelics's muse.

SUNDAY POST,

OCTOBER 26,

FARRAR'S RECITAL

The principal musical event of the coming week will be the song recital of Miss Geraldine Farrar in Symphony Hall next Tuesday afternoon, Oct. 28, at 2:30. This is the first time in Boston that Miss Farrar has undertaken an entire programme and, in fact, the second time she has made such a venture, her first having been made yesterday afternoon in New York in Carnegie Hall. In Boston Miss Farrar will have the assistance of Mr. Arthur Rosenstein, accompanist.

Miss Farrar will sing 24 songs divided into four groups. The first will be classic, consisting of airs of Gluck, Beethoven, Handel and Mozart. Both of the Beethoven songs, "La Partenza" and "Mit einem gemalten Band," will be unfamiliar to the greater part of the audience; likewise the Mozart number—an "Alleluja." This is the last movement of the motet exsultate for soprano voice with an accompaniment of two violins, viola, two oboes, two horns, bass and organ. It was arranged by Madame Lilli Lehmann for the benefit of the Mozarteum in Salzburg and sung by her in concerts. The piano accompaniment is by Fritz Lindemann. It was written after the manner of a dramatic scene in three movements by Mozart at Milan in January, 1773, for the singer Venanzio Rauzzini, a male soprano, and it was first sung by him. Jan. 17, 1773, in church.

The second group comprises songs by Schubert, Franz and Loewe, all of them except the "Heidenroslein" of Schubert out of the usual run of recital programmes. "Non t'accostar all' Urna" was the first of four Italian songs with words by Metastasio written in 1820 for Fraulein von Romer. The three Franz songs, "Ach, wenn ich doch ein Immchen war,'" "Der Schmetterling" and "Gute Nacht" are excellent examples of his genius. The two Loewe songs are "Der Edelfalk" and "Walpurgisnacht." The first is the second of three poems by Freiligrath composed in 1839. The verses of the three are by Alexis, and Loewe set them in 1824.

The third group comprises songs by Moussorgsky, Rubinstein, Tschaikowsky, Sinding and Richard Strauss. Sinding's "Sylvelin" and Strauss' "Zueignung" Miss Farrar has already sung in Boston.

The final group consists of songs by the Russian Grechaninov, by Grieg, Massenet, Hugo Wolf, Chadwick and MacDowell. The last three songs will be sung in English.

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

The fourth programme of the Symphony Orchestra to be played Friday afternoon, Oct. 31, and Saturday evening, Nov. 1, will bring the first soloist of the season, Miss Geraldine Farrar of [illegible]

[illegible] "Cosi fan tutte." [illegible] will [illegible] three songs by [illegible], the words of which were written by Madame Wesendonck, "Im Treibhaus," "Traume" and "Schmerzen." These will be sung with orchestral accompaniment.

Dr. Muck has again some new works on the programme, two pieces by Max Schillings, the well-known composer, who is now conductor in Stuttgart. These are two symphonic fantasies, "Seemorgen" and "Meeresgruss." The other numbers will be Mozart's Symphony in E-flat and Weber's "Jubilee" Overture. The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony in E flat..........Mozart
Air, "Come Scoglio"..........Mozart
Two symphonic fantasies:
"Seemorgen"..........Schillings
"Meeresgruss"..........Schillings
Three poems:
"Im Treibhaus"..........Wagner
"Traume"..........Wagner
"Schmerzen"..........Wagner
Overture, "Jubilee"..........Weber

FRIEDA HEMPEL

The fifth of the series of Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall, Sunday, Nov. 9, will introduce to Boston as a concert singer Frieda Hempel, principal coloratura singer of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. This is Madame Hempel's second season in this country. For a number of years she has been the principal coloratura singer of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and as such gained a wide fame throughout Europe. Her success in opera in New York and Boston last year was one of the noteworthy events of the season. She will be assisted by an orchestra of 50 Symphony men under Otto Urack.

Franz Egenieff

Franz Egenieff, a German baritone, will give a song recital in Jordan Hall on Monday afternon, Nov 3, with the assistance of the distinguished Hungarian composer-pianist, Jeno Kerntler. Egenieff was last in this country in the spring of 1904 when he sang in the English production of "Parsifal" and met with instant favor. He is the possessor of a beautiful baritone voice and is in great demand in the opera houses of continental Europe. Tickets are on sale at Symphony Hall.

JOSEF HOFMANN TO PLAY TOMORROW

The concert in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon will be a piano recital by Josef Hofmann. This will be the only appearance in recital in Boston this year of this distinguished pianist. Mr. Hofmann's programme offers a set of variations by Handel, two of Beethoven's Bagatelles, one in E-flat major and one in C major, and the big sonata, op. 106; two Nocturnes, op. 32, No. 1 and op. 9, No. 3, by Chopin; his mazurka, op. 56, two waltzes in F minor and E-flat major; a sonata by Liszt, and then six pieces by modern Russian composers. Rachmaninoff will be represented by two preludes, those in A minor and D minor, and by his polichinelle. Dvorsky, a name new to Boston, will be represented by a barcarole and scriabine. One of the most original of the Russian composers is represented on the programme by a poeme and etude in D-sharp minor. The concert will begin at 3:30.

KNEISEL QUARTET

The Kneisel Quartet announces its regular series of chamber music concerts to be given at Steinert Hall on Tuesday evenings, Nov. 4, Dec. 2, Jan. 6 and March 17.

Among the works to be performed are the following:

Concerto in G major, for violin principale, two flutes, two violins, viola and violoncello, No. 8..........Ba Quartet in G major, op. 18, No. 2..Beethov
Quartet in F major, op. 59, No. 1..Beethov Quartet in F minor, op. 95..........Beethov
Quartet in E flat major, op. 127...Beethov
Quartet in B flat major, op. 67..........Brahms
Quintet in G major, for two violins, two violas and violoncello, op. 111.....Brahms
Sextet in G major, for two violins, two violas and two violoncellos, op. 36...Brahms
Scherzo from quartet in C minor, op. 38 (manuscript)..........A. Brune
Quartet in D minor, No. 5..G. W. Chadwick
Quartet in E major, op. 45....Vincent D'Indy
Quartet in G major, op. 76, No. 1....Haydn

Pension Fund Concert

The first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in aid of its pension fund will be given in Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, Nov. 16, at 3:30. Full particulars regarding the concert will be announced later.

Dwight Elmendorf

Pursuant to the promise made to his patrons last season, Dwight Elmendorf, America's foremost travel lecturer, will present his much heralded travel talks on India, Ceylon, and Java. The course will open at Symphony Hall, Nov. 7, and will continue for five successive Friday evenings and Saturday afternoons. The first lecture will deal with Ceylon, where verdant plains, picturesque tea and coffee plantations, and groves of oranges, bananas, and other tropical fruits form a charming picture. After Ceylon, comes India, the weird land of mystic romance, of elephants and maharajahs, fraught with historic interest of the Sepoy mutiny, the siege of Delhi, the famous "Black Hole" of Calcutta, and tiger hunting. This is the land of Kipling, Bayard Taylor and other makers of literature, and of lords and notables of England from Clive to Curzon. India will be triangulated, and each side of the triangle will be covered in a separate lecture, the first being "Southern India, from Tuticorin to Bijapur," the second, "Western India from Bombay to Udaipur"; the third, "Eastern India, from Delhi to Darjeeling." The concluding topic will be "Java," an island [illegible] of 32,000, [illegible] and [illegible] expended upon it than any other one island in the world. Mr. Elmendorf brings to these subjects the photographic results of nearly nine months of constant travel, and they are said to form the most exhaustive study ever attempted from the picture expert's point of view. Season tickets insuring the same seat during either course of five lectures will be on sale at the ticket office, Symphony Hall, at 8:30 a. m., Monday, Oct. 27. The season sale closes at 5 p. m., Saturday, Nov. 1. Single tickets for all lectures will be on sale at the ticket office, Monday, Nov. 3.

MISS GERALDINE FARRAR.

JOSEF HOFMAN
IMPORTANT A

F STRANSKY.
ON.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY

The fourth Sunday afternoon concert in Symphony Hall, which will be given next Sunday afternoon, Nov. 2, at 3:30, will bring the annual visit of the Philharmonic Society of New York with Josef Stransky as its conductor. This orchestra since it first began to come to Boston a few years ago has grown steadily in favor. It is not only the oldest orchestra in the country, this being its 72d season, but it is the representative orchestra of New York. It brings to Boston its full personnel of 80 odd men.

The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, the eminent violinist, who will make his first Boston appearance of this season on this occasion. Mr. Kreisler will play Bruch's Concerto No. 1 in G minor.

The orchestral numbers will be the "Rienzi" overture of Wagner; Richard Strauss' tone poem "Death and Transfiguration" and Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor.

GLOBE—OCTOBER 26,

Elmendorf's Travel Talks.

When Dwight Elmendorf begins his eighth annual season of travel talks at Symphony Hall, Nov 7, he will bring to a realization the ambition of many years, a comprehensive series of travel talks on the great Indian Empire. After nine months of constant travel and research, he has returned with a weath of pictures and exclusive material, from which he has prepared five travel talks. The first reveals Ceylon and the "Cingalese"; the second, "Southern India, From Tuticorin to Bijapur"; the third, "Western India, From Bombay to Udaipur"; the fourth, "Eastern India, From Delhi to Daijeeling," and the fifth, "Java."

Season tickets will go on sale at Symphony Hall this morning. The sale of single tickets will begin [illegible]

BOSTON

Farrar to Sing Here on Tuesday

Boston Songbird to Be Heard in Twenty-four Selections.

The principal musical event of this week will be the song recital of Miss Geraldine Farrar in Symphony Hall, Tuesday afternoon, October 28, at 2:30. This is the first time in Boston, that Miss Farrar has undertaken an entire program and in fact, the second time she has made such a venture, her first having been yesterday afternoon in New York in Carnegia Hall. She will have the assistance of Mr. Arthur Rosenstein accompanist.

Miss Farrar will sing twenty-four songs divided into four groups. The first will be classical by Gluck, Beethoven, Handel and Mozart.

The second group comprises songs by Schubert, Franz and Loewe, all of them except the "Heidenroslein" of Schubert out of the usual run of recital programs.

The third group comprises songs by Moussorgsky, Rubinstein, Tschaikowsky, Sinding and Richard Strauss. Sinding's "Sylvelin" and Strauss's "Zueignung" Miss Farrar has already sung in Boston.

The final group comprises songs by the Russian Grechaninov, Grieg, Massenet, Hugo Wolf, Chadwick and MacDowell. The last three will be sung in English.

Geraldine Farrar, Boston's Own Star, Here Coming Week

Miss Farrar is to sing 24 songs, divided into groups, in Symphony Hall Tuesday.

BOSTON AMERICAN, OCTOBER 25,

Music Lovers Hear Sibelius' Symphony

Dr. Karl Muck Ably Reads Finnish Composer's Work.

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

The Fourth Symphony of Sibelius was performed for the first time in Boston by the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. It was the first real novelty of the season, and had been awaited with some interest.

Like many modern symphonies it proved intolerably long, and its length, due to endless reiteration of a limited number of ideas, caused many to overlook considerable that was meritorious in it.

Sibelius is a Finnish composer, a man who speaks with a loud, harsh voice through a full orchestra. He is a complete scorist, and he sees to it that every desk in the orchestra shall have something to do every minute, even if it sometimes conflicts with what some other set of instruments are performing.

The Fourth Symphony could hardly be described as pretty, dainty, amusing, bright, entertaining or witty. As a means to give Symphony audiences a good time it is a dismal failure. There's the word, Dismal. There is something dismal, melancholy, majestically sorrowful in this symphony. It has its moments of grandeur of magnificence, or mirth, hard and sardonic, even of dance, but its impression is dismal. Vigorous orchestration, extraordinary harmonizations distinguish it.

For the rest there was a merry suite of Dances from Gluck, Handel's concerto for strings and two wind instruments, and a jovial Haydn Symphony.

The orchestra was in good form, and Dr. Muck did his best to read the jawbreaking syllables of Sibelius with clearness and intelligence. I'll wager he would have delighted the composer.

Sun[illegible]
Oct. 26, [illegible]

Elmendorf Lectures.

Dwight Elmendorf will begin his eighth series of travel talks on Friday evenings and Saturday afternoons on Friday evening, Nov. 7, at Symphony Hall. The subject this year will be "India." Season tickets insuring the same seat during either course of five lectures will be on sale at the ticket office, Symphony Hall, at 8:30 A. M. Monday, Oct. 27. The season sale closes at 5 P. M. Saturday, Nov. 1. Single tickets for all lectures will be on sale at the ticket office Monday, Nov. 3.

[38]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

JOURNAL—

OCTOBER 25,

AUDIENCE DAZED BY CUBIST MUSIC

But Several Enthusiasts Applaud Symphony by Sibelius.

By E. F. Harkins

Several persons in Symphony yesterday afternoon applauded the performance of the first novelty of the season, the Sibelius Symphony No. 4, in A minor. Most of those in the large audience sat amused, smiling, wondering what to make of it. They had tasted Cubist music at last and were not quite sure whether they liked it.

It was the faintest applause for a novelty since the Lendvai symphony had its American premiere at these same concerts last February.

To one unbridled Sibelius enthusiast in the second balcony this symphony was a source of quite delirious delight. But his frantic handclaps were diametrically opposed by the general silence and surprise.

There were gleams of sunshine and melody in the third and fourth movements, but for the most part this latest symphony from the pen of Finland's foremost composer is a tangle of the most dismal dissonances. It eclipses the saddest and sourest moments of Debussy. Compared with this, the once cryptic Wagner's music must seem like so many jubilee songs.

When the Sibelius work was played last winter by the New York Symphony Orchestra the conductor felt constrained to tell the audience that he washed his hands of it. Dr. Muck did nothing of the kind. He was as silent as the sphinx, and no trace of distress or amusement appeared on his face as he returned to the stage to acknowledge the ardent applause of the very small minority.

But how fortunate that minority if cacophony is to prevail in the future and the mind of the music lover is to be uplifted to the seventh heaven with music almost if not quite as lovely as that furnished by a Chinese band! And what a jar it must have been to these doters upon dissonance to hear the Handel concerto for strings and wind choirs, the Gluck ballet suite and the second Haydn symphony! Nothing could have been more Philistine than such a trio of numbers after the maudlin meandering of Sibelics's muse.

SUNDAY POST,

OCTOBER 26,

FARRAR'S RECITAL

The principal musical event of the coming week will be the song recital of Miss Geraldine Farrar in Symphony Hall next Tuesday afternoon, Oct. 28, at 2:30. This is the first time in Boston that Miss Farrar has undertaken an entire programme and, in fact, the second time she has made such a venture, her first having been made yesterday afternoon in New York in Carnegie Hall. In Boston Miss Farrar will have the assistance of Mr. Arthur Rosenstein, accompanist.

Miss Farrar will sing 24 songs divided into four groups. The first will be classic, consisting of airs of Gluck, Beethoven, Handel and Mozart. Both of the Beethoven songs, "La Partenza" and "Mit einem gemalten Band," will be unfamiliar to the greater part of the audience; likewise the Mozart number—an "Alleluja." This is the last movement of the motet exsultate for soprano voice with an accompaniment of two violins, viola, two oboes, two horns, bass and organ. It was arranged by Madame Lilli Lehmann for the benefit of the Mozarteum in Salzburg and sung by her in concerts. The piano accompaniment is by Fritz Lindemann. It was written after the manner of a dramatic scene in three movements by Mozart at Milan in January, 1773, for the singer Venanzio Rauzzini, a male soprano, and it was first sung by him, Jan. 17, 1773, in church.

The second group comprises songs by Schubert, Franz and Loewe, all of them except the "Heidenroslein" of Schubert out of the usual run of recital programmes. "Non t'accostar all' Urna" was the first of four Italian songs with words by Metastasio written in 1820 for Fraulein von Romer. The three Franz songs, "Ach, wenn ich doch ein Immchen war," "Der Schmetterling" and "Gute Nacht" are excellent examples of his genius. The two Loewe songs are "Der Edelfalk" and "Walpurgisnacht." The first is the second of three poems by Freiligrath composed in 1839. The verses of the three are by Alexis, and Loewe set them in 1824.

The third group comprises songs by Moussorgsky, Rubinstein, Tschaikowsky, Sinding and Richard Strauss. Sinding's "Sylvelin" and Strauss' "Zueignung" Miss Farrar has already sung in Boston.

The final group consists of songs by the Russian Grechaninov, by Grieg, Massenet, Hugo Wolf, Chadwick and MacDowell. The last three songs will be sung in English.

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

The fourth programme of the Symphony Orchestra to be played Friday afternoon, Oct. 31, and Saturday evening, Nov. 1, will bring the first soloist of the season, Miss Geraldine Farrar of the [illegible] Opera [illegible] Cosi fan tutte." [illegible] will [illegible] three songs by [illegible], the words of which were written by Madame Wesendonck, "Im Treibhaus," "Traume" and "Schmerzen." These will be sung with orchestral accompaniment.

Dr. Muck has again some new works on the programme, two pieces by Max Schillings, the well-known composer, who is now conductor in Stuttgart. These are two symphonic fantasies, "Seemorgen" and "Meeresgruss." The other numbers will be Mozart's Symphony in E-flat and Weber's "Jubilee" Overture. The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony in E flat	Mozart
Air, "Come Scoglio"	Mozart
Two symphonic fantasies:
"Seemorgen"	Schillings
"Meeresgruss"	Schillings
Three poems:
"Im Treibhaus"	Wagner
"Traume"	Wagner
"Schmerzen"	Wagner
Overture, "Jubilee"	Weber

FRIEDA HEMPEL

The fifth of the series of Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall, Sunday, Nov. 9, will introduce to Boston as a concert singer Frieda Hempel, principal coloratura singer of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. This is Madame Hempel's second season in this country. For a number of years she has been the principal coloratura singer of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and as such gained a wide fame throughout Europe. Her success in opera in New York and Boston last year was one of the noteworthy events of the season. She will be assisted by an orchestra of 50 Symphony men under Otto Urack.

Franz Egenieff

Franz Egenieff, a German baritone, will give a song recital in Jordan Hall on Monday afternon, Nov 3, with the assistance of the distinguished Hungarian composer-pianist, Jeno Kerntler. Egenieff was last in this country in tho spring of 1904 when he sang in the English production of "Parsifal" and met with instant favor. He is the possessor of a beautiful baritone voice and is in great demand in the opera houses of continental Europe. Tickets are on sale at Symphony Hall.

JOSEF HOFMANN TO PLAY TOMORROW

The concert in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon will be a piano recital by Josef Hofmann. This will be the only appearance in recital in Boston this year of this distinguished pianist. Mr. Hofmann's programme offers a set of variations by Handel, two of Beethoven's Bagatelles, one in E-flat major and one in C major, and the big sonata, op. 106; two Nocturnes, op. 32, No. 1 and op. 9, No. 3, by Chopin; his mazurka, op. 56, two waltzes in F minor and E-flat major; a sonata by Liszt, and then six pieces by modern Russian composers. Rachmaninoff will be represented by two preludes, those in A minor and D minor, and by his polichinelle. Dvorsky, a name new to Boston, will be represented by a barcarole and scriabine. One of the most original of the Russian composers is represented on the programme by a poeme and etude in D-sharp minor. The concert will begin at 3:30.

KNEISEL QUARTET

The Kneisel Quartet announces its regular series of chamber music concerts to be given at Steinert Hall on Tuesday evenings, Nov. 4, Dec. 2, Jan. 6 and March 17.

Among the works to be performed are the following:

Concerto in G major, for violin principale, two flutes, two violins, viola and violoncello, No. 8	Bach
Quartet in G major, op. 18, No. 2	Beethoven
Quartet in F major, op. 59, No. 1	Beethoven
Quartet in F minor, op. 95	Beethoven
Quartet in E flat major, op. 127	Beethoven
Quartet in B flat major, op. 67	Brahms
Quintet in G major, for two violins, two violas and violoncello, op. 111	Brahms
Sextet in G major, for two violins, two violas and two violoncellos, op. 36	Brahms
Scherzo from quartet in C minor, op. 38 (manuscript)	A. Brune
Quartet in D minor, No. 5	G. W. Chadwick
Quartet in E major, op. 45	Vincent D'Indy
Quartet in G major, op. 76, No. 1	Haydn

Pension Fund Concert

The first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in aid of its pension fund will be given in Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, Nov. 16, at 3:30. Full particulars regarding the concert will be announced later.

Dwight Elmendorf

Pursuant to the promise made to his patrons last season, Dwight Elmendorf, America's foremost travel lecturer, will present his much heralded travel talks on India, Ceylon, and Java. The course will open at Symphony Hall, Nov. 7, and will continue for five successive Friday evenings and Saturday afternoons. The first lecture will deal with Ceylon, where verdant plains, picturesque tea and coffee plantations, and groves of oranges, bananas, and other tropical fruits form a charming picture. After Ceylon, comes India, the weird land of mystic romance, of elephants and maharajahs, fraught with historic interest of the Sepoy mutiny, the siege of Delhi, the famous "Black Hole" of Calcutta, and tiger hunting. This is the land of Kipling, Bayard Taylor and other makers of literature, and of lords and notables of England from Clive to Curzon. India will be triangulated, and each side of the triangle will be covered in a separate lecture, the first being "Southern India, from Tuticorin to Bijapur," the second, "Western India from Bombay to Udaipur"; the third, "Eastern India, from Delhi to Darjeeling." The concluding topic will be "Java," an island [illegible] of 32,000,- [illegible] and has [illegible] expended upon it than any other one island in the world. Mr. Elmendorf brings to these subjects the photographic results of nearly nine months of constant travel, and they are said to form the most exhaustive study ever attempted from the picture expert's point of view. Season tickets insuring the same seat during either course of five lectures will be on sale at the ticket office, Symphony Hall, at 8:30 a. m., Monday, Oct. 27. The season sale closes at 5 p. m., Saturday, Nov. 1. Single tickets for all lectures will be on sale at the ticket office, Monday, Nov. 3.

MISS GERALDINE FARRAR.

JOSEF HOFMAN
IMPORTANT A

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY

The fourth Sunday afternoon concert in Symphony Hall, which will be given next Sunday afternoon, Nov. 2, at 3:30, will bring the annual visit of the Philharmonic Society of New York with Josef Stransky as its conductor. This orchestra since it first began to come to Boston a few years ago has grown steadily in favor. It is not only the oldest orchestra in the country, this being its 72d season, but it is the representative orchestra of New York. It brings to Boston its full personnel of 80 odd men.

The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, the eminent violinist, who will make his first Boston appearance of this season on this occasion. Mr. Kreisler will play Bruch's Concerto No. 1 in G minor.

The orchestral numbers will be the "Rienzi" overture of Wagner; Richard Strauss' tone poem "Death and Transfiguration" and Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor.

GLOBE—OCTOBER 26,

Elmendorf's Travel Talks.

When Dwight Elmendorf begins his eighth annual season of travel talks at Symphony Hall, Nov 7, he will bring to a realization the ambition of many years, a comprehensive series of travel talks on the great Indian Empire. After nine months of constant travel and research, he has returned with a weath of pictures and exclusive material, from which he has prepared five travel talks. The first reveals Ceylon and the "Cingalese"; the second, "Southern India, From Tuticorin to Bijapur"; the third, "Western India, From Bombay to Udaipur"; the fourth, "Eastern India, From Delhi to Daijeeling," and the fifth, "Java."

Season tickets will go on sale at Symphony Hall this morning. The sale of single tickets will begin [illegible]

BOSTON [illegible]

Farrar to Sing Here on Tuesday

Boston Songbird to Be Heard in Twenty-four Selections.

The principal musical event of this week will be the song recital of Miss Geraldine Farrar in Symphony Hall, Tuesday afternoon, October 28, at 2:30. This is the first time in Boston, that Miss Farrar has undertaken an entire program and in fact, the second time she has made such a venture, her first having been yesterday afternoon in New York in Carnegia Hall. She will have the assistance of Mr. Arthur Rosenstein accompanist.

Miss Farrar will sing twenty-four songs divided into four groups. The first will be classical by Gluck, Beethoven, Handel and Mozart.

The second group comprises songs by Schubert, Franz and Loewe, all of them except the "Heidenroslein" of Schubert out of the usual run of recital programs.

The third group comprises songs by Moussorgsky, Rubinstein, Tschaikowsky, Sinding and Richard Strauss. Sinding's "Sylvelin" and Strauss's "Zueignung" Miss Farrar has already sung in Boston.

The final group comprises songs by the Russian Grechaninov, Grieg, Massenet, Hugo Wolf, Chadwick and MacDowell. The last three will be sung in English.

Geraldine Farrar, Boston's Own Star, Here Coming Week

Miss Farrar is to sing 24 songs, divided into groups, in Symphony Hall Tuesday.

BOSTON AMERICAN, OCTOBER 25,

Music Lovers Hear Sibelius' Symphony

Dr. Karl Muck Ably Reads Finnish Composer's Work.

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

The Fourth Symphony of Sibelius was performed for the first time in Boston by the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. It was the first real novelty of the season, and had been awaited with some interest.

Like many modern symphonies it proved intolerably long, and its length, due to endless reiteration of a limited number of ideas, caused many to overlook considerable that was meritorious in it.

Sibelius is a Finnish composer, a man who speaks with a loud, harsh voice through a full orchestra. He is a complete scorist, and he sees to it that every desk in the orchestra shall have something to do every minute, even if it sometimes conflicts with what some other set of instruments are performing.

The Fourth Symphony could hardly be described as pretty, dainty, amusing, bright, entertaining or witty. As a means to give Symphony audiences a good time it is a dismal failure. There's the word, Dismal. There is something dismal, melancholy, majestically sorrowful in this symphony. It has its moments of grandeur of magnificence, or mirth, hard and sardonic, even of dance, but its impression is dismal. Vigorous orchestration, extraordinary harmonizations distinguish it.

For the rest there was a merry suite of Dances from Gluck, Handel's concerto for strings and two wind instruments, and a jovial Haydn Symphony.

The orchestra was in good form, and Dr. Muck did his best to read the jaw breaking syllables of Sibelius with clearness and intelligence. I'll wager he would have delighted the composer.

F STRANSKY.
ON.

[illegible]

Elmendorf Lectures.

Dwight Elmendorf will begin his eighth series of travel talks on Friday evenings and Saturday afternoons on Friday evening, Nov. 7, at Symphony Hall. The subject this year will be "India." Season tickets insuring the same seat during either course of five lectures will be on sale at the ticket office, Symphony Hall, at 8:30 A. M. Monday, Oct. 27. The season sale closes at 5 P. M. Saturday, Nov. 1. Single tickets for all lectures will be on sale at the ticket office Monday, Nov. 3.

HERALD. BOSTON. OCTOBER 26. 1913.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The program of the Symphony orc a for Friday afternoon, Oct. 31, aturday evening, Nov. 1, will bring rst soloist of the season, Miss Ger e Farrar. With the exception of ppearances with the orchestra the wing week in Philadelphia and Ba nore, this will be Miss Farrar's oncert appearance during the curr eason. She will sing an air, "Come coglio," from Mozart's "Cosi fan atte," and Wagner's "Im Treibhaus," Traeume" and "Schmerzen," with ottl's orchestral accompaniment. Two ieces by Max Schillings, composer and onductor in Stuttgart, symphonic fantasies, "Seemorgen" and Meergruss," will be played here for the first time. Mozart's symphony in E flat and Weber's "Jubilee" overture will complete the program. Mozart's symphony begins and Weber's overture ends the concert.

MISS FARRAR'S RECITAL

Miss Geraldine Farrar will give a song recital in Symphony Hall next Tuesday afternoon at 2:30. This is the first time in Boston that she has undertaken an entire program, the second time she has made such a venture, for her first was yesterday afternoon in New York. Arthur Rosenstein will be the accompanist.

She will sing 24 songs, divided into four groups. The first will be classical, by Gluck, Beethoven, Handel and Mozart. Beethoven songs, "La Partenza" and "Mit einem gemalten Band," are unfamiliar to many, as is Mozart's "Alleluja," the last movement of a motet "Exsultate" for soprano voice, orchestra and organ. Lilli Lehmann arranged it for the benefit of the Mozarteum in Salzburg. The air was written after the manner of a dramatic scene in three movements by Mozart at Milan in January, 1773, for the male soprano, Venanzio Rauzzini.

The second group comprises songs by Schubert, Franz and Loewe. All of them except Schubert's "Heidenroslein" are seldom heard. Schubert's "Non t'accostar all' Urna" was the first of four Italian songs, with words by Metastasio, written in 1820. Franz songs, "Ach, wenn ich doch ein Immchen war'," "Der Schmetterling" and "Gute Nacht" are excellent examples of his genius. The two ballads by Loewe are "Der Edelfalk" and "Walpurgisnacht."

The third group comprises songs by Moussorgsky, Rubinstein, Tschaikowsky, Sinding and Richard Strauss. Sinding's "Sylvelin" and Strauss's "Zueignung" Miss Farrar has already sung in Boston.

The final group comprises songs by Grechaninov, Grieg, Massenet, Hugo Wolf, Chadwick and MacDowell. The last three will be sung in English.

HOFMANN TODAY

The concert in Symphony Hall this afternoon will be a piano recital by Josef Hofmann. This will be his only appearance in recital in Boston this year. Mr. Hofmann, in recent years, has the favor of local music lovers, and a large audience is assured. His program includes a set of Variations by Handel, two of Beethoven's Bagatelles, one in E flat major and one in C major, and the Sonata, Op. 106; Chopin's Nocturnes, Op. 32, No. 1, and Opus 9, No. 3, Mazurka, Op. 56, waltzes in E minor and E flat major, a Sonata by Iiszt and six pieces by modern Russian composers. Rachmaninoff will be represented by two Preludes, and Polichinelle. Dvorsky, a name new to Boston, will be represented by a Barcarole, and Scriabin is represented by a Poeme and Etude in D sharp minor. The concert will begin at 3:30.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY

The fourth Sunday afternoon concert in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon, at 3:30, will bring the annual visit of the Philharmonic Society of New York, Josef Stransky condustor. This orchestra is not only the oldest in the country, this being its 72d season, but it is the representative orchestra of New York. It comes with its full personnel of 80-odd men.

The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, the eminent violinist, who will then make his first appearance here this season. He will play Bruch's Concerto No. 1 in G minor.

The orchestral pieces will be Wagner's "Rienzi" overture; Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor.

PADEREWSKI'S RECITAL

Mr. Paderewski's illness, which caused im to postpone some of his early retals this month, will in no wise affect recital in Boston Friday afternoon, v. 7. He has fully recovered from attack of grippe which disabled him will begin his regular work with postponed recital in New York Saty afternoon, Nov. 1. At his recital in Boston he will play a Fantasia and Fugue in G-minor, Bach-Liszt; Beethoven's Sonata in E-major, Opus 109; Schumann's "Carneval" Chopin's Nocturne in E-major, Mazurka in B-minor and Sonata in B flat-minor, and Liszt's "Waldesrauschen" and "Campanella."

The public sale of tickets will open at Symphony Hall next Friday.

FRIEDA HEMPEL

The fifth of the series of Sunday afteron concerts in Symphony Hall, Sun y, Nov. 9, will introduce to Boston as concert singer Frieda Hempel, principal coloratura singer of the Metropolitan Opera House. This is Mme. Hemel's second season in this country. or a number of years she has been the rincipal coloratura singer of the Royal pera, Berlin, and as such gained a le fame throughout Europe. She will assisted by an orchestra of 50 Sym- [illegible] led by Otto [illegible]

FRANZ EGENIEFF

Franz Egenieff, the German baritone, who will give a recital in Jordan Hall Monday afternoon, Nov. 3, is remembered here as having sung the part of Amfortas in Henry W. Savage's production in English of "Parsifal," in the fall of 1904. Mr. Egenieff is now regarded as one of the most skilled lieder singers in Europe.

TRAVELER

OCTOBER 25, 1913.

SIBELIUS WORK FAILS TO IMPRESS

Boston Hears Fourth Symphony for First Ttime and Is Not Enthusiastic.

By FRANK BERTWALL.

The Sibelius Fourth Symphony, which was heard in Boston yesterday afternoon for the first time, being the opening number on the program of this week's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, evidently left the audience in considerable doubt as to what the composer was trying to express and the exact nature of his bereavement. Some one has likened the composition to that of the cubists in the world of brush and palette. Perhaps freakish is a bit too strong a term to apply to it, yet that comes pretty close to the impression conveyed by the first hearing.

Certainly it is not the real Sibelius speaking. His other and better known works show that. There are moments in it when he would seem to be striving to get away from his moody subject and give rein to his natural self, but these moments simply serve to emphasize the less desirable portions of the number. Notable playing of the 'cello by Mr. Warnke was one redeeming trait. The composition as a whole, however, gives one the impression of a composer seeking the unusual rather than trying to give expression to natural and worthy thoughts. The courteous applause at its close seemed to say thanks for giving us an opportunity of hearing the work, but showed no desire for more.

On the other hand the Handel concerto that followed aroused genuine enthusiasm both for the work itself and the excellent artistry displayed by Mr. Longy, Mr. Fosse and the horn players. The Gluck ballet suite and the Haydn symphony were likewise well received.

It is perhaps worth noting that, notwithstanding the unfavorable weather, the house was sold out. Such is the drawing power of a novelty. Next week comes the first soloist of the season, Miss Geraldine Farrar.

GERALDINE FARRAR SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Grand Opera Singer Scheduled for Next Week's Concerts.

The fourth program of the Symphony orchestra to be played Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week will bring the first soloist of the season, Miss Geraldine Farrar. She will sing "Come scoglio," from Mozart's opera, "Cosi fan tutte," and three songs by Wagner, words by Mme. Wesendonck, "Im Treibhaus," "Traume" and "Schmerzen."

Two pieces by Max Schillings, conductor in Stuttgart, "Seemorgen" and "Meeresgruss"; Mozart's Symphony in E flat and Weber's "Jubilee" overture, make up the orchestral program.

The first concert by the orchestra in aid of its pension fund will be given in Symphony hall Sunday afternoon, Nov. 16th, at 3:30.

FARRAR TO SING TUESDAY NEXT

Tuesday afternoon next, in Symphony Hall, Geraldine Farrar will, for the first time in Boston, give a concert all by herself. Arthur Rosenstein will be the accompanist. Miss Farrar will sing 24 songs, including familiar and unfamiliar compositions, selected to display the many beauties of her voice and artistry.

Paderewski's illness will in no wise affect his recital in Boston Friday afternoon, Nov. 7.

The season sale of tickets for the current season of Kneisel Quartet concerts shows that this popular organization is gaining in favor with the Boston public each season.

Franz Egenieff, a German baritone, will give a song recital in Jordan Hall Monday afternoon, Nov. 3, with the assistance [illegible] pianist, Je

---

JOURNAL—

OCTOBER 27

JOSEF HOFMANN'S RECITAL IS LONG

Josef Hofmann is a superexcellent pianist and an indifferent program maker. The first part of the program that he played at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon was conducive to deep sleep, notwithstanding the recitalist's prodigious technique; and to make matters all the more trying, except to the omnivorous student, he played the Beethoven sonata (op. 106) entire, instead of only the two movements announced on the program. This first of the program's three divisions occupied over an hour and left the large audience rather weary.

This was unforunate, for the best numbers were yet to come. One sonata was sufficient for such a matinee, and the one decidedly to be preferred was the Liszt sonata, which came at the end of the second part of the program, and which the Polish artist played on this occasion, so it was said, for the first time in America. Pianist or audience could not wish for a more brilliant composition, melodious and yet massive, and give opportunities for the dulcet tones and the technical might that equally distinguish Mr. Hofmann's playing.

A dozen smaller pieces by Chopin, Rachmaninoff, Dvorsky and Scriabine were also on the program, so that the recital did not end until nearly 6 o'clock; and yet even then the more insatiable enthusiasts crowded to the front and demanded more. Mr. Hofmann is more than a virile poet of the piano; he is a generous entertainer, like Paderewski, and so he yielded to the demand.

BOSTON POST,

OCTOBER 27,

HOFMANN RECITAL LENGTHY

But Pianist's Playing of Great Works Was Memorable

BY OLIN DOWNES

Josef Hofmann has seldom played so well in Boston of late years as he did yesterday afternoon at his recital in Symphony Hall. It is unfortunate that his programme was so long and so meaty. It is not just of a pianist to place on the same programme the sonata op. 106 of Beethoven and the Liszt sonata in B minor. Either work in itself is half a concert. In each of these colossal compositions Mr. Hofmann excelled himself, but when a programme lasts from 3:30 until 6 o'clock in the afternoon, it is too much for the most willing flesh.

HELD HIS AUDIENCE

It should be said, however, that Mr. Hofmann by supremely artistic playing did all that could be done to make the recital interesting throughout its length, and the majority of a large audience heard him through to the end with manifest enthusiasm.

The pieces were a set of variations by Handel; the bagatelles in E flat major and C major and the big sonata of Beethoven; the two Chopin nocturnes, both of which are in the key of B major; the mazurka, op. 56, which is too seldom played; the Liszt sonata; preludes in A minor and D minor of Rachmaninoff; a barcarolle by Dvorsky, a composer not known here; a poeme' and an etude in D sharp minor by Scriabine.

It would be easy to talk at length of Mr. Hofmann's equipment as a pianist, but in these days neither audiences nor reviewers expect less than a great technic, and, from a pianist of recognized standing, strikingly individual features of style. Yesterday afternoon Mr. Hofmann, who appeared to be unusually in the vein, put all of his skill, his knowledge and intuition at the service of the composer, and he reached what was to many the high water mark of his achievements in this city.

He played the Handel variations with such clearness and such a beautiful and pellucid tone that the music would have been absorbing had it been less melodious that it was. In Beethoven's sonata, which most of us do not understand, he found a remarkable balance of clearness in exposition and a rhapsodic spirit in interpretation, and the interest of the performance was greatly [illegible] exceptional [illegible] question, was made not only astonishingly clear in its development, profoundly emotional and subjective, but grateful as sound to the ear. Those who are acquainted with this music and its many passages that are dry or awkward from a pianist's point of view will realize what this means.

Hardly less praiseworthy was the playing of Chopin. What a pleasure—what a heavenly relief—to hear the nocturnes, the mazurka, the waltzes played as though Chopin were not a neurotic sentimentalist, but a poet whose artistic feeling, if nothing else, was sufficiently strong to prevent him from falling into the hysterical manner of utterance that is accredited to him by many a pretentious interpreter. It would be hard to imagine more lovely and poetical playing than Mr. Hofmann's treatment of these pieces. The mazurka is one of the most interesting of the numerous collection of compositions in this form which Chopin left the world. Masterpieces often referred to, but too seldom played. Or perhaps that is best! There are still a number of Chopin's mazurkas which have thus far escaped the hands of the casual vandal of the concert hall.

Liszt's sonata was in a sense the climax of the programme. Flaming rhetoric, indeed! Modern as tomorrow, as James Huneker recently remarked of that wonderful creation, the Mildred Lawson of George Moore. Liszt's sonata is probably not as solid as Liszt enthusiasts would like to believe, but it is a great piece for all that, and full of genius. In the evolutions of a single theme Liszt saw far ahead of his day and blazed the path for generations to walk in.

In this sonata the composer-pianist concentrated all his splendid arsenal of effects, and in the hands of Mr. Hofmann the composition did indeed assume overwhelming proportions, and for the moment, at least, undeniable significance. It was played with extraordinary power when this was required, and—mirabile dictu—this was not fatal to the instrument, nor unpleasantly brassy to the ear. Thanks partly to Mr. Hofmann's tempi, the performance must be considered historic, for the manner in which the great lines of an apparently loosely constructed composition stood out and balanced each other, and for the ever-changing color and eloquence in interpretation.

This recital, in spite of its inordinate length, will long be remembered as a masterly demonstration of a modern pianist's ar

---

RECORD.

OCTOBER 25.

SYMPHONY NO. 4 BY SIBELIUS

PROGRAMME.

Sibelius. Symphony No. 4. (First time in Boston)
Handel. Concerto for two Wind Choirs.
Gluck. Tambourin. Gavotte, Chaconne. (Arr. by Gevaert.).
Haydn. Symphony in D major.

Dr. Muck has given us three purely orchestral concerts, all in a row. The present writer is supremely contented with this and is glad to have the solo display conspicuous by its absence. Judging by the long waiting line yesterday for second balcony seats, the public are satisfied with it, also. The programme on this occasion was, however, not without its contrasts; in fact the first and second parts were as wide apart as the poles. Before the walk in the corridor the audience had the most modern dissonances and progressions; after their promenade they had plain and undistorted melody and absolutely symmetrical musical form, says Louis C. Elson in The Advertiser.

The score of the Sibelius Symphony is not extreme in its instrumental demands. With the exception of bells, introduced in the finale, it is almost the "classical orchestra," but the "classical" ends there: for the treatment is of the 20th, or perhaps the 21st century. The work begins with a passage of great promise, sombre, and with the picturesque and monotonous reiteration that is typical of Scandinavia. Evil is suggested, and the muted horns blow very dismal blasts. There are "sounds and lamentations heard in the air,"—that is if there were any air, which there is not, for mere tune is left out of this mis-called symphony. There were dissonant and doleful mutterings, generally leading nowhere.

One could understand the feelings of the Frenchman who once asked, after a piece of music—"Ce Sonate, que me veut-il?" So we were tempted more than once to ask—"What does this Symphony want?"

The second movement was as fragmentary as the first and ended, like its predecessor, for no apparent reason. The third movement, on the contrary, wound up with an everlasting organ-point which suggested an end several minutes before it came.

Finding how easy this trick was to do. Sibelius continued the organ-point business (an organ-point is a continuous bass-note against changing harmonies), a long way through the finale, and this last movement contained some of the most discordant effects ever achieved even in modern music.

The symphony is nominally in A minor; practically it is in all known, and some unknown, keys. Yet it is not, on the whole, a repulsive work. It has moments of greatness. It seems to be the work of a genius who has not yet found himself. He is still groping, and often ineffectually.

MONITOR, BOSTON, MASS., SATURDAY, OCTOBER 25

Presenting the latest symphony of the Finnish composer, Sibelius, and interpreting works of eighteenth century composers, Karl Muck directed the third public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra Friday afternoon before the usual filled hall. The program was as follows: Sibelius, symphony No. 4 in A minor (first time in Boston); Handel, concerto for two wind choirs and strings; Gluck, three operatic dances: "Tambourin," "Gavotte" and "Grand Chaconne;" Haydn, symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 2.).

Original in three fundamental respects—in the plan of his structure, in the selection of his harmonic and melodic material and in the application of his instrumental tone—Sibelius in his fourth symphony has given the orchestral art a clean push ahead. He comes before the listening public as the representative of a new school of musical engineering. He finds answer to problems of composition that hitherto have been merely stated and never practically solved.

His work bears little relation to the pieces which are generally described as modern, except, perhaps, to a few composed in France; and it has little external resemblance even to these. His newest music is of a simple, compact, highly tested and tempered make, like the music of Debussy; but it is quite different in mechanical method from anything ever turned out of a Parisian workshop. There is no such thing as Gallic influence to be traced in the symphony, although it is evident that Finn and Frenchman are seeking conquests in the same field.

The art world is giving only scattering attention to that field, therefore the Sibelius symphony is not of the present day in its aims. If it were designed on a grand plan, and if it employed an orchestra of elaborate tone resource, we might write it among the compositions that will give our epoch its mark in musical history. If, also, it took an hour in performance and if it required all the men at Dr. Muck's command and a few more besides to present it, we might record it in the Straussian battleship class of compositions. But its plan is simple even to curtness; it needs hardly more players than the fifth symphony of Beethoven. For a work covering all the moods that a cyclic composition is expected to cover, it tells its story in a comparatively short time.

The interest of the symphony in A minor is that it takes our imaginations into a fresh realm of expression; and in doing so it is near to the music of Debussy and remote from the music of Strauss. It is engineering genius subduing the clouds instead of the seas. Sibelius exercises his talent on aerial, not naval, architecture; and his success almost seems to point to a time when the dreadnought tone poem will be relegated among historic phenomena.

No more certain indications of vitality need to be looked for in the new composition than those already noted: originality of plan, of harmonic and melodic substance and of instrumentation. The strength of its structure is largely in its economy. The work is free from the repetitions which the classic masters found essential for symmetry and which most of the later composers rely on for coherence. The familiar formula of exposition, development and recapitulation, by which orchestral writers commonly hold our attention is not followed. The brief first movement is expository only. It goes no farther than to make statements of themes and presentation of harmonic backgrounds. These indicate the general mechanical method of the symphony and that is all the composer wants of them. Everything is stated deliberately and there is the end of it. The harmony is not of the dynamic kind of the old school that allows melodies to float above it indefinitely through many keys, but it is of [illegible] static type which resists the intrusion of melody. Thus there is the action [illegible] there is the stress and strain which is so desirable in symphonic workmanship, but it is attained through a single statement. The old devices of counter-statement, illustration and expansion are done away with.

The second movement is likewise an example of light, firm structure. As a scherzo it has one main mood to begin and to end with and a contrasting mood to occupy us by way of episode. But the third part is in no respect a repetition of the first, and the second part is far from being the obvious swing from humor to pathos or mock seriousness such as characterizes the conventional movement of its kind. The fun of it is so veiled that the listener hardly knows that he is being amused until the last moment. Orchestral humorists are rarer than orchestral sentimentalists, and they are usually the kind of music makers that paint pictures of our manners to the life. Telling indeed is the satire of Beethoven's scherzo in the fifth symphony when the fugued passage starts up; ironical is the moment when Till swings in Strauss' "Eulenspiegel;" comical is the scene with which the broomstick flies into the corner in Dukas' "Apprentice."

In the music of nearly all the symphonic writers are fine examples of amusing situations cunningly worked up. But there is nothing more subtle and irresistible than the closing measures of the second movement of the Sibelius symphony in A minor. And remarkable to note, this closing passage is one of the most abstruse and scholarly little exploits you will come across in the literature of music. To drive a joke home, to put a house into a laugh by a profoundly studied cadence that would give a music professor much hesitation to analyze, and yet to do it as naturally as Haydn would write his "mi re, do," is to get a start on every other composer who ever scored an orchestral page.

Much could be remarked about interesting effects of tone combination in this work, effects which amount to structural motives, so recurrent and balanced are they. If Sibelius were always to use the bassoon as he does in this symphony we should charge him with mannerism; we know, however, that his use of it is not manner but message. His vigorous employment of the low notes of this instrument bespeaks a new day of freedom for the wood choir, a day of independence from the fundamental French horn tone. In flute, likewise, and in clarinet, we note a treatment which is a clear protest against the procedure of the composers who have had the applause of the last 20 years. No instrument is put to service as a mere tone filler. Everything speaks in its own voice. There is equality everywhere. The strings do not dominate the orchestra; neither do the first violins dominate the strings.

As pilot of the Finnish aircraft, Dr. Muck scored his points chiefly in the first two movements and here the gallery was quick to acknowledge his good work. He never got far from the ground in his third and fourth flights. But he was not out for a spectacular day. He was too just to himself as a technician to overdo his opportunity.

Leave should not be taken of this discussion of the great symphony without mention of the composer's application of rhetorical formulas in the last movement. As attention in the opening movement is wholly given to exposition, here it is wholly given to development, and to development of a kind so rich and so out of the familiar style that the Symphony conductor and his men, with all their perspicacity, only began to fathom it. Thus the composer works out the second of the three main ideas of classic structure. The third traditional idea of recapitulation he has nothing to do with. When the time comes to begin to say things over again, Sibelius stops.

Proudly the horn players obeyed Dr. Muck and stood up to bow to applause after their shrewd execution of the rapid notes in the Handel concerto. They have brought the efficiency of their department up to the mark of the rest of the orchestra with the addition of new talent this autumn, and they are not backward in showing their satisfaction about it. With dignity and with apparent delight the two leading oboe players accepted their share of the applause also. It was no surprise to the house to hear the solo oboist of the principal wood choir read his part to perfection; but it must have surprised many to find that there was an oboist in the orchestra who could take the solo line of a second choir with equal acclaim.

Dr. Muck furnished after the intermission what in the early years of the Symphony orchestra would have made a complete program. No less than three eighteenth century composers he deemed necessary to offset one of the twentieth. Everything was well received. The conductor found the sentiment of both the gay and the somber music of Gluck in a way to keep his audience attentive. Furthermore he succeeded in interesting it in the Haydn symphony in D major, which represents the composer in an unwontedly gray mood.

ELMENDORF TO LECTURE

Dwight Elmendorf will open his eighth annual series of travel talks at Symphony hall, Nov. 7, continuing over five Friday evenings and Saturday afternoons. The countries to be described this season are Ceylon, India and Java. Mr. Elmendorf gave up half his lecture season last year in order to reach India at a season of the year when the country was richest in photographic possibilities, it is said, and he has returned after nine months of travel with a picture record of his journeyings which in variety of subject and artistic worth he considers the finest of his 30 years of foreign travel. Season tickets insuring the same seat during either course of five lectures go on sale at Symphony hall Monday. Single tickets for all lectures will go on sale Nov. 3.

SOPRANO TO GIVE ANNUAL MATINEE

(Photo reproduced by permission of C. A. Ellis)

Miss Geraldine Farrar, recital singer and Symphony soloist

the Boston Symphony orchestra, Oct. 31 and Nov. 1. Her selections will be the aria, "Come scoglio," from Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte" and the three Wagnerian songs with orchestral accompaniment, "Im Treibhaus," "Traeume" and "Schmerzen." Two new works by Max Schillings are on the program, "Seemorgen" and "Meeresgruss." The other numbers will be Mozart's symphony in E flat and Weber's "Jubilee" overture.

Miss Farrar appears in recital in Symphony hall on the afternoon of Oct 28. She will sing 24 numbers, including a group from the classic repertory, three of which, Beethoven's "La Partenza" and "Mit einem gemalten Band," and Mozart's "Alleluia" from the motet "Exsultate," arranged by Lilli Lehmann, are unfamiliar concert pieces. Miss Farrar will sing Shubert's "Hedgerose" and familiar works by Franz and Loewe. French, Russian and American composers are liberally represented on the program.

* * *

The Verdi band concert which has been thrice postponed is announced to be given on Boston Common Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock. Under the direction of Theron D. Perkins the following program will be played: Selection from the opera "I Lombardi," excerpts from "Ernani," aria from "Aida," selection from "Un ballo in Maschera," "Miserere" from "Trovatore," selection from the opera "Simon Boccanegra," "The Anvil Chorus" from "Trovatore" and selection from "Aida." The soprano soloist will be Mme. Wilhelmina Wright Calvert.

* * *

Josef Hofmann gives a piano recital in Symphony hall tomorrow afternoon, playing Beethoven's sonata, op. 106, and other works as follows: Handel, variations; Beethoven, bagatelles in E flat major and C major; Chopin, nocturnes, op. 32, No. 1 and op. 9, No. 3; mazurka, op. 56; waltzes in F minor and E flat major. He will also present a Liszt sonata, two preludes, A minor and D minor, and "Polichinelle," by Rachmaninoff, and pieces by Dvorsky and Scriabine.

* * *

Bringing to Boston the 80 players of the New York Philharmonic Society, Josef Stransky will present in Symphony hall Sunday afternoon, Nov. 2, the following program: Wagner, overture to "Rienzi"; Bruch, violin concerto No. 1 in G minor; Strauss, tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration"; Tschaikowsky, symphony No. 5 in E minor. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, violinist.

* * *

Ignace Paderewski, the pianist, makes his first appearance in Boston at Symphony hall on the afternoon of Nov. 7. He will play the Bach-Liszt fantasia and fugue in G minor, Beethoven's sonata in E major, opus 109; Schumann's "Carneval"; Chopin's nocturne in E major; mazurka in B minor and sonata in B flat minor; and two etudes by Liszt, "Waldesrauschen" and "La Campanella."

* * *

The Kneisel quartet opens its Boston series of concerts at Steinert hall on the night of Nov. 4, with Henri L. Leroy, clarinetist, assisting. The works to be presented are: Beethoven, quartet in F minor; Chadwick, quartet in D minor; Brahms, quintet in B minor. These concerts are under Symphony hall management and tickets are put on sale at the Symphony hall box office Oct. 28.

* * *

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give its first pension fund concert on the afternoon of Nov. 16 in Symphony hall, with Karl Muck conducting.

* * *

Franz Egenieff, baritone, gives a song recital in Jordan hall on the afternoon of Nov. 3, assisted by Jeno Kerntler, pianist.

PIANIST WHO INTERPRETS BEETHOVEN

TRANSCRIPT

OCTOBER 25,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

FROM THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY TO SIBELIUS

Pieces by Haendel, Gluck and Haydn in Remarkable Performance—The Rare Accomplishment of Dr. Muck and the Orchestra in Such Music—Sibelius's Baffling Symphony—The Contrasts of Surface and Substance and a Possible Explanation

IF Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra occasionally misunderstand and so misinterpret their music, as they seemed to do last week with Franck's tone-poem, "The Daughters of Æolus," then in a short seven days do they redeem themselves. If, being human and so subject to infirmity, they fall below their standard—rather less often than most of us do in our work—forthwith they reassert it in new and high excellences. Three of the items on the programme of the concert yesterday afternoon were eighteenth-century pieces: A concerto—in the old sense of the word—for strings and two wind-choirs by Händel; three dances out of Gluck's operas and Haydn's symphony in D, the twelfth of the Salomon series. Now, simple and stripped as this old music looks, there is none more exacting to play to perfection. Ultra-modern pieces, from Strauss to Schönberg and from Reger to Ravel, in spite of their technical exactions, are relatively easy beside it. For these eighteenth-century composers wrote a transparent music and assumed that an orchestra of sensitive and glorifying virtuosi would play it. The appointed instruments must sing the melodies, and oboists, 'cellists, clarinetists, string choir or wind choir must phrase them with the divination and the skill of a prima donna who adds to voice, artistry. The interplay of the melodies must seem as free and clear as light itself. Not safely may any player miss an accent, since the music will not hide his slip. The response to rhythm in every man of the orchestra must be sensitiveness itself. The euphony of the different choirs within themselves, the balancing of them one with another, must be flawless. Each choir, again, must play with the utmost beauty of characteristic tone, since from these unified yet diversified voices, rather than from harmonic and instrumental detail, this old music gains what we now call color. Above all, an orchestra must play these eighteenth-century pieces with a keen sense of style. Here is music that weaves itself into patterns by a self-propelling impulse. Each time it is played, it must seem to be creating itself anew. With all its formal elegance, the elementary quality of music as spontaneous utterance still lurks in it. Into symmetrical traceries of sound it weaves itself, as it unfolds its design in flow of line, in grace of motion, in play of light and shade. Nothing should seem arbitrary; everything should seem felicitous. The beauty and the animation of it all should spring from charm or zest of inventing, imagining and imparting mood.

Fortunate the orchestra that can bear this test of eighteenth-century music in technical impeccability, in beauty of tone, in felicity of detail, in pervading sense of style. For the players these pieces of Gluck, Händel and Haydn were as mirrors illuminated that did reflect all their virtues and that might as clearly have imaged all their faults. Throughout, the orchestra seemed the perfect instrument of this music and upon the instrument Dr. Muck was playing as perfectly. Now, it is as easy for a conductor to take this old music superficially as it is for his men to play it carelessly. Do not the melodies sing themselves? What ear could miss the transformations and the interplay of them? The rhythms set themselves in motion. Who could mistake a single mood or fancy? As the music seems to create itself, so does it express itself? In the good old kapellmeister phrase, as the students say in Germany, "let it run." Many a conductor does let it run until it becomes a blur that streams by the ear without clear or characteristic impression. Haydn's symphonies and Mozarts in particular have been so played in Boston within easy memory.

As it happens, eighteenth-century music is no such easy-going thing. According to the conditions of their time Händel and Haydn were as versed in the possibilities of their orchestras as Strauss or Mahler in ours. They were practising conductors as well as creating composers. They had as fine and imaginative ears—so far as their orchestral resources went—for the quality of tone that should be the revealing and characteristic voice of their music. As they sought it beyond peradventure, so Dr. Muck now seeks and gains it—for Händel's concerto body and brilliance almost in alternation; for two of Gluck's dances limpidity and fine lustres, for the third large and lucent sonority; for Haydn's symphony, lightness, fluidity, suppleness. Simple and fluent as this old music seems, there is room in it for the nicest discrimination in accent, for the most adroit distribution of light and shade. The eighteenth-century composers did not litter their scores with marks of expression or parenthetical notes between the staves. They trusted to the intelligence and imagination of the virtuosi who played their music. In these days in these things, the conductor replaces their little intuitive bands. Recall the variety of accent that Dr. Muck gave to the recurring antiphonal dialogue of Händel's choirs; the delicate modulations with which he gave Gluck's dances a lovelier grace; the just heed, without a hint of over-emphasis, of every rhetorical device or playful fancy

These melodies of Haydn or of Gluck sing themselves. True, but they sing themselves more beautifully when phrase melts into phrase as it did under Dr. Muck's hands and when the pace stays or quickens as though the impulses of the composer were playing in a kind of reincarnation. Formal as this old music is, there is a queer communicating impulse in it. The listener is caught into it almost in spite of himself, begins to create it with the composer, winds and unwinds the strands of counterpoint, deepens or lightens the melodies, presses forward with the design and brings it finally to full and triumphant completion. The impulse is in the music, but it is Dr. Muck who transmits it by his command of the rhythm that is the electricity of tone.

Grant that Händel's concerto is only tracery in tones with no more mood than vigorous creation; but with Gluck's dances comes gaiety a little touched with wistfulness and, in the chaconne, with all its formalities, an eloquent elation. Haydn smiles out of his symphony often gaily, but now and then with the shadow of melancholy and reflection across the smile. There are moods—not emotions or passions; on goes the music weaving its patterns; only, as it were, the light that falls upon the web varies with the feeling behind. The conductor must not miss this play of mood since it is the charm of the music; yet he must not over-emphasize it till it bursts the formal bonds and shatters the elegance of symphony or dance. The golden mean is hard to gain. Dr. Muck gains it. To the beauty of sound and pattern in this old music, he adds its charm of feeling. In its elegances and formalities, he discovers a hundred little felicities. He makes it fall fresh and warm on our ears. Over into us comes the composer's impulse. Perhaps to do all this for eighteenth-century pieces is a finer and harder feat than to make "Ein Heldenleben" throb with eloquence or to lay iridescent phrase by iridescent phrase in "The Afternoon of a Faun."

Before all this eighteenth-century music and in sharp contrast with it stood Sibelius's new symphony and as contrasting were the answering moods of the audience. Händel, Gluck, Haydn it understood and enjoyed and its applause was as warm as its pleasure. The Sibelius of this particular symphony baffled and puzzled it. By the precedent of his two earlier symphonies, it was safe—incumbent even—to applaud; but the actual sensation, as the desultory clapping suggested, was doleful bewilderment. Only the vehement at either extreme were quite sure of their impressions. To some, Sibelius writes invariably mighty masterpieces; to others his whole procedure in this newest symphony is but wild maundering, signifying nothing but his disordered mind. The refuge of the sane and open-minded in such confusing play of partisanship and prejudice is to try to discover what in matter, manner and spirit the music really is, and what Sibelius would express in it. So doing it can understand and estimate his accomplishment.

In the first place, much in the new symphony is characteristic of the Sibelius of the old. It is short and terse. It is free of form, yet firmly and closely upbuilded. Throughout there is no mistaking what Sibelius would say or his manner of speech in the saying. He writes lucidly; he writes with the designing faculty that sees the end from the beginning and the steps along the way. He is economical of means, but he uses every one of them for a purpose and with firm and adroit skill. An ordinary orchestra; little more than half an hour; the usual symphonic divisions and contrasts suffice him. He is too full of invention, imagination and emotion to need to split his melodies into fragments and then worry each fragment through endless sequences. Directness of speech and intensity of purpose in it save him from mere manipulation of harmonic and instrumental resource and invention.

Sibelius speaks out of himself and speaks in the substance and the character of his musical thoughts. He is fertile in the invention of melodies and they have a distinctive individuality. They may be rugged, sombre and puissant; they may be fantastical, eerie and restless; they may be grave and sad or else austerely noble; they may unfold in changeful tumult or in concentrated intensity; yet each is the expression of a personal emotion. If Sibelius is to be read in his music, he is a moody and imaginative man, who instinctively and directly translates into tones the emotions and the imaginings that possess him. How far emotion and image are induced by external impulse and suggestion is pure speculation. Finland is a rugged land and Sibelius, a Finn, writes a rugged music. Sombre and stark is the Finnish landscape and Sibelius writes a stark and sombre music. The lights of Finland are clear and sharp; the shadows there are lowering and gray. Like to them in its light and shade is Sibelius's music. Great winds sweep the great wastes of Finland, and tumultuous in such wise are Sibelius's symphonies. Finnish folk-song is eerie and Sibelius can write in the mood of weird fantasy. A grave folk, a melancholy folk, an austerely noble folk, much-enduring, are the Finns. Sibelius shares their traits. No doubt, with Sibelius his land and his folk play upon a mind and a spirit in which emotion and image seem intense and thick-coming. Suffice it that the passion or the vision, however inspired, spring into musical speech.

Hence is this new symphony primarily a symphony in which emotion and imagining become a sequence of tones, a melody, a theme. Whether they are born of Sibelius himself or of his environment or more probably of both, whether they are sombre and puissant, eerie or mournful, these melodies arrest the listening ear, seize the listening imagination, stir to responsive emotion. They have power to sway those that hear—the power of emotion, the power of vivid image. And there is no staying the flood of them. On they come, restless, tumultuous, as various as the emotions and the images that have engendered them, each surcharged with the Sibelian intensity. They meet, they clash, they part. They cry out in broken ejaculation. They grope into fuller utterance. They sustain themselves for a little in clear-voiced song; they die away in mystery; they are smothered and choked. Restlessly they wander up and down introduction and [illegible] that must bear this tumult than such music as Sibelius has written? Inevitably warring keys will clash in it and dissonances scream out. It will move in strange sequences; it will halt in sharp-set juxtapositions. The instrumental voices will whirr and whistle, clamor and shriek; the harmonies will bite and pierce; the rhythms will shatter themselves upon each other. The lights will be lurid; the shadows black. Passion of utterance will spend itself in its own vehemence and spent, die away in despondent whispers. There will rarely be beauty except in sharp and sudden flashes. For the first time what we call impressionism and "ultra-modern" procedure in music will seem not calculated, but rhapsodic; not merely adroit and imaginative, but strong and stark.

Hearing such a symphony, it is easy to say that Sibelius has taken his melodies, rugged and sombre, restless and eerie, lofty and grave, and clothed them in all the singularities of tonality, dissonance, sequence, harmony and instrumentation that he can devise; that he has attempted a freakish tour de force and unflaggingly, almost viciously, accomplished it, out of strength turned perverse and wanton. Amazed his audiences hear; baffled they depart. Consider rather, the flood of emotion and imagining that Sibelius has poured into this symphony, consider the melodies that must bear this flood between the high, firm banks of the symphonic form. The flood cannot but seethe with all the singularities of what we call ultra-modern music, when impelling it, is such inventive daring and such resolute will as are in Sibelius. The symphony is no wild congeries of freakish and empty "effects," meaningless and insincere. It is a symphony of emotional and imaginative tumult, but never of tumult unguided or assumed. In fine and fearless frenzy Sibelius drives his melodies through their course—a northern Phæton with the steeds of Apollo, but too strong and sure to be overturned.

H. T. P.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

More Novel Pieces on Dr. Muck's Programme—Josef Hofmann's Recital with an Array of Exacting Pieces—Miss Farrar with the Symphony Orchestra and in a Song Recital of Her Own

MISS FARRAR, unheard here for two years, will sing thrice in Boston ne week—once in a song recital of h own in Symphony Hall, on Tuesday afte noon, and twice in the regular pair of Sy phony Concerts. On Sunday afternoon, Symphony Hall, Mr. Hofmann, the piani will begin his present American tour wi a characteristically arduous programm For the rest, the Symphony Orchestra ha the concerts of the week to itself. If th number of concerts is small, in these da of autumn beginnings, the quality speak for itself.

Symphony Hall—Symphony Concerts

For a conductor who professes such indifference to novel music, Dr. Muck is singularly zealous to provide it. A week ago he revived Franck's forgotten tone-poem, "The Daughters of Æolus"; yesterday he made known Sibelius's newest symphony for the first time in Boston, and at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening he and the orchestra will play for the first times in America two fantastic pieces by Max Schillings, "Morning on the Lake," and "The Sea's Greeting." Schillings, more easily recalled by his "Moloch" and other operas than by his purely symphonic music, is an able composer of the middle generation who walks in the ways of Wagner. The other orchestral numbers are Mozart's symphony in E-flat and Weber's "Jubilee" Overture, long unheard at the Symphony Concerts. Miss Farrar will be the assisting singer in an air from Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte" and three orchestrated songs of Wagner, "Dreams," "In the Hothouse" and "Pangs. In add four of these pieces she has never been heard here, and she is now at the height of her young prime.

Symphony Hall—Mr. Hofmann

It is Josef Hofmann's distinction to have risen to his present place in the first rank of pianists by his abilities and nothing else. He shuns self-advertising; he is not a "picturesque personality"; he never flatters his audience and he asks it to take music and the performance of it as seriously as does he. The greater then the abilities that have won a fine and enduring public for him. They are manifold—mastery of technique, rare command of diversified and significant tone, feeling for the long melody, the finely spun phrase and the animating rhythm, keen understanding, just emotion, and a serene command of himself and his music. Mr. Hofmann likes the taxing programme and he has set himself and his audiences such a list of pieces for his concert tomorrow afternoon in Symphony Hall: Beethoven's sonata. Opus 106; Liszt's mighty sonata in B minor; five short pieces by Chopin and five more by contemporary Russian composers—almost always happy in their music for the piano—Rachmaninoff, Dvorsky and Scriabin.

Symphony Hall—Miss Farrar

Hitherto Miss Farrar has sung in Boston either in opera, in orchestral concerts or in a song recital divided with another artist. Next Tuesday afternoon at Symphony Hall, she will venture for the first time here a song recital of her own. Her programme is catholic and exacting. It begins with old pieces out of Händel, Gluck, Mozart, and Beethoven, three of which are unfamiliar. It proceeds with classical German songs—some of them as novel—by Schubert, Franz, and Löwe. Then follow sundry Russian songs from Moussorgsky, Rubinstein, Tschaikowsky, and Gretchaninoff, and a miscellany of contemporary pieces by Strauss, Wolf, Massenet, Chadwick and MacDowell. By the clear token of this programme Miss Farrar would prove herself a finely-touched singer of songs in the concert room as well as a vivid singing actress in the opera house. She has the voice and the artistry, the intelligence and the imag[illegible] the zest for work.

From EAGLE

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

OCT 24 1913

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY DATES.

Women's Auxiliary Puts in Plea for More Concerts.

The programme for concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, was made known yesterday in a report presented by Mrs. Charles F. Pray, chairman of the executive committee, at the annual fall meeting of the Women's Auxiliary Board on Philharmonic Concerts, which was held in the science room of the Academy of Music. Mrs. Camden C. Dike presided.

Five concerts will be given during the season of 1913-1914, on Friday evenings, November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony will be given at the opening concert. The executive committee stated that ten concerts should be given as the number of persons wishing to subscribe exceeds the number that can be admitted.

The receipts at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has 101 musicians, are not sufficient to pay the expenses of the orchestra, and Major Henry L. Higginson, the founder, makes up the deficiency every year. Only the assisting artists can be paid from the receipts.

The assisting artists are Fritz Kreisler, violinist, who plays on December 5; Mme. Elizabeth Boehme Van Endert, soprano, of the Berlin Royal Opera Company, who sings on February 20, and Jan Paderewski, who plays at the closing concert on March 20.

The board decided to protest against the running of the 3-cent car line through Ashland place, because the noise disturbs any performance in the Opera House of the Academy, and because it would prevent the convenient use of one of the carriage entrances. Mrs. Rosa Bender was made chairman of the committee to obtain signatures of those members of the Women's Auxiliary who were not present. The Women's Auxiliary Board of the Brooklyn Symphony Concerts will be asked to consider joining in the protest.

From EAGLE

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

OC 1913

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S TRIBUTE

Brooklyn Establishes Record in Selling All Reserved Seats for Season's Concerts.

Former subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts have subscribed for all of the seats in the opera house of the Academy of Music, including all of the boxes, for the entire season of 1913-14. It is the first time since the Boston Symphony Orchestra began giving concerts in Brooklyn, about twenty-three years ago, that the entire house has been sold out to the old subscribers. It is the first time that it is impossible to sell tickets to new subscribers. The date that was fixed for new subscribers to purchase tickets was Saturday, October 25, but there are no reserved seats which they may purchase. A limited number of admission tickets will be sold for the main floor and the first balcony.

Those who were not subscribers last year, and who have made written application for tickets, if any were to be had, may renew their applications for the season of 1914-15, and in case there are any vacant seats another season, the seats will be assigned to them in the order in which the applications are received, and at prices that will be fixed by the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the management of the orchestra, in due course .

While the opera house of the Academy had been large enough for most of the audiences during the first few years, it has been certain from the first that it would not be large enough to accommodate audiences after the people have gotten into the habit of coming to the Academy. It will be desirable, in time, that another balcony be added to the opera house to accommodate the audiences at the many important concerts given there. The increased demand for tickets is a testimonial not only to the supreme position which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has held, but also to Dr. Muck, as conductor.

From TIMES

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date OCT 17 1913

The sale of season tickets for the five concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia, at Miss Harris' office, in Heppe's piano rooms, is fully up to expectations. When the box office sale opens for the first concert there will be very few tickets to offer to the public.

The concerts will be given Monday evenings, on November 3, December 1, January 5, February 16 and March 16. Geraldine Farrar, who will be the soloist at the first concert, is ending a most successful tour of the Pacific coast, which she has made under the direction of C. A. Ellis, who is also the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Kreisler will be the

TRANSCRIPT
OCTOBER 25,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

FROM THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY TO SIBELIUS

Pieces by Haendel, Gluck and Haydn in Remarkable Performance—The Rare Accomplishment of Dr. Muck and the Orchestra in Such Music—Sibelius's Baffling Symphony—The Contrasts of Surface and Substance and a Possible Explanation

IF Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra occasionally misunderstand and so misinterpret their music, as they seemed to do last week with Franck's tone-poem, "The Daughters of Æolus," then in a short seven days do they redeem themselves. If, being human and so subject to infirmity, they fall below their standard—rather less often than most of us do in our work—forthwith they reassert it in new and high excellences. Three of the items on the programme of the concert yesterday afternoon were eighteenth-century pieces: A concerto—in the old sense of the word—for strings and two wind-choirs by Händel; three dances out of Gluck's operas and Haydn's symphony in D, the twelfth of the Salomon series. Now, simple and stripped as this old music looks, there is none more exacting to play to perfection. Ultra-modern pieces, from Strauss to Schönberg and from Reger to Ravel, in spite of their technical exactions, are relatively easy beside it. For these eighteenth-century composers wrote a transparent music and assumed that an orchestra of sensitive and glorifying virtuosi would play it. The appointed instruments must sing the melodies, and oboists, 'cellists, clarinetists, string choir or wind choir must phrase them with the divination and the skill of a prima donna who adds to voice, artistry. The interplay of the melodies must seem as free and clear as light itself. Not safely may any player miss an accent, since the music will not hide his slip. The response to rhythm in every man of the orchestra must be sensitiveness itself. The euphony of the different choirs within themselves, the balancing of them one with another, must be flawless. Each choir, again, must play with the utmost beauty of characteristic tone, since from these unified yet diversified voices, rather than from harmonic and instrumental detail, this old music gains what we now call color. Above all, an orchestra must play these eighteenth-century pieces with a keen sense of style. Here is music that weaves itself into patterns by a self-propelling impulse. Each time it is played, it must seem to be creating itself anew. With all its formal elegance, the elementary quality of music as spontaneous utterance still lurks in it. Into symmetrical traceries of sound it weaves itself, as it unfolds its design in flow of line, in grace of motion, in play of light and shade. Nothing should seem arbitrary; everything should seem felicitous. The beauty and the animation of it all should spring from charm or zest of inventing, imagining and imparting mood.

Fortunate the orchestra that can bear this test of eighteenth-century music in technical impeccability, in beauty of tone, in felicity of detail, in pervading sense of style. For the players these pieces of Gluck, Händel and Haydn were as mirrors illuminated that did reflect all their virtues and that might as clearly have imaged all their faults. Throughout, the orchestra seemed the perfect instrument of this music and upon the instrument Dr. Muck was playing as perfectly. Now, it is as easy for a conductor to take this old music superficially as it is for his men to play it carelessly. Do not the melodies sing themselves? What ear could miss the transformations and the interplay of them? The rhythms set themselves in motion. Who could mistake a single mood or fancy? As the music seems to create itself, so does it express itself? In the good old kapellmeister phrase, as the students say in Germany, "let it run." Many a conductor does let it run until it becomes a blur that streams by the ear without clear or characteristic impression. Haydn's symphonies and Mozarts in particular have been so played in Boston within easy memory.

As it happens, eighteenth-century music is no such easy-going thing. According to the conditions of their time Händel and Haydn were as versed in the possibilities of their orchestras as Strauss or Mahler in ours. They were practising conductors as well as creating composers. They had as fine and imaginative ears—so far as their orchestral resources went—for the quality of tone that should be the revealing and characteristic voice of their music. As they sought it beyond peradventure, so Dr. Muck now seeks and gains it—for Händel's concerto body and brilliance almost in alternation; for two of Gluck's dances limpidity and fine lustres, for the third large and lucent sonority; for Haydn's symphony, lightness, fluidity, suppleness. Simple and fluent as this old music seems, there is room in it for the nicest discrimination in accent, for the most adroit distribution of light and shade. The eighteenth-century composers did not litter their scores with marks of expression or parenthetical notes between the staves. They trusted to the intelligence and imagination of the virtuosi who played their music. In these days in these things, the conductor replaces their little intuitive bands. Recall the variety of accent that Dr. Muck gave to the recurring antiphonal dialogue of Händel's choirs; the delicate modulations with which he gave Gluck's dances a lovelier grace; the just heed, without a hint of over-emphasis, of every [illegible] rhetorical device or playful fancy.

These melodies of Haydn or of Gluck sing themselves. True, but they sing themselves more beautifully when phrase melts into phrase as it did under Dr. Muck's hands and when the pace stays or quickens as though the impulses of the composer were playing in a kind of reincarnation. Formal as this old music is, there is a queer communicating impulse in it. The listener is caught into it almost in spite of himself, begins to create it with the composer, winds and unwinds the strands of counterpoint, deepens or lightens the melodies, presses forward with the design and brings it finally to full and triumphant completion. The impulse is in the music, but it is Dr. Muck who transmits it by his command of the rhythm that is the electricity of tone.

Grant that Händel's concerto is only tracery in tones with no more mood than vigorous creation; but with Gluck's dances comes gaiety a little touched with wistfulness and, in the chaconne, with all its formalities, an eloquent elation. Haydn smiles out of his symphony often gaily, but now and then with the shadow of melancholy and reflection across the smile. There are moods—not emotions or passions; on goes the music weaving its patterns; only, as it were, the light that falls upon the web varies with the feeling behind. The conductor must not miss this play of mood since it is the charm of the music; yet he must not over-emphasize it till it bursts the formal bonds and shatters the elegance of symphony or dance. The golden mean is hard to gain. Dr. Muck gains it. To the beauty of sound and pattern in this old music, he adds its charm of feeling. In its elegances and formalities, he discovers a hundred little felicities. He makes it fall fresh and warm on our ears. Over into us comes the composer's impulse. Perhaps to do all this for eighteenth-century pieces is a finer and harder feat than to make "Ein Heldenleben" throb with eloquence or to lay iridescent phrase by iridescent phrase in "The Afternoon of a Faun."

Before all this eighteenth-century music and in sharp contrast with it stood Sibelius's new symphony and as contrasting were the answering moods of the audience. Händel, Gluck, Haydn it understood and enjoyed and its applause was as warm as its pleasure. The Sibelius of this particular symphony baffled and puzzled it. By the precedent of his two earlier symphonies, it was safe—incumbent even—to applaud; but the actual sensation, as the desultory clapping suggested, was doleful bewilderment. Only the vehement at either extreme were quite sure of their impressions. To some, Sibelius writes invariably mighty masterpieces; to others his whole procedure in this newest symphony is but wild maundering, signifying nothing but his disordered mind. The refuge of the sane and open-minded in such confusing play of partisanship and prejudice is to try to discover what in matter, manner and spirit the music really is, and what Sibelius would express in it. So doing it can understand and estimate his accomplishment.

In the first place, much in the new symphony is characteristic of the Sibelius of the old. It is short and terse. It is free of form, yet firmly and closely upbuilded. Throughout there is no mistaking what Sibelius would say or his manner of speech in the saying. He writes lucidly; he writes with the designing faculty that sees the end from the beginning and the steps along the way. He is economical of means, but he uses every one of them for a purpose and with firm and adroit skill. An ordinary orchestra; little more than half an hour; the usual symphonic divisions and contrasts suffice him. He is too full of invention, imagination and emotion to need to split his melodies into fragments and then worry each fragment through endless sequences. Directness of speech and intensity of purpose in it save him from mere manipulation of harmonic and instrumental resource and invention.

Sibelius speaks out of himself and speaks in the substance and the character of his musical thoughts. He is fertile in the invention of melodies and they have a distinctive individuality. They may be rugged, sombre and puissant; they may be fantastical, eerie and restless; they may be grave and sad or else austerely noble; they may unfold in changeful tumult or in concentrated intensity; yet each is the expression of a personal emotion. If Sibelius is to be read in his music, he is a moody and imaginative man, who instinctively and directly translates into tones the emotions and the imaginings that possess him. How far emotion and image are induced by external impulse and suggestion is pure speculation. Finland is a rugged land and Sibelius, a Finn, writes a rugged music. Sombre and stark is the Finnish landscape and Sibelius writes a stark and sombre music. The lights of Finland are clear and sharp; the shadows there are lowering and gray. Like to them in its light and shade is Sibelius's music. Great winds sweep the great wastes of Finland, and tumultuous in such wise are Sibelius's symphonies. Finnish folk-song is eerie and Sibelius can write in the mood of weird fantasy. A grave folk, a melancholy folk, an austerely noble folk, much-enduring, are the Finns. Sibelius shares their traits. No doubt, with Sibelius his land and his folk play upon a mind and a spirit in which emotion and image seem intense and thick-coming. Suffice it that the passion or the vision, however inspired, spring into musical speech.

Hence is this new symphony primarily a symphony in which emotion and imagining become a sequence of tones, a melody, a theme. Whether they are born of Sibelius himself or of his environment or more probably of both, whether they are sombre and puissant, eerie or mournful, these melodies arrest the listening ear, seize the listening imagination, stir to responsive emotion. They have power to sway those that hear—the power of emotion, the power of vivid image. And there is no staying the flood of them. On they come, restless, tumultuous, as various as the emotions and the images that have engendered them, each surcharged with the Sibelian intensity. They meet, they clash, they part. They cry out in broken ejaculation. They grope into fuller utterance. They sustain themselves for a little in clear-voiced song; they die away in mystery; they are smothered and choked. Restlessly they wander up and down introduction and that must bear this tumult than such music as Sibelius has written? Inevitably warring keys will clash in it and dissonances scream out. It will move in strange sequences; it will halt in sharp set juxtapositions. The instrumental voices will whirr and whistle, clamor and shriek; the harmonies will bite and pierce; the rhythms will shatter themselves upon each other. The lights will be lurid; the shadows black. Passion of utterance will spend itself in its own vehemence and spent, die away in despondent whispers. There will rarely be beauty except in sharp and sudden flashes. For the first time what we call impressionism and "ultra-modern" procedure in music will seem not calculated, but rhapsodic; not merely adroit and imaginative, but strong and stark.

Hearing such a symphony, it is easy to say that Sibelius has taken his melodies, rugged and sombre, restless and eerie, lofty and grave, and clothed them in all the singularities of tonality, dissonance, sequence, harmony and instrumentation that he can devise; that he has attempted a freakish tour de force and unflaggingly, almost viciously, accomplished it, out of strength turned perverse and wanton. Amazed his audiences hear; baffled they depart. Consider rather, the flood of emotion and imagining that Sibelius has poured into this symphony, consider the melodies that must bear this flood between the high, firm banks of the symphonic form. The flood cannot but seethe with all the singularities of what we call ultra-modern music, when impelling it, is such inventive daring and such resolute will as are in Sibelius. The symphony is no wild congeries of freakish and empty "effects," meaningless and insincere. It is a symphony of emotional and imaginative tumult, but never of tumult unguided or assumed. In fine and fearless frenzy Sibelius drives his melodies through their course—a northern Phæton with the steeds of Apollo, but too strong and sure to be overturned.

H. T. P.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

More Novel Pieces on Dr. Muck's Programme—Josef Hofmann's Recital with an Array of Exacting Pieces—Miss Farrar with the Symphony Orchestra and in a Song Recital of Her Own

MISS FARRAR, unheard here for two years, will sing thrice in Boston ne. week—once in a song recital of h own in Symphony Hall, on Tuesday after noon, and twice in the regular pair of Symphony Concerts. On Sunday afternoon, in Symphony Hall, Mr. Hofmann, the pianist, will begin his present American tour with a characteristically arduous programme. For the rest, the Symphony Orchestra has the concerts of the week to itself. If the number of concerts is small, in these days of autumn beginnings, the quality speaks for itself.

Symphony Hall—Symphony Concerts

For a conductor who professes such indifference to novel music, Dr. Muck is singularly zealous to provide it. A week ago he revived Franck's forgotten tone-poem, "The Daughters of Æolus"; yesterday he made known Sibelius's newest symphony for the first time in Boston, and at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening he and the orchestra will play for the first times in America two fantastic pieces by Max Schillings, "Morning on the Lake," and "The Sea's Greeting." Schillings, more easily recalled by his "Moloch" and other operas than by his purely symphonic music, is an able composer of the middle generation who walks in the ways of Wagner. The other orchestral numbers are Mozart's symphony in E-flat and Weber's "Jubilee" Overture, long unheard at the Symphony Concerts. Miss Farrar will be the assisting singer in an air from Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte" and three orchestrated songs of Wagner, "Dreams," "In the Hothouse" and "Pangs. In add four of these pieces she has never been heard here, and she is now at the height of her young prime.

Symphony Hall—Mr. Hofmann

It is Josef Hofmann's distinction to have risen to his present place in the first rank of pianists by his abilities and nothing else. He shuns self-advertising; he is not a "picturesque personality"; he never flatters his audience and he asks it to take music and the performance of it as seriously as does he. The greater then the abilities that have won a fine and enduring public for him. They are manifold—mastery of technique, rare command of diversified and significant tone, feeling for the long melody, the finely spun phrase and the animating rhythm, keen understanding, just emotion, and a serene command of himself and his music. Mr. Hofmann likes the taxing programme and he has set himself and his audiences such a list of pieces for his concert tomorrow afternoon in Symphony Hall: Beethoven's sonata. Opus 106; Liszt's mighty sonata in B minor; five short pieces by Chopin and five more by contemporary Russian composers—almost always happy in their music for the piano—Rachmaninoff, Dvorsky and Scriabin.

Symphony Hall—Miss Farrar

Hitherto Miss Farrar has sung in Boston either in opera, in orchestral concerts, or in a song recital divided with another artist. Next Tuesday afternoon at Symphony Hall, she will venture for the first time here a song recital of her own. Her programme is catholic and exacting. It begins with old pieces out of Händel, Gluck, Mozart, and Beethoven, three of which are unfamiliar. It proceeds with classical German songs—some of them as novel—by Schubert, Franz, and Löwe. Then follow sundry Russian songs from Moussorgsky, Rubinstein, Tschaikowsky, and Gretchaninoff, and a miscellany of contemporary pieces by Strauss, Wolf, Massenet, Chadwick and MacDowell. By the clear token of this programme Miss Farrar would prove herself a finely-touched singer of songs in the concert room as well as a vivid singing actress in the opera house. She has the voice and the artistry, the intelligence and the imag- [illegible] the zest for work

---

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
OCT 24 1913
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY DATES.

Woman's Auxiliary Puts in Plea for More Concerts.

k, 1884

The programme for concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, was made known yesterday in a report presented by Mrs. Charles F. Pray, chairman of the executive committee, at the annual fall meeting of the Women's Auxiliary Board on Philharmonic Concerts, which was held in the science room of the Academy of Music. Mrs. Camden C. Dike presided.

Five concerts will be given during the season of 1913-1914, on Friday evenings, November 7, December 5, January 9, February 20 and March 20. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony will be given at the opening concert. The executive committee stated that ten concerts should be given as the number of persons wishing to subscribe exceeds the number that can be admitted.

The receipts at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has 101 musicians, are not sufficient to pay the expenses of the orchestra, and Major Henry L. Higginson, the founder, makes up the deficiency every year. Only the assisting artists can be paid from the receipts.

The assisting artists are Fritz Kreisler, violinist, who plays on December 5; Mme. Elizabeth Boehme Van Endert, soprano, of the Berlin Royal Opera Company, who sings on February 20, and Jan Paderewski, who plays at the closing concert on March 20.

The board decided to protest against the running of the 3-cent car line through Ashland place, because the noise disturbs any performance in the Opera House of the Academy, and because it would prevent the convenient use of one of the carriage entrances. Mrs. Rosa Bender was made chairman of the committee to obtain signatures of those members of the Women's Auxiliary who were not present. The Women's Auxiliary Board of the Brooklyn Symphony Concerts will be asked to consider joining in the protest.

---

rom EAGLE
ddress: Brooklyn, N. Y.
OC[illegible] 1913
te

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S TRIBUTE

Brooklyn Establishes Record in Selling All Reserved Seats for Season's Concerts.

Former subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts have subscribed for all of the seats in the opera house of the Academy of Music, including all of the boxes, for the entire season of 1913-14. It is the first time since the Boston Symphony Orchestra began giving concerts in Brooklyn, about twenty-three years ago, that the entire house has been sold out to the old subscribers. It is the first time that it is impossible to sell tickets to new subscribers. The date that was fixed for new subscribers to purchase tickets was Saturday, October 25, but there are no reserved seats which they may purchase. A limited number of admission tickets will be sold for the main floor and the first balcony.

Those who were not subscribers last year, and who have made written application for tickets, if any were to be had, may renew their applications for the season of 1914-15, and in case there are any vacant seats another season, the seats will be assigned to them in the order in which the applications are received, and at prices that will be fixed by the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the management of the orchestra, in due course.

While the opera house of the Academy had been large enough for most of the audiences during the first few years, it has been certain from the first that it would not be large enough to accommodate audiences after the people have gotten into the habit of coming to the Academy. It will be desirable, in time, that another balcony be added to the opera house to accommodate the audiences at the many important concerts given there. The increased demand for tickets is a testimonial not only to the supreme position which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has held, but also to Dr. Muck, as conductor.

---

om TIMES ldress
Philadelphia, Pa.
OCT 17 1913
at

The sale of season tickets for the five concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia, at Miss Harris' office, in Heppe's piano rooms, is fully up to expectations. When the box office sale opens for the first concert there will be very few tickets to offer to the public.

The concerts will be given Monday evenings, on November 3, December 1, January 3, February 16 and March 16.

Geraldine Farrar, who will be the soloist at the first concert, is ending a most successful tour of the Pacific coast, which she has made under the direction of C. A. Ellis, who is also the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Kreisler will be the lis

From EVG. JOURNAL
Address: New York
Date OCT 25 1913

Established: L

Orchestral Concerts Begin; Many Recitals Planned Next Week

The several conductors of New York's numerous orchestras have already announced, in general, what musical fare they will offer for the coming season which, accordingly, promises to prove interesting, if not filled with startling novelties. Both Walter Damrosch, of the New York Symphony Orchestra, and Josef Stransky, of the Philharmonic Orchestra, have brought back from Europe some of the newest output of the music makers across the sea, while Dr. Carl Muck, for the periodic visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give New York the cream of such programmes as are first revealed at the Hub.

Mr. Damrosch will open the regular orchestral season with the first concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra at Aeolian Hall to-morrow afternoon. For this first programme he has selected the Fifth Symphony of Tschaikowsky, a concerto for strings by Vivaldi and a Roumanian Rhapsody by Georges Enesco. Mme. Johanna Gadski will be the soloist with three Wagner songs and Joan's Farewell from Tschaikowsky's "Jeanne d'Arc." For next Friday's programme there will be a Haydn symphony, Charles Martin Loeffler's "Le Villanelle du Diable," and Mme. Louise Homer will be the soloist.

The first pair of Philharmonic concerts will take place at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Friday afternoon. Conductor Stransky has chosen the "King Lear" overture of Berlioz, the same composer's "Symphonie Fantastique" and Tschaikowsky's "Marche Slav." Mme. Teresa Carreno will make her first appearance in New York of her present tour in the Tschaikowsky B minor concerto.

It will be good news to discriminating music lovers to learn that the Boston Orchestra will play Beethoven's Seventh Symphony at its first appearance of the season, scheduled for November 6, at Carnegie Hall. Brahms's "Tragic Overture," Liszt's "Les Preludes" and the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" will complete the Thursday evening programme. The following Saturday afternoon Glazounoff's Fifth Symphony will be the chief feature. Grieg's overture, "In Autumn," Cesar Franck's "Les Eolides" and Dvorak's overture "Husitska" will fill out the afternoon.

The Russian Symphony Orchestra, under Modest Altschuler, will give its first concert at Carnegie Hall on November 25, with Maurice Warner, a young violinist fresh from the Auer school, as the soloist. The "Pathetique" symphony of Tschaikowsky will be the chief number.

From Address
Date

rk, 1884

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES FIRST OF SERIES

An enthusiastic audience filled Infantry hall last evening for the first of a series of six concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

For 33 consecutive seasons this orchestra has returned to Providence and the concert of last evening was the 130th in Infantry hall. Dr. Karl Muck, is a wonderful leader and has an orchestra that responds to his every thought, and with such wonderful precision, that its work is well nigh perfect.

The program last evening was one well chosen to display the perfection of orchestral work and was as follows: Beethoven, Symphony in A-major, No. 7, op. 92, 1. Poco Sostenuto; Vivace: II. Allegretto; III. Presto: Presto meno assai; IV. Allegro con brio. Weber, Scene and aria; "Ocean! Thou Mighty Monster," from "Oberon" (Act III., No. 13) Frank, Symphonic poem; "Les Eolides; Wagner, three poems; "The Acoldae" "Im Treibhaus" "Traume" "Schmerzen" Grieg, overture, "I'm Herbst" "In Autumn" op. 11.

The principal number, the Seventh Symphony, with which the program began was filled with a melody and charm that enthralls. Especially appealing was the witchery of the last movement which Richard Wagner characterize; as the "Apotheosis of the Dance."

That it met with the success it deserved was shown by the enthusiastic and prolonged applause. The other numbers, the symphonic poem "Les Eloides" by Cesar Frank, a fine example of French music and the "Autumn" music of the Norwegian Edward Greig. The sololist was Mme. Johanna Gadski of the Metropolitan Opera company, her wonderful voice carried to perfection in the song from Weber's opera, "Oberon" "Ocean Thou Mighty [illegible] to be [illegible] the rang[illegible]

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. OCT 23 1913
Date

Establi

SYMPHONY CONCERT SEATS SNAPPED UP

Women Want Boston Orchestra to Appear Here Ten Times Next Season.

FIRST WITHOUT SOLOIST.

Dr. Muck Prefers That His Band Be Heard Alone.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give the first of its Brooklyn concerts this season with a full programme of Symphonic music and "without the sensation of a visiting artist." This is in accordance with the wish of Dr. Carl Muck, the conductor.

The Woman's Auxiliary Board on Philharmonic Concerts heard announcement to this effect to-day. Mrs. Camden C. Dike presided at the annual fall meeting, and a report was heard from Mrs. Charles F. Pray, executive committee chairman, in the course of which she said:

"Five concerts will be given on Friday evenings, Nov. 7, Dec. 5, Jan. 9, Feb. 20, and March 20. The programme for the opening concert will have for its first part Beethoven's seventh symphony.

"The orchestra has long held the first position among orchestras in this country on account of the quality of its work, and is probably the foremost orchestra in the world. Its conductor receives the largest salary paid to any conductor on either continent, and its soloists are paid larger prices than are paid by any other orchestra in America or abroad. But the chief reason why Dr. Much and the managers of the orchestra are reducing the number of soloists is to give an opportunity to the orchestra itself, which is composed of 101 musicians selected for the various parts so that the men playing the various instruments are of the highest rank to be found in the world. They are paid the highest salaries that are paid to men in any orchestra on either side of the Atlantic.

"The assisting artists for Brooklyn are foremost in their specific work: Mr. Fritz Kreisler, violinist, who will play on Dec. 5; Mme. Elizabeth Boehme Van Endert, soprano of the Berlin Royal Opera Company, who will sing on Feb. 20, and Jan Paderewski, the best known pianist of modern times, who will play at the closing concert on March 20.

"The total receipts at the five concerts in Brooklyn last year were $12,727.50, but this amount, although paying the expenses of the Brooklyn concerts and soloists here in Brooklyn is not enough to cover the pro rata share of the conductor and the members of the orchestra.

"Saturday, Oct. 18, was the last day on which old subscribers could renew subscriptions for themselves and members of their families, respectively. On Monday, Oct. 20, when all the applications for old subscribers had been recorded and the seats had been duly checked off on the house chart, it appeared that every seat in the house, including all of the seats in the boxes, had been subscribed for the season. It also appeared that some of the old subscribers were unable to get additional seats for members of their families.

"At the same time there were written applications from those who would be new subscribers for about 100 additional seats, no one of whom will be able to get any seats for the concerts in Brooklyn this year unless some of the present subscribers should give up their seats.

"Brooklyn is entitled to five matinee concerts as well as five evening concerts. The orchestra gave ten concerts in Brooklyn in the old Academy of Music, and gave up its matinee series when the concerts were given in the Baptist Temple. An urgent appeal should be made to the managers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to give ten concerts in Brooklyn in 1914-15. Inquiry is frequently made as to what is paid to soloists. The amount paid by the orchestra is not made public. At the same time, it is known that the services of Fritz Kreisler, soloist on Dec. 5, cannot be secured for less than $900; that the services of Mme. Van Endert cannot be secured in this country this season at any price, and that Mr. Paderewski has never been willing to play in recital for less than $2,000, and has usually received more than that."

Mrs. Hersey Brown mov[illegible] J. Elliott Langstaff sec[illegible] tion, which was carrie[illegible] protest aga[illegible] the [illegible] Thr[illegible] land[illegible] con[illegible]

From JOURNAL
Address: Providence, R. I.
OCT 22 1913

SYMPHONY CONCERT GREETED BY CROWD

Boston Orchestra Opens 33rd Season in This City.

MADAME GADSKI IS SOLOIST

Operatic Soprano Assists in Masterly Presentation at Infantry Hall. Programme Under Leadership of Dr. Karl Muck Given Enthusiastic Reception.

For its 33rd season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to this city last evening, opening the series of six concerts which it will give here this winter with its 130th concert in Infantry Hall.

A year ago, when Dr. Karl Muck returned to the Symphony after an absence of several years, he was greeted by one of the largest audiences in the history of Symphony appearances here, but no greater than that which nearly filled the hall last evening. A year ago Dr. Muck found in the Symphony Orchestra an organization fitted to his hand, upon which during the past year he has placed his impress until it has come to be a well-nigh perfect instrument upon which he plays with consummate skill, bringing out to the utmost its beauty of tone, its flexibility and its variety.

Last evening's programme, which was calculated to display these qualities, was as follows:

Beethoven..Symphony in A-major, No. 7, op. 92
  1. Poco Sostenuto; Vivace
  II. Allegretto
  III. Presto: Presto meno assai
  IV. Allegro con brio
Weber..Scene and aria "Ocean! Thou Mighty Monster," from "Oberon" (Act III., No. 13)
Franck..........Symphonic poem, "Les Eolides ("The Aeolidae")
Wagner—Three poems........ "Im Treibhaus" "Traume" "Schmerzen"
Grieg.................Overture, "I'm Herbst" ("In Autumn"), op. 11

It is now a hundred years since Beethoven finished his Seventh Symphony, and the anniversary of its first performance will fall on Dec. 8 of this year. Unlike some compositions now popular, it had an immediate success, and it is a matter of history that when played the following year before the allied sovereigns at the meeting of the Congress of Vienna "it made a great impression."

And small wonder since in all these years it has lost nothing of its beauty of melody or rhythm. It is the most romantic, and the most happy of all the Beethoven symphonies, and rivals the Fifth Symphony in popularity.

Commentators have tried to find all sorts of meanings in the work to which the composer left no clue, although he esteemed it one of his best compositions. Possibly Richard Wagner comes nearer to the mark than the others when he calls it "the apotheosis of the dance," as it is the ideal embodiment in tones of the bodily movement.

While the symphony has been given here before, it was never better played than last evening, when all the rhythm of the different dance motives was brought out in perfection. The rendition of the second movement was a remarkable performance, especially the measured crescendo of the first part of the allegretto.

That the excellence of its performance was fully appreciated was evident by the applause vouchsafed after each movement, and at the conclusion of the whole Dr. Muck was enthusiastically recalled.

After the symphony the symphonic poem by Caesar Francke and the Grieg overture seemed comparatively tame, although both were brilliantly played and received the approval of the audience.

"Les Eolides," based on Leconte de Lisle's poem of that name, is an example of the changes that time brings in the popular taste, since when first performed in Paris in 1877, it was hissed, and 17 years later when given another hearing, it was received with enthusiasm. The opening motive, "Oh, floating breezes of the skies, sweet breaths of the fair Spring, that caress the hills and plains with freakish kisses," is expressed and reiterated in the graceful, picturesque music that becomes somewhat monotonous toward the end.

Mme. Johanna Gadski of the Metropolitan Opera Company was the assisting soloist, and her magnificent voice and excellent diction found ample opportunity to display themselves in the aria from "Oberon" and the three Wagner songs which offered considerable variety. Mme. Gadski, who was last heard here in a Wagner performance, and will be heard here again next month, is a favorite with Providence audiences, and was recalled again and again after each appearance.

The second concert will be given on Tuesday evening, Nov. 18, at 8:15 o'clock, when the soloist will be Ruth Deyo, pianist.

A. W. C.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C. OCT 26 1913
Date

"The most commanding individuality among virtuosos since the death of Paganini is beyond doubt of peradventure Jan Ignace Paderewski." Such is the dictum of the distinguished music critic, Philip Hale, of Boston, and it is one which cannot be disputed. In the twenty years that Paderewski has been before the world as a pianist he has held a place in the affections of the public that is without parallel in the history of music. Paganini has become a tradition, and about his life a myth already has formed, yet granting that he was all the legend makers would have him, the public he appealed to was very small as compared to that which has listened to Paderewski play. Europe alone knew Paganini, while the Polish pianist has not only played in all countries of Europe, but has conquered both Americas, Australia, and South Africa.

Paderewski's career differs from that of most virtuosos. He was not "a wonder child," but on the contrary was a grown man of twenty-eight before he made his debut as a serious musician. To be sure, when he was sixteen he had made a desperate venture to give concerts in Russia with the forlorn hope of making enough money to ease his poverty and make his life easier while studying. The results of this tour were increased poverty and a profound conviction that he was not intended to be a pianist. In truth, it was several years before he had the courage to go seriously at his piano again.

In the full sense of the word Paderewski is a self-made man. His father was a farmer in Russian Poland, and in 1863, when Ignace was three years old, was banished to Siberia for political reasons. His mother died when he was a baby. He himself was a half-grown lad before he received any regular instruction in music, in the Conservatory in Warsaw. After his tragical ludicrous tour of Russia in 1876 he returned to Warsaw to devote himself to composition, and three years later became a professor in the Conservatory.

He married, had one year of poverty and bliss, when his wife died, leaving him an infant son. In his effort to forget his grief he plunged more eagerly than ever into his work. He gave up his position in Warsaw to go to Berlin and study composition under Kiel and Urban, but the turning point of his career came in 1884, when he went to Vienna to study the piano under his countryman, Leschititzky. The obstacles in front of him were tremendous. He was beginning at the bottom of his career at an age when most virtuosos have succeeded or failed. Excepting a short time when he taught in the Conservatory of Strassburg, he labored in Vienna nearly four years. The vast amount of work he did, the hours he spent daily in scale playing are yet told by those who were in Vienna at that time. But he accomplished the almost impossible. When he made his debut in Vienna in 1887 it was recognized at once that a new personality had come into music.

Life soon became easier for him. The following year he made his debuts in Berlin and Paris, but it was not until the spring of 1890, successful though he had been, that he came really into his own. That was when London bowed to the magic of his playing and the public fought to get to his recitals.

In the fall of 1891 he came to America and made the first of the eight tours which have brought him to this country, the present tour being his ninth. He has returned as a rule every other year, but for the greater part of the country his present concerts will be the first since the season of 1907-8, for when he came to America the following year it was chiefly to have his Symphony performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and he gave only a limited number of recitals. This year, coming under the direction of Charles A. Ellis, of Boston, who has had charge of his American tours since 1902, Paderewski plans to play in the six months between October and May a total of 100 concerts.

Paderewski will give a concert in Washington, November 11, at 4:30 o'clock, at the National Theater, under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

From WORLD
Address: New York
Date

Esta 1884

This will be the first time since the Boston Symphony Orchestra began giving concerts in this borough, over twenty-three years ago, that the house has been entirely sold out to old subscribers. The old subscribers, who have maintained the concerts through the trying period which followed the destruction of the old Academy of Music in Montague street, until the new academy was erected, have subscribed for all the seats in the new Academy of Music, including all the boxes, for the entire season of 1913-1914. The Academy is not large enough to accommodate all who had wished to subscribe. Unfortunately the new subscribers to these concerts cannot be accommodated. It is believed that another balcony will soon be added to the opera-house to accommodate the audiences at the many important concerts given at the Academy. The increased demand for tickets is a testimonial not only to the supreme position which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has held, but also to Dr. Muck as conductor. The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music Friday evening, Nov. 7. The programme will be purely orchestral and classical. It comprises Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahm's "Tragic Overture," Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Wagner's overture, "The Flying Dutchman."

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 22 1

Social Doings

Brilliant Audience at Symphony Concert.—A Birthday Masquerade. — Engagement Announced in Bristol. -Coming Functions.

The first of the series of concerts here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Infantry Hall last night, attracted a very large and brilliant audience. In the gathering were President Faunce of Brown University, Mr. Harry Parsons Cross, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Metcalf, Miss Helen P. Metcalf, Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Metcalf, Mr. Theodore Francis Green, Mr. and Mrs. Frank L. Hinckley, former Gov. D. Russell Brown, Miss Brown, Mrs. Charles H. Merriman, Mr. and Mrs. G. Richmond Parsons, Mrs. I. Harris Metcalf, Miss Margarethe Dwight, Mr. Charles Morris Smith, Miss Harriett M. Smith, Prof. and Mrs. William Carey Poland, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Edwards, the Misses Edwards, Mr. and Mrs. Edward G. Buxton, Mrs. Charles G. King, Mr. Lacey Baker, Miss Cecelia Lacey Baker, Mrs. Anne Gilbreth Cross, Mrs. George Hall, Mr. and Mrs. Prescott O. Clarke, Mr. and Mrs. F. D. Carr, Mr. and Mrs. William C. Dart, Mr. and Mrs. Irving H. Irons, Miss Harriet E. Barrows, Miss Frances Alexander, Mrs. W. B. M. Miller, Dr. Seth K. Gifford, Miss Gifford, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Freeman, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Prof. and Mrs. Charles W. Brown, Miss Edith Nichols, Dr. and Mrs. Charbonnell, Mrs. William O. Todd, Miss Helen B. Pettis, Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert C. Carpenter, Miss Elizabeth Carpenter, Mr. and Mrs. Edgar J. Lowenstein, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur M. Allen, Mrs. F. W. Matteson, Mrs. Gilbert A. Phillips, Mr. and Mrs. George M. Thornton, the Misses Thornton, Miss Harriett J. Miller, Mr. and Mrs. Henry S. Sprague, Mr. Charles W. North, Miss North, Mrs. Robert B. Treat, Miss Hazel Treat, Mr. and Mrs. T. F. Dwyer, the Misses Vaughn, Miss Emily B. Aldrich, Mrs. John P. Campbell, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore W. Foster, Mrs. J. Fred Gibson, Mrs. Henry R. Evans, Mr. and Mrs [illegible] Sisson.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date

ALL SEATS ARE BOOKED AHEAD FOR CONCERTS

Requests for Boston Symphony Concert Reservations at Academy Break All Records.

The pre-eminent position that is held by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is thoroughly appreciated in Brooklyn. The old subscribers who have maintained the concerts through the trying period which followed the destruction of the old Academy of Music in Montague street until the new Academy was erected, have subscribed for all of the seats in the new Academy of Music, including all of the boxes, for the entire season of 1913-1914. This is the first time since the Boston Symphony Orchestra began giving concerts in Brooklyn some twenty-three years ago that the entire house has been sold out to the old subscribers. It is the first time that it is impossible to sell tickets to new subscribers. Yesterday was fixed for new subscribers to purchase tickets, but unfortunately for those who would be new subscribers, there were no reserved seats. A limited number of admission tickets will be sold for the main floor and the first balcony at $1.00, and for the second balcony at 75c.

All those who were not subscribers last year, and who have made written application for tickets, if any were to be had, may renew their application for the season of 1914-1915, and in case there are any vacant seats another season, the seats will be assigned to them in the order in which the applications are received, and at prices that will be fixed by the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the management of the orchestra in due course.

While the opera house of the Academy of Music had been large enough for most of the audiences during the first few years, it has been certain from the first that it would not be large enough to accommodate audiences after the people have got-en into the habit of coming to the cademy. It will be desirable in time at another balcony be added to the era House to accommodate the iences at the many important con- given at the Academy.

From TIMES
Address: New York OCT 26 1913
Date

Under the title of the Longy New York Modern Chamber Music Society, Georges Longy and twenty other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give five Saturday evening concerts at Aeolian Hall this season of modern works written for strings, voice, and wind instruments. The dates are Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Feb. 21, and March 21.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City.
OCT 26 1913
Date

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The first pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 6, at 8:15, and on Saturday afternoon, November 8, at 2:30. The Thursday night programme will comprise Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms's "Tragic" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Preludes," and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman." The Saturday afternoon programme will be Glazounoff's fifth symphony, Grieg's overture, "In Autumn"; Cesar Franck's "Les Eolides" and Dvorak's dramatic overture "Husitska."

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 22 1913

SYMPHONY SEASON OPENED WELL

Boston Orchestra's Initial Concert Delightful. — Mme. Gadsky Sang Finely.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first Providence concert of its 33d season before an audience that nearly filled Infantry Hall last evening. With the return of Dr. Muck to the orchestra last year, popularity at once increased, and appearances seem to show that there will be no falling off this season.

The programme last evening was as follows:

Symphony in A-major, No. 7...Beethoven
I. Poco Sostenuto; Vivace.
II. Allegretto.
III. Presto; Presto meno assai.
IV. Allegro con brio.
Scene and aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from "Oberon," (Act III., No. 13) ....Weber
Symphonic Piem, "Les Eolides"...Franck
Three poems ....
(a) "Im Treibhaus" ....
(b) "Traume" ....
(c) "Schmerzen" ....Wagner
Overture, "In Autumn," Op. 11......Grieg

Of the symphony be it said at once that it could scarcely be surpassed. This symphony of the dance rhythms is one of the most happy and joyous of the master's, rising to bacchanalian frenzy in the finale, Dr. Muck brings out each minute detail with the utmost fastidiousness, and marks the sudden contests in force and harmony which abound in the first movement with great skill and care. The rapture of the smoothly melodic allegretto he conceived splendidly. The scherzo and finale were played with a demoniac passion that was thrilling.

The revival of Franck's delicate and subtle tone-poem, "Les Eolides," after long years of rest, was an interesting experiment. And yet the playing of this exquisite fantasy was the poorest of the evening, due not to any fault of the orchestra, but because, by the mere fact of the immensity of the orchestra, it was impossible to carry out the conception of the diaphanous, airy zephyrs. It should have been a breath; it had too much reality, too much body.

Another revival of a piece not heard in several years, was Grieg's "Im Herbst." Nothing could prove more conclusively Grieg's powerlessness to compose in the larger forms. At moments, when the spell of the folk-song seems to be upon him, his characteristic wistfulness appears in crisp harmonies and well-marked rhythms. But he is unable to maintain himself on these heights for long-sustained passages and therefore the work is of uneven merit. The performance was perfect.

The soloist was Mme. Gadski, always a favorite in Providence. She was greeted with enthusiasm, and this was warranted by her splendid performance in well-selected numbers. The full power and beauty of her magnificent voice was shown in the scene from "Oberon," and her rendition of the Wagner songs was a delight.

All in all, last night's concert was one of the best balanced and most satisfactory within recent recollection. The wind instruments especially shone as never before. One always expects the strings to be unsurpassed anywhere, but last night the wood winds and brass covered themselves with glory.

At the second concert in the series on Nov. 18, Miss Ruth Deyo, the promising pianist, will be the soloist.

R. A. P.

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date

Für das erſte Konzertpaar des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters, welche am Abend des 6. reſp. am Nachmittag des 8. November in Carnegie Hall ſtattfinden, hat Dirigent Dr. Muck folgende Programme aufgeſtellt. Für den Donnerſtag: Beethoven's Siebente Symphonie, Brahms' „Tragiſche Ouverture", Liſzt's „Préludes" und Wagner's „Fliegende Holländer"-Ouverture. Das Matinee-Programm umfaßt Glazounoff's „Fünfte Symphonie", Grieg's Ouverture „Im Herbſt", César Franck's „Les Eolides" und Dvorak's Dramatiſche Ouverture „Huſitska".

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From POST
Address: New York
Date OCT 1913

The first pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, November 6, at 8:15, and Saturday afternoon, November 8, at 2:30. The Thursday night programme will comprise Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms's "Tragic" Overture, Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "The Preludes," and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture. The Saturday afternoon programme will be Glazounoff's Fifth Symphony, Grieg's Overture, "In Autumn," Cesar Franck's "Les Eolides," and Dvořák's Dramatic Overture "Husitska."

From TIMES
Address: New York OCT 1913
Date

The first pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, Nov. 6, and Saturday afternon, Nov. 8. The Thursday night programme will comprise Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms's "Tragic" Overture, Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "The Preludes," and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman." The Saturday afternoon programme will be Glazounoff's Fifth Symphony, Grieg's Overture "In Autumn," Cesar Franck's "Les Eolides," and Dvorak's Dramatic Overture, "Husitska."

⁂

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date OCT 26 1913

The sale of season tickets for the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been in progress at Droop's Music Store since last Wednesday, is entirely fulfilling the expectations of Mrs. Katie Wilson-Greene, the local manager. Very few seats are left, and it is likely that these will be taken up before the sale of the first concert begins. Concerts are to be given on Tuesday afternoons at 4:30, the dates being November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. There will be no soloist at the first concert. In December the soloist will be Fritz Kreisler; in January, Teresa Carreno; in February, Mme. van Endert, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and in March, Paderewski.

[illegible] are being held by the

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City. 13
Date

The first two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, will be given Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, November 6 and 8. There will be no soloist. but the Thursday programme's features will be Beethoven's seventh symphony, Brahms's "Tragic Overture," Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman," and those of Saturday will be Glazounoff's fifth symphony, Grieg's overture "In Autumn," Cesar Franck's "Les Eolides," and Dvorak's dramatic overture "Husitska."

[43]

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 2 1

Social Doings

Brilliant Audience at Symphony Concert.—A Birthday Masquerade.— Engagement Announced in Bristol.-Coming Functions.

The first of the series of concerts here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Infantry Hall last night, attracted a very large and brilliant audience. In the gathering were President Faunce of Brown University, Mr. Harry Parsons Cross, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Metcalf, Miss Helen P. Metcalf, Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Metcalf, Mr. Theodore Francis Green, Mr. and Mrs. Frank L. Hinckley, former Gov. D. Russell Brown, Miss Brown, Mrs. Charles H. Merriman, Mr. and Mrs. G. Richmond Parsons, Mrs. I. Harris Metcalf, Miss Margarethe Dwight, Mr. Charles Morris Smith, Miss Harriett M. Smith, Prof. and Mrs. William Carey Poland, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Edwards, the Misses Edwards, Mr. and Mrs. Edward G. Buxton, Mrs. Charles G. King, Mr. Lacey Baker, Miss Cecelia Lacey Baker, Mrs. Anne Gilbreth Cross, Mrs. George Hall, Mr. and Mrs. Prescott O. Clarke, Mr. and Mrs. F. D. Carr, Mr. and Mrs. William C. Dart, Mr. and Mrs. Irving H. Irons, Miss Harriet E. Barrows, Miss Frances Alexander, Mrs. W. B. M. Miller, Dr. Seth K. Gifford, Miss Gifford, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Freeman, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Prof. and Mrs. Charles W. Brown, Miss Edith Nichols, Dr. and Mrs. Charbonnell, Mrs. William O. Todd, Miss Helen B. Pettis, Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert C. Carpenter, Miss Elizabeth Carpenter, Mr. and Mrs. Edgar J. Lowenstein, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur M. Allen, Mrs. F. W. Matteson, Mrs. Gilbert A. Phillips, Mr. and Mrs. George M. Thornton, the Misses Thornton, Miss Harriett J. Miller, Mr. and Mrs. Henry S. Sprague, Mr. Charles W. North, Miss North, Mrs. Robert B. Treat, Miss Hazel Treat, Mr. and Mrs. T. F. Dwyer, the Misses Vaughn, Miss Emily B. Aldrich, Mrs. John P. Campbell, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore W. Foster, Mrs. J. Fred Gibson, Mrs. Henry R. Evans, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sisson.

Address: New York City.
Date

ALL SEATS ARE BOOKED AHEAD FOR CONCERTS

Requests for Boston Symphony Concert Reservations at Academy Break All Records.

Est 1884

The pre-eminent position that is held by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is thoroughly appreciated in Brooklyn. The old subscribers who have maintained the concerts through the trying period which followed the destruction of the old Academy of Music in Montague street until the new Academy was erected, have subscribed for all of the seats in the new Academy of Music, including all of the boxes, for the entire season of 1913-1914. This is the first time since the Boston Symphony Orchestra began giving concerts in Brooklyn some twenty-three years ago that the entire house has been sold out to the old subscribers. It is the first time that it is impossible to sell tickets to new subscribers. Yesterday was fixed for new subscribers to purchase tickets, but unfortunately for those who would be new subscribers, there were no reserved seats. A limited number of admission tickets will be sold for the main floor and the first balcony at $1.00, and for the second balcony at 75c.

All those who were not subscribers last year, and who have made written application for tickets, if any were to be had, may renew their application for the season of 1914-1915, and in case there are any vacant seats another season, the seats will be assigned to them in the order in which the applications are received, and at prices that will be fixed by the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the management of the orchestra in due course.

While the opera house of the Academy of Music had been large enough for most of the audiences during the first few years, it has been certain from the first that it would not be large enough to accommodate audiences after the people have gotten into the habit of coming to the Academy. It will be desirable in time that another balcony be added to the Opera House to accommodate the audiences at the many important concerts given at the Academy.

From TIMES
Address: New York OCT 26 1913
Date

Under the title of the Longy New York Modern Chamber Music Society, Georges Longy and twenty other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give five Saturday evening concerts at Aeolian Hall this season of modern works written for strings, voice, and wind instruments. The dates are Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Feb. 21, and March 21.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City.
OCT 26 1913
Date

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The first pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 6, at 8:15, and on Saturday afternoon, November 8, at 2:30. The Thursday night programme will comprise Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms's "Tragic" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Preludes," and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman." The Saturday afternoon programme will be Glazounoff's fifth symphony, Grieg's overture, "In Autumn"; Cesar Franck's "Les Eolides" and Dvorak's dramatic overture "Husitska."

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 2 1913

SYMPHONY SEASON OPENED WELL

Boston Orchestra's Initial Concert Delightful. — Mme. Gadsky Sang Finely.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first Providence concert of its 33d season before an audience that nearly filled Infantry Hall last evening. With the return of Dr. Muck to the orchestra last year, popularity at once increased, and appearances seem to show that there will be no falling off this season.

The programme last evening was as follows:

Symphony in A-major, No. 7...Beethoven
I. Poco Sostenuto; Vivace.
II. Allegretto.
III. Presto; Presto meno assai.
IV. Allegro con brio.
Scene and aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from "Oberon," (Act III., No. 13) ....Weber
Symphonic Piem, "Les Eolides"...Franck
Three poems ....
(a) "Im Treibhaus" ....
(b) "Traume" ....
(c) "Schmerzen" ....Wagner
Overture, "In Autumn," Op. 11......Grieg

Of the symphony be it said at once that it could scarcely be surpassed. This symphony of the dance rhythms is one of the most happy and joyous of the master's, rising to bacchanalian frenzy in the finale, Dr. Muck brings out each minute detail with the utmost fastidiousness, and marks the sudden contests in force and harmony which abound in the first movement with great skill and care. The quiet rapture of the smoothly melodic allegretto he conceived splendidly. The scherzo and finale were played with a demoniac passion that was thrilling.

The revival of Franck's delicate and subtle tone-poem, "Les Eolides," after long years of rest, was an interesting experiment. And yet the playing of this exquisite fantasy was the poorest of the evening, due not to any fault of the orchestra, but because, by the mere fact of the immensity of the orchestra, it was impossible to carry out the conception of the diaphanous, airy zephyrs. It should have been a breath; it had too much reality, too much body.

Another revival of a piece not heard in several years, was Grieg's "Im Herbst." Nothing could prove more conclusively Grieg's powerlessness to compose in the larger forms. At moments, when the spell of the folk-song seems to be upon him, his characteristic wistfulness appears in crisp harmonies and well-marked rhythms. But he is unable to maintain himself on these heights for long-sustained passages and therefore the work is of uneven merit. The performance was perfect.

The soloist was Mme. Gadski, always a favorite in Providence. She was greeted with enthusiasm, and this was warranted by her splendid performance in well-selected numbers. The full power and beauty of her magnificent voice was shown in the scene from "Oberon," and her rendition of the Wagner songs was a delight.

All in all, last night's concert was one of the best balanced and most satisfactory within recent recollection. The wind instruments especially shone as never before. One always expects the strings to be unsurpassed anywhere, but last night the wood winds and brass covered themselves with glory.

At the second concert in the series on Nov. 18, Miss Ruth Deyo, the promising pianist, will be the soloist.

R. A. P.

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date

Für das erſte Konzertpaar des Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſters, welche am Abend des 6. reſp. am Nachmittag des 8. November in Carnegie Hall ſtattfinden, hat Dirigent Dr. Muck folgende Programme aufgeſtellt. Für den Donnerſtag: Beethoven's Siebente Symphonie, Brahms' „Tragiſche Ouverture", Liſzt's „Préludes" und Wagner's „Fliegende Holländer"-Ouverture. Das Matinee-Programm umfaßt Glazounoff's „Fünfte Symphonie", Grieg's Ouverture „Im Herbſt", César Franck's „Les Eolides" und Dvorak's Dramatiſche Ouverture „Huſitska".

From POST
Address: New York
Date OCT 1913

The first pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, November 6, at 8:15, and Saturday afternoon, November 8, at 2:30. The Thursday night programme will comprise Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms's "Tragic" Overture, Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "The Preludes," and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture. The Saturday afternoon programme will be Glazounoff's Fifth Symphony, Grieg's Overture, "In Autumn," Cesar Franck's "Les Eolides," and Dvorák's Dramatic Overture "Husitska."

From TIMES
Address: New York OCT 1913
Date

The first pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, Nov. 6, and Saturday afternon, Nov. 8. The Thursday night programme will comprise Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms's "Tragic" Overture, Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "The Preludes," and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman." The Saturday afternoon programme will be Glazounoff's Fifth Symphony, Grieg's Overture "In Autumn," Cesar Franck's "Les Eolides," and Dvorak's Dramatic Overture, "Husitska."

***

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date OCT 26 1913

The sale of season tickets for the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been in progress at Droop's Music Store since last Wednesday, is entirely fulfilling the expectations of Mrs. Katie Wilson-Greene, the local manager. Very few seats are left, and it is likely that these will be taken up before the sale of the first concert begins. Concerts are to be given on Tuesday afternoons at 4:30, the dates being November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17 and March 17. There will be no soloist at the first concert. In December the soloist will be Fritz Kreisler; in January, Teresa Carreno; in February, Mme. van Endert, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and in March, Paderewski.

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City. 1913
Date

The first two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, will be given Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, November 6 and 8. There will be no soloist, but the Thursday programme's features will be Beethoven's seventh symphony, Brahms's "Tragic Overture," Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman," and those of Saturday will be Glazounoff's fifth symphony, Grieg's overture "In Autumn," Cesar Franck's "Les Eolides," and Dvorak's dramatic overture "Husitska."

Newspaper

From SUN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 26 1913

Est 1884

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Lyric on Wednesday, November 5. Geraldine Farrar, the soloist, will sing a rather unfamiliar air from Mozart's opera, "Cosi Fan Tutte," and three of Richard Wagner's songs.

The Clef Club Orchestra, an organization of negro musicians, conducted by James Reese Europe, president of the club, will give a concert at Albaugh's on the evening of November 5. Old negro plantation songs, many of them by negro composers, several of the classics, together with some of the "tango" tunes of the day, will comprise the program.

POST, NOVEMBER 2,

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Dr. Muck has arranged a most attractive programme for the Pension Fund concert to be given in Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, Nov. 16, at 3:30. There will be no soloist. He has decided to make the Symphony Beethoven's in C-minor, No. 5, which after all is said and done, is the most popular work of its kind in orchestral literature. The second half of the programme will be made of lighter pieces. These will comprise Bizet's charming first "L'Arlesienne" Suite, Rimsky-Korsakoff's brilliant and effective Spanish caprice, and, finally, Liszt's Second Rhapsody, a work which has not been played by the Symphony Orchestra in a number of years. The sale opens at the box office next Friday morning, Nov. 7.

FRANZ EGENIEFF SINGS TOMORROW

Tomorrow afternoon in Jordan Hall Franz Egenieff will give his first song recital in this city, assisted at the piano by Dr. Jeno Kerntler. Egenieff comes to this country for his introductory concert tour from Germany, where he has been a conspicuous vocal artist for several years. After serving as a cavalry officer in the Prussian army, following his graduation from his university, Egenieff decided upon a musical career.

His training is described as having been thorough, and from the night of his debut he continued to progress until he was made, at different times, a leading baritone of the Komische Opera in Berlin and of the Royal Opera in that city. Despite his pronounced vocal, musical and dramatic ability, Egenieff found his greatest inclination to be in the direction of lieder, and gradually he was accorded a conspicuous position for his interpretive resources in presenting the masterpieces of the German and other song schools.

Egenieff's programme for tomorrow afternoon is one which should appeal to those who appreciate the song in its highest form. The composers to be represented are Schumann, Hugo Wolf, Arthur Foote, Kerntler, Kaun and Pataky. The programme, in its entirety, is as follows:

"Biterolf"	Wolf
"Verborgenheit"	Wolf
"Der Musikant"	Wolf
"Gesang Weyla's"	Wolf
"Der Nock"	Loewe
"Belsazar	Schumann
"Provenzalisches Lied"	Schumann
"The Lotus Flower"	Hubert Pataky
"On the River"	Hubert Pataky
"The Three Comrades"	Hans Hermann
"Farewell"	Jeno Kerntler
"On the Way to Kew"	Arthur Foote
"Irish Folk Song"	Arthur Foote
"My Native Land"	Hugo Kaun

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY THIS AFTERNOON

The concert at Symphony Hall this afternoon at 3:30 will be given by the Philharmonic Orchestra of New York, Josef Stransky, conductor. The annual visit of this great orchestra has become a welcome event in Boston's musical season and the audiences in recent years have been uniformly large. The concert gains special importance from the fact that Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist. This will be his first appearance in Boston this season. Kreisler has been giving concerts ever since his arrival two and one-half weeks ago and his success has been remarkable even for him.

At tomorrow's concert he will play Bruch's Concerto in G-minor, No. 1, one of the most grateful works written for the violin. The orchestral numbers will be the "Rienzi" overture of Wagner, Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony. The symphony will come at the end of the programme.

PADEREWSKI

Paderewski, who has entirely recovered from the grippe which disabled him for a fortnight, has resumed his interrupted concert tour. Yesterday afternoon he played in Aeolian Hall, New York, tomorrow (Monday) he plays in Buffalo, Tuesday in Worcester and next Friday afternoon he gives his recital in Symphony Hall. The hour of the recital is 2:30. His programme is characteristic of the man and the artist and is altogether most attractive.

Fantasia and fugue in G minor	Bach-Liszt
Sonata in E major, op. 109	Beethoven
Carnaval	Schumann
Nocturne, E major, op. 62	Chopin
Mazurka, B minor	Chopin
Sonata, B flat minor	Chopin
Two etudes, "Waldesrauschen" and "La [illegible]	Chopin

ALWIN SCHROEDER

Alwin Schroeder, the well-known cellist of this city, has just returned from the Pacific coast, where he was associate artist with Miss Geraldine [illegible] on the concert tour she has been making for the past few weeks. As might be expected by his Eastern admirers, Mr. Schroeder met with instant favor in the West and critics and [illegible] spoke most highly of his art. The San Francisco Chronicle said of him:

"In Alwin Schroeder as an artist every desire and demand of an exacting audience is met. Art, by nature and cultivation, has reached a high fulfilment in the 'cellist, whose experience and reputation are little greater than his native faculty."

Mr. Schroeder has recently organized the Schroeder Trio, which will give concerts later in the season, and a musical treat may be expected.

HERALD.

NOVEMBER 2.

N. Y. PHILHARMONIC

The concert at Symphony Hall this afternoon at 3:30 will be given by the Philharmonic orchestra of New York, Josef Stransky, conductor. The annual visit of this great orchestra has become a welcome event in Boston's musical season, and the audiences in recent years have been uniformly large. Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist. This will be his first appearance in Boston this season.

At today's concert he will play Bruch's concerto in G minor. The orchestral numbers will be the "Rienzi" overture, Wagner; Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," and Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony. The symphony will come at the end of the program.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Dr. Muck has arranged an attractive program for the pension fund concert in Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, Nov. 16, at 3:30. There will no soloist. The program will include Beethoven's Symphony in C-minor, the most popular work of its kind in orchestral literature. The second half of the program will be made up of lighter pieces. Bizet's charming first "L'Arlesienne" Suite. Rimsky-Korsakoff's brilliant Spanish Caprice and Liszt's Second Rhapsody, which has not been played by the Symphony Orchestra for many years. The sale of tickets will open at the box office next Friday morning, Nov. 7.

MR. PADEREWSKI

Mr. Paderewski, who has entirely recovered from the grippe which disabled him for a fortnight, has resumed his interrupted concert tour, and on next Friday afternoon, at 2:30, will give his recital in Symphony Hall. His program is characteristic of him. The program is as follows:

Fantasia and Fugue in G minor	Bach-Liszt
Sonata in E major, Opus 109	Beethoven
Carnaval	Schumann
Nocturne, E major, Opus 62	Chopin
Mazurka, B minor	Chopin
Sonata, B-flat minor	Chopin
Two Etudes—Waldersrauschen, La Campanella

FIRST ORCHESTRA TRIP

The Symphony Orchestra in its full strength leaves tonight for its first southern trip, and will give concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and New York. At only two of the concerts, those in Philadelphia and Baltimore, will there be a soloist, Miss Geraldine Farrar. The orchestra has never begun an out-of-town season with such favorable prospects. Carnegie Hall, New York, has been sold out for the season to the last seat for both series. In Brooklyn there is a unique condition. There is not a new subscriber on the list the subscribers of last year, with their renewals and additional seats, having exhausted the capacity of the Academy of Music. In Baltimore, Philadelphia and Washington almost the same condition exists. Only a few stray seats in each of the three cities are left for single sale.

MAGGIE TEYTE

Miss Maggie Teyte, soprano, will give a song recital of 18th century French songs at the Copley-Plaza Hotel on Thursday afternoon, Nov. 20, at 3 o'clock. She will be dressed in costumes to suit the period. The Boston Quartet of Ancient Instruments and Charles Lurvey, pianist, will assist. Tickets may be secured at the Copley-Plaza, Herrick's and Symphony Hall.

FRIEDA HEMPEL

At the concert in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 9, Miss Frieda Hempel, the brilliant coloratura soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and the Metropolitan Opera, New York, will be the soloist. Last year she made her debut in New York, when she was a sick woman. Despite this, she made a deep impression on the New York public and later was hailed as one of the most brilliant singers of the day. She has sung a few times in opera in Boston and aroused enthusiasm.

Miss Hempel has been on the stage only a few years; in fact, she is only 28 years old. Her career has been brilliant in Berlin where most of it has been spent, in London where she is a member of the Covent Garden Opera, and in various European cities where she has sung as "guest." This year she will create in America the role of Feldmarschallin in Strauss's "Rosenkavalier."

At her concert here she will be assisted by an orchestra of Symphony players under Otto Urack. The program will be as follows:

Overture, "The Marriage of Figaro"	Mozart
Aria, "Deh vieni non tarder"	Mozart
Ballet Music from "Orpheus"	Gluck
Songs with piano—
Du gis lie Ruh	Schubert
Hark, hark the Lark	Schubert
Elfenlied	Wolf
Staendchen	Strauss
Suite, "Peer Gynt" No. 1: (a) Morning Mood, (b) Anitra's Dance	Grieg
Aria, "Ernani, Ernani involami"	Verdi
Selection (orchestra).
Songs with piano—
Ein Traum	Grieg
[illegible]	Humperdinck

ELMENDORF LECTURES

The sale of single tickets for any of the lectures to be given by Dwight Elmendorf in Symphony Hall will open Monday morning (tomorrow) at the box office. The first lecture comes on next Friday evening and Saturday afternoon, and the subject will be "Ceylon."

A visit to the "Other Side of the World" seems almost impossible to the ordinary traveller because of its distance, and the time and money necessary for the journey, and the hardships and discomforts. After nine months of travel and preparation, Mr. Elmendorf will this season spread out his screen, and upon it, by the art of camera and brush, will transport his audiences into the realms of Vedism, Brahmanism, Buddhism and Mohammedanism—Ceylon, India and Java.

The pictures of Ceylon will attract the attention to the brilliant coloring of the scant costumes of the Cingalese.

JOURNAL—

NOVEMBER 3,

Fritz Kreisler and His Violin Provoke Storm of Applause

By E. F. Harkins.

THANKS to the Balkan War, Fritz Kreisler came back to Boston yesterday, after only a year's absence. Usually the Austrian violinist stays away for two or three years, for his beautiful art is in demand from Vienna to London and from Boston to San Antonio. But last November, soon after he played at the Symphony concerts, he was called back to take his place as a lieutenant in the Austrian army, when the Balkans began to pull the Turk's nose, and so his tour was interrupted. Now he has resumed it, and he appeared at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

Like Hofmann, the soloist in this same series a week before, Kreisler first visited Boston as a juvenile phenomenon. That was just twenty-five years ago. Like Hofmann, too, the prodigy has developed into a model artist. Kreisler lifts his hat to Ysaye, but the famous Belgian would have had reason to return to compliment if he had heard his rival and admirer play Bruch's G minor concerto yesterday. The mighty outburst of applause was the deserved reward of a performance that few, if, indeed, any, of Kreisler's contemporaries could equal, movement for movement. There was brilliance of technique without any of the scratchiness that is too often heard, even when noted fiddlers play, and, as in the adagio, there was a tone smooth as velvet and almost humanly tender.

It is often said in praise of violinists that they make their instruments sing, but no prima donna of the day has the technical grace, the physical vigor and the tonal beauty that Kreisler displays, not now and then, but every time he entertains the public. Such art must be classed among the wonders of the age.

The big audience also enjoyed the orchestral performance. Wagner's "Rienzi" overture and Tschaikowsky's tuneful fifth symphony were truly popular numbers. The Strauss tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," made demands that the orchestra did not altogether meet. The orchestra has an able conductor in Joseph Stransky. It now also has another well-known former member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Krafft, the first violinist, who sits not far away from his old confrere, Leo Schulz, the 'cellist.

BOSTON POST,

NOVEMBER 3,

STRANSKY AS THE MASTER

Philharmonic and Kreisler Delight Big Audience

BY OLIN DOWNES

As great a number as Symphony Hall could accommodate gathered there yesterday afternoon for the concert given by the New York Philharmonic Society, Josef Stransky conductor, with the assistance of Fritz Kreisler, violinist. Mr. Kreisler played the Bruch G minor concerto. The orchestral pieces were Wagner's "Rienzi" Overture, Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Tschaikowsky's 5th symphony.

Mr. Kreisler performed an outmoded concerto with such enthusiasm and finish that he made the overworked composition new again. Passages that are ordinarily but of a decorative character became instinct with meaning. Music that had been thought mere material for the virtuoso [illegible] beset him for a [illegible] and finally [illegible]

We re[illegible] last mov[illegible] and distinguished in character. The beauty of Mr. Kreisler's tone, the elegance of his technic, are matters known to all. He was discourteously recalled and recalled by his audience, long after he had given evidence that he was not to be persuaded into breaking the continuity of an orchestral programme.

More Master of His Men

Either Mr. Stransky was heard in a programme more to his taste than that which he offered Bostonians on the occasion of his last visit to this city, or he is now more master of his orchestra. Whatever the reason, his conducting yesterday afternoon was a revelation of his capacities. The compositions of Strauss and of Tschaikowsky might well be supposed to be among his favorite works, for a more intimate understanding of them it would be hard to imagine. Possibly there was here and there a slight preponderance of detail, yet, as a whole, for all of his faithful exposition of the smallest details of the scores Mr. Stransky did not become pedantic, did not exalt detail until the forest became visible on account of the trees.

It was as though Mr. Stransky had first examined his music with a microscope, and then, having acquainted himself with every shred of it, had made known his own subjective impressions after the most objective search for the composer's meaning. At any rate, the orchestral performances were especially notable for precision of attack, an admirably adjusted scale of dynamics, sensitive nuance and the expressive and elastic phrasing of the solo instruments. Noteworthy were some extremely delicate pianissimo effects, and in the symphony, effects of rhythm.

Sympathetic Interpretation

The music of Tschaikowsky was interpreted with freedom, yet with logic and the utmost continuity of thought.

It must surely have been with consciousness of his deed that Tschaikowsky wrote a Fifth symphony much akin in its meaning to the Fifth of Beethoven. Tschaikowsky, too, has his motto for fate, and in his music, also, this motto is reversed in its meaning in the final movement, probably the most courageous and optimistic that the composer ever penned. No more sympathetic interpretation that Mr. Stransky's could be desired, and this was generally true, also, of Strauss' tone-poem, which, after all is said and done, may prove to be this composer's greatest legacy to the world. The orchestral playing on the whole was of a higher order than any performances given by this body of musicians in recent performances in Boston. The programme was refreshing by reason of its modernity, and Mr. Stransky had occasion to congratulate himself on the present results of his labors.

[44]

SUNDAY GLOBE—

NOVEMBER 2.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Franz Egenieff in Concert at Steinert Hall

Franz Egenieff, who will sing tomorrow afternoon for the first time in Boston in concert, was a cavalry officer in the Prussian Army when he decided to make his career in music. Three years previous to this, while stationed at Darmstadt, he had begun singing lessons. A member of the nobility, Egenieff stirred his family to remonstrance against such a step, for his title is Baron Kleydorff, formerly the adjutant to the Grand Duke of Hesse-Darmstadt. His wife was Miss Lily Busch of St Louis.

Egenieff made a few minor appearances in opera, then was engaged by Mr Savage for his English "Parsifal" company. He sang the role of Amfortas for the first time Oct 18, 1904, here at the Tremont Theatre, in the second performance by the company and 134 times thereafter, alternating with Mr Bischoff. The baritone is said to be 38 years old and to be an accomplished painter, for he planned to sketch with a friend in the Grand Canyon last Summer. His facility in languages is said to have included English, French and Russian even before his native German, and now Italian, Polish and Japanese.

Egenieff's teachers have been Lilli Lehmann, Victor Maurel and Alfredo Cairati. He was a member of the Berlin Komische opera for a year and the Royal opera for a longer period.

The program of the recital which will take place tomorrow afternoon at Jordan Hall is as follows: Wolf, Biterolf, Verborgenheit, Der Musikant and Gesang Weyla's; Lowe, Der Nock; Schumann, Belsazar, Provenzalisches Lied; Hubert Pataky, The Lotus Flower, On the River; Hans Hermann, The Three Comrades; Jeno Kerntler, Farewell; Arthur Foote, On the Way to Kew, Irish Folk Song; Hugo Kaun, My Native Land.

Kreisler and New York Philharmonic Today

The concert at Symphony Hall this afternoon at 3:30 will be given by the Philharmonic Orchestra of New York, Josef Stransky conductor. The annual visit of this great orchestra has become a welcome event in Boston's musical season. The concert gains special importance from the fact that Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist. This will be his first appearance in Boston this season. Kreisler has been giving concerts ever since his arrival two and one-half weeks ago and his success has been remarkable even for him.

At tomorrow's concert he will play Bruch's Concerto in G Minor, No. 1, one of the most grateful works written for the violin. The orchestral numbers will be the "Rienzi" overture of Wagner, Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration" and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony. The symphony will come at the end of the program.

Paderewski's Recital Next Friday Afternoon

Paderewski, who has entirely recovered from the grippe which disabled him for a fortnight, has resumed his interrupted concert tour. Yesterday afternoon he played in Aeolian Hall, New York. Tomorrow he will play in Buffalo, Tuesday in Worcester, and next Friday afternoon he is to give his recital in Symphony Hall. The hour is 2:30. His program is characteristic of the man and the artist and is altogether most attractive. It will be worth a great deal to hear him play Schumann's "Carneval."

The program in full is as follows: Fantasia and Fugue in G Minor, Bach-Liszt; Sonata in E Major, Opus 109, Beethoven; Carnaval, Schumann; Nocturne, E Major, Opus 62, Mazurka, B Minor, Sonata, B Flat Minor, Chopin; Waldesrauschen, La Campanella, Liszt.

First Kneisel Concert With Clarinetist Leroy as Soloist.

The Kneisel Quartet will give its first concert of the season next Tuesday night atSteinhert Hall. Mr Kneisel's associates remain as last year—Mr Letz, second violin; Mr Svecenski, viola, and Mr Willeke, cellist.

The program will close with Brahms' quintet in B minor for two violins, viola, cello and clarinet, op 115. This is one of the four chamber works suggested to Brahms by the eminent clarinetist, Prof Muehfeld of the Meininger Orchestra. The assisting player for the Kneisel's will be Henri Leon Leroy, the clarinetist of the New York Philharmonic, highly spoken of in his own city. He will have an opportunity in the Tschaikowsky Symphony at the orchestra concert this afternoon to reveal the quality of his art.

The first and second numbers Tuesday evening will be "Beethoven's quartet in F minor, op 95, and Mr Chadwick's quartet in D minor, No 5.

Mr Longy and His Club In Usual Three Concerts

The Longy Club will give its usual series of three concerts of chamber music for wind instruments in Jordan Hall during the coming season. The concerts will be given on Thursday evening, Nov 27 (Thanksgiving), Thursday, Jan 22 and Wednesday evening, March 4. During the past Summer Mr Longy spent much time while in France securing novelties. Incidentally, while in Paris, he had the honor of being called upon to act as one of the judges of the competitions of various students and classes in the Paris Conservatoire.

For the first concert of the club he proposes giving a program entirely American, the composers being Messrs Oldberg, Mason, Archer-Gibson and Brockway. Among the novelties will be a quintet by Gutsav Strube, a 18th Century sonata for flute, oboe and piano, by Leillety; a ballade for oboe and piano and a nonette by Malherbes; two little pieces by Woolett and a septet by Flamaud. If it is possible he will have some choruses by Beethoven and Schumann, with wind instrument accompaniment.

Frieda Hempel Next Sunday.

Particular interest attaches to the concert to be given in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, Nov 9, by Miss Frieda Hempel, the coloratura soprano of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and the Metropolitan Opera, New York. Miss Hempel is at the beginning of her sec- [illegible] in America. Last year she [illegible] New York under most unfortunate conditions, inasmuch as she was really a sick woman and should not have sung at all. Despite all this, however, she made a deep impression on the New York public.

Later she was accorded a high place as a singer of florid roles. She made a few appearances at the Boston Opera. As Violetta in "Traviata" she appeared a radiantly beautiful woman and showed herself an accomplished singer of coloratura. This year she will have the part of Feldmarshallin in Richard Strauss' "Rosenkavalier" when produced at the Metropolitan.

At her concert here next Sunday Miss Hempel will be assisted by an orchestra of Symphony men with Otto Urack as conductor. She will sing arias from "The Marriage of Figaro" and "Ernani" and two groups of songs and piano.

Alwin Schroeder Trio.

Alwin Schroeder, the well-known 'cellist of this city, has just returned from the Pacific Coast where he was associate artist with Miss Geraldine Farrar on the concert tour she has been making for the past few weeks. As might be expected by his Eastern admirers Mr Schroeder met with instant favor in the West and critics and public alike spoke most highly of his art.

The San Francisco Chronicle said of him: "In Alwin Schroeder as an artist every desire and demand of an exacting audience is met. Art, by nature and cultivation, has reached a high fulfillment in the 'cellist, whose experience and reputation are little greater than his native faculty."

Mr Schroeder recently has organized the Schroeder Trio which will give concerts later in the season. A musical treat may be expected.

First Orchestra Trip.

The Symphony Orchestra leaves tonight for its first Southern trip and will give its regular concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and New York. At only two of the concerts, those in Philadelphia and Baltimore, will there be a soloist, Miss Geraldine Farrar. The orchestra has never begun an out-of-town season with such favorable prospects.

Carnegie Hall, New York, has been sold out for the season to the last seat for both series of concerts. In Brooklyn there is not a new subscriber on the list, the subscribers of last year with their renewals and additional seats having exhausted the entire seating capacity of the Academy of Music.

In Baltimore, Philadelphia and Washington almost the same condition exists, only a few stray seats in each of these cities being left for single sale.

JOURNAL—

NOVEMBER 1

KREISLER SUNDAY CONCERT SOLOIST

Violinist at Symphony Hall With Philharmonic Orchestra.

The concert at Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon will be given by the Philharmonic Orchestra of New York, Josef Stransky conductor. Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist. He will play Bruch's Concerto in G minor, No. 1. The orchestral numbers will be the "Rienzi" overture of Wagner, Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony.

HERALD,

NOVEMBER 1,

4TH SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Two Orchestral Fantasies by Max Schillings Heard for First Time.

MISS FARRAR SINGS

Gives Airs by Mozart and Wagner Though Weather Had Affected Her Voice.

By PHILIP HALE.

The fourth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Miss Geraldine Farrar was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Mozart..................Symphony, E flat major
Mozart—
Recitative, "Temerari," and Aria, "Come scoglio," from "Cosi fan tutte."
Schillings......"Meergruss" and "Seemorgen"
Wagner.................................. { Im Treibhaus / Traeume / Schmerzen
(Orchestral accompaniment by Mottl.)
Weber......................"Jubel" Overture

Mozart's symphony had not been played at these concerts since November, 1909. It may be on the whole inferior to the G minor and the "Jupiter," which are more often performed, yet the Andante has the peculiar Mozartian grace, tinged with romantic melancholy. The Minuet has long been a favorite, and the Finale is delightful in its vivacity.

Weber's overture does not wear so well as the three overtures by him, which are to an orchestral programmaker what "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci" are to a perplexed impresario. It was written for a festival occasion, and such compositions seldom have long life. Weber noted in his diary that the overture and also the cantata which he had written in honor of the 50th anniversary of the ascension of Friedrich August the First to the Saxon throne had "made a great effect;" and he added: "God be thanked for this." Weber had reason to be thankful. No doubt some enjoy the overture today from early association with it in a four-handed arrangement for the piano, or because "Heil dir im Sieger Kranz" is introduced, and they recognize the tune. The Weberian formulas and flourishes of 1818 are today singularly old fashioned. There is not the imaginative sweep with the romantic flavor that still vivifies the more famous three overtures.

The orchestral fantasies of Max Schillings were played here for the first time. Excerpts from his operas and the prologue to "Oedipus Rex" have been heard at Symphony concerts, and Dr. Ludwig Wuellner recited "The Witch's Song" to his music at a Pension Fund concert. Two movements of his string quartet have been performed in Boston. His music has never made a deep impression.

The two fantasies heard yesterday were first played early in 1896 at Munich. "Morning at Sea" was suggested by a poem of Lenau. There are arguments published in the scores, written in a bombastic vein, and we are told by the late Nodnagel that the music is symbolical. He names the typical themes. The ocean, in its various phases, its stormy rage, its swell and fall, its peaceful depths, teaches restless and complaining man to be patient, calm, courageous, happy. Now this is all very fine, but it does not necessarily make good music. Of the two fantasies, "Morning at Sea" is the more interesting; the other one is too much like the prose argument.

Schillings's themes do not have a well-defined profile, except the sturdy little one in which he gives out the rhythm of "Thalatta," the famous cry of the Ten Thousand led by Xenophon. Nor do they have a decided character. The composer's thematic treatment is involved and as thick as his instrumentation.

The unhappy man seems to share the view of the late John Stetson, that, when an orchestra is engaged, all the men should play all the time. It is not always easy to recognize the typical themes. The analytical hearer—for there are such persons—may easily mistake "courageous lamentation" for "daring dreams" or "tormenting doubt"; and that would be annoying.

It is not fair to hold Mr. Schillings responsible for Nodnagel's explanation; it is to be hoped that he himself was not guilty of the prose arguments in the score.

To the hearer who wishes to be possessed by his own thoughts, or to dream his own dreams when he is "reminded by the instruments," these fantasies recall the characterization in "Great Expectations" of the tragedian's reading of Hamlet: They are "massive and concrete."

Unfortunately they do not in any way suggest the sea, scouling, raging, sinister, or laughing beneath the sun, or calm and brooding. They can never be classed as musical seascapes with pages of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" and "Sadko," Debussy's La Mer," Mendelssohn's two overtures, Gilson's "La Mer" or even the first movement of Rubinstein's "Ocean" symphony. Mr. Schillings's emotions might have been experienced on dry land.

The sudden change in the weather affected Miss Farrar's throat so that yesterday she could hardly speak. Nevertheless she sang Mozart's recitative in the grand style, and the aria with dramatic and vocal intelligence. She sang with impressive breadth and with true sentiment. Only in a few instances, as in the extreme low tones, was her temporary disability noticeable. She was equally fortunate in the songs of Wagner, and in them beauty of voice, purity of sentiment, and eloquence of diction were fully displayed.

There was an obvious but amusing typographical error in the program book. It was there stated that Mme. Wesendonck, the author of the poems to which Wagner set music, was born in 1828 and married in 1888. For 1888, read 1848.

There will be no concerts next week. The program for Nov. 14 and 15 will include Schubert's Unfinished symphony, Haydn's 'cello concerto in D-major, Beethoven's Pastoral symphony. Mr. Warnke will be the soloist.

POST, SATURDAY,

NOVEMBER 1,

FARRAR IS SUFFERING FROM COLD

But Her Singing at Symphony Concert Was Glorious

BY OLIN DOWNES

The feature of yesterday afternoon's public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall was the singing of Geraldine Farrar, and this in spite of the fact that Miss Farrar, owing to a sudden cold, could hardly speak as she waited back of the stage. Never has she sung here to better apparent advantage; never has she given greater proof of her continued development as an artist.

MOZART SYMPHONY

The remainder of the programme was not significant. There was a good performance of the E flat symphony of Mozart—that one of the symphonies of Mozart in the key of E flat which is known to all. There were two useless novelties by Max Schillings; there was finally the "Jubilee" overture of Weber, at the end of which, as the orchestra played the tune that Weber incorporated under its original title, "Heil dir im Siegerkranz," otherwise known to the English as "God Save the King" and to Americans as "My Country 'Tis of Thee," the audience, for the first time, we believe, in the history of these concerts, rose to its feet. They knew no better. Most of them had not read their programme notes and ascertained that Weber considered his tune as "Heil dir im Siegerkranz."

Miss Farrar sang the recitative, "Temerari," and the aria, "Come Scoglio," from the first act of Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte," and three of the five songs which Wagner wrote as sketches for "Tristan," "Im Treibhaus," "Traume" and "Schmerzen." She sang the air by Mozart in a noble spirit, "in the grand manner," and with an opulence and beauty of tone that was the more astonishing in view of the condition of her throat. The tone was always full and beautiful, the declamation full of dignity and dramatic power, the air itself treated with the utmost art. And the songs of Wagner, of which the accompaniment was a thing to remember, including Mr. Ferir's viola and the first horn solo, Miss Farrar interpreted with an intensity of feeling, which gained in expression by the restraint and the fineness of her style.

The condition of her throat was more evident than in the Mozart music. Huskiness was especially noticeable in the lower tones. But not for a moment did this interfere with the quality of the interpretation. Miss Farrar changed the order of her songs as they were announced in the programme, and after a poetic interpretation of the "Traume" betook herself to her rooms at the Touraine and a mustard bath. Her condition, it is reported, is improving, so that there is little doubt that the concert this evening will find her in better spirits than the concert of yesterday afternoon.

Schilling's pieces, "Greeting to the Sea," and "Morning on the Sea," were played for the first time here, were composed in 1896. A theme in the first piece is rhythmed as the word "Thalatta," with which Xenophon and the Ten Thousand saluted the sea, is rhythmed, and this theme, the subject matter of the first piece, is recalled in the second. The pieces are related thematically and in mood. Of the two the last is the better, because it is the shorter. The first piece commences bravely, and with a real suggestion of a big sea mood, but as soon as he has fully announced his theme the composer's imagination flags, and there's an end of it.

When these pieces were first played in Germany they were condemned bitterly as being "ultra-modern." Dear gentlemen of the German press, the trouble with this music is not that it is "ultra-modern," but quite the reverse. It is a series of commonplace repetitions of commonplace tricks of the trade, which are at the command of every third-rate composer of the day, especially in Germany. The same stock of devices for developing a theme in a noisy, pretentious manner, the same monotonously swollen orchestration, the same everything, and by the yard of it, ready tinned and labelled "Made in Germany."

JOURNAL

NOVEMBER 5.

FRIEDA HEMPEL SAYS SHE IS IN FINE VOICE

Frieda Hempel, German Prima Donna, Who Will Sing in Symphony Hall Concert Next Sunday Afternoon.

© MISHKIN.

German Prima Donna Will "Really Sing" This Season—Al Jolson Springs Surprise—Basil Foster Back With "The Sunshine Girl"—Suffrage Theater.

By E. F. Harkins

"NOW," says Frieda Hempel, "you really will hear me sing."

That was one of the first things the German prima donna said when she landed on this side of the ocean the other day. Then she had to explain what she meant.

"You see," she said, "I am quite a different Frieda Hempel from the one that came here last sason. The fact is, I am an entirely different woman. That trip over last year was one of the real gloomy events of my life. It seemed as if I were making a voyage to a cemetery. My health was poor and I was afraid I could not do myself justice."

As a matter of fact, Mme. Hempel did not quite do herself justice in New York, when she made her debut in this country, but she was genuinely successful when she sang in opera here.

"But now," she went on, "I have discovered America, and quite a number of good friends in America seem to have discovered me. My health is fully restored, and now, I repeat, you really will hear me sing."

Bostonians will be the first to judge of this, for they will have her as soloist at the Symphony Hall concert next Sunday afternoon.

Mme. Hempel has brought over a cute little dog named Pitti, a regular canine prima donna, so to speak, for this Lilliputian Florentine Spitz has a part in Strauss's "Rosenkavalier"—not a singing or even a barking part, but one nevertheless important enough to collect fees for.

Mme. Hempel spent most of last summer studying new roles with Professor Nasi, her Italian teacher, and she will take the prima donna role in the American production of the Strauss opera.

* * *

---

advertiser nov-3

KREISLER PRINCE OF VIOLINISTS

PROGRAMME.

Wagner. "Rienzi" overture.

Bruch, G minor Concerto for Violin.

Mr. Kreisler.

Strauss. "Death and Transfiguration." Orchestral tone-poem.

Tschaikowsky. Fifth symphony, E minor.

As the great universities of the world are beginning to exchange professors, so the great American cities are beginning to exchange orchestras and conductors. A change of pasture makes fat calves, and a change of our orchestral diet is decidedly educational for our concert-goers. Even while we consider our own orchestra beyond question the best in America (or in the world, for that matter), we welcomed the change of atmosphere, of style of programme, and of solo work which obtained in this concert, given in Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon, says Louis C. Elson of Sunday's concert by the N. Y. Philharmonic Orchestra.

Bruch's beautiful concerto is another proof of imperishable melody. The charming tune which pervades its slow movement is always attractive, much more so than the learned asceticism of Brahms in another violin concerto.

Fritz Kreisler is an artist worth traveling many miles to hear. Entirely free from the tricks with which some violinists win their public, he has yet as great a technique as the most scintillating pyrotechnist of them all. But with Kreisler one does not think of the artist and of the great difficulties he is overcoming; he manages to make one think first of the composer and his music—"Ars est celare Artem." There is no more satisfying artist on the concert platform today than Fritz Kreisler. His press agent need not herald him as "the greatest living artist or that has ever lived," as was flamboyantly announced of a great artist last season. But the double stopping, the martele, the G string work, of the finale, proved Kreisler the peer of anyone in technique, while the beauty of the adagio showed him much more than a mere technician. The public tried hard to force further violin work, but Kreisler was too much of an artist to give an encore after a fine concerto.

TRANSCRIPT.

NOVEMBER 3,

NEWS OF MUSIC

Miss Farrar and Wagner's Songs—Mr Paderewski Conquers Himself and Plays—Puccini Finishes a Short Opera and Plans Another—Items About Composers and Operas

IT is a milestone in an opera singer's career when she has gained the power to make herself wholly subordinate to great music on the concert platform. All the influences of the opera training and of the multi-colored life of the popular star are against it. Hitherto Miss Farrar has not been able altogether to achieve it. But Saturday night, in Symphony Hall, as on the preceding afternoon, her artistic indentification of herself with her art was complete. No music is more exacting than the Wagner songs she sang. She gave to them the finest tones of her middle voice, a mastery of breath and phrasing that is the result of pure hard work, and a justness of mood which is difficult to analyze but is unmistakable. This music must dominate even the greatest singer, or it becomes grotesque. Miss Farrar proved herself worthy of it by letting it dominate her. She was, throughout the songs, unnoticeable, except as the interpreter. When her last phrase in the "Träume" was finished and the orchestra, in Mottl's expert scoring, was drawing the mood tenderly out into nothingness, she stood as she had stood during the singing, effacing herself as far as it was possible, while the genius of Wagner sang itself to the end. One felt convinced, as perhaps never before in her career, that she was not posed but genuinely absorbed in the music of which she was but an interpreter. When a singer has achieved this we can call her, without any of the usual qualifying phrases, a great artist.

Here in Boston

From today through Saturday Nov. 15, limited subscriptions for the new season will be received at the Opera House. That is to say, those who wish to subscribe for a single evening or for the matinée in alternate weeks or who care to subscribe only for a part of the season can make such an arrangement or seemingly any within reason that they desire to propose. Moreover, excellent places are still plentiful in all parts of the house. Once more subscribers who have not yet made full payment of their subscription are reminded that they are overdue.

Victim of the Bostonian climate, as singers new to it often are, Mr. Egenieff has deferred his song recital announced for this afternoon to a later date, which will be duly published and for which tickets issued for today will be good.

Mr. Longy will begin next Saturday evening in New York his novel series of chamber concerts, the plan for which was recently outlined in this column. His programme traverses Juon's Octet for violin, viola, violoncello, oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon and piano; Ravel's Introduction and Allegro for harp, accompanied by a quartet of strings, a flute and a clarinet, and songs by Debussy, Aubert and Woollett to be sung by Mme. Sundelius.

Mr. Paderewski at Last

Forty-five minutes after the announced hour for the beginning of the concert, Mr. Paderewski took his place at the piano in Æolian Hall in New York on Saturday afternoon, and in those forty-five minutes, as plausible gossip runs, the pianist battled with the nervous dread of the facing of a metropolitan audience that has beset him for a fortnight and finally conquered it. [illegible] down this strange neurotic malaise the announced course of his recitals bids fair to run smoothly. Certainly his playing showed that his fears were as groundless as such nervous obsessions usually are. "Many of his well-remembered qualities," writes Mr. Aldrich in the Times, "exercised their spell upon the most fastidious listeners as of yore. These are the qualities that first lifted him to his own peculiar and undisputed preëminence. He is a wonder-worker in color, when he wishes to be, and in the searching poignancy of his cantabile, in the beauty and richness and the variety of tints and gradations in his tone. There is still the exquisite perfection in the singing of a phrase, the moulding of a melody. Few can play, as he can, florid passages upon the pianoforte with such iridescent beauty of color; few can charge the music they play with so intense and penetrating a romantic feeling or so envelop it with the atmosphere of poetical imagination.

"This is Mr. Paderewski at his best. If he was not always at his best yesterday, it is necessary to remember that ill health has pursued him, but something else also has pursed him in his last three or four visits to America; a new and unlovely tendency that never manifested itself in his earlier years to force the tone of his instrument in fortissimo passages, to compel it to an utterance beyond its nature. This tendency has been sometimes more, sometimes less, but it has been something to grieve the judicious among his admirers, and it was not absent Saturday.

Items of the Day

Hitherto, if memory does not slip, Mr. Hofmann has not played Schumann's pianoforte concerto in America. He will play it at the concerts of the New York Symphony Orchestra next Friday and next Sunday, and in all probability when he appears in Boston with the Symphony Orchestra.

It seems that Saint-Saëns himself handed to Mr. Pierné, the conductor of the Colonne Concerts in Paris, the overture written before he was twenty, which was played at them the other day. He had chanced upon the score among some forgotten papers. When the reviewers heard the piece they found it neat, graceful and simple, altogether characteristic of a youthful Saint-Saëns who was to ripen into the traits his music has since disclosed.

Encouraged by his fair fortune with similar ventures in the past, Mr. Damrosch announces a "Beethoven Festival" for the early spring in New York. The series of six concerts will traverse most of the composer's symphonies and end with a performance of the Ninth.

Xavier Léroux, the Parisian composer, is amusing himself with the writing of an operatic comedy in which some of the personages of "The Barber of Seville" and of "Figaro's Wedding" reappear in their old age with their sons and daughters. Cherubino, for example, and at sixty-two, is still making love.

The change of management at the Opéra in Paris is not to be accomplished without an "incident." Monsieur Messager and Monsieur Broussan have failed of reappointment. Each blames the other for their common misfortune and Messager has found a pretext to challenge Broussan to a duel.

STRANSKY AND KREISLE

THE CONCERT OF THE NEW YOR PHILHARMONIC

A Long Programme of Nervous Shocks Mr. Stransky's Unrelenting Emotion Interpretation, and His Masterly Con passing of It—Its Beauties and Its Di advantages — Mr. Kreisler Plays Bruch Concerto

KREISLER and the New York Ph harmonic Orchestra shared ho ors at the Symphony Hall c cert yesterday afternoon. If t response given them was not equal, th was due largely (beyond the attractiv ness of a soloist per se) to the peculia exhausting nature of the programme. A ter Mr. Kreisler's concerto people w simply too tired to appreciate emotion music to the full. The whole program was two hours long and was played wi out any gracious intermission, which mig have freshened the hearers for Mr. Stra sky's glorious readings of the Strau "Death and Transfiguration" and Tsch kowsky's Fifth Symphony. These, wi the Bruch G minor concerto and the Rien overture, form a programme that for em tional strain could not easily be matched.

But this is not all. For not anoth conductor in the country would have re it so persistently as an emotional attack on the nerves. Not a single sound was to be heard in all those two hours which did not make the physical nerves tingle in reply. Many a time one could have wished, for the sake of a bit of repose, to hear some "pure pattern" music, music which, as it were, could be looked at, and could be enjoyed without being felt. Such might have been the waltz in the symphony, a light, fairy-like thing quite fleshless in its wistfulness. But Mr. Stransky (and it tells a deal of his method) chose to take it at a slow tempo, to deepen its wistfulness into melancholy, and to give it the same nerve-vibrating emotional tone that had dominated the whole afternoon.

Yet the interpretation was just. The emotional reading of the symphony was closest to Tschaikowsky's material and the deepening of the little waltz was perfectly consistent with the whole reading. If there had been an intermission the tale might have been different. But the two orchestral pieces played to weary nerves and attentions that had already been strained by Mr. Kreisler's masterly performance.

But though one might suggest an intermission or a somewhat shorter programme, one cannot deny the power and justice of Mr. Stransky's readings or the resourcefulness with which he gave them voice.

SUN

Time a [illegible] doubts, might believe that the co could not "get away with it." But th interpretation always pleaded for itself as inseparable part of the whole readin Such was the extreme freedom the conductor took with the first movement o the symphony, varying it at will from a allegro impetuoso to something very nearl like a largo, breaking it up into grea streaks of color which existed for themselves alone and not for the whole design. Yet one realized that this was precisely the best way to do justice to Tschaikowsky's somewhat turgid exposition. Th movement is one strain after another impassioned song, and Mr. Stransky saw it that each strain produced its fulles effect.

Again, in the Rienzi overture whic opened the programme, Mr. Stransky to the allegro so slowly that it seemed could not hold the attention on it. But he justified his course when he came to tha most puzzling passage, where Wagner' fine sense of fitness took a vacation an where nearly every conductor gives u hopelessly to the commonplace—the retur of the introductory melody allegro. In th slow, maestoso reading which Mr. Stransk gave to the allegro this sounded delicat and gentle, but not cheap, and for th first time in many hearings Rienzi w through without a flaw.

Mr. Stransky's interpretation, whi seemed almost perfect of its kind, ma peculiar demands upon the nervous orga ization of the listener. It chooses, wher ever possible, the majestic, the intens the highly colored reading. This nearl always means that the conductor takes passage, especially an allegro, as slowl as possible. And a slow allegro can carried through only with a deeply vibra ing tone and a compelling legato. Th three qualities, tonal power, tonal sono ity, and tonal legato are purely sensuo ones. As the natural tempo becomes slo er they must be called more and mo into service. Thus the majestic readi maintains itself solely by calling into pla the sensuous response. But for any i terpretative artist there are two dange in the method. The first is the brea ing point beyond which a slower temp is not able to evoke the necessary se suous reaction to sustain it. It is a d lightful feat of sleight of hand for a co ductor to skirt as near as possible to th point without going beyond it. And M Stransky yesterday kept well enou within it to hold the attention with ce tainty. But on the second danger he r afoul, as was inevitable. For the comm est psychological phenomenon of nerv reaction is that after the first moment sensation it continually weakens until, it be given no rest, it becomes numb even positively painful. The unemoti music, the kind that can be "looked at has the advantage of placing little str on the nervous organization and leavi the hearer fresh after hours of listeni It is the old contrast of the contemplati and the sensuous, the Stoic and the E curean, the Apollonius and the Dionysia The one observes and lays up treasures some future heaven, but runs the dang of missing present reality. The other e periences and gets close to present reali but runs the danger of having noth afterwards to show for it. Eighteenth c tury art was largely of the former kin and hence we can listen to two Hay symphonies at a time without becomi fatigued. Nineteenth century music, b ginning with Beethoven, went to the em tional—the empirical—extreme, and th was the music that filled Mr. Stransky programme.

It would be unjust to say all this as criticism of Mr. Stransky's method and the orchestra which he has trained magnificently to express his meani The sensuous interpretation is a disa vantage rather than a fault. Yesterday accounted for the fact that the orchest did not receive the response that the au ence undoubedly felt for it. The sensuo reading of music represents the whole me sage of the nineteenth century and it good to have one conductor in the la who can carry it as far as it will go. Th this does not, in Mr. Stransky's case, me careless interpretation, stressing of b colors and slurring over detailed beau was evident to anyone who obse closely. Whenever a passage occurred which the sensuous effect might be spo by a slightly false emphasis the pre nuance was always forthcoming. S was the accompaniment in the de allegro section of the Rienzi overt Such, too, were the bass pizzicatti in accompaniment of the Bruch concerto. Stransky's method is consistently that three seasons ago, when he had just tak Mr. Mahler's orchestra. But it has n penetrated to the slightest details of terpretation. Mr. Stransky is not a co ductor who leads with "temperamen alone. He conducts also with an inte gence which is continuously on duty, b continuously in the service of the emotio

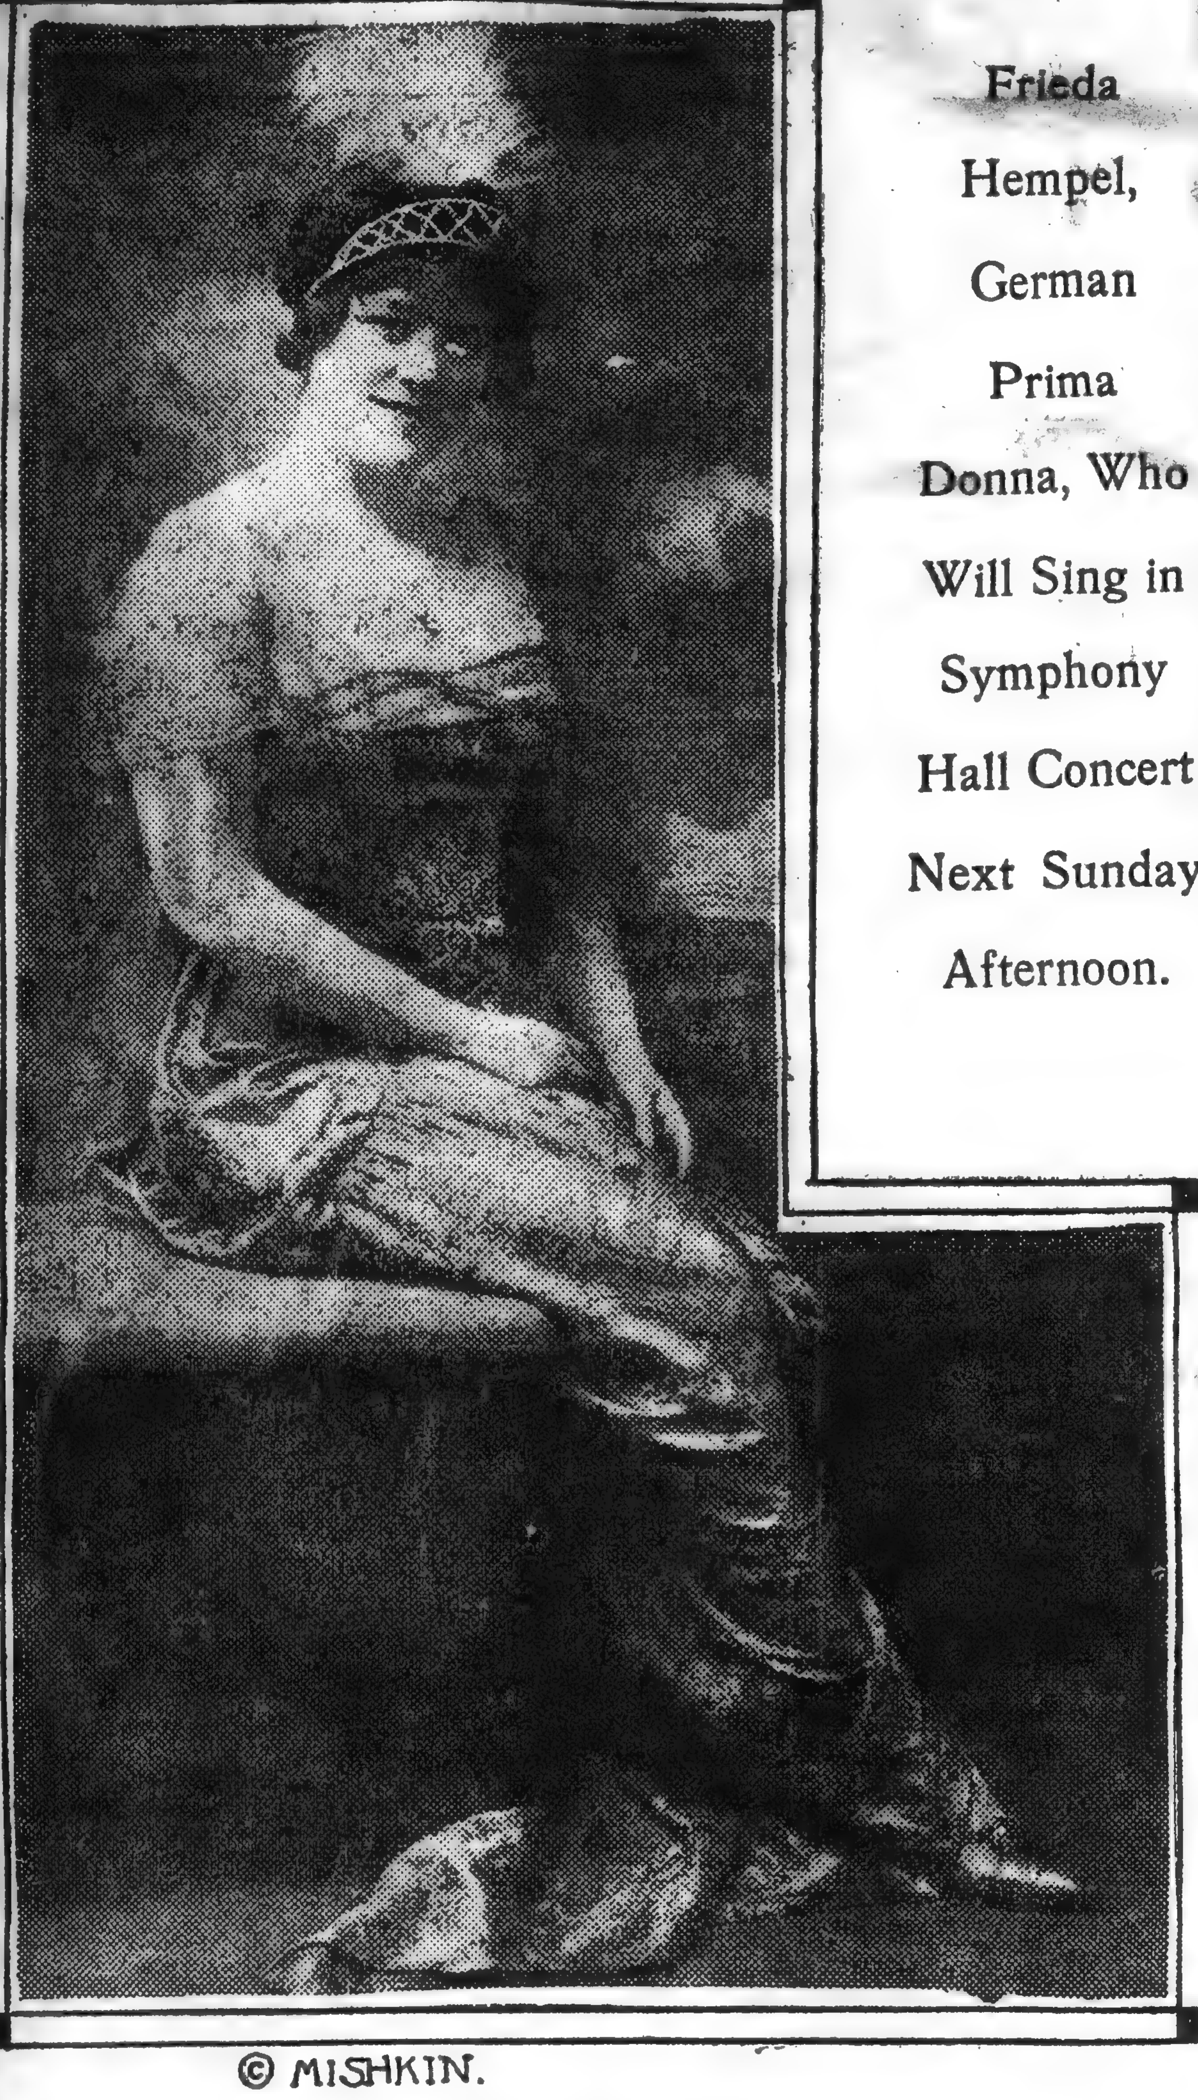
Mr. Stransky's new arrangement of t brass, by which the trumpets and tro bones are behind the violins on the ductor's left, had an excellent tria terday. Whatever the traditionalists say about it, it is undeniably effecti the first movement of the Tschaik there is a crescendo passage built up ly of answering horns and trumpets the great beams of tone rushed first one side of the stage and then fro other the listener received an almo torial sense of growing climax. An the last measures of the symphony, the theme of the first movement is sim answered back and forth the effect sensational. The purist might cal "music faking." But if so, then ant choirs in a cathedral are also mus ing. Surely such a device is just as mate as the use of suggestive timbr pictorial purposes, or the use of b a religious passage of a tone poem

Mr. Kreisler was the same qui master of his instrument as o felt that his greatness was ural, and not an artifici talent, exaggerated at t normal human qualities, case with virtuosi. H full and pure, not for that is not legi a solo violin, but [illegible]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

JOURNAL
NOVEMBER 5.

FRIEDA HEMPEL SAYS SHE IS IN FINE VOICE



Frieda Hempel, German Prima Donna, Who Will Sing in Symphony Hall Concert Next Sunday Afternoon.

© MISHKIN.

German Prima Donna Will "Really Sing" This Season—Al Jolson Springs Surprise—Basil Foster Back With "The Sunshine Girl"—Suffrage Theater.

By E. F. Harkins

"NOW," says Frieda Hempel, "you really will hear me sing."

That was one of the first things the German prima donna said when she landed on this side of the ocean the other day. Then she had to explain what she meant.

"You see," she said, "I am quite a different Frieda Hempel from the one that came here last sason. The fact is, I am an entirely different woman. That trip over last year was one of the real gloomy events of my life. It seemed as if I were making a voyage to a cemetery. My health was poor and I was afraid I could not do myself justice."

As a matter of fact, Mme. Hempel did not quite do herself justice in New York, when she made her debut in this country, but she was genuinely successful when she sang in opera here.

"But now," she went on, "I have discovered America, and quite a number of good friends in America seem to have discovered me. My health is fully restored, and now, I repeat, you really will hear me sing."

Bostonians will be the first to judge of this, for they will have her as soloist at the Symphony Hall concert next Sunday afternoon.

Mme. Hempel has brought over a cute little dog named Pitti, a regular canine prima donna, so to speak, for this Lilliputian Florentine Spitz has a part in Strauss's "Rosenkavalier"—not a singing or even a barking part, but one nevertheless important enough to collect fees for.

Mme. Hempel spent most of last summer studying new roles with Professor Nasi, her Italian teacher, and she will take the prima donna role in the American production of the Strauss opera.

* * *

Advertiser Nov 3

KREISLER PRINCE OF VIOLINISTS

PROGRAMME.

Wagner. "Rienzi" overture.
Bruch, G minor Concerto for Violin.
Mr. Kreisler.
Strauss. "Death and Transfiguration." Orchestral tone-poem.
Tschaikowsky. Fifth symphony, E minor.

As the great universities of the world are beginning to exchange professors, so the great American cities are beginning to exchange orchestras and conductors. A change of pasture makes fat calves, and a change of our orchestral diet is decidedly educational for our concert-goers. Even while we consider our own orchestra beyond question the best in America (or in the world, for that matter), we welcomed the change of atmosphere, of style of programme, and of solo work which obtained in this concert, given in Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon, says Louis C. Elson of Sunday's concert by the N. Y. Philharmonic Orchestra.

Bruch's beautiful concerto is another proof of imperishable melody. The charming tune which pervades its slow movement is always attractive, much more so than the learned asceticism of Brahms in another violin concerto.

Fritz Kreisler is an artist worth traveling many miles to hear. Entirely free from the tricks with which some violinists win their public, he has yet as great a technique as the most scintillating pyrotechnist of them all. But with Kreisler one does not think of the artist and of the great difficulties he is overcoming; he manages to make one think first of the composer and his music—"Ars est celare Artem." There is no more satisfying artist on the concert platform today than Fritz Kreisler. His press agent need not herald him as "the greatest living artist or that has ever lived," as was flamboyantly announced of a great artist last season. But the double stopping, the martele, the G string work, of the finale, proved Kreisler the peer of anyone in technique, while the beauty of the adagio showed him much more than a mere technician. The public tried hard to force further violin work, but Kreisler was too much of an artist to give an encore after a fine concerto.

TRANSCRIPT.
NOVEMBER 3,

NEWS OF MUSIC

Miss Farrar and Wagner's Songs—Mr. Paderewski Conquers Himself and Plays—Puccini Finishes a Short Opera and Plans Another—Items About Composers and Operas

IT is a milestone in an opera singer's career when she has gained the power to make herself wholly subordinate to great music on the concert platform. All the influences of the opera training and of the multi-colored life of the popular star are against it. Hitherto Miss Farrar has not been able altogether to achieve it. But Saturday night, in Symphony Hall, as on the preceding afternoon, her artistic indentification of herself with her art was complete. No music is more exacting than the Wagner songs she sang. She gave to them the finest tones of her middle voice, a mastery of breath and phrasing that is the result of pure hard work, and a justness of mood which is difficult to analyze but is unmistakable. This music must dominate even the greatest singer, or it becomes grotesque. Miss Farrar proved herself worthy of it by letting it dominate her. She was, throughout the songs, unnoticeable, except as the interpreter. When her last phrase in the "Träume" was finished and the orchestra, in Mottl's expert scoring, was drawing the mood tenderly out into nothingness, she stood as she had stood during the singing, effacing herself as far as it was possible, while the genius of Wagner sang itself to the end. One felt convinced, as perhaps never before in her career, that she was not posed but genuinely absorbed in the music of which she was but an interpreter. When a singer has achieved this we can call her, without any of the usual qualifying phrases, a great artist.

Here in Boston

From today through Saturday Nov. 15, limited subscriptions for the new season will be received at the Opera House. That is to say, those who wish to subscribe for a single evening or for the matinée in alternate weeks or who care to subscribe only for a part of the season can make such an arrangement or seemingly any within reason that they desire to propose. Moreover, excellent places are still plentiful in all parts of the house. Once more subscribers who have not yet made full payment of their subscription are reminded that they are overdue.

Victim of the Bostonian climate, as singers new to it often are, Mr. Egenieff has deferred his song recital announced for this afternoon to a later date, which will be duly published and for which tickets issued for today will be good.

Mr. Longy will begin next Saturday evening in New York his novel series of chamber concerts, the plan for which was recently outlined in this column. His programme traverses Juon's Octet for violin, viola, violoncello, oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon and piano; Ravel's Introduction and Allegro for harp, accompanied by a quartet of strings, a flute and a clarinet, and songs by Debussy, Aubert and Woollett to be sung by Mme. Sundelius.

Mr. Paderewski at Last

Forty-five minutes after the announced hour for the beginning of the concert, Mr. Paderewski took his place at the piano in Æolian Hall in New York on Saturday afternoon, and in those forty-five minutes, as plausible gossip runs, the pianist battled with the nervous dread of the facing of a metropolitan audience that has beset him for a fortnight and finally conquered it. Now that he [illegible] down this strange neurotic malaise the announced course [illegible] his recitals bids fair to run smoothly. Certainly his playing showed that his fears were as groundless as such nervous obsessions usually are. "Many of his well-remembered qualities," writes Mr. Aldrich in the Times, "exercised their spell upon the most fastidious listeners as of yore. These are the qualities that first lifted him to his own peculiar and undisputed preëminence. He is a wonder-worker in color, when he wishes to be, and in the searching poignancy of his cantabile, in the beauty and richness and the variety of tints and gradations in his tone. There is still the exquisite perfection in the singing of a phrase, the moulding of a melody. Few can play, as he can, florid passages upon the pianoforte with such iridescent beauty of color; few can charge the music they play with so intense and penetrating a romantic feeling or so envelop it with the atmosphere of poetical imagination.

"This is Mr. Paderewski at his best. If he was not always at his best yesterday, it is necessary to remember that ill health has pursued him, but something else also has pursed him in his last three or four visits to America; a new and unlovely tendency that never manifested itself in his earlier years to force the tone of his instrument in fortissimo passages, to compel it to an utterance beyond its nature. This tendency has been sometimes more, sometimes less, but it has been something to grieve the judicious among his admirers, and it was not absent Saturday.

Items of the Day

Hitherto, if memory does not slip, Mr. Hofmann has not played Schumann's pianoforte concerto in America. He will play it at the concerts of the New York Symphony Orchestra next Friday and next Sunday, and in all probability when he appears in Boston with the Symphony Orchestra.

It seems that Saint-Saëns himself handed to Mr. Pierné, the conductor of the Colonne Concerts in Paris, the overture written before he was twenty, which was played at them the other day. He had chanced upon the score among some forgotten papers. When the reviewers heard the piece they found it neat, graceful and simple, altogether characteristic of a youthful Saint-Saëns who was to ripen into the traits his music has since disclosed.

Encouraged by his fair fortune with similar ventures in the past, Mr. Damrosch announces a "Beethoven Festival" for the early spring in New York. The series of six concerts will traverse most of the composer's symphonies and end with a performance of the Ninth.

Xavier Léroux, the Parisian composer, is amusing himself with the writing of an operatic comedy in which some of the personages of "The Barber of Seville" and of "Figaro's Wedding" reappear in their old age with their sons and daughters. Cherubino, for example, and at sixty-two, is still making love.

The change of management at the Opéra in Paris is not to be accomplished without an "incident." Monsieur Messager and Monsieur Broussan have failed of reappointment. Each blames the other for their common misfortune and Messager has found a pretext to challenge Broussan to a duel.

SUN

STRANSKY AND KREISLE

THE CONCERT OF THE NEW YOR PHILHARMONIC

A Long Programme of Nervous Shocks Mr. Stransky's Unrelenting Emotion Interpretation, and His Masterly Co passing of It—Its Beauties and Its D advantages—Mr. Kreisler Plays Bruch Concerto

KREISLER and the New York Philharmonic Orchestra shared honors at the Symphony Hall concert yesterday afternoon. If the response given them was not equal, this was due largely (beyond the attractiveness of a soloist per se) to the peculiarly exhausting nature of the programme. After Mr. Kreisler's concerto people were simply too tired to appreciate emotional music to the full. The whole programme was two hours long and was played without any gracious intermission, which might have freshened the hearers for Mr. Stransky's glorious readings of the Strauss "Death and Transfiguration" and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony. These, with the Bruch G minor concerto and the Rienzi overture, form a programme that for emotional strain could not easily be matched.

But this is not all. For not another conductor in the country would have read it so persistently as an emotional attack on the nerves. Not a single sound was to be heard in all those two hours which did not make the physical nerves tingle in reply. Many a time one could have wished, for the sake of a bit of repose, to hear some "pure pattern" music, music which, as it were, could be looked at, and could be enjoyed without being felt. Such might have been the waltz in the symphony, a light, fairy-like thing quite fleshless in its wistfulness. But Mr. Stransky (and it tells a deal of his method) chose to take it at a slow tempo, to deepen its wistfulness into melancholy, and to give it the same nerve-vibrating emotional tone that had dominated the whole afternoon.

Yet the interpretation was just. The emotional reading of the symphony was closest to Tschaikowsky's material and the deepening of the little waltz was perfectly consistent with the whole reading. If there had been an intermission the tale might have been different. But the two orchestral pieces played to weary nerves and attentions that had already been strained by Mr. Kreisler's masterly performance.

But though one might suggest an intermission or a somewhat shorter programme, one cannot deny the power and justice of Mr. Stransky's readings or the resourcefulness with which he gave them voice.

Time an [illegible] doubts, might believe that the co could not "get away with it." But interpretation always pleaded for itself as inseparable part of the whole reading. Such was the extreme freedom the conductor took with the first movement o the symphony, varying it at will from a allegro impetuoso to something very nearl like a largo, breaking it up into grea streaks of color which existed for themselves alone and not for the whole design. Yet one realized that this was precisely the best way to do justice to Tschaikowsky's somewhat turgid exposition. Th movement is one strain after another o impassioned song, and Mr. Stransky saw t it that each strain produced its fulles effect.

Again, in the Rienzi overture whic opened the programme, Mr. Stransky too the allegro so slowly that it seemed n could not hold the attention on it. But he justified his course when he came to tha most puzzling passage, where Wagner's fine sense of fitness took a vacation an where nearly every conductor gives u hopelessly to the commonplace—the retur of the introductory melody allegro. In th slow, maestoso reading which Mr. Stransk gave to the allegro this sounded delicat and gentle, but not cheap, and for th first time in many hearings Rienzi wen through without a flaw.

Mr. Stransky's interpretation, whi seemed almost perfect of its kind, ma peculiar demands upon the nervous orga ization of the listener. It chooses, wher ever possible, the majestic, the intens the highly colored reading. This nearl always means that the conductor takes passage, especially an allegro, as slowl as possible. And a slow allegro can b carried through only with a deeply vibra ing tone and a compelling legato. The three qualities, tonal power, tonal sono ity, and tonal legato are purely sensuou ones. As the natural tempo becomes slo er they must be called more and mor into service. Thus the majestic readi maintains itself solely by calling into pla the sensuous response. But for any in terpretative artist there are two danger in the method. The first is the brea ing point beyond which a slower temp is not able to evoke the necessary se suous reaction to sustain it. It is a d lightful feat of sleight of hand for a co ductor to skirt as near as possible to th point without going beyond it. And M Stransky yesterday kept well enou within it to hold the attention with ce tainty. But on the second danger he r afoul, as was inevitable. For the commo est psychological phenomenon of nervo reaction is that after the first moment sensation it continually weakens until, it be given no rest, it becomes numb even positively painful. The unemotio music, the kind that can be "looked at has the advantage of placing little st on the nervous organization and leavi the hearer fresh after hours of listeni It is the old contrast of the contemplati and the sensuous, the Stoic and the E curean, the Apollonius and the Dionysia The one observes and lays up treasures some future heaven, but runs the dang of missing present reality. The other e periences and gets close to present reali but runs the danger of having noth afterwards to show for it. Eighteenth ce tury art was largely of the former kin and hence we can listen to two Hay symphonies at a time without becomi fatigued. Nineteenth century music, b ginning with Beethoven, went to the em tional—the empirical—extreme, and th was the music that filled Mr. Stransky programme.

It would be unjust to say all this as criticism of Mr. Stransky's method and the orchestra which he has trained magnificently to express his meanin The sensuous interpretation is a disa vantage rather than a fault. Yesterday accounted for the fact that the orchest did not receive the response that the au ence undoubedly felt for it. The sensuo reading of music represents the whole me sage of the nineteenth century and it good to have one conductor in the la who can carry it as far as it will go. Th this does not, in Mr. Stransky's case, me careless interpretation, stressing of b [illegible] and slurring over detailed beaut [illegible] ident to anyone who obse [illegible] Whenever a passage occurred [illegible] e sensuous effect might be spo [illegible] slightly false emphasis the prec [illegible] was always forthcoming. S [illegible] e accompaniment in the de [illegible] section of the Rienzi overt [illegible] too, were the bass pizzicatti in [illegible] mpaniment of the Bruch concerto. [illegible] nsky's method is consistently that [illegible] seasons ago, when he had just tak [illegible] Iahler's orchestra. But it has n [illegible] ted to the slightest details of [illegible] tion. Mr. Stransky is not a co [illegible] vho leads with "temperamen [illegible] Ie conducts also with an inte [illegible] ch is continuously on duty, b [illegible] ly in the service of the emotio [illegible] nsky's new arrangement of t [illegible] which the trumpets and tro bones are behind the violins on the ductor's left, had an excellent tria terday. Whatever the traditionalists say about it, it is undeniably effecti the first movement of the Tschaik there is a crescendo passage built up ly of answering horns and trumpets the great beams of tone rushed first one side of the stage and then fro other the listener received an almos torial sense of growing climax. An the last measures of the symphony, the theme of the first movement is sim answered back and forth the effect sensational. The purist might cal "music faking." But if so, then ant choirs in a cathedral are also mus ing. Surely such a device is just as mate as the use of suggestive timbr pictorial purposes, or the use of b a religious passage of a tone poem.

Mr. Kreisler was the same qui master of his instrument as e felt that his greatness was ural, and not an artificia talent, exaggerated at t normal human qualities, case with virtuosi. F full and pure, not for that is not legit a solo violin, but [illegible] playing might ... that the Bruch was just the ... he did best, but anyone who ... with him knows he does nearly ... equally well. And it all ... without any exaggeration, without ... glamorous "personality." Everything ... accomplished by pure musical means. ... with Mr. Kreisler one never feels that ... interpreter is greater than the music. ... is the final praise for a great interpretative artist, but to how many other violin virtuosi of today can it be applied?

H. K. M.

MONITOR,
NOVEMBER 1,

MUSIC OF SCHILLINGS PLAYED

Presenting for the first time in ... two works of Max Schillings, the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, rehearsed its fourth program in Symphony hall Friday afternoon. The house was filled with enthusiastic listeners, who applauded both the orchestra and the soloist, Miss Geraldine Farrar, who sang an air of Mozart and three songs of Wagner. The program was as follows: Mozart, symphony in E flat major; Mozart, air, "Come scoglio," from "Cosi fan tutte"; Max Schillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen"; Wagner, three poems, "Im Treibhaus," "Schmerzen," "Traeume"; Weber, overture, "Jubilee."

The descriptive chapter has had its ... of high vogue in novel writing, and ... has the descriptive rhapsody in orchestral scoring. The literary description has exhausted the impressional quality of the adjective, and the orchestral description has about used up the representative powers of instrumental color. Novelists have gathered together bits of landscape imagery and made them depict the emotions of their chracters; composers have brought together certain emotional tone effects and made them reproduce natural scenery. Thus writer helps reader and music-maker helps listener to an interpretation of themselves as social beings, the means employed being some interesting holiday or work-a-day phenomena like forest, mountain, river, sea, roadside, harvest field or city street.

The difficulty with word painting is that it tends to become too thorough and geographic, with tone-painting that it likes to put on its themes every last harmonic and instrumental tint that tonal resource offers and to allow detail to overwhelm the picture. Not all novelistic scenery is of Meredith's sort, which always lies right along the line of the plot, not all symphonic scenery, like Debussy's, is within the bounds of well proportioned thematic structure. Read William Black to see how much description Meredith, as good an observer as he, left out of "The Egoist." Listen to the tone poets from whom come the compositions that make the bulk of the orchestral novelties of the day, and think how many a tempting chord, how many ... blend of wood, string and ... Debussy must have allowed to ... written, foregoing the use of the ... contained in them because they ... place in his symphonic texture. ... could not have your Porcelain Rogue the complete figure she is if so much as a single word descriptive of English landscape were used out of emotional key with her. You could not have the Faun in the perfect sunshine of his afternoon if so much as one combination of notes, theoretically full of light, but off the route of the musical development, were intruded into the finest of French tone poems.

Nothing can be more certain about the two sea pictures that were played Friday afternoon than that their composer wrote with an extraordinary command of orchestral color. Nothing, either, can be more certain than that he wrote about the joy of Xenophon and his home-returning Greeks on beholding from the mountains of Trebizond the waters of the Black sea with the ardor of a sincere classicist. But the picture would have been far more powerful if it had been painted with Athenian economy of material. There is probably a larger wealth of instrumental color lavished on either one of the two orchestral fantasies of Schillings than will be put into all the works which Sibelius, the composer of the great symphony of last week's program, will ever write. It is not possible ... so many emotional effects as are found in the sea pieces to be employed on a single pictorial subject without loss of ... unity. Both "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen" are overloaded with adjectives.

... are doubtless relevant to the ... subject of the sea, which is ... , of course, as musical language. ... mood of delight on sighting the ... when returning from a long journey ... requires less than a whole ... marine views for its state-

... Weingartner ... has been played in recent years at Symphony concerts have disclosed. They indicate indisputable mastery of the instrumental forces and at the same time doubtful mastery of elemental expression. The appeal of sound is certain enough, and yet the appeal of idea is imperfect. Undeniably works like the sea pieces, the Weingartner symphonies and the vast "Polish" symphony of Paderewski have an influence on the art of composition, whether they ever get at the heart of the world of musical listeners or not. They have enriched the technique of the orchestra, though they have not added measurably to the sum of constructive musical thinking. The Schillings works have the merit of individuality. The "Morning" of the German composer is quite as vital in sentiment as the "Afternoon" of the Frenchman, which was composed about the same year. The sea pieces have kept their freshness a decade and a half in the repertory and should keep it much longer.

Dr. Muck interpreted the Schillings numbers with especial heed for their rich color qualities and for their larger rythmic values, calling for beauty of tone from his players and a broad style of phrasing. He had evidently put much care into the preparation of this part of his program and he entirely justified his choice of the pieces by his earnest reading of them. There was no other task of particular difficulty for him. He read the Mozart symphony in an easy manner, neither endeavoring to make a brililant number of it nor in any way slighting it.

He showed an interesting tendency to hold the quick movements down to a moderate speed and to give a fairly brisk beat to the slower portions. He thus avoided all appearance of being careless in the execution of the brighter passages and escaped the necessity of shading minutely the meditative passages. He was his best self as a Mozart conductor in the operatic selection in which Miss Farrar appeared as soloist. Excellent here for his sensitive support of the voice and his help in expounding the dramatic situation through the accompaniment, he was even better in the accompaniments of the Wagnerian songs. Here the orchestral tone which he brought out was a marvel of blend with the soprano voice.

The finale of the "Jubilee" overture, with its patriotic song that is appropriated by many nations, caused those of the house of recent school training to stand at the first notes. More arose as the second and third phrases of the melody sounded out in the trumpets and by the time the strain that carries "Land of the Pilgrims' pride" was reached the entire audience was up.

Miss Farrar found the Mozart aria a big exploit. Her voice had the dramatic quality the music required, but not at every turn of the angular melody all the flexibility that could be desired. Her singing of the Wagner songs was a marvel of vocal beauty and of balance of expression between the intellectual and the sentimental.

Beethoven's fifth symphony will be the principal number on the program of the pension-fund concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be given in Symphony hall, Sunday afternoon, Nov. 16. Dr. Muck announces for his other selections Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" suite, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice" and Liszt's second rhapsody. The orchestra goes on its first monthly tour next week, when there will be no concerts in Boston.

The program of the Symphony concerts of Nov. 14 and 15 consists of Schubert's symphony in B minor, Haydn's concerto for violoncello in D major and Beethoven's sixth symphony. The soloist will be Heinrich Warnke.

* * *

Josef Stransky comes to Boston with the New York Philharmonic society to interpret an orchestral program in Symphony hall Sunday afternoon. He brings Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, as his soloist. The program is as follows: Wagner, overture "Rienzi"; Bruch, violin concerto No. 1, in G minor; Richard Strauss, tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration"; Tschaikowsky, symphony No. 5, in E minor.

* * *

Franz Egenieff, baritone, gives a song recital in Jordan hall on the afternoon of Nov. 3, with Jeno Kerntler assisting at the piano. The program is as follows: Wolf, "Biterolf," "Verborgenheit," "Der Musikant," "Gesang Weyla's"; Loewe, "Der Noeck"; Schumann, "Belsazar," "Provenzalisches Lied"; Pataky, "The Lotus Flower," "On the River"; Hermann, "The Three Comrades"; Kerntler, "Farewell"; Foote, "On the Way to Kew," "Irish Folk Song"; Kaum, "My Native Land."

* * *

Miss Frieda Hempel, soprano, appears in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 9, assisted by an orchestra of Boston Symphony players, Otto Urack, con-

... Suite, "Peer Gynt," ... "Ernani," Verdi; songs with piano ... Traum," Grieg; "Wiegenlied," Humperdinck; "Dresselliedl," D'Albert; "S'Gretel," Pfitzner. Overture, "Barber of Seville."

* * *

Ignace Paderewski, the pianist, appears in Symphony hall in recital on the afternoon of Nov. 7 at 2:30 o'clock. His program is as follows: Fantasia and fugue in G minor, Bach-Liszt; sonata in E major, op. 109, Beethoven; "Carnaval," Schumann; nocturne, E major, op. 62, mazurka, B minor, sonata, B flat minor, Chopin; two etudes, "Waldesrauschen" and "La Campanella," Liszt.

* * *

TRAVELER
NOVEMBER 1,

SUNDAY CONCERT BY PHILHARMONIC

Famous New York Orchestra in Symphony Hall Tomorrow Afternoon.

The concert at Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon at 3:30 will be given by the Philharmonic Orchestra of New York, Josef Stransky, conductor. The concert gains special importance from the fact that Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist.

He will play Bruch's concerto in G minor No. 1. The orchestral numbers will be the "Rienzi" overture of Wagner, Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony.

Frieda Hempel Sings in Boston Nov. 9

The Sunday afternoon concert of Nov. 9 will be given by Frieda Hempel, coloratura soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company. She will be assisted by an orchestra of Symphony players under the direction of Otto Urack. The program as at present arranged calls for two arias, "Deh Vieni," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and "Ernani Involami," from "Ernani," and two groups of songs.

Symphony Starts On Southern Trip

The Symphony Orchestra leaves tomorrow night for its first southern trip and will give concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and New York. At the concerts in Philadelphia and Baltimore Miss Geraldine Farrar will be the soloist. Carnegie Hall has been sold out for the season for both series of concerts. In Brooklyn there is not a new subscriber on the list, the subscribers of last year with their renewals and additional seats having exhausted the seating capacity of the Academy of Music.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Dr. Muck has arranged a most attractive program for the Pension Fund concert to be given in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, Nov. 16, at 3:30. Bizet's charming first "L'Arlesienne" suite, Rimsky-Korsakoff's brilliant and effective Spanish Caprice and finally Liszt's Second Rhapsody will be the program. The sale opens at the box office Friday morning.

CONCERT NOTES

Franz Egenieff, the German baritone, gives a recital in Jordan Hall on Monday afternoon. His program will include songs by Hugo Wolf, Schumann, Hubert Pataky and Arthur Foote. Dr. Jeno Kerutler will be his accompanist.

Paderewski gives a recital in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon at 2:30, the Symphony Orchestra being away on its southern trip. His program will be Fantasia and fugue in G minor, Bach-Liszt; sonata in E major, opus 109, Beethoven; carnaval, Schumann; Nocturne, E major, Opus 62, Mazurka, B minor and Sonata, B-flat minor, Chopin, and Waldesrauschen and La Campanella, Liszt.

Miss Maggie Teyte, soprano, will give a recital of 18th century French songs at the Copley-Plaza Hotel Thursday afternoon, Nov. 20, at 3 o'clock. Miss Teyte will be dressed in costumes to suit the period. The Boston Quartet of Ancient Instruments and Charles Lurvey, pianist, will assist.

The annual series of concerts by the Longy Club opens Thursday evening, Nov. 27, in Jordan Hall. The program will be entirely of works by American composers, Messrs. Oldberg, Mason, Archer, Gibson and Brockway being represented.

Alwin Schroeder, former 'cellist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has organized the Schroeder trio.

TRANSCRIPT
NOVEMBER 1,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MISS FARRAR'S SINGING EXCELS THE REST

A Magnificent Air from Mozart Sung in the Old "Grand Style"—Another Sort of Beauty and Power in Three Songs from Wagner—Schillings's Empty and Turgid Fantasias — A Symphony by Mozart, Often with Its True and Lovely Voice, and a Resurrection from Weber

NOMINALLY Miss Farrar was the "assisting artist"—the first indeed of the new season—at the Symphony Concert, yesterday afternoon. Actually her singing of an air from Mozart's opera, "Cosi fan Tutte," and of three songs by Wagner were the outstanding incidents of it. For the purely orchestral pieces Dr. Muck began with Mozart's symphony in E-flat, long familiar but overlooked since one of Mr. Fiedler's middle years in the conductorship. By the present standards of the orchestra, it was excellently, but only here and there remarkably, played. Dr. Muck ended with Weber's "Jubilee Overture" long unheard at the Symphony or any other concerts in this town. The orchestra ran easily and eloquently through its sonorities and there is not much else of interest in it. Nowadays the Russians write that sort of ceremonial and occasional piece more pompously and showily though not with the play of sincere and outspoken mood with which, after almost a century, Weber seems still to be vitalizing his music. For "middle pieces" and novel pieces stood two symphonic fantasias of the sea written as long ago as 1896, when they passed for "ultra-modern" music, by Max Schillings, the thick-voiced German composer who walks with slow and halting feet. In no respect were they significant; in scarcely any were they interesting. Yet we must hear the empty Schillings, while Schönberg, Stravinsky and Scriabin with really novel and maybe pregnant matter in them stand mute and waiting at the door.

Thus Miss Farrar's "numbers" and her singing of them rose above all the rest of the concert and the austerely minded could dismiss for the time any distracting thought of her as an eminent singing-actress of the opera houses of three capitals and as a vivid "personality" about whom the curiosity of the audience was keen. On one score and only one she disappointed it, and that bore no relation to music or to song. She wore the simplest of frocks; she was hatless and gloveless in the good German fashion; as she has been of late with the waxing self-control of riper years and deeper ambitions, she was free from any hint of self-consciousness and altogether sincere. Even the sudden cold that seemed likely to cloud her tones and that did overshadow a single one of them, she burned away for the time by eagerness of spirit and force of will. Not for nothing has she absorbed Mme. Lehmann's gospel that a singer must overcome besetting circumstance, yielding not an inch to it—for her own good as well as for her audience's pleasure. These elder singers would have the younger like themselves.

One of the serious airs with which Mozart has sprinkled and diversified his gay comedy, "Cosi fan Tutte," was Miss Farrar's first piece. Fiordiligi sings it while she still believes sincerely that she is a lofty exemplar of constancy to an absent lover. It is a superb piece of music in the "grand style" of the eighteenth-century only a little tempered in the final measures by the sunny Mozartean brilliance and the light undertone of mockery that plays in and out of Mozartean comedy as though for the instant the composer were seeing and hearing his personages with insight and irony. Fiordiligi and Mozart, too, are wholly serious at the beginning. The music unfolds in magnificent recitative, outflung, yet sustained phrase the very voice of Fiordiligi's exaltation of spirit. Miss Farrar sang it as magnificently in long sweeps of unbroken and unwavering tone wherein each phrase seemed to take life and color from the emotion outpoured. Not a whit behind her was Dr. Muck in the sustaining and the phrasing of the orchestral part. There was no doubting, no mistaking, Miss Farrar had conquered the old "grand style" of such declamatory song and as it ever has been and as it always will be such singing was thrilling to hear.

Artfully, yet without audible contrivance, the singer passed into the air itself, more as by leading of the emotion and the music that was giving it speech than by arbitrary concession. Through a short, grave and eloquent andante, the air continues the mood of the recitative. Fiordiligi likens her constant heart to a firm rock shaken by tempests. In Miss Farrar's singing the "grand style" of declamation became now the "grand style" of sustained and flowing song, ample of line, broad of phrase, rich of color, deep of beauty. The music quickens, brightens, becomes, as we say, unmistakenly, more Mozartean. Fiordiligi's exaltation begins to be rhapsodic. To an allegro succeeds a piu allegro, and with both came Miss Farrar's opportunity for the exercise of another glory of this old "grand style" of eighteenth century and some nineteenth century song—the rounded, sustained, relatively slow, rhapsodic coloratura that clothes emotion with its complementary sensuous beauty and that thrills not as a feat of skill, but for itself and for what it imparts. In the twentieth century it lived again in Miss Farrar's tones. In lieu of the tricky modern trill stood the beautiful old Italian shake. And as rare in its kind was her conducting—and Dr. Muck's too—of the convoluting Mozartean melody with phrase curving out of phrase and arabesque flowing into arabesque. And in the coloring of the singer's tones came and went the little Mozartean note of mocking irony. ...

[47]

[illegible] would be and nothing more. One who did not know Mr. Kreisler's playing might have said that the Bruch was just the sort of thing he did best, but anyone who is familiar with him knows he does nearly everything else equally well. And it all comes without any exaggeration, without any glamorous "personality." Everything is accomplished by pure musical means. And with Mr. Kreisler one never feels that the interpreter is greater than the music. This is the final praise for a great interpretative artist, but to how many other violin virtuosi of today can it be applied?

H. K. M.

MONITOR,

NOVEMBER 1,

MUSIC OF SCHILLINGS PLAYED

Presenting for the first time in Boston two works of Max Schillings, the Boston Symphony orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor, rehearsed its fourth program in Symphony hall Friday afternoon. The house was filled with enthusiastic listeners, who applauded both the orchestra and the soloist, Miss Geraldine Farrar, who sang an air of Mozart and three songs of Wagner. The program was as follows: Mozart, symphony in E flat major; Mozart, air, "Come scoglio," from "Cosi fan tutte"; Max Schillings, "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen"; Wagner, three poems, "Im Treibhaus," "Schmerzen," "Traeume"; Weber, overture, "Jubilee."

The descriptive chapter has had its days of high vogue in novel writing, and so has the descriptive rhapsody in orchestral scoring. The literary description has exhausted the impressional qualities of the adjective, and the orchestral description has about used up the representative powers of instrumental color. Novelists have gathered together bits of landscape imagery and made them define the emotions of their chracters; composers have brought together certain emotional tone effects and made them reproduce natural scenery. Thus writer helps reader and music-maker helps listener to an interpretation of themselves as social beings, the means employed being some interesting holiday or work-a-day phenomena like forest, mountain, river, sea, roadside, harvest field or city street.

The difficulty with word painting is that it tends to become too thorough and geographic, with tone-painting that it likes to put on its themes every last harmonic and instrumental tint that tonal resource offers and to allow detail to overwhelm the picture. Not all novelistic scenery is of Meredith's sort, which always lies right along the line of the plot, not all symphonic scenery, like Debussy's, is within the bounds of well proportioned thematic structure. Read William Black to see how much description Meredith, as good an observer as he, left out of "The Egoist." Listen to the tone poets from whom come the compositions that make the bulk of the orchestral novelties of the day, and think how many a tempting chord, how many an attractive blend of wood, string and brass tone Debussy must have allowed to go unwritten, foregoing the use of the emotion contained in them because they had no place in his symphonic texture. You could not have your Porcelain Rogue the complete figure she is if so much as a single word descriptive of English landscape were used out of emotional key with her. You could not have the Faun in the perfect sunshine of his afternoon if so much as one combination of notes, theoretically full of light, but off the route of the musical development, were intruded into the finest of French tone poems.

Nothing can be more certain about the two sea pictures that were played Friday afternoon than that their composer wrote with an extraordinary command of orchestral color. Nothing, either, can be more certain than that he wrote about the joy of Xenophon and his home-returning Greeks on beholding from the mountains of Trebizond the waters of the Black sea with the ardor of a sincere classicist. But the picture would have been far more powerful if it had been painted with Athenian economy of material. There is probably a larger wealth of instrumental color lavished on either one of the two orchestral fantasies of Schillings than will be put into all the works which Sibelius, the composer of the great symphony of last week's program, will ever write. It is not possible for so many emotional effects as are found in the sea pieces to be employed on a single pictorial subject without loss of continuity. Both "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen" are overloaded with adjectives.

These are doubtless relevant to the general subject of the sea, which is as boundless, of course, as musical language. But our mood of delight on sighting the ocean when returning from a long journey inland requires less than a whole gallery of marine views for its state-

The Schillings works have the same qualities that music of Weingartner and Paderewski which has been played in recent years at Symphony concerts have disclosed. They indicate indisputable mastery of the instrumental forces and at the same time doubtful mastery of elemental expression. The appeal of sound is certain enough, and yet the appeal of idea is imperfect. Undeniably works like the sea pieces, the Weingartner symphonies and the vast "Polish" symphony of Paderewski have an influence on the art of composition, whether they ever get at the heart of the world of musical listeners or not. They have enriched the technique of the orchestra, though they have not added measurably to the sum of constructive musical thinking. The Schillings works have the merit of individuality. The "Morning" of the German composer is quite as vital in sentiment as the "Afternoon" of the Frenchman, which was composed about the same year. The sea pieces have kept their freshness a decade and a half in the repertory and should keep it much longer.

Dr. Muck interpreted the Schillings numbers with especial heed for their rich color qualities and for their larger rythmic values, calling for beauty of tone from his players and a broad style of phrasing. He had evidently put much care into the preparation of this part of his program and he entirely justified his choice of the pieces by his earnest reading of them. There was no other task of particular difficulty for him. He read the Mozart symphony in an easy manner, neither endeavoring to make a brililant number of it nor in any way slighting it.

He showed an interesting tendency to hold the quick movements down to a moderate speed and to give a fairly brisk beat to the slower portions. He thus avoided all appearance of being careless in the execution of the brighter passages and escaped the necessity of shading minutely the meditative passages. He was his best self as a Mozart conductor in the operatic selection in which Miss Farrar appeared as soloist. Excellent here for his sensitive support of the voice and his help in expounding the dramatic situation through the accompaniment, he was even better in the accompaniments of the Wagnerian songs. Here the orchestral tone which he brought out was a marvel of blend with the soprano voice.

The finale of the "Jubilee" overture, with its patriotic song that is appropriated by many nations, caused those of the house of recent school training to stand at the first notes. More arose as the second and third phrases of the melody sounded out in the trumpets and by the time the strain that carries "Land of the Pilgrims' pride" was reached the entire audience was up.

Miss Farrar found the Mozart aria a big exploit. Her voice had the dramatic quality the music required, but not at every turn of the angular melody all the flexibility that could be desired. Her singing of the Wagner songs was a marvel of vocal beauty and of balance of expression between the intellectual and the sentimental.

Beethoven's fifth symphony will be the principal number on the program of the pension-fund concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be given in Symphony hall, Sunday afternoon, Nov. 16. Dr. Muck announces for his other selections Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" suite, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice" and Liszt's second rhapsody. The orchestra goes on its first monthly tour next week, when there will be no concerts in Boston.

The program of the Symphony concerts of Nov. 14 and 15 consists of Schubert's symphony in B minor, Haydn's concerto for violoncello in D major and Beethoven's sixth symphony. The soloist will be Heinrich Warnke.

* * *

Josef Stransky comes to Boston with the New York Philharmonic society to interpret an orchestral program in Symphony hall Sunday afternoon. He brings Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, as his soloist. The program is as follows: Wagner, overture "Rienzi"; Bruch, violin concerto No. 1, in G minor; Richard Strauss, tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration"; Tschaikowsky, symphony No. 5, in E minor.

* * *

Franz Egenieff, baritone, gives a song recital in Jordan hall on the afternoon of Nov. 3, with Jeno Kerntler assisting at the piano. The program is as follows: Wolf, "Biterolf," "Verborgenheit," "Der Musikant," "Gesang Weyla's"; Loewe, "Der Noeck"; Schumann, "Belsazar," "Provenzalisches Lied"; Pataky, "The Lotus Flower," "On the River"; Hermann, "The Three Comrades"; Kerntler, "Farewell"; Foote, "On the Way to Kew," "Irish Folk Song"; Kaum, "My Native Land."

* * *

Miss Frieda Hempel, soprano, appears in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 9, assisted by an orchestra of Boston Symphony players, Otto Urack, conductor. The [illegible] follows:

[illegible] Strauss; Suite, "Peer Gynt," No. 1; aria from "Ernani," Verdi; songs with piano—"Ein Traum," Grieg; "Wiegenlied," Humperdinck; "Dressellied," D'Albert; "S'Gretel," Pfitzner. Overture, "Barber of Seville."

* * *

Ignace Paderewski, the pianist, appears in Symphony hall in recital on the afternoon of Nov. 7 at 2:30 o'clock. His program is as follows: Fantasia and fugue in G minor, Bach-Liszt; sonata in E major, op. 109, Beethoven; "Carnaval," Schumann; nocturne, E major, op. 62, mazurka, B minor, sonata, B flat minor, Chopin; two etudes, "Waldesrauschen" and "La Campanella," Liszt.

* * *

TRAVELER

NOVEMBER 1,

SUNDAY CONCERT BY PHILHARMONIC

Famous New York Orchestra in Symphony Hall Tomorrow Afternoon.

The concert at Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon at 3:30 will be given by the Philharmonic Orchestra of New York, Josef Stransky, conductor. The concert gains special importance from the fact that Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist.

He will play Bruch's concerto in G-minor No. 1. The orchestral numbers will be the "Rienzi" overture of Wagner, Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony.

Frieda Hempel Sings in Boston Nov. 9

The Sunday afternoon concert of Nov. 9 will be given by Frieda Hempel, coloratura soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company. She will be assisted by an orchestra of Symphony players under the direction of Otto Urack. The program as at present arranged calls for two arias, "Deh Vieni," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and "Ernani Involami," from "Ernani," and two groups of songs.

Symphony Starts On Southern Trip

The Symphony Orchestra leaves tomorrow night for its first southern trip and will give concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and New York. At the concerts in Philadelphia and Baltimore Miss Geraldine Farrar will be the soloist. Carnegie Hall has been sold out for the season for both series of concerts. In Brooklyn there is not a new subscriber on the list, the subscribers of last year with their renewals and additional seats having exhausted the seating capacity of the Academy of Music.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Dr. Muck has arranged a most attractive program for the Pension Fund concert to be given in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, Nov. 16, at 3:30. Bizet's charming first "L'Arlesienne" suite, Rimsky-Korsakoff's brilliant and effective Spanish Caprice and finally Liszt's Second Rhapsody will be the program. The sale opens at the box office Friday morning.

CONCERT NOTES

Franz Egenieff, the German baritone, gives a recital in Jordan Hall on Monday afternoon. His program will include songs by Hugo Wolf, Schumann, Hubert Pataky and Arthur Foote. Dr. Jeno Kerutler will be his accompanist.

Paderewski gives a recital in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon at 2:30, the Symphony Orchestra being away on its southern trip. His program will be Fantasia and fugue in G minor, Bach-Liszt; sonata in E major, opus 109, Beethoven; carnaval, Schumann; Nocturne, E major, Opus 62, Mazurka, B minor and Sonata, B-flat minor, Chopin, and Waldesrauschen and La Campanella, Liszt.

Miss Maggie Teyte, soprano, will give a recital of 18th century French songs at the Copley-Plaza Hotel Thursday afternoon, Nov. 20, at 3 o'clock. Miss Teyte will be dressed in costumes to suit the period. The Boston Quartet of Ancient Instruments and Charles Lurvey, pianist, will assist.

The annual series of concerts by the Longy Club opens Thursday evening, Nov. 27, in Jordan Hall. The program will be entirely of works by American composers, Messrs. Oldberg, Mason, Archer, Gibson and Brockway being represented.

Alwin Schroeder, former 'cellist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has organized the Schroeder trio.

TRANSCRIPT,

NOVEMBER 1,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MISS FARRAR'S SINGING EXCELS THE REST

A Magnificent Air from Mozart Sung in the Old "Grand Style"—Another Sort of Beauty and Power in Three Songs from Wagner—Schillings's Empty and Turgid Fantasias — A Symphony by Mozart, Often with Its True and Lovely Voice, and a Resurrection from Weber

NOMINALLY Miss Farrar was the "assisting artist"—the first indeed of the new season—at the Symphony Concert, yesterday afternoon. Actually her singing of an air from Mozart's opera, "Cosi fan Tutte," and of three songs by Wagner were the outstanding incidents of it. For the purely orchestral pieces Dr. Muck began with Mozart's symphony in E-flat, long familiar but overlooked since one of Mr. Fiedler's middle years in the conductorship. By the present standards of the orchestra, it was excellently, but only here and there remarkably, played. Dr. Muck ended with Weber's "Jubilee Overture" long unheard at the Symphony or any other concerts in this town. The orchestra ran easily and eloquently through its sonorities and there is not much else of interest in it. Nowadays the Russians write that sort of ceremonial and occasional piece more pompously and showily though not with the play of sincere and outspoken mood with which, after almost a century, Weber seems still to be vitalizing his music. For "middle pieces" and novel pieces stood two symphonic fantasias of the sea written as long ago as 1896, when they passed for "ultra-modern" music, by Max Schillings, the thick-voiced German composer who walks with slow and halting feet. In no respect were they significant; in scarcely any were they interesting. Yet we must hear the empty Schillings, while Schönberg, Stravinsky and Scriabin with really novel and maybe pregnant matter in them stand mute and waiting at the door.

Thus Miss Farrar's "numbers" and her singing of them rose above all the rest of the concert and the austerely minded could dismiss for the time any distracting thought of her as an eminent singing-actress of the opera houses of three capitals and as a vivid "personality" about whom the curiosity of the audience was keen. On one score and only one she disappointed it, and that bore no relation to music or to song. She wore the simplest of frocks; she was hatless and gloveless in the good German fashion; as she has been of late with the waxing self-control of riper years and deeper ambitions, she was free from any hint of self-consciousness and altogether sincere. Even the sudden cold that seemed likely to cloud her tones and that did overshadow a single one of them, she burned away for the time by eagerness of spirit and force of will. Not for nothing has she absorbed Mme. Lehmann's gospel that a singer must overcome besetting circumstance, yielding not an inch to it—for her own good as well as for her audience's pleasure. These elder singers would have the younger like themselves.

One of the serious airs with which Mozart has sprinkled and diversified his gay comedy, "Cosi fan Tutte," was Miss Farrar's first piece. Fiordiligi sings it while she still believes sincerely that she is a lofty exemplar of constancy to an absent lover. It is a superb piece of music in the "grand style" of the eighteenth-century only a little tempered in the final measures by the sunny Mozartean brilliance and the light undertone of mockery that plays in and out of Mozartean comedy as though for the instant the composer were seeing and hearing his personages with insight and irony. Fiordiligi and Mozart, too, are wholly serious at the beginning. The music unfolds in magnificent recitative, outflung, yet sustained phrase the very voice of Fiordiligi's exaltation of spirit. Miss Farrar sang it as magnificently in long sweeps of unbroken and unwavering tone wherein each phrase seemed to take life and color from the emotion outpoured. Not a whit behind her was Dr. Muck in the sustaining and the phrasing of the orchestral part. There was no doubting, no mistaking, Miss Farrar had conquered the old "grand style" of such declamatory song and as it ever has been and as it always will be such singing was thrilling to hear.

Artfully, yet without audible contrivance, the singer passed into the air itself, more as by leading of the emotion and the music that was giving it speech than by arbitrary concession. Through a short, grave and eloquent andante, the air continues the mood of the recitative. Fiordiligi likens her constant heart to a firm rock shaken by tempests. In Miss Farrar's singing the "grand style" of declamation became now the "grand style" of sustained and flowing song, ample of line, broad of phrase, rich of color, deep of beauty. The music quickens, brightens, becomes, as we say, half-mistakenly, more Mozartean. Fiordiligi's exaltation begins to be rhapsodic. To an allegro succeeds a piu allegro, and with both came Miss Farrar's opportunity for the exercise of another glory of this old "grand style" of eighteenth century and some nineteenth century song—the rounded, sustained, relatively slow, rhapsodic coloratura that clothes emotion with its complementary sensuous beauty and that thrills not as a feat of skill, but for itself and for what it imparts. In the twentieth century it lived again in Miss Farrar's tones. In lieu of the tricky modern trill stood the beautiful old Italian shake. And as rare in its kind was her conducting—and Dr. Muck's too—of the convoluting Mozartean melody with phrase curving out of phrase and arabesque flowing into arabesque. And in the coloring of the singer's tones came and went the little Mozartean note of mocking irony. Fiordiligi knew, and Miss Farrar and we that heard [illegible] she would yield to the first [illegible] over [illegible] had proved [illegible] this air out of Mozart played again through her singing of Wagner's three songs—of the hothouse, of sorrow and of dreams—guided in its new course by her intuitive and reasoned sense of style. They are orchestrated songs, imaginatively and beautifully orchestrated as out of themselves and of "Tristan" by Mottl. Yet they keep the intimacy of emotion and the fineness of expression of song at its purest. And they are songs of contemplative mood, germinating in meditation, unfolding, expanding in the beauty and the subdued power of tones, until the mood becomes ecstatic passion that speaks and yet seems still. Miss Farrar shed over them a soft and glowing beauty of melting tone; she wove the melodic line as though it were vision taking body, form and color; slowly, unbrokenly, inevitably in her designing the contemplation became subdued passion, the passion unfolding ectasy. The means to the utterance became the utterance itself, hushing all thought of the singer and her artistry. Being such, it was nearly the completeness of artistic accomplishment.

458 Harrison avenue, Boston, Mass.

Between whiles the rest of the concert came and went. Perhaps Dr. Muck, as in "The Daughters of Æolus" of a fortnight ago used too heavy a tone, especially in the strings, in the first allegro of Mozart's symphony, so that it sounded as though he were writing—but still in his own way—for full orchestra in the twentieth century instead of the eighteenth. Perhaps that little orchestra of Mozart's time was content to be limpid and plastic. The twentieth must add its emphasis, too, and so we hear, as we heard yesterday in the allegro a kind of multiplied Mozart. Not so, however, with all the rest of the symphony. There the conductor and the orchestra subdued their hands to what they worked in. The melodies returned in the slow movement with a beautiful suavity; the adorning tracery seemed the gossamer of tone. The fleeting phrases of the minuet passed in the wood wind like darts of soft light; and the accenting of the string was like soft winds blowing through it.

Perhaps the little stars—say of Isadora's children—might dance to the lightly whirling glints of the finale.

Then Mr. Schillings took his exercise in imitative Wagner according to the standard procedure. Almost every experienced ear could anticipate nearly always what was to happen in the music—the interplay of the motives, the harmonic and the instrumental color, the transitions, the contrasts, the climaxes, the general musical design of the two fantasias. But Wagner had the faculty of making his motives vivid and significant, the interweaving of them eloquent with emotion, picture or idea; out of themselves and out of the harmonic and the instrumental vesture they speak with beauty and with power. Mr. Schillings in the two fantasias lacks these essentials to the matter and the manner of the music he is undertaking. For eloquence, he substitutes thickness of insistent voice; for winged imagination heavy-footed effort. The sea and turgid verses about it serve him as well as anything else for text and suggestion. He would probably have written in the same fashion had he elected to hymn, say, the hills of his own inland Stuttgart. For ending, the sonorous platitudes of Weber's overture, yet still serve what too elate and sincere to be quite platitudes. The Weberian sense of the pomp and power of sound still glorifies them. And at the end for "Heil dir im Siegerkranz"—which is also "America" and "God Save the King"—the audience was on its feet. Never perhaps has a royal anniversary in the Saxon court, for which the overture was written, been so honored in an American concert-hall. No doubt this morning the Dresdener Anzeiger made a cabled note of it.

H. T. P.

GLOBE

NOVEMBER 1

GERALDINE FARRAR SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Sings Wagner Poems With Deep Conviction.

Max Schillings' New Sea Fantasies Without Originality.

At the fourth Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon two orchestral fantasies by Max Schillings, "Greeting to the Sea" and "Morning on the Sea," were played for the first time in Boston. Miss Geraldine Farrar, as soloist, sang the recitative "Temerari" and aria "Come scoglio" from Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte," and three poems by Wagner to accompaniment for orchestra by Felix Mottl—"Im Treibhaus," "Traume" and "Schmerzen." Mozart's symphony in E flat began the concert and Weber's "Jubel" overture ended it. Dr Muck conducted.

Max Schillings, now 45 and conductor at Stuttgart, begins his first fantasy in the approved formula of all good sonnets—"Oh Sea." The Greek greeting, "Thalatta," derived from Xenophon and his Ten Thousand is a sign of the composer's predilection for Hellenic themes. Signs of his admiration of Wagner also may be found.

Both fantasies begin with a suggestion of the classic manner. There is a profile, a certain strength of line in the opening bars of the "Greeting to the Sea" that promises well, but the promise not kept. The label "made in Germany" is written upon much that follows. As a rule the thematic ideas are not of distinction. Some have possibilities which a more fertile imagination would have caused to flower in development. [illegible] losing the identity [illegible] His repetitions of it are oft[illegible] with no new phase or guise [illegible] thought to engage or refresh the mind. In design it is respectable music, but without depth or marked originality. At moments there would be a hint at the capture of beauty, only to revert to the obvious and the commonplace.

The composer has rich resources in harmony and is a skilled contrapuntal workman. Both the scores are of substantial and durable weave. They should wear well. Sonority is one of the chief features, a sonority easily approaching turbulence. This was indeed a heavy sea and tempestuous its billows. It is a bold mariner who launches upon it a second time. Dr Muck apparently did all possible for the pieces, and they were warmly applauded.

Miss Farrar sang Wagner's inspired songs of life and love with an authority at which she but hinted at her recital on Tuesday, the "Im-Treibhaus" with a quiet and searching intensity of emotion that asked no consideration for youth or made promise for later years. It was in itself a fulfillment, and revealed the maturity of this young artist as nothing else she has done.

"The Traume," which was sung last was only less convincing in that the voice was a little less secure in the closing phrases. How beautifully the sentiment of the song unfolded, from the directness almost akin to challenge in the question of the opening line: "Sag', welch' wunderbare Traume" through the deepening seriousness of fancy until the concluding lines confess the tragic burden of their passion.

Miss Farrar stood and sang as one who herself was dreaming through these epochs of human understanding, one who at its close had learned of the mysteries of life and womanhood. The singer will not be forgotten for the sweet simplicity of her repose, nor for its majesty.

The voice yesterday was richer and more varied in color than on Tuesday. In the middle and lower registers there were tones of haunting beauty, not mere suaveness of sound, but tones that took on shades and tints of meaning. The excerpt from Mozart had those essential qualities—the purity of style, the patrician command in recitative, the plastic line and emotional sincerity in aria. When the head voice acquires more point and concentration, fluent passages such as these will go with greater ease and conviction. The Mozart music gave pleasure. That from Wagner, particularly the first and last songs as they were sung, caught the true accents of inspiration and rapture.

Dr Muck conducted the symphony of Mozart with all the love and tenderness that an artist would lavish upon each detail of a miniature in ivory. To hear a body of violinists execute gossamer passages with such plasticity in precision is unalloyed delight. The wood wind outdid themselves—Mr Longy with his usual art; Mr Maquarre and Mr Grisez almost defied the ear to tell their tone apart—in the fleeting phrases of the trio in the minuet. To praise such vertuosity and through it such clear and luminous exposition of beauty as Mozart revealed it, is but presumption. Weber's sturdy old overture was good to hear again. Part of the audience rose leisurely at the "God Save the Queen." Some observed it by putting on their hats.

There will be no symphony concerts next week. The next program will bring forward Mr Warnke as soloist in Haydn's D major concerto for cello, with Schubert's "Unfinished" and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphonies for the other numbers.

GLOBE

NOVEMBER

SUNDAY'S MUSIC.

Miss Hempel Distinguish Herself in Concert.

Mammoth Orchestra at Mechanic's Hall With Earl Cartwright.

Miss Frieda Hempel, previously known to this city through three appearances last season as a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and a highly accomplished singer of coloratura parts, made her first appearance in Boston yesterday afternoon as a singer in concert. Miss Hempel was assisted by an orchestra of Symphony players, with Otto Urack, the assistant conductor presiding both at the desk and as Miss Hempel's accompanist at the piano in a group of songs.

Commonly it has not been expected that the coloratura soprano should show particular intelligence or imagination in the interpretation of songs. To execute a trill or a roulade smoothly or with brilliance was to attain to a very high level indeed of vocal art. Nor is purity of vocalization to be held lightly in a day when most singers are innocent of it; but to be able to execute a florid phrase with true fluency—one might almost use that rare and exquisite word limpidity—and within the same hour deliver a group of songs of divergent and highly individual character, revealing their import with subtlety of understanding, imagination and spontaneity, as well as giving abundant evidence of having learned well how to sing, is to denote by so much more the artist.

A woman whose charm of presence springs perhaps less from her beauty than from the simplicity and graciousness of her manner, Miss Hempel gives to Schubert's "Hark, Hark the Lark" the exuberance and airy exultation of the spirit of Spring. Here as elsewhere, mobility of facial expression matched the skill in the coloring of the voice. The singing of the song deserved a better accompaniment.

The Strauss serenade rarely has been given with a more intimate or exquisite rapture. The full beauty of Miss Hempel's middle voice, which resembles that of a lyric, or even at times a dramatic soprano, makes her fortunate among her sisters whose tones within the staff are prone to be infantile or without character. Wolf's "Elfenlied" had true lightness of touch, fleeting moments of passing fancy in expressive eyes and voice. It was wholly of the fairy world. "Du bist die Ruh" had begun the group.

Miss Hempel's excerpts from opera were "The Pangs of Hell," from "The Magic Flute," in which she sang with authority in recitative, purity of tone and phrasing in sustained passages, and with an admirable and most uncommon flexibility, precision and brilliance in the rapid runs. It is a pleasure to hear a prima donna who is minded to sing with a regard for the rhythm and for the succession of notes as set down by a composer rather than [illegible]

From TIMES

[illegible] from "Lucia" sung legitimately [illegible] a privilege. Miss Hempel has not extreme brilliance of upper register, but she has a uniformly beautiful voice—a voice which gave true pleasure yesterday—and she has musicianship. The soprano was repeatedly recalled, and added to the program after Arditi's waltz song, "Paria," which she gave with brave abandon.

The flute obbligato in the "Lucia" was played by Mr Chevrot of the Symphony Orchestra, who here, as he already had done in the ballet music from "Orpheus" and the "Morning" from Greig's Peer Gynt suite, exhibited a tone of marked purity, facility of execution and a style that contained distinction.

Besides those mentioned, the orchestral numbers included the overture to "The Magic Flute," Schubert's overture "Alfonso and Estrella" and the Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda." After the latter the conductor was recalled by hearty applause. Mr Urack played accompaniments which were painstaking and had musical qualities, but often lacked character.

The next concert of this series will be given next Sunday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the pension fund.

BOSTON POST,

NOVEMBER 10.

HEMPEL IN SONGS OF 2 NATIONS

Noted German Artiste Gives Interesting Recital

BY OLIN DOWNES

Frieda Hempel of the Metropolitan Opera House and the Berlin Royal Opera yesterday afternoon appeared in Boston for the first time in concert in Symphony Hall. She was assisted by an orchestra of Boston Symphony players, led by Otto Urack. The programme was entertaining and it may here be said that an orchestra helps much to relieve a long succession of songs and arias.

A VARIED PROGRAMME

Mme. Hempel's programme was comparatively short and there was agreeable diversity. She sang the aria from the first act of Mozart's "Magic Flute"—not from the second act, as the programme stated; the Mad Scene from "Lucia di Lammermoor," in which she made important departures from tradition in her cadenza; four songs with piano accompaniment—Schubert's "Du Bist die Ruh" and "Hark, Hark, the Lark," Wolf's "Elfinlied," and Strauss' "Standcken," and for a final number Arditi's waltz song, "Parla," which she repeated.

The orchestra played the overture to "The Magic Flute," two pieces from the "Peer Gynt" music of Grieg, the brilliant ballet music from "La Gioconda" and Schubert's seldom-played overture, "Alfonso and Estrella." Mr. Urack accompanied Mme. Hempel when she sang the songs with piano.

Mme. Hempel has shown herself ere this an accomplished singer, and she has a reputation especially for her singing of florid music. She sang her roulades in the Mozart aria with exceptional sureness and virtuosity, and she did more than this: she interpreted the music in a manner that responded to

ADVERTISER.

NOVEMBER 10.

FRIEDA HEMPEL IN SYMPHONY HALL

BRILLIANT CONCERT FOR MUSIC LOVERS

Remarkable Voice and Excellent Method of Noted Singer Heard to Splendid Advantage.

By Louis C. Elson.

Again we have to thank Mr. Mudgett for a Sunday concert both pleasant and educational. Miss Frieda Hempel won her first real American success in Boston, for last season New York was disposed to be hypercritical about her operatic work, while Boston at once accepted her as a great coloratur artist. But in New York they have an unwritten law that no one shall sing Rosina or Lucia until she is declining down the vale of years. To have a young and charming coloratur singer in these roles puzzles them. For ourselves we found Miss Hempel's charming stage presence did not in any way detract from the beauty of her voice or the brilliancy of her execution.

She played her trump card first and sang that almost impossible aria of that very uncomfortable female, The Queen of the Night. We do not thrill very greatly over Mozart's vocal fireworks in "The Magic Flute," but the public are always whipped up into a fever of excitement by these laryngeal pyrotechnics, and if the voice of the people is the voice of God, then the voice of the coloratur soprano is [illegible] brilliant aria so well sung [illegible]. The old guard (Melba, Sembrich & Co.) used to do this sort of thing magnificently (that old guard which neither dies nor surrenders); but we doubt whether they would venture on this number today. It is a mountain peak of vocal difficulties. And these difficulties were royally overcome by Miss Hempel, who showed to splendid advantage in this scintillating vein. Just why the sable queen should express her anger and anguish in such roulades and "tours de force" remains a mystery, as does very much else in opera-land. But in the performance of it there was clear diction, pure intonation even in the highest passages, and clean execution even in the most rapid.

But Miss Hempel had other worlds to conquer, and after winning success in "Gli Angui" turned to the more musical and purer school of the German Lieder. No greater contrast could be imagined than that between the foregoing aria and Schubert's "Du Bist die Ruh," with its "Canto Spianato," its long sustained legato touches, its slow crescendo effects.

Although there was here a little of the squeezed quality which one sometimes expects with such a "voix blanche," there was sweetness and delicate shading, too. "Hark, Hark the Lark," in its three-verse German version, was brightly sung, although here the accompaniment might have been more elastic, but Wolf's "Elfenlied," and Strauss's 'Serenade" were excellent both in accompaniment and voice.

"Il dolce Suono" from "Lucia" was perfectly done, the voice balancing against the flute obbligato finely and every run and trill was as clear as a bell. The vocal waltz, "Parla" (which has no "parlato" in it), was a successful sop to the popular Cerberus and it displayed Miss Hempel's remarkable voice, high range and excellent method with great effect. Of course there were encores after some of the vocal numbers and recalls galore, and we are glad to record that Miss Hempel is not one of those flickering stars whose high notes, like Charity, cover a multitude of sins, but is one of the most promising coloratur artists in the world today.

The orchestra, under Mr. Urack, played some agreeable selections and Mr. Urack also accompanied the singer upon the piano in the Lieder. He was cordially applauded, and deserved it. Even Jupiter Pluvius was unable to cause a diminished audience, and the hall was filled—as it always is at these worthy Sunday afternoon concerts.

HERALD.

NOVEMBER 10.

MISS HEMPEL GIVES CONCERT

Assisted by Orchestra of Symphony Players at Fifth of Series.

PERFORMANCE IS SPLENDID

The Brilliant Singing of Chief Artist Stirs Great Enthusiasm.

By PHILIP HALE.

Miss Frieda Hempel of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, assisted by an orchestra of Boston Symphony players conducted by Otto Urack, gave the fifth of the Sunday afternoon concerts yesterday in Symphony Hall. The program announced these arias and songs:

Mozart, first aria of the "Queen of Night" in "The Magic Flute"; Donizetti, "Mad Scene" from "Lucia di Lammermoor"; Schubert, "Du bist die Ruh," "Hark, Hark the Lark"; Wolf, Elfenlied; Strauss, Strendchen; Arditi, waltz song, "Parla."

The orchestra played the overtures to "The Magic Flute" and "Alfonso and Estrella," ballet music from "Orpheus," two movements from Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite and the "Dance of the Hours" from "La Gioconda."

Miss Hempel, who appeared last season at the Boston Opera House as Rosina, Violetta and Olympia, sang here yesterday for the first time in concert. Her program as announced a fortnight ago included "Ernani, Fly with Me," which we would gladly hear if only to revive old memories and associations. There was a time when every self-respecting concert soprano brought with her this aria from 'Ernani," "Robert toi que j'aime" and Harrison Millard's "Waiting." Ah, these were good old days, when the assisting orchestra, if there was one, would have played the overture to "Zanetta" or "The Bronze Horse" or "Zampa" or "Masaniello," and probably two of them. And today an overture by Auber would be welcome at a Symphony concert.

Miss Hempel's original program also incuded Mozart's beautiful air, "Deh vieni non tardar," which we would rather have heard than the air of the mysterious Queen of Night. But let us be grateful. Miss Hempel might have sung Proch's Air and Variations.

An audience of good size was roused to enthusiasm; and with good reason. Miss Hempel's singing of florid passages and ornaments was brilliant. We have not heard such coloratura singing in Boston since Mme. Melba visited us when she was at the zenith of her fame. And Miss Hempel's singing of coloratura was not heartless; her bravura was not metallic and defiant. It was not only free, elastic, spontaneous; it was warm and significant. The voice itself is of [illegible]

SUN

[illegible] Hempel is something more than an accomplished virtuoso. She showed skill as an interpreter in the group of songs. Less successful, perhaps, in "Du bist die Ruh," than in the others, she nevertheless maintained a fine melodic line and caught the spirit of the poem. But her vocal performance and interpretation of the remaining songs was wholly admirable. Sentiment was not exaggerated; archness did not sink into aggressive coquetry. The song of Wolf was sung with delightful nuances of expression and the hackneyed serenade of Strauss assumed new beauty.

Miss Hempel was reported as saying when she recently landed in New York that she was indisposed the greater part of last season. Certainly, those who have heard her only at the Boston Opera House are not fully acquainted with her voice and her art. Yesterday she sang honestly and modestly without the airs and graces of the prima donna too expectant of applause.

Mr. Chevrot was warmly applauded not only for his part in the "Mad Scene," but for his expressive playing of the flute solo in Gluck's beautiful ballet music.

The orchestral pieces, especially the excerpts from "Peer Gynt," met with favor.

The concert next Sunday afternoon will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in aid of its pension fund. Dr. Muck will conduct. The program will include Beethoven's 5th Symphony, Bizet's "L'Arlesiene," Suite No. 1, Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish Airs and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2.

PADEREWSKI'S RECITAL

The program of Mr. Paderewski's recital in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 23, will be as follows: Paderewski, Variations and Fugue, op. 23; Beethoven, Sonata in D minor, op. 30; Schumann, Des Abends, Grillen, Warum, A[illegible]hwung; Schubert Liszt, Soiree de Vienne No. 6, Ere-King; Chopin, Ballade, op. 47, Nocture, op. 62; Polonaise, op. 53; Wagner-Liszt, Isolde's Liebestod; Rubinstein, Mazurka in D major.

SUNDAY POST

NOVEMBER 9

's Second Recit

is to give a second re

Symphony Hall, the date fo

Sunday afternoon, Nov. 2

This will be the first time th

pianist has ever given

Boston on a Sunday, and opportunity to many w unable to attend his afte recitals in the past on week d of seats will open at th

Symphony Hall, next

Nov. 14.

Mr. Paderewski has not setti on his programme, but it is certain that he will play a gr

Schumann pieces, in the which music he is as supr

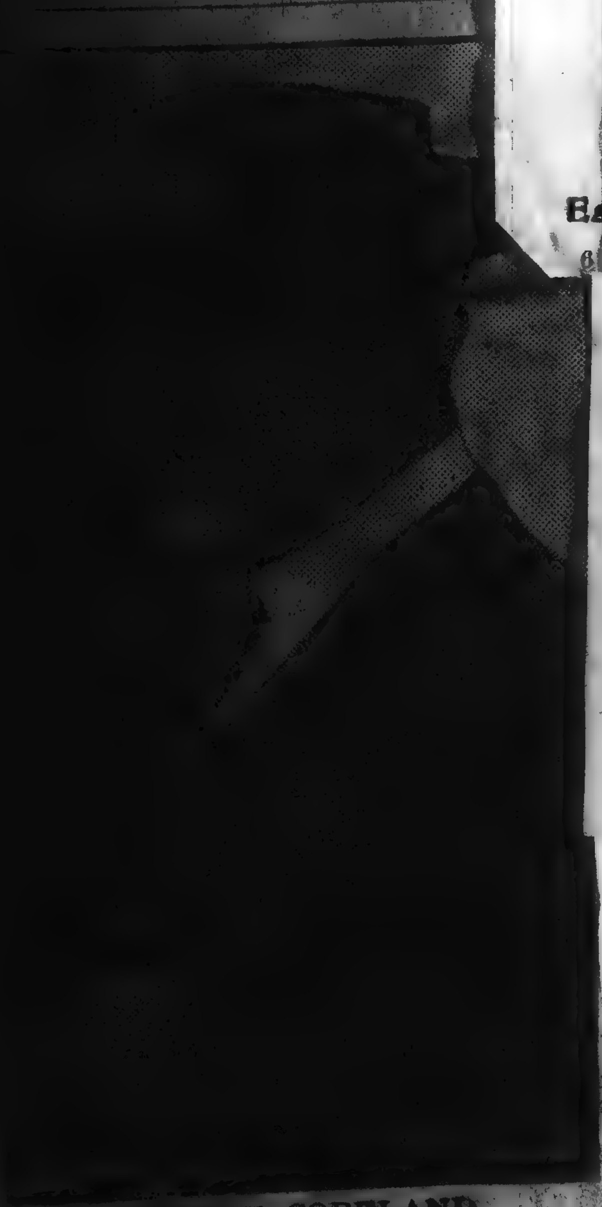
in the playing of Chopin

Arditi written originally for Adelina Patti. The programme is as follows:

Overture, "The Magic Flute" .... Mozart
Aria, "The Pangs of Hell," from "The Magic Flute" .... Mozart
Ballet music from "Orpheus" .... Gluck
Songs with piano:
"Du bist die Ruh'" .... Schubert
"Hark, Hark, the Lark" .... Schubert
"Elfenlied" .... Wolf
"Standchen" .... R. Strauss
Peer Gynt, Suite No. 1 .... Grieg
(a) Morning Mood. (b) Anitra's Dance.
Aria, "Il Dolce Suono," from "Lucia di Lammermoor" .... Donizetti
"Dance of the Hours," from "La Gioconda" .... Ponchielli
Waltz song, "Parla" .... Arditi
Overture, "Alfonso and Estrella" .... Schubert
Mr. Urack will accompany Miss Hempel in her songs with piano.



GEORGE COPELAND,
Pianist.

COPELAND RECITAL

Mr. George Copeland, the pianist of is city, who is justly admired for beauty and the individuality of playing, will give a recital next sday evening in Jordan Hall. will then play eight of Debussy's of preludes—there are 12 in the first time in Boston. The were published this year. The gramme in full will be as follows:

st movement, Sonata No. 2, op. 27 .... Beethoven
.... Chopin
lue .... Schumann de Symphoniques .... Debussy eres .... Debussy
.... Debussy
uillards terrasse des audience du clair de lune .... Debussy fées sont d'exquises danseuses" .... Debussy "—eccentric .... Debussy el vino (habanera) .... Debussy d'artifices .... Debussy

TEYTE

of the most unique and at the me time artistic recitals of the sean will be given by Miss Maggie Teyte the Copley-Plaza on the afternoon of Nov. 20, at 3 o'clock. Miss Teyte, whose voice and charming personality won her so many friends last season, will present in costumes of the period a programme of 18th century French songs. The old French songs which Miss Teyte will introduce on this occasion, will be published under the title of "Maggie Teyte's Repertoire" by G. Schirmer. The Boston Quartet of Ancient Instruments and Mr. Charles rvey, pianist, will add much to the tractiveness of the programme.

Wilhelm Bachaus, the pianist, will give a recital in Jordan Hall, on Thursday afternoon, Nov. 20, at 3 o'clock. The favorable impression created by this young artist two seasons ago is well remembered by those who heard.

FIFTH SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Dr. Muck has arranged a programme for the fifth Symphony concert which will bring delight to lovers of the classical in musical literature. Two symphonies will be played, Schubert's in B-minor, commonly known as the "Unfinished," and Beethoven's in F-major, No. 6, the "Pastorale". The soloist will be Mr. Heinrich Warnke, the admirable principal 'cellist of the orchestra. He will play Haydn's concerto in D-major. This has been played but twice at Symphony concerts in Boston. Anton played it in 1890 and Hugo the great German 'cellist, it in 1901. It is a work of char- beauty and at the same time great difficulty. The Schubert comes first on the pro- to be followed by the concerto, the intermission will be the Beethoven symphony.

FRIEDA HEMPEL AT SYMPHONY HALL

concert in Symphony Hall this noon will be by Frieda Hempel, distinguished coloratura singer of Metropolitan Opera House, New the Royal Opera, Berlin, as- by an orchestra of Symphony under Mr. Otto Urack, assist- conductor of the Boston Symphony Miss Hempel will sing three with the orchestra and one songs with piano. Her first extraordinary bravura for his sister- of an

---

From HERALD
Address: New York
Date OCT 26 1913

BROOKLYN

THE first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, November 7. The programme will be purely orchestral and classical and will comprise Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms' "Tragic Overture," Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

1884

From HERALD
Address: New York
Date NOV 9 - 1913

Humidity Fails to Mar Work of Boston Symphony

1884

Famous Orchestra Overcomes the Elements by Brilliant Playing at Carnegie Hall.

Old "General Humidity" was abroad yesterday afternoon and pervaded Carnegie Hall, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra was giving its first matinee of the season to a house completely sold out. It was the sort of a day dreaded by strings and wood winds of an orchestra, for while they try to play music the dampness plays havoc. So it took all the skill and virtuosity of this famous ensemble to overcome the elements, but these men did overcome and played as brilliant a concert as they have given here in years.

It was an unusual programme, Russia, Bohemia and Belgium being represented, and it began with Alexander Glazounoff's fifth symphony, a work much neglected here. It was decidedly well worth hearing, for it is interesting and effectively orchestrated. The orchestra distinguished itself by a brilliant performance, especially of the final movement, with its Russian ragtime rhythm and its whirling climax. Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, was recalled several times, and the orchestra arose to receive the applause of the huge audience.

Then came Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride," played at a breath taking speed, with amazing spirit, and the orchestra followed its conductor with absolute precision, a feat of virtuosity.

After this, by way of contrast, was heard the symphonic poem "Les Eolides," by that Belgian mystic, Cesar Franck, a beautiful composition, played with abundant sentiment and interpreted with a fine feeling for its beauties. The concert came to a close with Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska," stirringly played and bringing the concert to a brilliant close.

SYMPHONY MEMBERS PLAY MODERN MUSIC

Twenty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, united under the name of the Longy New York Modern Chamber Music Society, gave their first concert of a series of five at Aeolian Hall last night. The organization is headed by Mr. George Longy, first oboe player of the Boston Orchestra, and these concerts are given under the patronage of several well known persons, such as Mmes. Frederick Trever Hill, Samuel Untermyer, Charles Robinson Smith, J. F. D. Lanier, Clarence Beebe, Christian Brevoort Zabriskie, W. H. Beebe and Miss Mabel Choate.

Last night's audience was quite large and it appeared to revel in the modern offerings, which began with Mr. Paul Juon's octet for violin, viola, 'cello, oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon and piano. The piano part was played admirably by Miss Carolyn Beebe. It was an interesting composition, interestingly played. There were times when there was lack of balance in this ensemble, but this desirable quality doubtless will appear with continued playing. In the last movement of the work the shading of these artists was excellent.

Then followed a group of modern songs, sung by Mrs. Marie Sundelius, soprano, of Boston. She proved an intelligent singer and was applauded heartily for her interpretation of songs by Messrs. Debussy, Aubert and Wollett.

The final number was Maurice Ravel's introduction and allegro for harp solo with string quartet, flute and clarinet, Mr. A. Holy playing the harp.

All told, it was an evening of exotic music. Those who had heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the afternoon and this concert at night described the day as a Boston musical invasion.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City.
Date ~~NOV 9 1913~~

BOSTON SYMPHONY AND LONGY PLAYERS

1884

For its first matinee of the season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra not only presented a programme of great interest and variety, but even sent a completely satisfied audience home at the early hour of four o'clock.

Glazounoff the Russian led the programme with his Fifth Symphony, of which Dr. Muck gave a beautifully luminous reading. The first movement has some splendid moments, but drops into banality toward the close. It was the second movement, a Scherzo, which completely captivated the audience by its lightness and grace. Again the fourth and final movement impressed the listeners with superbly turbulent progress.

Smetana's overture to "The Battered Bride," a familiar number smoothly played, opened the second part of the programme, and another Bohemian, Dvorak, closed it with his overture which celebrates in stirring fashion, but somewhat lengthily, the wars of the followers of Huss.

Cesar Frank came between the two with a symphonic poem descriptive of "the floating breezes of the skies." It is in the modern manner, imbued with that detachment which characterizes this master. It does not show him at his best, although it has exquisite moments.

Modern French, truly idiomatic French chamber music from the pens of Juon, Debussy, Aubert, Woolett and Ravel puzzled and pleased a large audience Saturday evening in Aeolian Hall.

Mr. George Longy, the premier oboist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his chosen band of four strings, woodwind, harp, horn and piano, initiated New York into the dissonant joys and fleeting glimpes of etherial melody as fashioned by the moderns for so unique a combination of instruments.

All was not pure gold, but there sparkled many real gems of musical beauty and effectiveness in the at times dull setting. The Octet, op. 27, by Paul Juon, well nigh wearied one by its continued restatements of themes, in spite of the composer's noble effort to divide the honors between the players. Maurice Ravel's introduction and allegro for solo harp, with string quartet, flute and clarinet was on the whole more satisfactory. There were several novel effects for the harp which Mr. Alfred Haly, the soloist, accomplished with but a slight shortcoming, and the six voiced accompaniment abounded in color. Color, unfortunately, is the body and soul of this modern school.

Three songs, a Debussy ballade, an air from Aubert's "The Blue Forest" and "Des Harpes dans le Soir," by Woolett, won warm approval for Marie Sundelius, a soprano, whose fresh, clean voice and attractive stage presence were a genuine pleasure.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date NOV 2 - 1913

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first visit of the season to New York this week, giving a concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 6, at 8:15 and Saturday afternoon, November 8, at 2:30. The programme for Thursday night is as follows:

Symphony in A major, No. 7 .... Beethoven
"Tragic" Overture .... Brahms
Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes" .... Liszt
Overture, "The Flying Dutchman" .... Wagner

The programme for Saturday afternoon will be as follows:

Symphony in B flat major, No. 5 .... Glazounoff
Overture, "The Sold Bride" .... Smetana
Symphonic poem, "Les Eolides" .... Franck
Dramatic overture, "Husitska" .... Dvorak

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 27 1913

All of the seats in the new Academy of Music, including all of the boxes, have been sold out for the season of 1913-1914 for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A limited number of admission tickets will be sold for the main floor and the first balcony. The first concert will be given on Friday evening, November 7, at 8:15. The programme will be purely orchestral. It comprises Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms's "Tragic Overture," Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Wagner's Overture, "The Flying Dutchman."

[49]

TELEPHONE 929 CHELSEA
Intended for Boston Syn.

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.
106-110 Seventh Ave., N. Y. City
NEW YORK
CABLE ADDRESS:
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date NOV 7 1913

1884

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Ich habe ein ganz ſpezielles faible für Beethoven's ſiebente Symphonie, die glänzende, überwiegend heitere, dithyrambiſche. Vielleicht weil ſie das Leben, kurze Epiſoden ausgenommen, ſo ſchön bejaht, weil ſie ſich zu einem bacchantiſchen Jubel ſteigert, der direkt ein Vorgefühl der erhabenen Krone der „Neunten" iſt! Vielleicht, weil Wagner ſie die „Symphonie des Tanzes" genannt hat (er konnte damals noch nicht wiſſen, daß die Duncan das wörtlich nehmen und das Werk mit ihren Nacktbeinen illuſtriren werde).

Es war ein glücklicher Gedanke Dr. Muck's, uns ſein Orcheſter diesmal mit dieſem Glanze einzuführen, ein Gedanke, den ihm mit mir wohl das ganze große Publikum der geſtrigen Veranſtaltung in Carnegie Hall gedankt haben wird. Sein Programm brachte ferner noch Brahms' „Tragiſche Ouverture" und zum Schluß Wagner's „Holländer"-Ouverture, welcher Liszt's „Préludes" vorangegangen waren, durch welche Gabe der Werth des Programms an ſtiliſtiſcher Einheit erheblich verloren hat. Nicht, als ob ich dieſe populärſte aller Orcheſtergaben des Weimaraners nicht nach Gebühr ſchätzen könnte, ſondern weil ſie mir in ihrer Abgeſpieltheit und melodramatiſchen Poſe nur mehr in einem populären Programm am Platze erſcheint.

Dr. Muck iſt nicht eigentlich der Mann des himmelſtürmenden Dithyrambus, doch hat er mich geſtern auch in dieſer Anſicht faſt entwaffnet, denn er ſtreute ſeine diesbezüglichen Gaben gar reich und freigebig aus. Mag ſein, daß im erſten und letzten Satz manches allzu abgezirkelt und genau herauskam — dafür aber entſchädigte im erſten Satz die wirkſamſte daktyliſche Deklamation und im letzten ein Schwung und ein bacchantiſcher Taumel, der fortreißen mußte. Ganz einwandfrei, wirklich ein „Gebild aus Himmelshöhen" war ſein Allegretto, von ſchäumender Heiterkeit getragen erſchien der erſte Theil des Preſto, während das Trio durch volksthümliche Einfachheit wirkte und die Steigerung zur feierlichen Pracht trefflich gelang.

Brahms' „Tragiſche Ouverture" erklang wie aus einem Guß in ſein feſtgehaltenem dunkelgoldenem Kolorit, die „Préludes" brachten wundervolle Klangwirkungen und Steigerungen. Als die beſte Leiſtung möchte ich aber die „Holländer"-Ouverture bezeichnen, deren Gegenſätze bald ſchroff einander gegenübergeſtellt, bald innig verſchmolzen wurden, wobei die ausgleichenden Uebergänge von feinſter Hand getragen waren. Die erregten Naturſchilderungen, die troſtlos graue Stimmungsfarbe mit dem durchbrechenden Sonnenlicht, fanden in Muck den überzeugendſten Ausbeuter. Sein Orcheſter ſuchte geſtern wieder ſeinesgleichen an Glanz, Virtuoſität und Ausdauer. Bewunderungswürdig waren die Holzbläſer mit ihren präziſen Einſätzen in der Wagner'ſchen Ouverture. Daß bei dieſer Gruppe kleine Intonationsſchwankungen an ſo heiklen Stellen wie dem pianiſſimo-Einſatz der Heilverkündigung oft nicht zu vermeiden ſind, weiß man ja. Mit Recht durfte das Orcheſter den dem Führer gezollten begeiſterten Beifall mit ihm theilen.

H.

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City.
Date NOV 1 1913

Chamber Music Concert.

The Longy New York Modern Chamber Music Society will open a series of concerts at Aeolian Hall next Saturday night, when M. Longy, first oboe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will have a number of his associates in the orchestra as assistants. The assisting artists will be Carolyn Beebe, pianist; Marie Sundelius, soprano, and Alfred Holy, harpist. Under direction of M. Longy, who will play the oboe, the programme will include a Paul Juon octet for violin, viola, 'cello, oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon and piano; Maurice Ravel's introduction and allegro for harp solo with string quartet, flute and clarinet; Claude Debussy's ballade, Louis Aubert's "Reve du petit chaperon rouge," from "The Blue Forest," and Henry Wollett's "Des Harpes dans le soir," sung by Mrs. Sundelius, with A. de at the piano. This is the first programme of this nature is York audie

SUNDAY POST

NOVEMBER 9

Paderewski's Second Recital

Paderewski is to give a second re cital in Symphony Hall, the date fo this being Sunday afternoon, Nov. 2 at 3:30. This will be the first time tha this great pianist has ever given recital in Boston on a Sunday, and will give an opportunity to many w have been unable to attend his afte noon recitals in the past on week da
The sale of seats will open at th office, Symphony Hall, next F morning, Nov. 14.

Mr. Paderewski has not settle ally on his programme, but it is certain that he will play a gro short Schumann pieces, in the p of which music he is as supre he is in the playing of Chopin

GEORGE COPELAND,
Pianist.

COPELAND RECITAL

Mr. George Copeland, the pianist of this city, who is justly admired for the beauty and the individuality of his playing, will give a recital next Thursday evening in Jordan Hall.

He will then play eight of Debussy's second set of preludes—there are 12 in all—for the first time in Boston. The preludes were published this year. The programme in full will be as follows:

First movement, Sonata No. 2, op. 27.... Beethoven
.Chopin
Valse ....Schumann
Etude Symphoniques ....Debussy
Bruyères ....Debussy
Ondine ....Debussy
Brouillards ....
La terrasse des audience du clair de lune. Debussy
"Les fees sont d'exquises danseuses"..Debussy
"General Lavine"—eccentric ....Debussy
La Puerta del vino (habanera).......Debussy
Feux d'artifices..........................

MAGGIE TEYTE

One of the most unique and at the same time artistic recitals of the season will be given by Miss Maggie Teyte at the Copley-Plaza on the afternoon of Nov. 20, at 3 o'clock. Miss Teyte, whose voice and charming personality won her so many friends last season, will present in costumes of the period a programme of 18th century French songs. The old French songs which Miss Teyte will introduce on this occasion, will be published under the title of "Maggie Teyte's Repertoire" by G. L. Schirmer. The Boston Quartet of Ancient Instruments and Mr. Charles Lurvey, pianist, will add much to the attractiveness of the programme.

Wilhelm Bachaus, the pianist, will give a recital in Jordan Hall, on Thursday afternoon, Nov. 20, at 3 o'clock. The favorable impression created by this young artist two seasons ago is well remembered by those who heard.

FIFTH SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Dr. Muck has arranged a programme for the fifth Symphony concert which will bring delight to lovers of the classical in musical literature. Two symphonies will be played, Schubert's in B-minor, commonly known as the "Unfinished," and Beethoven's in F-major, No. 6, the "Pastorale". The soloist will be Mr. Heinrich Warnke, the admirable principal 'cellist of the orchestra. He will play Haydn's concerto in D-major. This has been played but twice at Symphony concerts in Boston. Anton Hekking played it in 1890 and Hugo Becker, the great German 'cellist, played it in 1901. It is a work of characteristic beauty and at the same time is of great difficulty. The Schubert symphony comes first on the programme, to be followed by the concerto, and after the intermission will be played the Beethoven symphony.

FRIEDA HEMPEL AT SYMPHONY HALL

The concert in Symphony Hall this afternoon will be by Frieda Hempel, the distinguished coloratura singer of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, and the Royal Opera, Berlin, assisted by an orchestra of Symphony players under Mr. Otto Urack, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Miss Hempel will sing three numbers with the orchestra and one group of songs with piano. Her first will be the extraordinary bravura written by Mozart for his sister- who was the possessor of an unusually high voice, "The Pangs of Hell" ... in the Luigi Arditi, written originally for Adelina Patti. The programme is as follows:

Overture, "The Magic Flute".........Mozart
Aria, "The Pangs of Hell," from "The Magic Flute" ....Mozart
Ballet music from "Orpheus"..........Gluck
Songs with piano:
"Du bist die Ruh'"..............Schubert
"Hark. Hark, the Lark"..........Schubert
"Elfenlied" ....Wolf
"Standchen" ....R. Strauss
Peer Gynt, Suite No. 1................Grieg
(a) Morning Mood. (b) Anitra's Dance.
Aria, "Il Dolce Suono," from "Lucia di Lammermoor" ....Donizetti
"Dance of the Hours," from "La Gioconda" ....Ponchielli
Waltz song, "Parla" ....Arditi
Overture, "Alfonso and Estrella"....Schubert
Mr. Urack will accompany Miss Hempel in her songs with piano.

From HERALD
Address: New York
Date

THE first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, November 7. The programme will be purely orchestral and classical and will comprise Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms' "Tragic Overture," Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

Es 1884

From HERALD
Address: New York
Date NOV 9 - 1913

Humidity Fails to Mar Work of Boston Symphony

E 1884

Famous Orchestra Overcomes the Elements by Brilliant Playing at Carnegie Hall.

Old "General Humidity" was abroad yesterday afternoon and pervaded Carnegie Hall, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra was giving its first matinee of the season to a house completely sold out. It was the sort of a day dreaded by strings and wood winds of an orchestra, for while they try to play music the dampness plays havoc. So it took all the skill and virtuosity of this famous ensemble to overcome the elements, but these men did overcome and played as brilliant a concert as they have given here in years.

It was an unusual programme, Russia, Bohemia and Belgium being represented, and it began with Alexander Glazounoff's fifth symphony, a work much neglected here. It was decidedly well worth hearing, for it is interesting and effectively orchestrated. The orchestra distinguished itself by a brilliant performance, especially of the final movement, with its Russian ragtime rhythm and its whirling climax. Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, was recalled several times, and the orchestra arose to receive the applause of the huge audience.

Then came Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride," played at a breath taking speed, with amazing spirit, and the orchestra followed its conductor with absolute precision, a feat of virtuosity.

After this, by way of contrast, was heard the symphonic poem "Les Eolides," by that Belgian mystic, Cesar Franck, a beautiful composition, played with abundant sentiment and interpreted with a fine feeling for its beauties. The concert came to a close with Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska," stirringly played and bringing the concert to a brilliant close.

SYMPHONY MEMBERS PLAY MODERN MUSIC

Twenty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, united under the name of the Longy New York Modern Chamber Music Society, gave their first concert of a series of five at Aeolian Hall last night. The organization is headed by Mr. George Longy, first oboe player of the Boston Orchestra, and these concerts are given under the patronage of several well known persons, such as Mmes. Frederick Trever Hill, Samuel Untermyer, Charles Robinson Smith, J. F. D. Lanier, Clarence Beebe, Christian Brevoort Zabriskie, W. H. Beebe and Miss Mabel Choate.

Last night's audience was quite large and it appeared to revel in the modern offerings, which began with Mr. Paul Juon's octet for violin, viola, 'cello, oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon and piano. The piano part was played admirably by Miss Carolyn Beebe. It was an interesting composition, interestingly played. There were times when there was lack of balance in this ensemble, but this desirable quality doubtless will appear with continued playing. In the last movement of the work the shading of these artists was excellent.

Then followed a group of modern songs, sung by Mrs. Marie Sundelius, soprano, of Boston. She proved an intelligent singer and was applauded heartily for her interpretation of songs by Messrs. Debussy, Aubert and Wollett.

The final number was Maurice Ravel's introduction and allegro for harp solo with string quartet, flute and clarinet, Mr. A. Holy playing the harp.

All told, it was an evening of exotic music. Those who had heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the afternoon and this concert at night described the day as a Boston musical invasion.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City.
Date NOV 9 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY AND LONGY PLAYERS

1884

For its first matinee of the season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra not only presented a programme of great interest and variety, but even sent a completely satisfied audience home at the early hour of four o'clock.

Glazounoff the Russian led the programme with his Fifth Symphony, of which Dr. Muck gave a beautifully luminous reading. The first movement has some splendid moments, but drops into banality toward the close. It was the second movement, a Scherzo, which completely captivated the audience by its lightness and grace. Again the fourth and final movement impressed the listeners with superbly turbulent progress.

Smetana's overture to "The Battered Bride," a familiar number smoothly played, opened the second part of the programme, and another Bohemian, Dvorak, closed it with his overture which celebrates in stirring fashion, but somewhat lengthily, the wars of the followers of Huss.

Cesar Frank came between the two with a symphonic poem descriptive of "the floating breezes of the skies." It is in the modern manner, imbued with that detachment which characterizes this master. It does not show him at his best, although it has exquisite moments.

Modern French, truly idiomatic French chamber music from the pens of Juon, Debussy, Aubert, Woolett and Ravel puzzled and pleased a large audience Saturday evening in Aeolian Hall.

Mr. George Longy, the premier oboist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his chosen band of four strings, woodwind, harp, horn and piano, initiated New York into the dissonant joys and fleeting glimpes of etherial melody as fashioned by the moderns for so unique a combination of instruments.

All was not pure gold, but there sparkled many real gems of musical beauty and effectiveness in the at times dull setting. The Octet, op. 27, by Paul Juon, well nigh wearied one by its continued restatements of themes, in spite of the composer's noble effort to divide the honors between the players. Maurice Ravel's introduction and allegro for solo harp, with string quartet, flute and clarinet was on the whole more satisfactory. There were several novel effects for the harp which Mr. Alfred Holy, the soloist, accomplished with but a slight shortcoming, and the six voiced accompaniment abounded in color. Color, unfortunately, is the body and soul of this modern school.

Three songs, a Debussy ballade, an air from Aubert's "The Blue Forest" and "Des Harpes dans le Soir," by Woolett, won warm approval for Marie Sundelius, a soprano, whose fresh, clear voice and attractive stage presence were a genuine pleasure.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date NOV 2 - 1913

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Estab

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first visit of the season to New York this week, giving a concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 6, at 8:15 and Saturday afternoon, November 8, at 2:30. The programme for Thursday night is as follows:

Symphony in A major, No. 7..........Beethoven
"Tragic" Overture ....Brahms
Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes"..........Liszt
Overture, "The Flying Dutchman".....Wagner

The programme for Saturday afternoon will be as follows:

Symphony in B flat major, No. 5.....Glazounoff
Overture, "The Sold Bride"............Smetana
Symphonic poem, "Les Eolides"..........Franck
Dramatic overture, "Husitska"..........Dvorak

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 13

Establ

All of the seats in the new Academy of Music, including all of the boxes, have been sold out for the season of 1913-1914 for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A limited number of admission tickets will be sold for the main floor and the first balcony. The first concert will be given on Friday evening, November 7, at 8:15. The programme will be purely orchestral. It comprises Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms's "Tragic Overture," Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Wagner's Overture, "The Flying Dutchman."

TELEPHONE 929 CHELSEA
Intended for Boston Sy.

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.
106-110 Seventh Ave., N. Y. City
NEW YORK
CABLE ADDRESS:
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date

Boſtoner Symphonie=Konzert.

1884

Ich habe ein ganz ſpezielles faible für Beethoven's ſiebente Symphonie, die glänzende, überwiegend heitere, dithyrambiſche. Vielleicht weil ſie das Leben, kurze Epiſoden ausgenommen, ſo ſchön bejaht, weil ſie ſich zu einem bacchantiſchen Jubel ſteigert, der direkt ein Vorgefühl der erhabenen Krone der „Neunten“ iſt! Vielleicht, weil Wagner ſie die „Symphonie des Tanzes“ genannt hat (er konnte damals noch nicht wiſſen, daß die Duncan das wörtlich nehmen und das Werk mit ihren Nacktbeinen illuſtriren werde).

Es war ein glücklicher Gedanke Dr. Muck's, uns ſein Orcheſter diesmal mit dieſem Glanze einzuführen, ein Gedanke, den ihm mit mir wohl das ganze große Publikum der geſtrigen Veranſtaltung in Carnegie Hall gedankt haben wird. Sein Programm brachte ferner noch Brahms' „Tragiſche Ouverture“ und zum Schluß Wagner's „Holländer“=Ouverture, welcher Liszt's „Prèludes“ voranaegangen waren, durch welche Gabe der Werth des Programms an ſtiliſtiſcher Einheit erheblich verloren hat. Nicht, als ob ich dieſe populärſte aller Orcheſtergaben des Weimaraners nicht nach Gebühr ſchätzen könnte, ſondern weil ſie mir in ihrer Abgeſpieltheit und melodramatiſchen Poſe nur mehr in einem populären Programm am Platze erſcheint.

Dr. Muck iſt nicht eigentlich der Mann des himmelſtürmenden Dithyrambus, doch hat er mich geſtern auch in dieſer Anſicht faſt entwaffnet, denn er ſtreute ſeine diesbezüglichen Gaben gar reich und freigebig aus. Mag ſein, daß im erſten und letzten Satz manches allzu abgezirkelt und genau herauskam — dafür aber entſchädigte im erſten Satz die wirkſamſte daktyliſche Deklamation und im letzten ein Schwung und ein bacchantiſcher Taumel, der fortreißen mußte. Ganz einwandfrei, wirklich ein „Gebild aus Himmelshöhen“ war ſein Allegretto, von ſchäumender Heiterkeit getragen erſchien der erſte Theil des Preſto, während das Trio durch volksthümliche Einfachheit wirkte und die Steigerung zur feierlichen Pracht trefflich gelang.

Brahms' „Tragiſche Ouverture“ erklang wie aus einem Guß in fein feſtgehaltenem dunkelgoldenem Kolorit, die „Prèludes“ brachten wundervolle Klangwirkungen und Steigerungen. Als die beſte Leiſtung möchte ich aber die „Holländer“=Ouverture bezeichnen, deren Gegenſätze bald ſchroff einander gegenübergeſtellt, bald innig verſchmolzen wurden, wobei die ausgleichenden Uebergänge von feinſter Hand getragen waren. Die erregten Naturſchilderungen, die troſtlos graue Stimmungsfarbe mit dem durchbrechenden Sonnenlicht, fanden in Muck den überzeugendſten Ausdeuter. Sein Orcheſter ſuchte geſtern wieder ſeinesgleichen an Glanz, Virtuoſität und Ausdauer. Bewunderungswürdig waren die Holzbläſer mit ihren präziſen Einſätzen in der Wagner'ſchen Ouverture. Daß bei dieſer Gruppe kleine Intonationsſchwankungen an ſo heiklen Stellen wie dem pianiſſimo=Einſatz der Heilverkündigung oft nicht zu vermeiden ſind, weiß man ja. Mit Recht durfte das Orcheſter den dem Führer gezollten begeiſterten Beifall mit ihm theilen.

H.

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City.
Date

Chamber Music Concert.

Estal 84

The Longy New York Modern Chamber Music Society will open a series of concerts at Aeolian Hall next Saturday night, when M. Longy, first oboe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will have a number of his associates in the orchestra as assistants. The assisting artists will be Carolyn Beebe, pianist; Marie Sundelius, soprano, and Alfred Holy, harpist. Under direction of M.

Longy, who will play the oboe, the programme will include a Paul Juon octet for violin, viola, 'cello, oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon and piano; Maurice Ravel's introduction and allegro for harp solo, with string quartet, flute and clarinet; Claude Debussy's ballade, Louis Aubert's "Reve du petit chaperon rouge," from "The Blue Forest," and Henry Wollett's "Des Harpes dans le soir," sung by Mrs. Sundelius, with A. de Voto at the piano. This is the first time a programme of this nature is offered before a New York audience.

directors of the Company and of an auditor or accountant that the sum total of net income

General Chairman of B & M Tele

SUNDAY POST

NOVEMBER 9,

Paderewski's Second Recital

Paderewski is to give a second recital in Symphony Hall, the date for this being Sunday afternoon, Nov. 2 at 3:30. This will be the first time this great pianist has ever given a recital in Boston on a Sunday, and will give an opportunity to many who have been unable to attend his afternoon recitals in the past on week days. The sale of seats will open at the box office, Symphony Hall, next Friday morning, Nov. 14.

Mr. Paderewski has not settled finally on his programme, but it is fairly certain that he will play a group of short Schumann pieces, in the playing of which music he is as supreme as he is in the playing of Chopin.

GEORGE COPELAND,
Pianist.

COPELAND RECITAL

Mr. George Copeland, the pianist of this city, who is justly admired for the beauty and the individuality of his playing, will give a recital next Thursday evening in Jordan Hall.

He will then play eight of Debussy's second set of preludes—there are 12 in all—for the first time in Boston. The preludes were published this year. The programme in full will be as follows:

First movement, Sonata No. 2, op. 27.... Beethoven
..Chopin
Valse ....Schumann
Etude Symphoniques ....Debussy
Bruyères ....Debussy
Ondine ....Debussy
Brouillards ....Debussy
La terrasse des audience du clair de lune. Debussy
"Les fees sont d'exquises danseuses"..Debussy
"General Lavine"—eccentric ....Debussy
La Puerta del vino (habanera)......Debussy
Feux d'artifices..........

MAGGIE TEYTE

One of the most unique and at the same time artistic recitals of the season will be given by Miss Maggie Teyte at the Copley-Plaza on the afternoon of Nov. 20, at 3 o'clock. Miss Teyte, whose voice and charming personality won her so many friends last season, will present in costumes of the period a programme of 18th century French songs. The old French songs which Miss Teyte will introduce on this occasion, will be published under the title of "Maggie Teyte's Repertoire" by G. L. Schirmer. The Boston Quartet of Ancient Instruments and Mr. Charles Lurvey, pianist, will add much to the attractiveness of the programme.

Wilhelm Bachaus, the pianist, will give a recital in Jordan Hall, on Thursday afternoon, Nov. 20, at 3 o'clock. The favorable impression created by this young artist two seasons ago is well remembered by those who heard.

FIFTH SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Dr. Muck has arranged a programme for the fifth Symphony concert which will bring delight to lovers of the classical in musical literature. Two symphonies will be played, Schubert's in B-minor, commonly known as the "Unfinished," and Beethoven's in F-major, No. 6, the "Pastorale". The soloist will be Mr. Heinrich Warnke, the admirable principal 'cellist of the orchestra. He will play Haydn's concerto in D-major. This has been played but twice at Symphony concerts in Boston. Anton Hekking played it in 1890 and Hugo Becker, the great German 'cellist, played it in 1902. It is a work of characteristic beauty and at the same time is of great difficulty. The Schubert symphony comes first on the programme, to be followed by the concerto, and after the intermission will be played the Beethoven symphony.

FRIEDA HEMPEL AT SYMPHONY HALL

The concert in Symphony Hall this afternoon will be by Frieda Hempel, the distinguished coloratura singer of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, and the Royal Opera, Berlin, assisted by an orchestra of Symphony players under Mr. Otto Urack, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Miss Hempel will sing three numbers with the orchestra and one group of songs with piano. Her first [illegible] will be the extraordinary bravura [illegible] written by Mozart for his sister-[illegible] who was the possessor of an [illegible] high voice, "The Pangs of [illegible] ments in the [illegible] Luigi Arditi, written originally for Adelina Patti. The programme is as follows:

Overture, "The Magic Flute"..........Mozart
Aria, "The Pangs of Hell," from "The Magic Flute" ....Mozart
Ballet music from "Orpheus"..........Gluck
Songs with piano:
"Du bist die Ruh'"..........Schubert
"Hark, Hark, the Lark"..........Schubert
"Elfenlied" ....Wolf
"Standchen" ....R. Strauss
Peer Gynt, Suite No. 1..........Grieg
(a) Morning Mood. (b) Anitra's Dance.
Aria, "Il Dolce Suono," from "Lucia di Lammermoor" ....Donizetti
"Dance of the Hours," from "La Gioconda" ....Ponchielli
Waltz song, "Parla" ....Arditi
[illegible], "Alfonso and Estrella"....Schubert
[illegible]ck will accompany Miss Hempel in her songs with piano.

From HERALD
Address: New York
Date

THE first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, November 7. The programme will be purely orchestral and classical and will comprise Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms' "Tragic Overture," Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutch-

1884

From HERALD
Address: New York
Date NOV 9 - 1913

Humidity Fails to Mar Work of Boston Symphony

1884

Famous Orchestra Overcomes the Elements by Brilliant Playing at Carnegie Hall.

Old "General Humidity" was abroad yesterday afternoon and pervaded Carnegie Hall, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra was giving its first matinee of the season to a house completely sold out. It was the sort of a day dreaded by strings and wood winds of an orchestra, for while they try to play music the dampness plays havoc. So it took all the skill and virtuosity of this famous ensemble to overcome the elements, but these men did overcome and played as brilliant a concert as they have given here in years.

It was an unusual programme, Russia, Bohemia and Belgium being represented, and it began with Alexander Glazounoff's fifth symphony, a work much neglected here. It was decidedly well worth hearing, for it is interesting and effectively orchestrated. The orchestra distinguished itself by a brilliant performance, especially of the final movement, with its Russian ragtime rhythm and its whirling climax. Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, was recalled several times, and the orchestra arose to receive the applause of the huge audience.

Then came Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride," played at a breath taking speed, with amazing spirit, and the orchestra followed its conductor with absolute precision, a feat of virtuosity.

After this, by way of contrast, was heard the symphonic poem "Les Eolides," by that Belgian mystic, Cesar Franck, a beautiful composition, played with abundant sentiment and interpreted with a fine feeling for its beauties. The concert came to a close with Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska," stirringly played and bringing the concert to a brilliant close.

SYMPHONY MEMBERS PLAY MODERN MUSIC

Twenty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, united under the name of the Longy New York Modern Chamber Music Society, gave their first concert of a series of five at Aeolian Hall last night. The organization is headed by Mr. George Longy, first oboe player of the Boston Orchestra, and these concerts are given under the patronage of several well known persons, such as Mmes. Frederick Trever Hill, Samuel Untermyer, Charles Robinson Smith, J. F. D. Lanier, Clarence Beebe, Christian Brevoort Zabriskie, W. H. Beebe and Miss Mabel Choate.

Last night's audience was quite large and it appeared to revel in the modern offerings, which began with Mr. Paul Juon's octet for violin, viola, 'cello, oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon and piano. The piano part was played admirably by Miss Carolyn Beebe. It was an interesting composition, interestingly played. There were times when there was lack of balance in this ensemble, but this desirable quality doubtless will appear with continued playing. In the last movement of the work the shading of these artists was excellent.

Then followed a group of modern songs, sung by Mrs. Marie Sundelius, soprano, of Boston. She proved an intelligent singer and was applauded heartily for her interpretation of songs by Messrs. Debussy, Aubert and Wollett.

The final number was Maurice Ravel's introduction and allegro for harp solo with string quartet, flute and clarinet, Mr. A. Holy playing the harp.

All told, it was an evening of exotic music. Those who had heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the afternoon and this concert at night described the day as a Boston musical invasion.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York City.
Date NOV 9 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY AND LONGY PLAYERS

1884

For its first matinee of the season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra not only presented a programme of great interest and variety, but even sent a completely satisfied audience home at the early hour of four o'clock.

Glazounoff the Russian led the programme with his Fifth Symphony, of which Dr. Muck gave a beautifully luminous reading. The first movement has some splendid moments, but drops into banality toward the close. It was the second movement, a Scherzo, which completely captivated the audience by its lightness and grace. Again the fourth and final movement impressed the listeners with superbly turbulent progress.

Smetana's overture to "The Battered Bride," a familiar number smoothly played, opened the second part of the programme, and another Bohemian, Dvorak, closed it with his overture which celebrates in stirring fashion, but somewhat lengthily, the wars of the followers of Huss.

Cesar Frank came between the two with a symphonic poem descriptive of "the floating breezes of the skies." It is in the modern manner, imbued with that detachment which characterizes this master. It does not show him at his best, although it has exquisite moments.

Modern French, truly idiomatic French chamber music from the pens of Juon, Debussy, Aubert, Woolett and Ravel puzzled and pleased a large audience Saturday evening in Aeolian Hall.

Mr. George Longy, the premier oboist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his chosen band of four strings, woodwind, harp, horn and piano, initiated New York into the dissonant joys and fleeting glimpes of etherial melody as fashioned by the moderns for so unique a combination of instruments.

All was not pure gold, but there sparkled many real gems of musical beauty and effectiveness in the at times dull setting. The Octet, op. 27, by Paul Juon, well nigh wearied one by its continued restatements of themes, in spite of the composer's noble effort to divide the honors between the players. Maurice Ravel's introduction and allegro for solo harp, with string quartet, flute and clarinet was on the whole more satisfactory. There were several novel effects for the harp which Mr. Alfred Haly, the soloist, accomplished with but a slight shortcoming, and the six voiced accompaniment abounded in color. Color, unfortunately, is the body and soul of this modern school.

Three songs, a Debussy ballade, an air from Aubert's "The Blue Forest" and "Des Harpes dans le Soir," by Woolett, won warm approval for Marie Sundelius, a soprano, whose fresh, clear voice and attractive stage presence were a genuine pleasure.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date NOV 2 - 1913

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first visit of the season to New York this week, giving a concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 6, at 8:15 and Saturday afternoon, November 8, at 2:30. The programme for Thursday night is as follows:

Symphony in A major, No. 7..........Beethoven
"Tragic" Overture ....Brahms
Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes"..........Liszt
Overture, "The Flying Dutchman".....Wagner

The programme for Saturday afternoon will be as follows:

Symphony in B flat major, No. 5.....Glazounoff
Overture, "The Sold Bride"..........Smetana
Symphonic poem, "Les Eolides"..........Franck
Dramatic overture, "Husitska"..........Dvorak

Estab

From TIMES
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 1913

All of the seats in the new Academy of Music, including all of the boxes, have been sold out for the season of 1913-1914 for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A limited number of admission tickets will be sold for the main floor and the first balcony. The first concert will be given on Friday evening, November 7, at 8:15. The programme will be purely orchestral. It comprises Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms's "Tragic Overture," Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Wagner's Overture, "The Flying Dutchman."

Establ

TELEPHONE 929 CHELSEA
Intended for Boston Sy.

"O wad some power the giftie gi'e us
To see oursel's as ithers see us."

HENRY ROMEIKE, Inc.
106-110 Seventh Ave., N. Y. City
NEW YORK
CABLE ADDRESS:
"ROMEIKE" NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date NOV 7 1913

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Ich habe ein ganz ſpezielles faible für Beethoven's ſiebente Symphonie, die glänzende, überwiegend heitere, dithyrambiſche. Vielleicht weil ſie das Leben, kurze Epiſoden ausgenommen, ſo ſchön bejaht, weil ſie ſich zu einem bacchantiſchen Jubel ſteigert, der direkt ein Vorgefühl der erhabenen Krone der „Neunten" iſt! Vielleicht, weil Wagner ſie die „Symphonie des Tanzes" genannt hat (er konnte damals noch nicht wiſſen, daß die Duncan das wörtlich nehmen und das Werk mit ihren Nacktbeinen illuſtriren werde).

1884

Es war ein glücklicher Gedanke Dr. Muck's, uns ſein Orcheſter diesmal mit dieſem Glanze einzuführen, ein Gedanke, den ihm mit mir wohl das ganze große Publikum der geſtrigen Veranſtaltung in Carnegie Hall gedankt haben wird. Sein Programm brachte ferner noch Brahms' „Tragiſche Ouverture" und zum Schluß Wagner's „Holländer"-Ouverture, welcher Liszt's „Prêludes" vorangegangen waren, durch welche Gabe der Werth des Programms an ſtiliſtiſcher Einheit erheblich verloren hat. Nicht, als ob ich dieſe populärſte aller Orcheſtergaben des Weimaraners nicht nach Gebühr ſchätzen könnte, ſondern weil ſie mir in ihrer Abgeſpieltheit und melodramatiſchen Poſe nur mehr in einem populären Programm am Platze erſcheint.

Dr. Muck iſt nicht eigentlich der Mann des himmelſtürmenden Dithyrambus, doch hat er mich geſtern auch in dieſer Anſicht faſt entwaffnet, denn er ſtreute ſeine diesbezüglichen Gaben gar reich und freigebig aus. Mag ſein, daß im erſten und letzten Satz manches allzu abgezirkelt und genau herauskam — dafür aber entſchädigte im erſten Satz die wirkſamſte daktyliſche Deklamation und im letzten ein Schwung und ein bacchantiſcher Taumel, der fortreißen mußte. Ganz einwandfrei, wirklich ein „Gebild aus Himmelshöhen" war ſein Allegretto, von ſchäumender Heiterkeit getragen erſchien der erſte Theil des Preſto, während das Trio durch volksthümliche Einfachheit wirkte und die Steigerung zur feierlichen Pracht trefflich gelang.

Brahms' „Tragiſche Ouverture" erklang wie aus einem Guß in fein feſtgehaltenem dunkelgoldenem Kolorit, die „Prêludes" brachten wundervolle Klangwirkungen und Steigerungen. Als die beſte Leiſtung möchte ich aber die „Holländer"-Ouverture bezeichnen, deren Gegenſätze bald ſchroff einander gegenübergeſtellt, bald innig verſchmolzen wurden, wobei die ausgleichenden Uebergänge von feinſter Hand getragen waren. Die erregten Naturſchilderungen, die troſtlos graue Stimmungsfarbe mit dem durchbrechenden Sonnenlicht, fanden in Muck den überzeugendſten Ausdeuter. Sein Orcheſter ſuchte geſtern wieder ſeinesgleichen an Glanz, Virtuoſität und Ausdauer. Bewunderungswürdig waren die Holzbläſer mit ihren präziſen Einſätzen in der Wagner'ſchen Ouverture. Daß bei dieſer Gruppe kleine Intonationsſchwankungen an ſo heiklen Stellen wie dem pianiſſimo-Einſatz der Heilverkündigung oft nicht zu vermeiden ſind, weiß man ja. Mit Recht durfte das Orcheſter den dem Führer gezollten begeiſterten Beifall mit ihm theilen.

H.

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City.
Date

Chamber Music Concert.

The Longy New York Modern Chamber Music Society will open a series of concerts at Aeolian Hall next Saturday night, when M. Longy, first oboe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will have a number of his associates in the orchestra as assistants. The assisting artists will be Carolyn Beebe, pianist; Marie Sundelius, soprano, and Alfred Holy, harpist. Under direction of M. [illegible]gy, who will play the oboe, the programme will include a Paul Juon octet for violin, viola, 'cello, oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon and piano; Maurice Ravel's introduction and allegro for harp solo, with string quartet, flute and clarinet; Claude Debussy's ballade, Louis Aubert's "Reve du petit chaperon rouge," from "The Blue Forest," and Henry Wollett's "Des Harpes dans le soir," sung by Mrs. Sundelius, with A. de Voto at the piano. This is the first time a programme of this nature is offered before a [illegible] York audience.

Estal 84

[49]

directors of the accountant that the sum total of net income Company and of an auditor or
General Chairman of B & M Tele

From POST NOV 1 1913
Address: New York
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first visit of the season to New York the coming week, giving a concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 6, at 8:15, and Saturday afternoon, November 8, at 2:30. The programme for Thursday night is as follows: Beethoven, Symphony in A major, No. 7; Brahms, "Tragic" Overture; Liszt, Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes"; Wagner, Overture to "The Flying Dutchman." The programme for Saturday afternoon will be as follows: Glazounoff, Symphony No. 5; Smetana, Overture, "The Sold Bride"; Franck, Symphonic Poem, "Les Eolides"; Dvorák, Dramatic Overture, "Husitska." At the December concerts the soloist will be, on both occa- [illegible] violinist, Fritz Kreisler.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date NOV 2 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENING.

The first pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 6, and Saturday afternoon, November 8. The programme for the evening concert will consist of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms's "Tragic" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture. For Saturday Dr. Muck will present Glazounoff's Fifth Symphony, Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture, Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," and Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska." At the next pair of concerts December 4 and 6, Kreisler will be the soloist.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. NOV 6 1913
Date

MISS FARRAR ILL.

Indisposition Keeps Singer from Going to Baltimore.

A slight indisposition and fear of a cold kept Miss Geraldine Farrar, soprano, from traveling to Baltimore, Md., and singing there last night as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Yesterday morning she was suffering from a slight hoarseness and consulted Dr. H. Holbrook Curtis. He advised her not to go to Baltimore, saying that if the hoarseness increased it would be a serious matter, as she is to sing in the opening performance of "Manon" in the Metropolitan Opera House a week from Monday.

Miss Farrar sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia on Monday, after which she returned to her home. Last night's concert was to have been the last of her long series.

NIGHT CLASSES FILLED

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date NOV 2 1913

CONCERT SEASON STRIKES ITS PA

IT can fairly be said that the m season has struck its pace. Last w was a fair example of what music votees may expect each week from present time until the late spring. the present week also is charged w musical offerings numerous and import enough to please the multitude that re in the classics and spurn popular mu

Notable among the week's musical events will be the first appearance here this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Karl Muck again is its leader, and will prove his prowess at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday matinee. There will be neither novelties nor soloists for these two affairs, but it will be sheerly the Boston Orchestra which will prove the lodestone.

Thursday night's programme contains Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms' "Tragic" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes" and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture.

For the Saturday matinée the following will be played:—Glazounoff Symphony No. 5, Cesar Franck's symphonic poem "Les Eolides" and two overtures, Smetana's "Bartered Bride" and Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska."

• • •

BUT this will not be all of the week's orchestral concerts. T [illegible] Symphony Society, [illegible]

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York
Date NOV 7 1

Boston Symphon Orchestra Hea

By Sylvester Rawling.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall last night, gave the first concert of its twenty-eighth season in New York. There was a warm welcome for Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, when he first appeared before the crowded audience, which held the elect of New York music lovers, besides a fine array of people of fashion. It was not ever thus. Time was—not so long ago—when the Boston men played to sparsely filled houses; but the superlative qualities of the band gained for it new adherents every year until now the subscription is full, with a waiting list.

Dr. Muck's programme was not severe. It might be called popular even. It consisted of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms's "Tragic" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Preludes," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman. Each was played with amazing virtuosity. Indeed, when it was all over one was left to wonder whether something of appeal to sentiment had not been sacrificed in the achievement of such marvellous precision, and—if one may say it—of such mechanical perfection. At any rate, the audience was aroused to show marked demonstrations of approval. Dr. Muck was recalled many times and twice the entire orchestra was made to rise in acknowledgment of the plaudits.

From WORLD
Address: New York City.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY WINS APPLAUSE ONCE MORE.

Opening of Twenty-eighth Season Here Is Enthusiastically Welcomed by Audience.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, an old musical friend, always welcome, beginning its twenty-eighth New York season in Carnegie Hall last evening, demonstrated, as it so often has in the past, what a highly efficient, thoroughly trained orchestra can do under the guidance of a genuine conductor. There is always apparent in the work of this orchestra a personal effort of every member to achieve the best possible.

Last night the distinguished organization was in excellent condition, but oddly enough, scarcely up to the technical and artistic accomplishments shown at other times. In spite of the superior performance given, there were moments when the tendency to momentary raggedness was apparent, while the customary warmth of tone seemed missing.

Nevertheless, there was adequate compensation in the generally smooth interpretation of Beethoven's seventh symphony and the vitality imparted to Brahm's "Tragic" overture and the color revealed in the "Flying Dutchman" overture. The Liszt symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," seemed to carry the least artistic value.

From the standpoint of the audience, everything was perfection, and the applause after the symphony compelled Conductor Karl Muck to cause his musicians to rise in acknowledgment. This fine director led with his customary authority and incisiveness.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York
Date NOV 7 1913

The Boston Symphony Orchestra brilliantly opened its twenty-eighth New York season last night before a splendidly appreciative audience which filled Carnegie Hall to overflowing. Few changes were to be observed in the orchestra's make-up. Gustav Strube has severed his long connection with the organization to become professor at the Peabody Conservatory of Music, in Baltimore, and there are one or two new faces in the wind section, otherwise the band's personnel is the same. There is the same finely finished execution, the same sure, smooth ensemble and perfect balance which have long characterized this orchestra.

This is Dr. Karl Muck's second consecutive year as conductor, and the full and intimate understanding between the musicians and their leader is at all times evident.

Last night's concert was without an assisting solo artist and offered nothing in the way of novelty; in fact, comprised none but familiar numbers in the symphonic repertoire, all of which have been heard here many times. Dr. Muck's rendering of the "Tragic" overture of Brahms was fraught with portentous fire and gloom, befitting the composer's own conception, and made a profound impression.

In Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, which came first on the programme, the allegretto has rarely been so nobly and justly played, with such fine fidelity to the inner meaning of the music; nor did the conductor fear to let loose the bacchantic finale with all the furious rythmic energy [illegible] the close Dr. Muck was enthusiastically recalled and made his men rise to share in the applause.

The orchestra fairly "ate up" Liszt's timeworn symphonic poem "Les Preludes." Wagner's "Flying [illegible]

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date NOV 7 1913

BOSTON ORCHESTRA OPENS SEASON HERE

Great Crowd at Carnegie Hall at Its First Series of the Winter.

NO SOLO ON PROGRAMME

Dr. Karl Muck Remains Conductor, but Many New Faces Among the Players.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first visit to New York yesterday, beginning its twenty-eighth season here with a concert in Carnegie Hall. It comes more firmly intrenched than ever in the admiration of New York music-lovers. The hall was completely filled last evening, and there is said to be not a single seat to be had for any of the nine concerts that are to follow during the season. Nor has the orchestra ever more fully deserved this admiration and esteem, for it has never played more superbly than it did at this concert or more deeply absorbed the attention and roused the delight of its listeners. Dr. Karl Muck returns as its conductor, and there are a number of new faces to be seen among the players. But the quality of its performance has not changed; it is a quality of perfection in tone, in balance, in pliability and flexibility under the conductor's hands, in sheer beauty in every particular.

There was no solo performer at this concert. The programme began with Beethoven's seventh symphony, of which there was no new revelation and no new "reading." It was Beethoven's music as understood by the highest intelligence, sympathy, and devotion, played as Beethoven conceived it, with consummate skill and an entire command of all his requirements; and this is even better than a "reading." It was followed by Brahms's "Tragic Overture," a piece that rarely appears upon orchestra programmes. It is music of a certain outward austerity; profound in feeling, and mirroring, as one of its critics has said, the grandeur, the loftiness, the deep earnestness, of tragic character. It is not necessary to connect it with any particular drama, as some have insisted upon doing; for the music stands for itself and is complete by itself, and speaks with an eloquence that Brahms has not often surpassed. The performance gave the fullest utterance to all its eloquence, in its rich and dark orchestral color, an example of how justly and completely Brahms's orchestration interprets the essential quality of his musical inspiration, how perfectly fitted it is to such an interpretation. The playing by the orchestra penetrated to the very essence of the work.

There was a more popular kind of brilliancy in Liszt's sonorous and melodious symphonic poem "Les Préludes," the only really familiar one among his compositions in this form; and the programme was ended with Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman." The audience was stirred to great enthusiasm all through the concert. After the symphony Dr. Muck made his men rise to share the applause.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date NOV

MUCK SYMPHONY MUSICIANS GIVE INITIAL CONCERT

Boston Orchestra Performs Four Great Masterpieces Before Big Audience in Carnegie Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, gave its first concert for the season at Carnegie Hall last evening. The visitors attracted the customary large and fashionable audience, with the usual complement of standees.

The programme contained but four numbers, but these were very giants of composition. The opening number was Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, a work which has been pronounced by several authorities to be "the essence and spirit of the dance." A more sympathetic or convincing interpretation than the one given last evening would be inconceivable. From the beginning Dr Muck kept his men absolutely under control. Every beat of his baton was lucid to the audience and obeyed by the musicians. The melodious and delicate texture of the first movement; the profound and rhythmic second; the brilliant and scintillating third, and the joyous, vivacious last, were all presented with proper Beethovian appreciation and understanding.

Brahms' "Tragic" overture was the second offering. The work teems with expressive motifs, and, according to the programme notes, is supposed [illegible]

SUN

[illegible] great, heartbreaking "song" of the strings in unison, supported by a background of large brasses intoning descending scales, was a superb portion of the work and gloriously played by the musicians.

The various contrasts of tender fantasy and affecting pathos marked the overture throughout, and these were artistically and understandingly portrayed.

Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes," and the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," earned and received the enthusiasm of the audience. At to-morrow afternoon's concert works by Glazounoff, Smetana, Franck and Dvorak will be given.

From SUN
Address: New York City.
Date NOV 7 191

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLEASE

Exceptionally Fine Rendering of Beethoven's Music.

DR. MUCK'S WARM WELCOME

Brahms, Liszt and Wagner Contribute to Complete Rich Programme.

The first visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a musical season might properly be accorded the rank of an event. It is certain that in the estimation of this public it stands second to nothing, except of course the first night of the opera, which, however, presents a distinctly marked difference. The concerts of the Bostonian performers do not stir the depths of society. While they are not ignored by those society people who are fervent lovers of good music in all its manifestations, they appeal rather to that body of serious devotees of the tonal art which concerns itself more with analysis and reflection than with other joys of living.

The audience which assembled last evening in Carnegie Hall at the first concert of the current season was large and numbered many who are well known in the activities of the town. The reception bestowed upon Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, when he walked upon the stage was long and hearty, but the applause which followed some of the music betokened feelings which not even the reappearance of a favorite director could arouse.

Programme Rich in Opportunities.

The programme consisted of Beethoven's seventh symphony, the "Tragic" overture of Brahms, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes" and the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman." It was not a perfectly symmetrical arrangement, but it served its purpose in furnishing opportunities for the display of the finest qualities of the admired orchestra.

The symphony in A is a delightful number with which to begin a season's offerings. Familiar as it is to all music lovers it can never be wearisome, even when played but indifferently. When given as it was last night it satisfies every artistic demand, filling the ear with loveliest melody, with captivating rhythms, with fastidiously colored instrumentation and the spirit with poetic imagery.

Dr. Muck elected to make haste slowly in most of his tempi, but he kept in mind the guiding theme, "Without haste, without rest." There was no labored effort to set forth a new reading, no search after hitherto hidden messages in the middle voices of the harmony, no emphatic treatment of dynamic nuances or time modifications. Yet from beginning to end all the voices of the great orchestra sang eloquently, with unsurpassable beauty of tone, with exquisite balance, with delicately finished phrasing, with a marvellous range of sound, rising from the whisper of a perfect pianissimo to the full throated proclamation of fortissimo which had power without violence.

Elegantly Polished Delivery.

A more elegantly polished delivery of the music it would be difficult to conceive; yet there was never wanting the note of Beethoven's virility. The highest achievements in this lovely performance were found in the second and third movements. Especially in the trio of the scherzo the superbly executed vocal effects of a messa di voce by the wind instruments, coupled as it was with a crystalline clarity of balance, left the ear ravished with pure beauty.

But nothing can be gained by extending the description of this concert. We shall hear an overwhelming quantity of music in the course of the season, but it seems unlikely that anything can obliterate the memory of last evening's delivery of Beethoven's seventh symphony. The first matinee of the orchestra will take place to-morrow, when Glazounov's fifth symphony, Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture, Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides" and Dvorak's "Husitska" overture will be played. As at last evening's entertainment, there will be no soloist.

From POST NOV 1 1913
Address: New York
Date ....

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first visit of the season to New York the coming week, giving a concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 6, at 8:15, and Saturday afternoon, November 8, at 2:30. The programme for Thursday night is as follows: Beethoven, Symphony in A major, No. 7; Brahms, "Tragic" Overture; Liszt, Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes"; Wagner, Overture to "The Flying Dutchman." The programme for Saturday afternoon will be as follows: Glazounoff, Symphony No. 5; Smetana, Overture, "The Sold Bride"; Franck, Symphonic Poem, "Les Eolides"; Dvořák, Dramatic Overture, "Husitska." At the December concerts the soloist will be, on both occa- ...inent violinist, Fritz Kreisler.

rk, 1884

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date NOV 2 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENING.

The first pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 6, and Saturday afternoon, November 8. The programme for the evening concert will consist of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms's "Tragic" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture. For Saturday Dr. Muck will present Glazounoff's Fifth Symphony, Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture, Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," and Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska." At the next pair of concerts December 4 and 6, Kreisler will be the soloist.

Est , 1884

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. 13
Date ______

MISS FARRAR ILL.

Indisposition Keeps Singer from Going to Baltimore.

A slight indisposition and fear of a cold kept Miss Geraldine Farrar, soprano, from traveling to Baltimore, Md., and singing there last night as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Yesterday morning she was suffering from a slight hoarseness and consulted Dr. H. Holbrook Curtis. He advised her not to go to Baltimore, saying that if the hoarseness increased it would be a serious matter, as she is to sing in the opening performance of "Manon" in the Metropolitan Opera House a week from Monday.

Miss Farrar sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia on Monday, after which she returned to her home. Last night's concert was to have been the last of her long series.

NIGHT CLASSES FILLED

rk, 1884

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date NOV 2 1913

CONCERT SEASON STRIKES ITS PA

E

IT can fairly be said that the m season has struck its pace. Last w was a fair example of what music votees may expect each week from present time until the late spring. the present week also is charged w musical offerings numerous and import enough to please the multitude that re in the classics and spurn popular mu

Notable among the week's musical events will be the first appearance here this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Karl Muck again is its leader, and will prove his prowess at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday matinee. There will be neither novelties nor soloists for these two affairs, but it will be sheerly the Boston Orchestra which will prove the lodestone.

Thursday night's programme contains Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms' "Tragic" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes" and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture.

For the Saturday matinée the following will be played:—Glazounoff Symphony No. 5, Cesar Franck's symphonic poem "Les Eolides" and two overtures, Smetana's "Bartered Bride" and Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska."

• • •

BUT this will not be all of the week's orchestral concerts. T ...phony Society,

---

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York
Date NOV 7 1

Boston Symphoi Orchestra Hea

Estabi

By Sylvester Rawling.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall last night, gave the first concert of its twenty-eighth season in New York. There was a warm welcome for Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, when he first appeared before the crowded audience, which held the elect of New York music lovers, besides a fine array of people of fashion. It was not ever thus. Time was—not so long ago—when the Boston men played to sparsely filled houses; but the superlative qualities of the band gained for it new adherents every year until now the subscription is full, with a waiting list.

Dr. Muck's programme was not severe. It might be called popular even. It consisted of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms's "Tragic" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Preludes," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman. Each was played with amazing virtuosity. Indeed, when it was all over one was left to wonder whether something of appeal to sentiment had not been sacrificed in the achievement of such marvellous precision, and—if one may say it—of such mechanical perfection. At any rate, the audience was aroused to show marked demonstrations of approval. Dr. Muck was recalled many times and twice the entire orchestra was made to rise in acknowledgment of the plaudits.

From WORLD
Address: New York City.
Date ______

BOSTON SYMPHONY WINS APPLAUSE ONCE MORE.

Opening of Twenty-eighth Season Here Is Enthusiastically Welcomed by Audience.

Estabi 4

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, an old musical friend, always welcome, beginning its twenty-eighth New York season in Carnegie Hall last evening, demonstrated, as it so often has in the past, what a highly efficient, thoroughly trained orchestra can do under the guidance of a genuine conductor. There is always apparent in the work of this orchestra a personal effort of every member to achieve the best possible.

Last night the distinguished organization was in excellent condition, but oddly enough, scarcely up to the technical and artistic accomplishments shown at other times. In spite of the superior performance given, there were moments when the tendency to momentary raggedness was apparent, while the customary warmth of tone seemed missing.

Nevertheless, there was adequate compensation in the generally smooth interpretation of Beethoven's seventh symphony and the vitality imparted to Brahm's "Tragic" overture and the color revealed in the "Flying Dutchman" overture. The Liszt symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," seemed to carry the least artistic value.

From the standpoint of the audience, everything was perfection, and the applause after the symphony compelled Conductor Karl Muck to cause his musicians to rise in acknowledgment. This fine director led with his customary authority and incisiveness.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York
Date NOV 1913

, 1884

The Boston Symphony Orchestra brilliantly opened its twenty-eighth New York season last night before a splendidly appreciative audience which filled Carnegie Hall to overflowing. Few changes were to be observed in the orchestra's make-up. Gustav Strube has severed his long connection with the organization to become professor at the Peabody Conservatory of Music, in Baltimore, and there are one or two new faces in the wind section, otherwise the band's personnel is the same. There is the same finely finished execution, the same sure, smooth ensemble and perfect balance which have long characterized this orchestra.

This is Dr. Karl Muck's second consecutive year as conductor, and the full and intimate understanding between the musicians and their leader is at all times evident.

Last night's concert was without an assisting solo artist and offered nothing in the way of novelty; in fact, comprised none but familiar numbers in the symphonic repertoire, all of which have been heard here many times. Dr. Muck's rendering of the "Tragic" overture of Brahms was fraught with portentous fire and gloom, befitting the composer's own conception, and made a profound impression.

In Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, which came first on the programme, the allegretto has rarely been so nobly and justly played, with such fine fidelity to the inner meaning of the music; nor did the conductor fear to let loose the bacchantic finale with all the furious rythmic en... [illegible] ...the close ... Dr. Muck was enthusiast... recalled and made his men rise to share in the applause.

The orchestra fairly "ate up" Liszt's timeworn symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture, delivered with superb dynamic ... power, completed

---

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date NOV 7 1913

BOSTON ORCHESTRA OPENS SEASON HERE

Esta 84

Great Crowd at Carnegie Hall at Its First Series of the Winter.

NO SOLO ON PROGRAMME

Dr. Karl Muck Remains Conductor, but Many New Faces Among the Players.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first visit to New York yesterday, beginning its twenty-eighth season here with a concert in Carnegie Hall. It comes more firmly intrenched than ever in the admiration of New York music-lovers. The hall was completely filled last evening, and there is said to be not a single seat to be had for any of the nine concerts that are to follow during the season. Nor has the orchestra ever more fully deserved this admiration and esteem, for it has never played more superbly than it did at this concert or more deeply absorbed the attention and roused the delight of its listeners. Dr. Karl Muck returns as its conductor, and there are a number of new faces to be seen among the players. But the quality of its performance has not changed; it is a quality of perfection in tone, in balance, in pliability and flexibility under the conductor's hands, in sheer beauty in every particular.

There was no solo performer at this concert. The programme began with Beethoven's seventh symphony, of which there was no new revelation and no new "reading." It was Beethoven's music as understood by the highest intelligence, sympathy, and devotion, played as Beethoven conceived it, with consummate skill and an entire command of all his requirements; and this is even better than a "reading." It was followed by Brahms's "Tragic Overture," a piece that rarely appears upon orchestra programmes. It is music of a certain outward austerity; profound in feeling, and mirroring, as one of its critics has said, the grandeur, the loftiness, the deep earnestness, of tragic character. It is not necessary to connect it with any particular drama, as some have insisted upon doing; for the music stands for itself and is complete by itself, and speaks with an eloquence that Brahms has not often surpassed. The performance gave the fullest utterance to all its eloquence, in its rich and dark orchestral color, an example of how justly and completely Brahms's orchestration interprets the essential quality of his musical inspiration, how perfectly fitted it is to such an interpretation. The playing by the orchestra penetrated to the very essence of the work.

There was a more popular kind of brilliancy in Liszt's sonorous and melodious symphonic poem "Les Préludes," the only really familiar one among his compositions in this form; and the programme was ended with Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman." The audience was stirred to great enthusiasm all through the concert. After the symphony Dr. Muck made his men rise to share the applause.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date ______

MUCK SYMPHONY MUSICIANS GIVE INITIAL CONCERT

Est 1884

Boston Orchestra Performs Four Great Masterpieces Before Big Audience in Carnegie Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, gave its first concert for the season at Carnegie Hall last evening. The visitors attracted the customary large and fashionable audience, with the usual complement of standees.

The programme contained but four numbers, but these were very giants of composition. The opening number was Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, a work which has been pronounced by several authorities to be "the essence and spirit of the dance." A more sympathetic or convincing interpretation than the one given last evening would be inconceivable. From its beginning Dr Muck kept his men absolutely under control. Every beat of his baton was lucid to the audience and obeyed by the musicians. The melodious and delicate texture of the first movement; the profound and rhythmic second; the brilliant and scintillating third, and the joyous, vivacious last, were all presented with proper Beethovian appreciation and understanding.

Brahms' "Tragic" overture was the second offering. The work teems with expressive motifs, and, according to the programme notes, is supposed

---

SUN

...great, heartbreaking "song" of the strings in unison, supported by a background of large brasses intoning descending scales, was a superb portion of the work and gloriously played by the musicians.

The various contrasts of tender fantasy and affecting pathos marked the overture throughout, and these were artistically and understandingly portrayed.

Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes," and the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," earned and received the enthusiasm of the audience. At to-morrow afternoon's concert works by Glazounoff, Smetana, Franck and Dvorak will be given.

From SUN
Address: New York City.
Date ______

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLEASES

Exceptionally Fine Rendering of Beethoven's Music.

DR. MUCK'S WARM WELCOME

Brahms, Liszt and Wagner Contribute to Complete Rich Programme.

The first visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a musical season might properly be accorded the rank of an event. It is certain that in the estimation of this public it stands second to nothing, except of course the first night of the opera, which, however, presents a distinctly marked difference. The concerts of the Bostonian performers do not stir the depths of society. While they are not ignored by those society people who are fervent lovers of good music in all its manifestations, they appeal rather to that body of serious devotees of the tonal art which concerns itself more with analysis and reflection than with other joys of living.

The audience which assembled last evening in Carnegie Hall at the first concert of the current season was large and numbered many who are well known in the activities of the town. The reception bestowed upon Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, when he walked upon the stage, was long and hearty, but the applause which followed some of the music betokened feelings which not even the reappearance of a favorite director could arouse.

Programme Rich in Opportunities.

The programme consisted of Beethoven's seventh symphony, the "Tragic" overture of Brahms, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes" and the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman." It was not a perfectly symmetrical arrangement, but it served its purpose in furnishing opportunities for the display of the finest qualities of the admired orchestra.

The symphony in A is a delightful number with which to begin a season's offerings. Familiar as it is to all music lovers it can never be wearisome, even when played but indifferently. When given as it was last night it satisfies every artistic demand, filling the ear with loveliest melody, with captivating rhythms, with fastidiously colored instrumentation and the spirit with poetic imagery.

Dr. Muck elected to make haste slowly in most of his tempi, but he kept in mind the guiding theme, "Without haste, without rest." There was no labored effort to set forth a new reading, no search after hitherto hidden messages in the middle voices of the harmony, no emphatic treatment of dynamic nuances or time modifications. Yet from beginning to end all the voices of the great orchestra sang eloquently, with unsurpassable beauty of tone, with exquisite balance, with delicately finished phrasing, with a marvellous range of sound, rising from the whisper of a perfect pianissimo to the full throated proclamation of fortissimo which had power without violence.

Elegantly Polished Delivery.

A more elegantly polished delivery of the music it would be difficult to conceive; yet there was never wanting the note of Beethoven's virility. The highest achievements in this lovely performance were found in the second and third movements. Especially in the trio of the scherzo the superbly executed vocal effect of a messa di voice by the wind instruments, coupled as it was with a crystalline clarity of balance, left the ear ravished with pure beauty.

But nothing can be gained by extending the description of this concert. We shall hear an overwhelming quantity of music in the course of the season, but it seems unlikely that anything can obliterate the memory of last evening's delivery of Beethoven's seventh symphony. The first matinee of the orchestra will take place to-morrow, when Glazounov's fifth symphony, Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture, Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides" and Dvorak's "Husitska" overture will be played. As at last evening's entertainment, there will be no soloist.

From POST NOV 1 1913
Address: New York
Date ....

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first visit of the season to New York the coming week, giving a concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 6, at 8:15, and Saturday afternoon, November 8, at 2:30. The programme for Thursday night is as follows: Beethoven, Symphony in A major, No. 7; Brahms, "Tragic" Overture; Liszt, Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes"; Wagner, Overture to "The Flying Dutchman." The programme for Saturday afternoon will be as follows: Glazounoff, Symphony No. 5; Smetana, Overture, "The Sold Bride"; Franck, Symphonic Poem, "Les Eolides"; Dvorák, Dramatic Overture, "Husitska." At the December concerts the soloist will be, on both occasions, the eminent violinist, Fritz Kreisler.

AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date ______________ NOV 2 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENING.

The first pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 6, and Saturday afternoon, November 8. The programme for the evening concert will consist of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms's "Tragic" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture. For Saturday Dr. Muck will present Glazounoff's Fifth Symphony, Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture, Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," and Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska." At the next pair of concerts December 4 and 6, Kreisler will be the soloist.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. 13
Date ______________

MISS FARRAR ILL.

Indisposition Keeps Singer from Going to Baltimore.

A slight indisposition and fear of a cold kept Miss Geraldine Farrar, soprano, from traveling to Baltimore, Md., and singing there last night as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Yesterday morning she was suffering from a slight hoarseness and consulted Dr. H. Holbrook Curtis. He advised her not to go to Baltimore, saying that if the hoarseness increased it would be a serious matter, as she is to sing in the opening performance of "Manon" in the Metropolitan Opera House a week from Monday.

Miss Farrar sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia on Monday, after which she returned to her home. Last night's concert was to have been the last of her long series.

NIGHT CLASSES FILLED

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date .... NOV 2 1913

CONCERT SEASON STRIKES ITS PA

IT can fairly be said that the m season has struck its pace. Last w was a fair example of what music votees may expect each week from present time until the late spring. the present week also is charged w musical offerings numerous and import enough to please the multitude that re in the classics and spurn popular mu

Notable among the week's musical events will be the first appearance here this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Karl Muck again is its leader, and will prove his prowess at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday matinee. There will be neither novelties nor soloists for these two affairs, but it will be sheerly the Boston Orchestra which will prove the lodestone.

Thursday night's programme contains Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms' "Tragic" overture, Lizst's symphonic poem "Les Preludes" and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture.

For the Saturday matinée the following will be played:—Glazounoff Symphony No. 5, Cesar Franck's symphonic poem "Les Eolides" and two overtures, Smetana's "Bartered Bride" and Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska."

• • •

BUT this will not be all of the week's orchestral concerts. T ...phony Society,

---

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York
Date .... NOV 7 1913

Boston Symphony Orchestra Heard

By Sylvester Rawling.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall last night, gave the first concert of its twenty-eighth season in New York. There was a warm welcome for Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, when he first appeared before the crowded audience, which held the elect of New York music lovers, besides a fine array of people of fashion. It was not ever thus. Time was—not so long ago—when the Boston men played to sparsely filled houses; but the superlative qualities of the band gained for it new adherents every year until now the subscription is full, with a waiting list.

Dr. Muck's programme was not severe. It might be called popular even. It consisted of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms's "Tragic" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Preludes," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman. Each was played with amazing virtuosity. Indeed, when it was all over one was left to wonder whether something of appeal to sentiment had not been sacrificed in the achievement of such marvellous precision, and—if one may say it—of such mechanical perfection. At any rate, the audience was aroused to show marked demonstrations of approval. Dr. Muck was recalled many times and twice the entire orchestra was made to rise in acknowledgment of the plaudits.

From WORLD
Address: New York City.
Date ______________

BOSTON SYMPHONY WINS APPLAUSE ONCE MORE.

Opening of Twenty-eighth Season Here Is Enthusiastically Welcomed by Audience.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, an old musical friend, always welcome, beginning its twenty-eighth New York season in Carnegie Hall last evening, demonstrated, as it so often has in the past, what a highly efficient, thoroughly trained orchestra can do under the guidance of a genuine conductor. There is always apparent in the work of this orchestra a personal effort of every member to achieve the best possible.

Last night the distinguished organization was in excellent condition, but oddly enough, scarcely up to the technical and artistic accomplishments shown at other times. In spite of the superior performance given, there were moments when the tendency to momentary raggedness was apparent, while the customary warmth of tone seemed missing.

Nevertheless, there was adequate compensation in the generally smooth interpretation of Beethoven's seventh symphony and the vitality imparted to Brahm's "Tragic" overture and the color revealed in the "Flying Dutchman" overture. The Liszt symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," seemed to carry the least artistic value.

From the standpoint of the audience, everything was perfection, and the applause after the symphony compelled Conductor Karl Muck to cause his musicians to rise in acknowledgment. This fine director led with his customary authority and incisiveness.

From EVENING TELEGRAM
Address: New York
Date .... NO 1913

The Boston Symphony Orchestra brilliantly opened its twenty-eighth New York season last night before a splendidly appreciative audience which filled Carnegie Hall to overflowing. Few changes were to be observed in the orchestra's make-up. Gustav Strube has severed his long connection with the organization to become professor at the Peabody Conservatory of Music, in Baltimore, and there are one or two new faces in the wind section, otherwise the band's personnel is the same. There is the same finely finished execution, the same sure, smooth ensemble and perfect balance which have long characterized this orchestra.

This is Dr. Karl Muck's second consecutive year as conductor, and the full and intimate understanding between the musicians and their leader is at all times evident.

Last night's concert was without an assisting solo artist and offered nothing in the way of novelty; in fact, comprised none but familiar numbers in the symphonic repertoire, all of which have been heard here many times. Dr. Muck's rendering of the "Tragic" overture of Brahms was fraught with portentous fire and gloom, befitting the [illegible] conception, and made [illegible]

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date ______________ NOV 7 1913

BOSTON ORCHESTRA OPENS SEASON HERE

Great Crowd at Carnegie Hall at Its First Series of the Winter.

NO SOLO ON PROGRAMME

Dr. Karl Muck Remains Conductor, but Many New Faces Among the Players.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first visit to New York yesterday, beginning its twenty-eighth season here with a concert in Carnegie Hall. It comes more firmly intrenched than ever in the admiration of New York music-lovers. The hall was completely filled last evening, and there is said to be not a single seat to be had for any of the nine concerts that are to follow during the season. Nor has the orchestra ever more fully deserved this admiration and esteem, for it has never played more superbly than it did at this concert or more deeply absorbed the attention and roused the delight of its listeners. Dr. Karl Muck returns as its conductor, and there are a number of new faces to be seen among the players. But the quality of its performance has not changed; it is a quality of perfection in tone, in balance, in pliability and flexibility under the conductor's hands, in sheer beauty in every particular.

There was no solo performer at this concert. The programme began with Beethoven's seventh symphony, of which there was no new revelation and no new "reading." It was Beethoven's music as understood by the highest intelligence, sympathy, and devotion, played as Beethoven conceived it, with consummate skill and an entire command of all his requirements; and this is even better than a "reading." It was followed by Brahms's "Tragic Overture," a piece that rarely appears upon orchestra programmes. It is music of a certain outward austerity; profound in feeling, and mirroring, as one of its critics has said, the grandeur, the loftiness, the deep earnestness, of tragic character. It is not necessary to connect it with any particular drama, as some have insisted upon doing; for the music stands for itself and is complete by itself, and speaks with an eloquence that Brahms has not often surpassed. The performance gave the fullest utterance to all its eloquence, in its rich and dark orchestral color, an example of how justly and completely Brahms's orchestration interprets the essential quality of his musical inspiration, how perfectly fitted it is to such an interpretation. The playing by the orchestra penetrated to the very essence of the work.

There was a more popular kind of brilliancy in Liszt's sonorous and melodious symphonic poem "Les Préludes," the only really familiar one among his compositions in this form; and the programme was ended with Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman." The audience was stirred to great enthusiasm all through the concert. After the symphony Dr. Muck made his men rise to share the applause.

From ERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date ______________

Est 1884

MUCK SYMPHONY MUSICIANS GIVE INITIAL CONCERT

Boston Orchestra Performs Four Great Masterpieces Before Big Audience in Carnegie Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, gave its first concert for the season at Carnegie Hall last evening. The visitors attracted the customary large and fashionable audience, with the usual complement of standees.

The programme contained but four numbers, but these were very giants of composition. The opening number was Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, a work which has been pronounced by several authorities to be "the essence and spirit of the dance." A more sympathetic or convincing interpretation than the one given last evening would be inconceivable. From its beginning Dr Muck kept his men absolutely under control. Every beat of his baton was lucid to the audience and obeyed by the musicians. The melodious and delicate texture of the first movement; the profound and rhythmic second; the brilliant and scintillating third, and the joyous, vivacious last, were all presented with proper Beethovian appreciation and understanding.

Brahms' "Tragic" overture was the second offering. The work teems with expressive motifs, and, according to the programme notes, is supposed

---

SUN

[illegible] the great, heartbreaking "song" of the strings in unison, supported by a background of large brasses intoning descending scales, was a superb portion of the work and gloriously played by the musicians.

The various contrasts of tender fantasy and affecting pathos marked the overture throughout, and these were artistically and understandingly portrayed.

Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes," and the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," earned and received the enthusiasm of the audience. At to-morrow afternoon's concert works by Glazounoff, Smetana, Franck and Dvorak will be given.

From SUN
Address: New York City.
Date ______________

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLEASES

Exceptionally Fine Rendering of Beethoven's Music.

DR. MUCK'S WARM WELCOME

Brahms, Liszt and Wagner Contribute to Complete Rich Programme.

The first visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a musical season might properly be accorded the rank of an event. It is certain that in the estimation of this public it stands second to nothing, except, of course, the first night of the opera, which, however, presents a distinctly marked difference. The concerts of the Bostonian performers do not stir the depths of society. While they are not ignored by those society people who are fervent lovers of good music in all its manifestations, they appeal rather to that body of serious devotees of the tonal art which concerns itself more with analysis and reflection than with other joys of living.

The audience which assembled last evening in Carnegie Hall at the first concert of the current season was large and numbered many who are well known in the activities of the town. The reception bestowed upon Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, when he walked upon the stage, was long and hearty, but the applause which followed some of the music betokened feelings which not even the reappearance of a favorite director could arouse.

Programme Rich in Opportunities.

The programme consisted of Beethoven's seventh symphony, the "Tragic" overture of Brahms, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes" and the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman." It was not a perfectly symmetrical arrangement, but it served its purpose in furnishing opportunities for the display of the finest qualities of the admired orchestra.

The symphony in A is a delightful number with which to begin a season's offerings. Familiar as it is to all music lovers it can never be wearisome, even when played but indifferently. When given as it was last night it satisfies every artistic demand, filling the ear with loveliest melody, with captivating rhythms, with fastidiously colored instrumentation and the spirit with poetic imagery.

Dr. Muck elected to make haste slowly in most of his tempi, but he kept in mind the guiding theme, "Without haste, without rest." There was no labored effort to set forth a new reading, no search after hitherto hidden messages in the middle voices of the harmony, no emphatic treatment of dynamic nuances or time modifications. Yet from beginning to end all the voices of the great orchestra sang eloquently, with unsurpassable beauty of tone, with exquisite balance, with delicately finished phrasing, with a marvellous range of sound, rising from the whisper of a perfect pianissimo to the full throated proclamation of fortissimo which had power without violence.

Elegantly Polished Delivery.

A more elegantly polished delivery of the music it would be difficult to conceive; yet there was never wanting the note of Beethoven's virility. The highest achievements in this lovely performance were found in the second and third movements. Especially in the trio of the scherzo the superbly executed vocal effect of a messa di voce by the wind instruments, coupled as it was with a crystalline clarity of balance, left the ear ravished with pure beauty.

But nothing can be gained by extending the description of this concert. We shall hear an overwhelming quantity of music in the course of the season, but it seems unlikely that anything can obliterate the memory of last evening's delivery of Beethoven's seventh symphony. The first matinee of the orchestra will take place to-morrow, when Glazounov's fifth symphony, Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture, Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides" and Dvorak's "Husitska" overture will be played. As at last evening's entertainment, there will be no soloist.

From POST NOV 1 1913
Address: New York
Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first visit of the season to New York the coming week, giving a concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 6, at 8:15, and Saturday afternoon, November 8, at 2:30. The programme for Thursday night is as follows: Beethoven, Symphony in A major, No. 7; Brahms, "Tragic" Overture; Liszt, Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes"; Wagner, Overture to "The Flying Dutchman." The programme for Saturday afternoon will be as follows: Glazounoff, Symphony No. 5; Smetana, Overture, "The Sold Bride"; Franck, Symphonic Poem, "Les Eolides"; Dvořák, Dramatic Overture, "Husitska." At the December concerts the soloist will be, on both occasions, the eminent violinist, Fritz Kreisler.

AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date NOV 2 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENING.

The first pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 6, and Saturday afternoon, November 8. The programme for the evening concert will consist of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms's "Tragic" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture. For Saturday Dr. Muck will present Glazounoff's Fifth Symphony, Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture, Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," and Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska." At the next pair of concerts December 4 and 6, Kreisler will be the soloist.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y. 3
Date

MISS FARRAR ILL.

Indisposition Keeps Singer from Going to Baltimore.

A slight indisposition and fear of a cold kept Miss Geraldine Farrar, soprano, from traveling to Baltimore, Md., and singing there last night as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Yesterday morning she was suffering from a slight hoarseness and consulted Dr. H. Holbrook Curtis. He advised her not to go to Baltimore, saying that if the hoarseness increased it would be a serious matter, as she is to sing in the opening performance of "Manon" in the Metropolitan Opera House a week from Monday.

Miss Farrar sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia on Monday, after which she returned to her home. Last night's concert was to have been the last of her long series.

NIGHT CLASSES FILLED

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date NOV 2 1913

CONCERT SEASON STRIKES ITS PACE

It can fairly be said that the music season has struck its pace. Last week was a fair example of what music devotees may expect each week from the present time until the late spring. And the present week also is charged with musical offerings numerous and important enough to please the multitude that revel in the classics and spurn popular music.

Notable among the week's musical events will be the first appearance here this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Karl Muck again is its leader, and will prove his prowess at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday matinee. There will be neither novelties nor soloists for these two affairs, but it will be sheerly the Boston Orchestra which will prove the lodestone.

Thursday night's programme contains Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms' "Tragic" overture, Lizst's symphonic poem "Les Preludes" and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture.

For the Saturday matinée the following will be played:—Glazounoff Symphony No. 5, Cesar Franck's symphonic poem "Les Eolides" and two overtures, Smetana's "Bartered Bride" and Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska."

* * *

BUT this will not be all of the week's orchestral concerts. T[illegible]
[illegible]phony Society, [illegible]

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York
Date NOV 7 1913

Boston Symphony Orchestra Heard

By Sylvester Rawling.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall last night, gave the first concert of its twenty-eighth season in New York. There was a warm welcome for Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, when he first appeared before the crowded audience, which held the elect of New York music lovers, besides a fine array of people of fashion. It was not ever thus. Time was—not so long ago—when the Boston men played to sparsely filled houses; but the superlative qualities of the band gained for it new adherents every year until now the subscription is full, with a waiting list.

Dr. Muck's programme was not severe. It might be called popular even. It consisted of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms's "Tragic" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Preludes," and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman. Each was played with amazing virtuosity. Indeed, when it was all over one was left to wonder whether something of appeal to sentiment had not been sacrificed in the achievement of such marvellous precision, and—if one may say it—of such mechanical perfection. At any rate, the audience was aroused to show marked demonstrations of approval. Dr. Muck was recalled many times and twice the entire orchestra was made to rise in acknowledgment of the plaudits.

From WORLD
Address: New York City.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY WINS APPLAUSE ONCE MORE.

Opening of Twenty-eighth Season Here Is Enthusiastically Welcomed by Audience.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, an old musical friend, always welcome, beginning its twenty-eighth New York season in Carnegie Hall last evening, demonstrated, as it so often has in the past, what a highly efficient, thoroughly trained orchestra can do under the guidance of a genuine conductor. There is always apparent in the work of this orchestra a personal effort of every member to achieve the best possible.

Last night the distinguished organization was in excellent condition, but oddly enough, scarcely up to the technical and artistic accomplishments shown at other times. In spite of the superior performance given, there were moments when the tendency to momentary raggedness was apparent, while the customary warmth of tone seemed missing.

Nevertheless, there was adequate compensation in the generally smooth interpretation of Beethoven's seventh symphony and the vitality imparted to Brahm's "Tragic" overture and the color revealed in the "Flying Dutchman" overture. The Liszt symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," seemed to carry the least artistic value.

From the standpoint of the audience, everything was perfection, and the applause after the symphony compelled Conductor Karl Muck to cause his musicians to rise in acknowledgment. This fine director led with his customary authority and incisiveness.

[illegible] EVENING TELEGRAM
[illegible]: New York
NOV [illegible] 1913

The Boston Symphony Orchestra brilliantly opened its twenty-eighth New York season last night before a splendidly appreciative audience which filled Carnegie Hall to overflowing. Few changes were to be observed in the orchestra's make-up. Gustav Strube has severed his long connection with the organization to become professor at the Peabody Conservatory of Music, in Baltimore, and there are one or two new faces in the wind section, otherwise the band's personnel is the same. There is the same finely finished execution, the same sure, smooth ensemble and perfect balance which have long characterized this orchestra.

This is Dr. Karl Muck's second consecutive year as conductor, and the full and intimate understanding between the musicians and their leader is at all times evident.

Last night's concert was without an assisting solo artist and offered nothing in the way of novelty; in fact, comprised none but familiar numbers in the symphonic repertoire, all of which have been heard here many times. Dr. Muck's rendering of the "Tragic" overture of Brahms was fraught with portentous fire and gloom, befitting th[illegible] own [illegible]ception, and ma[illegible]

In Beet[illegible]

From TIMES
Address: New York City
Date NOV 7 1913

BOSTON ORCHESTRA OPENS SEASON HERE

Great Crowd at Carnegie Hall at Its First Series of the Winter.

NO SOLO ON PROGRAMME

Dr. Karl Muck Remains Conductor, but Many New Faces Among the Players.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first visit to New York yesterday, beginning its twenty-eighth season here with a concert in Carnegie Hall. It comes more firmly intrenched than ever in the admiration of New York music-lovers. The hall was completely filled last evening, and there is said to be not a single seat to be had for any of the nine concerts that are to follow during the season. Nor has the orchestra ever more fully deserved this admiration and esteem, for it has never played more superbly than it did at this concert or more deeply absorbed the attention and roused the delight of its listeners. Dr. Karl Muck returns as its conductor, and there are a number of new faces to be seen among the players. But the quality of its performance has not changed; it is a quality of perfection in tone, in balance, in pliability and flexibility under the conductor's hands, in sheer beauty in every particular.

There was no solo performer at this concert. The programme began with Beethoven's seventh symphony, of which there was no new revelation and no new "reading." It was Beethoven's music as understood by the highest intelligence, sympathy, and devotion, played as Beethoven conceived it, with consummate skill and an entire command of all his requirements; and this is even better than a "reading." It was followed by Brahms's "Tragic Overture," a piece that rarely appears upon orchestra programmes. It is music of a certain outward austerity; profound in feeling, and mirroring, as one of its critics has said, the grandeur, the loftiness, the deep earnestness, of tragic character. It is not necessary to connect it with any particular drama, as some have insisted upon doing; for the music stands for itself and is complete by itself, and speaks with an eloquence that Brahms has not often surpassed. The performance gave the fullest utterance to all its eloquence, in its rich and dark orchestral color, an example of how justly and completely Brahms's orchestration interprets the essential quality of his musical inspiration, how perfectly fitted it is to such an interpretation. The playing by the orchestra penetrated to the very essence of the work.

There was a more popular kind of brilliancy in Liszt's sonorous and melodious symphonic poem "Les Préludes," the only really familiar one among his compositions in this form; and the programme was ended with Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman." The audience was stirred to great enthusiasm all through the concert. After the symphony Dr. Muck made his men rise to share the applause

---

From [illegible]ERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date

MUCK SYMPHONY MUSICIANS GIVE INITIAL CONCERT

Boston Orchestra Performs Four Great Masterpieces Before Big Audience in Carnegie Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, gave its first concert for the season at Carnegie Hall last evening. The visitors attracted the customary large and fashionable audience, with the usual complement of standees.

The programme contained but four numbers, but these were very giants of composition. The opening number was Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, a work which has been pronounced by several authorities to be "the essence and spirit of the dance." A more sympathetic or convincing interpretation than the one given last evening would be inconceivable. From its beginning Dr Muck kept his men absolutely under control. Every beat of his baton was lucid to the audience and obeyed by the musicians. The melodious and delicate texture of the first movement; the profound and rhythmic second; the brilliant and scintillating third, and the joyous, vivacious last, were all presented with proper Beethovian appreciation and understanding.

Brahms' "Tragic" overture was the second offering. The work teems with expressive motifs, and, according [illegible]

[illegible] The great, heartbreaking "song" of the strings in unison, supported by a background of large brasses intoning descending scales, was a superb portion of the work and gloriously played by the musicians.

The various contrasts of tender fantasy and affecting pathos marked the overture throughout, and these were artistically and understandingly portrayed.

Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes," and the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," earned and received the enthusiasm of the audience. At to-morrow afternoon's concert works by Glazounoff, Smetana, Franck and Dvorak will be given.

From SUN
Address: New York City.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLEASES

Exceptionally Fine Rendering of Beethoven's Music.

DR. MUCK'S WARM WELCOME

Brahms, Liszt and Wagner Contribute to Complete Rich Programme.

The first visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a musical season might properly be accorded the rank of an event. It is certain that in the estimation of this public it stands second to nothing, except of course the first night of the opera, which, however, presents a distinctly marked difference. The concerts of the Bostonian performers do not stir the depths of society. While they are not ignored by those society people who are fervent lovers of good music in all its manifestations, they appeal rather to that body of serious devotees of the tonal art which concerns itself more with analysis and reflection than with other joys of living.

The audience which assembled last evening in Carnegie Hall at the first concert of the current season was large and numbered many who are well known in the activities of the town. The reception bestowed upon Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, when he walked upon the stage was long and hearty, but the applause which followed some of the music betokened feelings which not even the reappearance of a favorite director could arouse.

Programme Rich in Opportunities.

The programme consisted of Beethoven's seventh symphony, the "Tragic" overture of Brahms, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes" and the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman." It was not a perfectly symmetrical arrangement, but it served its purpose in furnishing opportunities for the display of the finest qualities of the admired orchestra.

The symphony in A is a delightful number with which to begin a season's offerings. Familiar as it is to all music lovers it can never be wearisome, even when played but indifferently. When given as it was last night it satisfies every artistic demand, filling the ear with loveliest melody, with captivating rhythms, with fastidiously colored instrumentation and the spirit with poetic imagery.

Dr. Muck elected to make haste slowly in most of his tempi, but he kept in mind the guiding theme, "Without haste, without rest." There was no labored effort to set forth a new reading, no search after hitherto hidden messages in the middle voices of the harmony, no emphatic treatment of dynamic nuances or time modifications. Yet from beginning to end all the voices of the great orchestra sang eloquently, with unsurpassable beauty of tone, with exquisite balance, with delicately finished phrasing, with a marvellous range of sound, rising from the whisper of a perfect pianissimo to the full throated proclamation of fortissimo which had power without violence.

Elegantly Polished Delivery.

A more elegantly polished delivery of the music it would be difficult to conceive; yet there was never wanting the note of Beethoven's virility. The highest achievements in this lovely performance were found in the second and third movements. Especially in the trio of the scherzo the superbly executed vocal effect of a messa di voce by the wind instruments, coupled as it was with a crystalline clarity of balance, left the ear ravished with pure beauty.

But nothing can be gained by extending the description of this concert. We shall hear an overwhelming quantity of music in the course of the season, but it seems unlikely that anything can obliterate the memory of last evening's delivery of Beethoven's seventh symphony. The first matinee of the orchestra will take place to-morrow, when Glazounov's fifth symphony, Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture, Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides" and Dvorak's "Husitska" overture will be played. As at last evening's entertainment, there will be no soloist.

[50]

From JOURNAL
Address: New York
Date NOV 7 - 19

Establish

Warm Greeting to Boston Symphony at First Concert

Carnegie Hall has been the shell of many and often strange reverberatory musical exhalations. Singers sing there and orchestras play there, and violinists and pianists seek this resonant refuge for the doing and undoing of divers things. But among all these activities in the realm of sound, few challenge the memory for reasons of substantial importance. There is one art to which singers and orchestras and instrumentalists rarely attain—namely, the art of evocation. Last night proved to be one of these rare occasions, for there occurred a veritable evocation of the spirit of Ludwig von Beethoven.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for the first visit of the season of this organization, played Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. It was a fitting choice for the opening of the Boston Orchestra's season here. Seldom, indeed, has this work been played with such penetrative eloquence. The inner spirit of the master was revealed.

Many minds have found many things in the Seventh Symphony. Schumann found the second movement to be the depiction of a marriage ceremony. Marx, the German pedagogue, thought it a story of the Moors of Spain. Wagner believed it to be "the apotheosis of the dance," and thus he has been posthumously responsible for Miss Isadore Duncan's antics with it. Philip Hale, the inexhaustible commentator of the Boston Symphony programmes, reiterates that "it escapes the commentator." As the landscape is to the eye of the beholder, so the symphony is in the ear of the hearer." But what did Dr. Muck find in it?

This orchestral conductor found Beethoven in it. It was the Beethoven who had passed his fortieth year, the Beethoven who had learned nearly all the things that life offers—except resignation. It was the Beethoven who still found life surging up within him, the Beethoven of an unsatisfied, uncompleted personality, the Beethoven who craved mightily a joie de vivre, profound and complete.

This was Dr. Muck's exposition of the Seventh Symphony—only the word "exposition" is unsuitable and unsatisfactory; rather let one repeat the word, "revelation." Revelation began with the arresting introduction and reached its climax in the proclamation of the allegretto. This slow movement was what life held for the master of Bonn in the still hours when he looked inward and knew.

Yet the allegretto is not all of the Seventh Symphony. It is, perhaps, the key to its turbulence, it sets the seal of explanation upon the presto and doggedly wild finale. Life offers so little! Creation of beauty is the sweat of the soul and is travail. The creative artist is human and yearns, as any other human, for the living beauties of life itself. The Seventh Symphony is an outburst of desire for the quivering warmth of what life may offer.

And it was in this spirit of interpretation that Dr. Muck guided his men to play it.

There were, of course, other items on this programme. Listeners to music must have their allotted quantity. Dr. Muck paved the way down the incline with Brahms's "Tragic Overture," a not unworthy first step, and thereafter descended rather abruptly with Liszt's "Les Preludes," closing with the Wagner overture to "Der Fliegende Hollaender."

The Brahms overture, to the discredit of our conductors in New York, is seldom played here. It should be heard oftener. Dr. Muck's fine insight was here again on display. The obviousness of the Liszt tone poem was lost in the virtuosoship with which the orchestra handled it, and the Wagner overture was a brilliant delight as the Boston men played it.

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City.
Date

MUS NOTES.

By EMILIE RANCES BAUER.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck opened its season last night in Carnegie Hall. Although this is a day of ultramodern tendencies, Dr. Muck returned to the form of musical diversion which included Beethoven's seventh symphony, Liszt's "Les Preludes" and the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman." The only compromise was Brahms' "Tragic" overture, and even Brahms is no longer strong diet for the average concertgoer of the day.

The orchestra has undergone a few changes in its personnel, among which may be mentioned the harp, Alfred Holy replacing the late Heinrich Schuecker, who died at his post last season. This splendid organization is in its usual brilliant form, and in the high degree of perfection with which the familiar old numbers were presented the audience found its pleasure. The orchestra [illegible] play in Brooklyn to-night and in [illegible] Hall again to-morrow after-

York, 1884

From PRESS
Address: New York
Date NOV 7 - 1913

Est

BOSTON ORCHESTRA OPENS SEASON HERE

Appreciative Gathering in Carnegie Hall—Dr. Muck Not at His Best.

There is always much rejoicing among those who really are connoisseurs and among those who think they are when the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its yearly musical ministration in New York. It was a foregone conclusion, therefore, that the first concert of that famous organization's twenty-eighth season in this city would attract a large and fashionable audience to Carnegie Hall last night, although Dr. Muck presented a programme which had nothing of special interest and did not enlist the services of a soloist.

Hardly a seat, in fact, was vacant when the great German conductor took his place on the platform, and by the time he had reached the third movement of Beethoven's Symphony in A major, No. 7, more than a few standees were clasping the rail in the rear of the parquet.

Like our own Philharmonic and Symphony orchestras, the band of virtuosi from the Hub has taken several new players into its ranks. To judge from yesterday's experience, however, the changes seem to have made little difference in the quality and general efficiency of an organization which is generally acknowledged to be second to none in the world.

In the Beethoven Symphony and Brahms's "Tragic" overture the euphony, transparency, unanimity, balance and precision of the orchestra approached close to perfection. There were times, however, as in the Finale of the Symphony, which did not express all of the "bacchantic" joy the composer had in mind, and in Liszt's "Preludes," which lacked something in impassioned vehemence, when, despite the rhythmical incisiveness and dynamic vigor of the performance, it almost seemed as if Dr. Muck and his willing disciples were not yet in perfect spiritual accord.

It is quite possible, of course, that Dr. Muck did not happen to be in one of his best moods. Eloquent, to be sure, in its quiet dignity and power was his performance of the first movement of Beethoven's seventh; finely effective his pompously droll interpretation of the Allegretto, but occasionally his readings seemed to be a little too precise and finical. One longed for a little spontaneity, a little emotional abandonment, for which the programme, closing with Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture, gave a few, if not many, opportunities.

MAX SMITH.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date

Est 884

Orchestra from Boston Gives Rousing Concert

◆

Dr. Karl Macks Conducts as Famous Body of Musicians Start Twenty-Eighth New York Season.

◆

There was need of no soloist to attract an audience to Carnegie Hall last night, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of its twenty-eighth season in New York. The big auditorium was completely sold out and scores of disappointed ones turned away empty handed from the box office. Dr. Karl Muck is again conductor, and when he appeared he was greeted with applause. That demonstration was mild, though, compared to later ones, was several times the handclapping was so prolonged that Dr. Muck asked the musicians to rise and acknowledge it.

And the applause was well earned, for a more wonderful exhibition of playing the orchestra scarcely ever has given here. There are some new artists in the ensemble, and all the changes appear to be for the better. In the matter of tone balance, precision of attack and lusciousness of sound the orchestra is better than ever.

The widest range of dynamic expression was shown, the orchestra leaping from a whispering pianissimo to a thundering climax with amazing quickness and surety, following the lead of its conductor's baton with unfailing precision. As though to prove the absolute confidence Dr. Muck has in his men and in their training, he allowed them to play a section of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony without lifting his baton and they did it superbly. The first movement was impressively measured in the introduction and rhythmically alert in the Vivace. The second movement was played exquisitely; the Presto mirrored the spirit of joy and the final Allegro was the embodiment of hilarious dance. Although the last movement was played at terrific speed there was no sacrifice of clarity.

The remaining numbers were Brahms' tragic overture, Liszt's "The Preludes," brilliantly played, and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman." The latter number, in the matter of dash and stirring spirit, was probably the best

[5]

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City.
Date NOV

Established:

DR. CARL MUCK.
(Photo copyright by Garo.)

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

A Virtuoso Band's Appeal for Appreciation.

Possibly there was a note of pride under the apparent modesty of the programme of the first of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night in Carnegie Hall. No solo feature; no new music. Only the band and its leader to assert their right to a hearing in a city which from one point of view is more than amply provided with orchestral music of its own making, and a list of pieces which do not gain in beauty or significance when made the vehicle of conductors' whims that never entered the heads of their composers, but whose varied charms, like those of all good compositions, bring a new refreshment when given perfect expression. The Boston orchestra's capacity for making such a proclamation has been demonstrated over and over again for a longer time than the majority of its patrons in the metropolis now have sat under its ministrations. Some of those patrons have grown old in years with it, but their appreciation has been kept fresh by its playing even as its voice has been perennially rejuvenated by a wise business and artistic administration. Its career has been marked by changes, but not by decay, and its performances must remain vital and vigorous so long as they are directed by such genuinely recreative musicians as Dr. Muck.

A perfect understanding and complete sympathy exist between the orchestra and its patrons, and so last night's concert was one of those incidents of the musical season which are sufficiently described when the record of their occurrence is made. Those who heard it will not need to be reminded of how the music sounded, and to those who did not, any attempt at description would sound like hyperbole. The list of pieces was singularly put together, and the purposes of the selections and their arrangement can scarcely be guessed. The first part of the evening was filled with Beethoven's Symphony in A major. Then, after a pause of ten minutes, there followed Brahms's "Tragic" overture, Liszt's "Préludes" and the overture to "The Flying Dutchman"—a decided decrescendo, no doubt, in some minds. If Liszt's symphonic poem was chosen to disclose the brilliancy of the orchestra's tone and the virtuosoship of its players, it might be said that those qualities had ample and more dignified illustration in the symphony, especially in its last movement, which had a performance quite without a fellow, in this reviewer's memory. But the glistering tinsel was at least a foil for the sombre fabric of the Brahms music, and enabled Wagner's overture to assume a noble dignity. The audience filled every seat in the room, and the music filled it with enthusiasm.

H. E. K.

From GLOBE
Address: New York
Date

Est

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first pair of New York concerts this season Thursday evening, Nov. 6, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 8, in Carnegie Hall. Thursday Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms's "Tragic" overture, Liszt's "Les Préludes," and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture will be played; Saturday, Glazounoff's fifth symphony, Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture, Franck's "Les Eolides," and Dvorak's "Husitska" overture.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York
Date NOV 7 - 1913

Establ

BOSTON SYMP ONY WELCOME R IEF

A Happy Contrast to Som Early Season Offerings.

HEAR MASTERS BY MA

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra the first performance of its season night at Carnegie Hall.

There have been a few chang am these symphonists, but none such materially to alter the strength and musical dominance of this remarkab association of musicians.

It has fallen to the lot of the present recorder of events to be compelled to speak severely and unreservedly during the past few weeks of much of the music, dramatic and absolute, that has lately been performed in this city. Nor is the war against pretence and charlatanism to cease. But it is a relief and a release to be permitted to lay aside one's sword, aye, and one's shield, for a brief interspace, and heartily to enjoy the real.

Remember, too, that you are not asked to go to these concerts to support music. Music is no meretricious beauty needing factitious and expensive keeping. Nor is it a mere fashion to listen to such interpretations as were heard last night. Fashion in itself does not long extend its patronage, to the sternly intellectual and the highly conceived.

People go to the Boston Symphony concerts because they can hear a normal and accurately interpreted programme of masters by masters. I abstain from the use of the adjectives superb and divine, and the rest of the doubtful and amateurish vocabulary of excited bards and hysterical reviewers. One cannot say more than "normal." It is the epithet applied by a celebrated historian to a great character.

Beethoven's Seventh was played last night as it rarely has been and one found oneself wondering what Beethoven would have said himself had he heard his symphony delivered with such energy, such spirit and such delight. The audience was swept out of itself, and something very like subdued cheering, and something that was enthusiastic applause was heard on the conclusion of the four movements.

Brahms's "Tragic" overture led the second part. We are told that the tragedy Brahms had in mind when he composed this stately music was Shakespeare's "Hamlet," but the austerity of outline of the greater part of it is more suggestive, to certain minds, of the ideals of Hellenic tragedy. Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Richard Wagner's "The Flying Dutchman" overture were also in the programme. Dr. Karl Muck conducted, and he conducted as usual for the orchestra and for music, and not for his own celebration.

From SUN
Address: New York City.
Date

Estab

A NEW MUSIC SOCIETY.

Chamber Compositions in Unusual Styles to Be Presented.

A great deal is in a name when it is the Longy New York Modern Chamber Music Society. The first concert of the organization confidently bearing all this appellation took place last evening in Aeolian Hall. The founder and director of the society is Geogres Longy, the admirable first oboist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his aids belong also to that assembly. They are J. Theodorowicz and A. Bak, violins; K. Rissland, viola; J. Keller, cello; A. de Voto, piano; A. Brooke, flute; G. Grisnez, clarinet; F. Hain, horn, and P. Sadony, basoon.

In addition to these there were special performers last evening, to wit, Carolyn Beebe, pianist; Marie Sundelius, soprano, and Alfred Holy, harp. The purpose of Mr. Longy's new organization is to introduce to this public chamber music compositions calling for more varied combinations than the works offered by string quartets or even by such bodies as our own much cherished Barrere Ensemble.

The programme began with Paul Juon's octet, opus 27, for violin, viola, cello, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and horn and piano. Miss Beebe was the pianist in this number, which was pleasing chiefly through its effective alternations and combinations of the instruments. The other numbers were a ballade by Debussy, Aubert's "Le Reve du Petit Chaperon Rouge," Henry Woollett's "Des Harpes dans le Soir," sung by Mrs. Sundelius, and Ravel's introduction and allegro for harp solo with string quartet, flute and clarinet.

Mr. Longy is himself an artist of the first rank and possesses fine taste. His associates are all thoroughly capable, and as the music to be offered by the new society is entirely out of the beaten track success should attend the venture.

From JOURNAL
Address: New York
Date NOV 7 - 1913
Establish

Warm Greeting to Boston Symphony at First Concert

Carnegie Hall has been the shell of many and often strange reverberatory musical exhalations. Singers sing there and orchestras play there, and violinists and pianists seek this resonant refuge for the doing and undoing of divers things. But among all these activities in the realm of sound, few challenge the memory for reasons of substantial importance. There is one art to which singers and orchestras and instrumentalists rarely attain—namely, the art of evocation. Last night proved to be one of these rare occasions, for there occurred a veritable evocation of the spirit of Ludwig von Beethoven.

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for the first visit of the season of this organization, played Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. It was a fitting choice for the opening of the Boston Orchestra's season here. Seldom, indeed, has this work been played with such penetrative eloquence. The inner spirit of the master was revealed.

Many minds have found many things in the Seventh Symphony. Schumann found the second movement to be the depiction of a marriage ceremony. Marx, the German pedagogue, thought it a story of the Moors of Spain. Wagner believed it to be "the apotheosis of the dance," and thus he has been posthumously responsible for Miss Isadore Duncan's antics with it. Philip Hale, the inexhaustible commentator of the Boston Symphony programmes, reiterates that "it escapes the commentator." As the landscape is to the eye of the beholder, so the symphony is in the ear of the hearer." But what did Dr. Muck find in it?

This orchestral conductor found Beethoven in it. It was the Beethoven who had passed his fortieth year, the Beethoven who had learned nearly all the things that life offers—except resignation. It was the Beethoven who still found life surging up within him, the Beethoven of an unsatisfied, uncompleted personality, the Beethoven who craved mightily a joie de vivre, profound and complete.

This was Dr. Muck's exposition of the Seventh Symphony—only the word "exposition" is unsuitable and unsatisfactory; rather let one repeat the word, "revelation." Revelation began with the arresting introduction and reached its climax in the proclamation of the allegretto. This slow movement was what life held for the master of Bonn in the still hours when he looked inward and knew.

Yet the allegretto is not all of the Seventh Symphony. It is, perhaps, the key to its turbulence, it sets the seal of explanation upon the presto and doggedly wild finale. Life offers so little! Creation of beauty is the sweat of the soul and is travail. The creative artist is human and yearns, as any other human, for the living beauties of life itself. The Seventh Symphony is an outburst of desire for the quivering warmth of what life may offer.

And it was in this spirit of interpretation that Dr. Muck guided his men to play it.

There were, of course, other items on this programme. Listeners to music must have their allotted quantity. Dr. Muck paved the way down the incline with Brahms's "Tragic Overture," a not unworthy first step, and thereafter descended rather abruptly with Liszt's "Les Preludes," closing with the Wagner overture to "Der Fliegende Hollaender."

The Brahms overture, to the discredit of our conductors in New York, is seldom played here. It should be heard oftener. Dr. Muck's fine insight was here again on display. The obviousness of the Liszt tone poem was lost in the virtuosoship with which the orchestra handled it, and the Wagner overture was a brilliant delight as the Boston men played it.

New York
NOV 7 - 1913

ON ORCHESTRA OPENS SEASON HERE

ppreciative Gathering in Carnegie Hall—Dr. Muck Not at His Best.

There is always much rejoicing among those who really are connoisseurs and among those who think they are when the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its yearly musical ministration in New York. It was a foregone conclusion, therefore, that the first concert of that famous organization's twenty-eighth season in this city would attract a large and fashionable audience to Carnegie Hall last night, although Dr. Muck presented a programme which had nothing of special interest and did not enlist the services of a soloist.

Hardly a seat, in fact, was vacant when the great German conductor took his place on the platform, and by the time he had reached the third movement of Beethoven's Symphony in A major, No. 7, more than a few standees were clasping the rail in the rear of the parquet.

Like our own Philharmonic and Symphony orchestras, the band of virtuosi from the Hub has taken several new players into its ranks. To judge from yesterday's experience, however, the changes seem to have made little difference in the quality and general efficiency of an organization which is generally acknowledged to be second to none in the world.

In the Beethoven Symphony and Brahms's "Tragic" overture the euphony, transparency, unanimity, balance and precision of the orchestra approached close to perfection. There were times, however, as in the Finale of the Symphony, which did not express all of the "bacchantic" joy the composer had in mind, and in Liszt's "Preludes," which lacked something in impassioned vehemence, when, despite the rhythmical incisiveness and dynamic vigor of the performance, it almost seemed as if Dr. Muck and his willing disciples were not yet in perfect spiritual accord.

It is quite possible, of course, that Dr. Muck did not happen to be in one of his best moods. Eloquent, to be sure, in its quiet dignity and power was his performance of the first movement of Beethoven's seventh; finely effective his pompously droll interpretation of the Allegretto, but occasionally his readings seemed to be a little too precise and finical. One longed for a little spontaneity, a little emotional abandonment, for which the programme, closing with Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture, gave a few, if not many, opportunities.

MAX SMITH.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City.
Date NOV 7
Established:

DR. CARL MUCK.
(Photo copyright by Garo.)

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

A Virtuoso Band's Appeal for Appreciation.

Possibly there was a note of pride under the apparent modesty of the programme of the first of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night in Carnegie Hall. No solo feature; no new music. Only the band and its leader to assert their right to a hearing in a city which from one point of view is more than amply provided with orchestral music of its own making, and a list of pieces which do not gain in beauty or significance when made the vehicle of conductors' whims that never entered the heads of their composers, but whose varied charms, like those of all good compositions, bring a new refreshment when given perfect expression. The Boston orchestra's capacity for making such a proclamation has been demonstrated over and over again for a longer time than the majority of its patrons in the metropolis now have sat under its ministrations. Some of those patrons have grown old in years with it, but their appreciation has been kept fresh by its playing even as its voice has been perennially rejuvenated by a wise business and artistic administration. Its career has been marked by changes, but not by decay, and its performances must remain vital and vigorous so long as they are directed by such genuinely recreative musicians as Dr. Muck.

A perfect understanding and complete sympathy exist between the orchestra and its patrons, and so last night's concert was one of those incidents of the musical season which are sufficiently described when the record of their occurrence is made. Those who heard it will not need to be reminded of how the music sounded, and to those who did not, any attempt at description would sound like hyperbole. The list of pieces was singularly put together, and the purposes of the selections and their arrangement can scarcely be guessed. The first part of the evening was filled with Beethoven's Symphony in A major. Then, after a pause of ten minutes, there followed Brahms's "Tragic" overture, Liszt's "Préludes" and the overture to "The Flying Dutchman"—a decided decrescendo, no doubt, in some minds. If Liszt's symphonic poem was chosen to disclose the brilliancy of the orchestra's tone and the virtuosoship of its players, it might be said that those qualities had ample and more dignified illustration in the symphony, especially in its last movement, which had a performance quite without a fellow, in this reviewer's memory. But the glistering tinsel was at least a foil for the sombre fabric of the Brahms music, and enabled Wagner's overture to assume a noble dignity. The audience filled every seat in the room, and the music filled it with enthusiasm.

H. E. K.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York
Date NOV 7 - 1913
Establ

BOSTON SYMP ONY WELCOME R IEF

A Happy Contrast to Some the Early Season Offerings.

HEAR MASTERS BY MA

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra the first performance of its season night at Carnegie Hall.

There have been a few chang am these symphonists, but none such materially to alter the strength and t musical dominance of this remarkabl association of musicians.

It has fallen to the lot of the present recorder of events to be compelled to speak severely and unreservedly during the past few weeks of much of the music, dramatic and absolute, that has lately been performed in this city. Nor is the war against pretence and charlatanism to cease. But it is a relief and a release to be permitted to lay aside one's sword, aye, and one's shield, for a brief interspace, and heartily to enjoy the real.

Remember, too, that you are not asked to go to these concerts to support music. Music is no meretricious beauty needing factitious and expensive keeping. Nor is it a mere fashion to listen to such interpretations as were heard last night. Fashion in itself does not long extend its patronage, to the sternly intellectual and the highly conceived.

People go to the Boston Symphony concerts because they can hear a normal and accurately interpreted programme of masters by masters. I abstain from the use of the adjectives superb and divine, and the rest of the doubtful and amateurish vocabulary of excited bards and hysterical reviewers. One cannot say more than "normal." It is the epithet applied by a celebrated historian to a great character.

Beethoven's Seventh was played last night as it rarely has been and one found oneself wondering what Beethoven would have said himself had he heard his symphony delivered with such energy, such spirit and such delight. The audience was swept out of itself, and something very like subdued cheering, and something that was enthusiastic applause was heard on the conclusion of the four movements.

hms's "Tragic" overture led the part. We are told that the Brahms had in mind when he this stately music was Shakes- "Hamlet," but the austerity of he greater part of it is more certain minds, of the ideals agedy. Liszt's "Les Pre- ard Wagner's "The Fly- overture were also in Dr. Karl Muck conducted as usual for for music, and not for ation.

From HERALD
Address: New York City
Date
Est
884

Orchestra from Boston Gives Rousing Concert

Dr. Karl Macks Conducts as Famous Body of Musicians Start Twenty-Eighth New York Season.

There was need of no soloist to attract an audience to Carnegie Hall last night, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of its twenty-eighth season in New York. The big auditorium was completely sold out and scores of disappointed ones turned away empty handed from the box office. Dr. Karl Muck is again conductor, and when he appeared he was greeted with applause. That demonstration was mild, though, compared to later ones, was several times the handclapping was so prolonged that Dr. Muck asked the musicians to rise and acknowledge it.

And the applause was well earned, for a more wonderful exhibition of playing the orchestra scarcely ever has given here. There are some new artists in the ensemble, and all the changes appear to be for the better. In the matter of tone balance, precision of attack and lusciousness of sound the orchestra is better than ever.

The widest range of dynamic expression was shown, the orchestra leaping from a whispering pianissimo to a thundering climax with amazing quickness and surety, following the lead of its conductor's baton with unfailing precision. As though to prove the absolute confidence Dr. Muck has in his men and in their training, he allowed them to play a section of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony without lifting his baton and they did it superbly. The first movement was impressively measured in the introduction and rhythmically alert in the Vivace. The second movement was played exquisitely; the Presto mirrored the spirit of joy and the final Allegro was the embodiment of hilarious dance. Although the last movement was played at terrific speed there was no sacrifice of clarity.

The remaining numbers were Brahms' tragic overture, Liszt's "The Preludes," brilliantly played, and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman." The latter number, in the matter of dash and stirring spirit, was probably the

---

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City.
Date
York, 1884

MUS NOTES.

By EMILIE RANCES BAUER.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck opened its season last night in Carnegie Hall. Although this is a day of ultramodern tendencies, Dr. Muck returned to the form of musical diversion which included Beethoven's seventh symphony, Liszt's "Les Preludes" and the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman." The only compromise was Brahms' "Tragic" overture, and even Brahms is no longer strong diet for the average concertgoer of the day.

The orchestra has undergone a few changes in its personnel, among which may be mentioned the harp, Alfred Holy replacing the late Heinrich Schuecker, who died at his post last season. This splendid organization is in its usual brilliant form, and in the high degree of perfection with which the familiar old numbers were presented the audience found its pleasure. The orchestra play in Brooklyn to-night and in Hall again to-morrow after-

---

From GLOBE
Address: New York
Date
Est

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first pair of New York concerts this season Thursday evening, Nov. 6, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 8, in Carnegie Hall. Thursday Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms's "Tragic" overture, Liszt's "Les Préludes," and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture will be played; Saturday, Glazounoff's fifth symphony, Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture, Franck's "Les Eolides," and Dvorak's "Husitska" overture.

[51]

UN
New York City.

NEW MUSIC SOCIETY.

r Compositions in Unusual ｒles to Be Presented.

deal is in a name when it is ongy New York Modern Chamber ic Society. The first concert of the organization confidently bearing all this appellation took place last evening in Aeolian Hall. The founder and director of the society is Geogres Longy, the admirable first oboist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his aids belong also to that assembly. They are J. Theodorowicz and A. Bak, violins; K. Rissland, viola; J. Keller, cello; A. de Voto, piano; A. Brooke, flute; G. Grisnez, clarinet; F. Hain, horn, and P. Sadony, basoon.

In addition to these there were special performers last evening, to wit, Carolyn Beebe, pianist; Marie Sundelius, soprano, and Alfred Holy, harp. The purpose of Mr. Longy's new organization is to introduce to this public chamber music compositions calling for more varied combinations than the works offered by string quartets or even by such bodies as our own much cherished Barrere Ensemble.

The programme began with Paul Juon's octet, opus 27, for violin, viola, cello, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and horn and piano. Miss Beebe was the pianist in this number, which was pleasing chiefly through its effective alternations and combinations of the instruments. The other numbers were a ballade by Debussy, Aubert's "Le Reve du Petit Chaperon Rouge," Henry Woollett's "Des Harpes dans le Soir," sung by Mrs. Sundelius, and Ravel's introduction and allegro for harp solo with string quartet, flute and clarinet.

Mr. Longy is himself an artist of the first rank and possesses fine taste. His associates are all thoroughly capable, and as the music to be offered by the new society is entirely out of the beaten track success should attend the venture.

From GLOBE
Address: New York
Date NOV 7 1913

First Boston Symphony Concert This Season.

There was nothing to distinguish particularly the first local concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last evening in Carnegie Hall, from many in other seasons. Dr. Karl Muck, tall, thin, and Mephistophelian, again conducted it. The audience again completely filled the hall. It was again necessary to cull one's programme book at the northeast corner of Fifty-seventh street and Seventh avenue, less of a hardship than in cold, windy, or rainy weather, but still a gross absurdity.

To think that in a city of the size and pretensions of New York one must go to the northeast corner of any two streets to find the programme book for a concert in its largest concert hall by the foremost orchestra in the world is a rather disquieting reflection. However, thus and so one must do, unless one is resigned to missing the valuable annotations of Mr. Philip Hale, and there you are! No one that cares for the best music is going to stay away from Boston Symphony concerts if he can help it, for, when one has twice run the gantlet of automobiles and found refuge in Carnegie Hall there is the matchless performance of the Boston band to comfort one.

The programme last night was that with which the orchestra opened its season in Boston; Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms's "Tragic" overture, Liszt's tone poem "Les Préludes," and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture. The performance of that most beautiful of all symphonies, the Seventh of the Immortal Nine, was such as to beggar praise. It seemed as if the scherzo could never have so exulted in its own glory. And the finale left you without the breath to shout the joy that was in you. Miss Isadora Duncan once danced here in public three movements (omitting the first) of this symphony. But neither that gifted woman, nor any other lone, lorn dancer, could have coped long with the symphony as Dr. Muck's men played it last night. It would have taken an infinite and superhuman terpsichorean host, its ascending ranks fading until lost in upper ether, to cope with that performance! It is getting to be a commonplace of orchestral concerts here for the men to rise after some one piece and acknowledge with their conductor the applause. After the Seventh Symphony yesterday such a proceeding seemed merely the inevitable.

It was well that there was a breathing space of ten minutes before the concert went on. The orchestra continued to play with the same virtuosity. If the effect was less, that was only because the material in hand was less. Of this part of the concert, however, the performance of the Brahms overture, impassioned, vital, noble, was something to be remembered long.

PITTS SANBORN.

From TIMES
Address: New York
Date NOV 9 1913

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

A Programme of Modern Music at Its Afternoon Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra finished its doings in New York yesterday with its afternoon concert in Carnegie Hall. Dr. Muck gave another exemplification of his ideas about unity of style in programme-making in the programme for this concert, which consisted entirely of modern compositions. The symphony was Glazunow's fifth, apparently one of the best productions of this too fertile Russian composer, who is prone to say much when he has little to say. Dr. Muck had played the symphony here before, seven years ago, and it had previously been played by the Philharmonic Society under Anton Seidl.

There is in it the skill of a master of orchestration and a musician accomplished in the technical resources of his art, in thematic elaboration and formal structure. He must have tunes that win their way speedily, even if he helps himself with charming frankness from Verdi or Wagner. His first two movements are the best; and of these the first is the most valuable in its ideas. It "sounds" and makes an immediate and agreeable impression, even though the way in which the chief theme, obviously Wagnerian in its origin, shapes itself rhythmically, after its suggestion in the introduction becomes rather monotonous. The scherzo, a pretty piece of aerial and delicate orchestration, is suspiciously thin in substance. In the third movement there might desirably be more matter, even with less art; for what the composer says is not really so important as he would make it sound. And in the last he falls too vigorously upon a syncopated tune and drives it hard.

In the overture to Smetana's opera, "The Bartered Bride," the conductor found matter with which to exploit to the very highest the virtuosity of his orchestra. Has this overture ever been played at such a terrific tempo before, and withal so clearly and crisply, made so brilliantly voluble? It may well be doubted. It may also be doubted whether such a speed is really quite the best for the music, and whether it would not sound better taken with a shade less of such breathless haste. César Franck's symphonic poem "Les Eolides" can scarcely claim an important position among his orchestral works, for it is very tenuous, though pretty long. Doubtless it was meant to be only a picturesque and suggestive sketch; and its vaporous charm was wholly represented by the orchestra's performance.

The last number was Dvorak's "Husitska" overture, music in which the solemn proclamation of the Hussite hymn is made effective, and made to count for much through its long development and its combination with a melody of martial aggressiveness.

And so this was a "modern" programme, nothing in which reached very far below the surface of the musical waters. There was a "unity" in it in [illegible] least. Whether or not [illegible]

Address: New York City.
Date NOV 9 1913

MUSIC FROM BOSTON

A Day with the Orchestra and Chamber Musicians.

AN AMIABLE MUSCOVITE

Russian, Czechish, Slavonic and French Compositions.

There was much other music in towr yesterday, but that which filled the ears afternoon and evening, of those whos minds are attuned to higher things thai opera was chiefly supplied by the Bos tonian artists, who have made a monthl visit to the metropolis for many years Heretofore the visitors have been conten to give us orchestral music, but this yeal Major Higginson's melodious missioners have split themselves into two organizations, the smaller one of which, calling itself the Longy New York Modern Chamber Music Society, has set itself the task of fostering a kind of music for w the local Barrère Ensemble has for s time tried to create a field. Perha patient people, after hearing four h or so of the very good kind of m which is made in Boston, will be pensed of using so cumbersome a and permitted to speak of Mr. Longy his associates as the Longy Club; if it will become a weariness of the fles discuss their agreeable entertainm the first of which began in Aeolian last night, four hours and a half the Boston Symphony Orchestra had cluded its first afternoon concert in negie Hall.

The afternoon programme, like th Thursday evening, was unembarrassed by a solo performance, and likewise was made up of music which had been heard here before—some of it very often, some of it not often enough to have had the bloom of novelty rubbed off it. A circumstance worth a word of comment because of its musical character was that the all-pervasive German composer was without representation in either of the day's schemes. The afternoon symphony was by a Russian—Glazounow's fifth, in B flat; after it came two pieces by Czechs—the overture to "The Bartered Bride," by Smetana, and Dvorak's "Husitzka" overture, separated by a symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," by the Belgian César Franck. Mr. Longy gave his hearers music by the Russian, Paul Juon; the Frenchmen Debussy, Louis Aubert and Maurice Ravel, and a stranger to our concert list, who, though he was represented by French music with a French title, bears a name which has an English sound—Henry Woollett. Of his personality it is not given to us to speak.

In spite of all this there is no pressing call for a disquisition on nationalism in music. As a matter of fact there ought, after so much music played by musicians of the same calibre, to be no call for a disquisition of any sort. Three and a half or four hours of music, with only a brief space for rest, refreshment and the other affairs of life, ought to turn the most devoted reviewer into a recorder of events. Fortunately, the patrons of the concerts of our Boston visitors do not need much else; there is so much in their concerts which they have learned to take for granted. The Glazounow symphony in the afternoon evoked great enthusiasm; so it did on March 4 and 5, 1898, whon, under the direction of Mr. Seidl, it had its first performances on this side of the Atlantic in concerts of the Philharmonic Society.

Then it brought with it a pleasant feeling of surprise, for the audience was prepared for a rude shock, and it was almost startling to "meet up" with a new Russian (as they would say down Boston way) who was willing to win attention by persuasive methods, instead of arresting it vi et armis, so to speak. Borodin and other wild Muscovites were uppermost in the popular mind, and Russian who showed some respect f traditional forms of expression was u expected, to say the least. It was b natural then, as it was again yesterda that the listeners should yield the selves willing captives to his fine inst mental sonorities, should delight in t fascination of his jocose movement a enjoy his melodies and the treatm which he gave them all the more beca they brought with them no need brain-racking. Where they were m put to it to account for their pleasura emotions was in the case of the mus delineation which César Franck gave the somewhat mysterious daughters Æolus, which some years ago Dr. Frank Damrosch treated as musical pabulum for young people, though it is anything but that. "Les Eolides" is a composition whose value is still open to question. If its composer had given it a motto like the lines in Æschylus's "Prometheus Bound"

"—— Ah, me! again
I hear the sound of flutt'ring nigh; the air
Pants to the soft beat of light-moving wings,

the propriety, if not the adequacy, of its brief subject might have been recognized, though its too extended treatment would still have been monotonous. To ask the listeners to accept it as a musical exposition of the long poem by De Lisle which Mr. Hale printed in his notes on the programme, was asking too much. But perhaps the fortunate ones who had the [illegible] reading the delightful excursion i ient literature to which the annot ited them. As for the performa Smetana's overture, it was a d tour de force simply.

It is evidently the conviction Longy, the brilliant hautboyist Boston band, that music is like je which "doth make the meat it fee otherwise he would have hesitated den the local list with a new se concerts in the field which has stubborn to M. Barrère and is this season to be occupied also by an organization much like M. Longy's in composition. His first concert had a fine body of intelligent listeners, and he strove to avoid the uquestioned wearisomeness of music of the kind which he is cultivating by mixing it with music for pianoforte, voice and harp. Nevertheless, his first number, the only one which could be called characteristic, was undeniably tedious. It was an octet by Paul Juon for violin (Mr. Theodorowicz), viola (Mr. Rissland), violoncello (Mr. Killer), Mr. Longy (oboe), Mr. Grisez (clarinet), Mr. Hain (horn), Mr. Sadony (bassoon) and Miss Carolyn Beebe (pianoforte). The wind instruments in Mr. Juon's music had an acridity which is never noticeable in the Boston Orchestra, which employs them all, and the composition itself had little to commend it beyond the Russian folk-time episode (in the style of the "Komarniskaia") of the first movement and the obviously national melody of its finale. On the whole, industry rather than inspiration seemed exemplified in the composition.

H. E. K.

From AMERICAN
Address: New York City.
Date NOV 9 1913
Established:

SYMPHONY BILL IS AMPLE PROOF OF VERSATILITY

Boston Orchestra Omits German Numbers and Plays Only Works of the Modern Composers.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon was devoted to modern compositions. Strange to relate, not a German writer was represented.

Instead, the large audience listened with evident satisfaction to a very Slavio symphony by Glazounow, an ultra-modern tone poem by the father of impressionistic music in France, Cesar Franck, and Bohemian numbers by Smetana and Dvorak.

It was a departure for the Boston musicians to present an entire programme of works of this character, but in so doing they gave new proof of versatility. The numbers were utterly dissimilar, yet full of color, vigor and harmonious effects.

The symphony was read with real spirit, instinct with life and feeling, each phrase of which was well planned and developed.

The overture to Smetana's "Bartered Bride," though familiar, could never be received with any feeling other than admiration when played with such sweeping rhythm, rich tone and brilliant technique as it was yesterday.

"Les Eolides," by Franck, was interesting as an example of the development of thematic material rather than as a musical delight. The dramatic overture "Husitska," by Dvorak, with its fragment of a hymn set in a glorious military environment, brought the concert to a stirring and pleasurable close.

At the next concert of the Boston Orchestra, scheduled for December 4 and 6, Fritz Kreisler, violinist, will assist.

From STAATSZEITUNG
Address: New York City.
Date

Erſtes Konzert der Boſtoner.

Das erſte einer Serie von fünf Konzerten giebt das rühmlichſt bekannte Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter morgen Abend im Opernſaale der Academy of Music unter der Leitung von Dr. Karl Muck. Das gediegene Programm enthält Kompoſitionen von Beethoven, Brahms, Liszt und Wagner. Die Konzerte finden unter der Aegide des Brooklyn Inſtituts für Künſte und Wiſſenſchaften ſtatt.

From SUN
Address: New York City.
Date NOV 9 1913
Establishe

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN MATINEE CONCERT

Glazounov's Fifth Symphony the Principal Number.

SMETANA MOVES SWIFTLY

Cesar Franck's "Les Eolides" Still Not Understood by Public.

The first matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday brought with it a repetition of a more than twice told tale, namely, that of all seats sold and all standing room covered. The music was exclusively instrumental, a fact which gave much comfort to the sincerest lovers of orchestral concerts. The list consisted of Glazounov's fifth symphony, B flat major, opus 55; Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture, Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," and Dvorak's "Husitska" overture.

Glazounov's symphony has figured infrequently in the programmes of New York concerts. It was brought here from Boston by the orchestra heard yesterday and played on December 8, 1906, Dr. Muck conducting. Evidently the director is fond of the composition or he would not have placed it again before a New York audience so early in the season. It is not a creation in the true sense of that word. Admirers of Russian compositions, and particularly of Glazounov, are unceasing in their honorable efforts to convince an idle world that this is important music, but it seems hardly likely that it will ever gain general acceptance as of the first rank.

Recalls Wagner and Others.

To ears habituated to the gifts of local opera houses, the first movement seems to be created chiefly of reminiscences of Wegner, Meyerbeer and Humperdinck. The second, which is the most firmly constructed, is a pretty and engaging scherzo, graceful, piquant and certainly the composer's own. The slow movement is melancholy and superficial. The finale follows the fashion, set by Tschaikowsky, of standing upon the safe ground of nationalism. The themes are Russian and the general development suggests the wild energy of the excited Russian peasant in a khorovod, which in this case ought perhaps for the sake of truth to be called a khorovodka.

Naturally the composition was performed in such a manner as to bring out all that was in it. However, without question, a more brilliant opportunity for Dr. Muck's association of virtuosi was afforded by the Smetana overture, which was played at a marvellous tempo and yet was as clear, fluent and technically excellent as if it had been taken at two-thirds the speed. This performance was an orchestral tour de force, but after all the overture sounds better when played just a little more slowly.

Not Yet Understood.

"Les Eolides" was written on a poem of Leconte Delisle and produced by Lamoureux at the Porte St. Martin in 1876. Vincent D'Indy, the distinguished French composer, in his admirable biography of Franck, notes that "it was not in the least understood by the public." Without doubt the same condition existed yesterday. The composition was permitted to pass without vigorous comment at the hands of its hearers.

Possibly at some millennial time in the golden years to come all music will clarify itself. Obscurity will be rolled together as a scroll and the universal choir of music lovers will be heard chanting the words of Brunnhilde, "Alles wird mir nun frei." In that day there will be no one to say that Cesar Franck's soul dwelt in a region not accessible to common mortals. He will be as easy to comprehend as Franko.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date NOV
Establis

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Plea for "More Generous Criticism" of a Great Orchestra.

To the Editor of the Public Ledger:

Sir—I have just finished reading your critic's faint praise of the superb concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of last evening. It seems unfortunate that the critical faculty so often cannot rise above petty considerations of personal jealousy and should seek to create a rivalry where none can exist.

We all admire the Philadelphia Orchestra as a painstaking body of men, who, under their present leader, have made and are making rapid strides, but, to compare them to an orchestra of picked men with an experience of 32 years, under trained leaders, is an impossibility—there can, as yet, be no rivalry. With the hope, that in the future, we may read a more generous criticism of a great orchestra, that should [illegible] always welcomed by those who care for the finest art, believe me.

Philadelphia, Novem

[52]

From GLOBE
Address: New York
Date NOV 7 1913

First Boston Symphony Concert This Season.

There was nothing to distinguish particularly the first local concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last evening in Carnegie Hall, from many in other seasons. Dr. Karl Muck, tall, thin, and Mephistophelian, again conducted it. The audience again completely filled the hall. It was again necessary to cull one's programme book at the northeast corner of Fifty-seventh street and Seventh avenue, less of a hardship than in cold, windy, or rainy weather, but still a gross absurdity.

To think that in a city of the size and pretensions of New York one must go to the northeast corner of any two streets to find the programme book for a concert in its largest concert hall by the foremost orchestra in the world is a rather disquieting reflection. However, thus and so one must do, unless one is resigned to missing the valuable annotations of Mr. Philip Hale, and there you are! No one that cares for the best music is going to stay away from Boston Symphony concerts if he can help it, for, when one has twice run the gantlet of automobiles and found refuge in Carnegie Hall there is the matchless performance of the Boston band to comfort one.

The programme last night was that with which the orchestra opened its season in Boston; Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Brahms's "Tragic" overture, Liszt's tone poem "Les Préludes," and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture. The performance of that most beautiful of all symphonies, the Seventh of the Immortal Nine, was such as to beggar praise. It seemed as if the scherzo could never have so exulted in its own glory. And the finale left you without the breath to shout the joy that was in you. Miss Isadora Duncan once danced here in public three movements (omitting the first) of this symphony. But neither that gifted woman, nor any other lone, lorn dancer, could have coped long with the symphony as Dr. Muck's men played it last night. It would have taken an infinite and superhuman terpsichorean host, its ascending ranks fading until lost in upper ether, to cope with that performance! It is getting to be a commonplace of orchestral concerts here for the men to rise after some one piece and acknowledge with their conductor the applause. After the Seventh Symphony yesterday such a proceeding seemed merely the inevitable.

It was well that there was a breathing space of ten minutes before the concert went on. The orchestra continued to play with the same virtuosity. If the effect was less, that was only because the material in hand was less. Of this part of the concert, however, the performance of the Brahms overture, impassioned, vital, noble, was something to be remembered long.

PITTS SANBORN.

From TIMES
Address: New York
Date NOV 9 - 1913

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

A Programme of Modern Music at Its Afternoon Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra finished its doings in New York yesterday with its afternoon concert in Carnegie Hall. Dr. Muck gave another exemplification of his ideas about unity of style in programme-making in the programme for this concert, which consisted entirely of modern compositions. The symphony was Glazunow's fifth, apparently one of the best productions of this too fertile Russian composer, who is prone to say much when he has little to say. Dr. Muck had played the symphony here before, seven years ago, and it had previously been played by the Philharmonic Society under Anton Seidl.

There is in it the skill of a master of orchestration and a musician accomplished in the technical resources of his art, in thematic elaboration and formal structure. He must have tunes that win their way speedily, even if he helps himself with charming frankness from Verdi or Wagner. His first two movements are the best; and of these the first is the most valuable in its ideas. It "sounds" and makes an immediate and agreeable impression, even though the way in which the chief theme, obviously Wagnerian in its origin, shapes itself rhythmically, after its suggestion in the introduction becomes rather monotonous. The scherzo, a pretty piece of aerial and delicate orchestration, is suspiciously thin in substance. In the third movement there might desirably be more matter, even with less art; for what the composer says is not really so important as he would make it sound. And in the last he falls too vigorously upon a syncopated tune and drives it hard.

In the overture to Smetana's opera, "The Bartered Bride," the conductor found matter with which to exploit to the very highest the virtuosity of his orchestra. Has this overture ever been played at such a terrific tempo before, and withal so clearly and crisply, made so brilliantly voluble? It may well be doubted. It may also be doubted whether such a speed is really quite the best for the music, and whether it would not sound better taken with a shade less of such breathless haste. César Franck's symphonic poem "Les Eolides" can scarcely claim an important position among his orchestral works, for it is very tenuous, though pretty long. Doubtless it was meant to be only a picturesque and suggestive sketch; and its vaporous charm was wholly represented by the orchestra's performance.

The last number was Dvorak's "Husitska" overture, music in which the solemn proclamation of the Hussite hymn is made effective, and made to count for much through its long development and its combination with a melody of martial aggressiveness.

And so this was a "modern" programme, nothing in which reached very far below the surface of the musical waters. There was a "unity" in it in [illegible] least. Whether or not [illegible]

Address: New York City.
Date NOV 9 1913

MUSIC FROM BOSTON

A Day with the Orchestra and Chamber Musicians.

AN AMIABLE MUSCOVITE

Russian, Czechish, Slavonic and French Compositions.

There was much other music in town yesterday, but that which filled the ears afternoon and evening, of those whose minds are attuned to higher things than opera was chiefly supplied by the Bostonian artists, who have made a monthly visit to the metropolis for many years. Heretofore the visitors have been content to give us orchestral music, but this year Major Higginson's melodious missioners have split themselves into two organizations, the smaller one of which, calling itself the Longy New York Modern Chamber Music Society, has set itself the task of fostering a kind of music for which the local Barrère Ensemble has for some time tried to create a field. Perhaps a patient people, after hearing four hours or so of the very good kind of music which is made in Boston, will be dispensed of using so cumbersome a title and permitted to speak of Mr. Longy and his associates as the Longy Club; if not, it will become a weariness of the flesh to discuss their agreeable entertainments, the first of which began in Aeolian Hall last night, four hours and a half after the Boston Symphony Orchestra had concluded its first afternoon concert in Carnegie Hall.

The afternoon programme, like that of Thursday evening, was unembarrassed by a solo performance, and likewise was made up of music which had been heard here before—some of it very often, some of it not often enough to have had the bloom of novelty rubbed off it. A circumstance worth a word of comment because of its musical character was that the all-pervasive German composer was without representation in either of the day's schemes. The afternoon symphony was by a Russian—Glazounow's fifth, in B flat; after it came two pieces by Czechs—the overture to "The Bartered Bride," by Smetana, and Dvorak's "Husitzka" overture, separated by a symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," by the Belgian César Franck. Mr. Longy gave his hearers music by the Russian, Paul Juon; the Frenchmen Debussy, Louis Aubert and Maurice Ravel, and a stranger to our concert list, who, though he was represented by French music with a French title, bears a name which has an English sound—Henry Woollett. Of his personality it is not given to us to speak.

In spite of all this there is no pressing call for a disquisition on nationalism in music. As a matter of fact there ought, after so much music played by musicians of the same calibre, to be no call for a disquisition of any sort. Three and a half or four hours of music, with only a brief space for rest, refreshment and the other affairs of life, ought to turn the most devoted reviewer into a recorder of events. Fortunately, the patrons of the concerts of our Boston visitors do not need much else; there is so much in their concerts which they have learned to take for granted. The Glazounow symphony in the afternoon evoked great enthusiasm; so it did on March 4 and 5, 1898, when, under the direction of Mr. Seidl, it had its first performances on this side of the Atlantic in concerts of the Philharmonic Society.

Then it brought with it a pleasant feeling of surprise, for the audience was prepared for a rude shock, and it was almost startling to "meet up" with a new Russian (as they would say down Boston way) who was willing to win attention by persuasive methods, instead of arresting it vi et armis, so to speak. Borodin and other wild Muscovites were uppermost in the popular mind, and a Russian who showed some respect for traditional forms of expression was unexpected, to say the least. It was but natural then, as it was again yesterday, that the listeners should yield themselves willing captives to his fine instrumental sonorities, should delight in the fascination of his jocose movement and enjoy his melodies and the treatment which he gave them all the more because they brought with them no need of brain-racking. Where they were more put to it to account for their pleasurable emotions was in the case of the musical delineation which César Franck gave to the somewhat mysterious daughters of Æolus, which some years ago Dr. Frank Damrosch treated as musical pabulum for young people, though it is anything but that. "Les Eolides" is a composition whose value is still open to question. If its composer had given it a motto like the lines in Æschylus's "Prometheus Bound"

"—— Ah, me! again
I hear the sound of flutt'ring nigh; the air
Pants to the soft beat of light-moving wings,

the propriety, if not the adequacy, of its brief subject might have been recognized, though its too extended treatment would still have been monotonous. To ask the listeners to accept it as a musical exposition of the long poem by De Lisle which Mr. Hale printed in his notes on the programme, was asking too much. But perhaps the fortunate ones who had the [illegible] reading the delightful excursion into ancient literature to which the annotator invited them. As for the performance of Smetana's overture, it was a delicious tour de force simply.

It is evidently the conviction of M. Longy, the brilliant hautboyist of the Boston band, that music is like jealousy which "doth make the meat it feeds on"; otherwise he would have hesitated to burden the local list with a new series of concerts in the field which has proved stubborn to M. Barrère and is this season to be occupied also by an organization much like M. Longy's in composition. His first concert had a fine body of intelligent listeners, and he strove to avoid the uquestioned wearisomeness of music of the kind which he is cultivating by mixing it with music for pianoforte, voice and harp. Nevertheless, his first number, the only one which could be called characteristic, was undeniably tedious. It was an octet by Paul Juon for violin (Mr. Theodorowicz), viola (Mr. Rissland), violoncello (Mr. Killer), Mr. Longy (oboe), Mr. Grisez (clarinet), Mr. Hain (horn), Mr. Sadony (bassoon) and Miss Carolyn Beebe (pianoforte). The wind instruments in Mr. Juon's music had an acridity which is never noticeable in the Boston Orchestra, which employs them all, and the composition itself had little to commend it beyond the Russian folk-time episode (in the style of the "Komarniskaia") of the first movement and the obviously national melody of its finale. On the whole, industry rather than inspiration seemed exemplified in the composition.

H. E. K.

MERICAN
New York City.
NOV 9 - 1913

SYMPHONY BILL IS AMPLE PROOF OF VERSATILITY

Boston Orchestra Omits German Numbers and Plays Only Works of the Modern Composers.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon was devoted to modern compositions. Strange to relate, not a German writer was represented.

Instead, the large audience listened with evident satisfaction to a very Slavic symphony by Glazounow, an ultra-modern tone poem by the father of impressionistic music in France, Cesar Franck, and Bohemian numbers by Smetana and Dvorak.

It was a departure for the Boston musicians to present an entire programme of works of this character, but in so doing they gave new proof of versatility. The numbers were utterly dissimilar, yet full of color, vigor and harmonious effects.

The symphony was read with real spirit, instinct with life and feeling, each phrase of which was well planned and developed.

The overture to Smetana's "Bartered Bride," though familiar, could never be received with any feeling other than admiration when played with such sweeping rhythm, rich tone and brilliant technique as it was yesterday.

"Les Eolides," by Franck, was interesting as an example of the development of thematic material rather than as a musical delight. The dramatic overture "Husitska," by Dvorak, with its fragment of a hymn set in a glorious military environment, brought the concert to a stirring and pleasurable close.

At the next concert of the Boston Orchestra, scheduled for December 4 and 6, Fritz Kreisler, violinist, will assist.

---

rom STAATSZEITUNG ddress: New York City.
te ſtes Konzert der Boſtoner.

erſte einer Serie von fünf Koniebt das rühmlichſt bekannte Bo-Symphonie - Orcheſter morgen m Opernſaale der Academy of nter der Leitung von Dr. Karl Das gediegene Programm enthält ſitionen von Beethoven, Brahms, und Wagner. Die Konzerte finden er Aegide des Brooklyn Inſtituts ünſte und Wiſſenſchaften ſtatt.

SUN
New York City.
NOV 9 - 1913

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN MATINEE CONCERT

Glazounov's Fifth Symphony the Principal Number.

SMETANA MOVES SWIFTLY

Cesar Franck's "Les Eolides" Still Not Understood by Public.

The first matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday brought with it a repetition of a more than twice told tale, namely, that of all seats sold and all standing room covered. The music was exclusively instrumental, a fact which gave much comfort to the sincerest lovers of orchestral concerts. The list consisted of Glazounov's fifth symphony, B flat major, opus 55; Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture, Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," and Dvorak's "Husitska" overture.

Glazounov's symphony has figured infrequently in the programmes of New York concerts. It was brought here from Boston by the orchestra heard yesterday and played on December 8, 1906, Dr. Muck conducting. Evidently the director is fond of the composition or he would not have placed it again before a New York audience so early in the season. It is not a creation in the true sense of that word. Admirers of Russian compositions, and particularly of Glazounov, are unceasing in their honorable efforts to convince an idle world that this is important music, but it seems hardly likely that it will ever gain general acceptance as of the first rank.

Recalls Wagner and Others.

To ears habituated to the gifts of local opera houses, the first movement seems to be created chiefly of reminiscences of Wegner, Meyerbeer and Humperdinck. The second, which is the most firmly constructed, is a pretty and engaging scherzo, graceful, piquant and certainly the composer's own. The slow movement is melancholy and superficial. The finale follows the fashion, set by Tschaikowsky, of standing upon the safe ground of nationalism. The themes are Russian and the general development suggests the wild energy of the excited Russian peasant in a khorovod, which in this case ought perhaps for the sake of truth to be called a khorovodka.

Naturally the composition was performed in such a manner as to bring out all that was in it. However, without question, a more brilliant opportunity for Dr. Muck's association of virtuosi was afforded by the Smetana overture, which was played at a marvellous tempo and yet was as clear, fluent and technically excellent as if it had been taken at two-thirds the speed. This performance was an orchestral tour de force, but after all the overture sounds better when played just a little more slowly.

Not Yet Understood.

"Les Eolides" was written on a poem of Leconte Delisle and produced by Lamoureux at the Porte St. Martin in 1876. Vincent D'Indy, the distinguished French composer, in his admirable biography of Franck, notes that "it was not in the least understood by the public." Without doubt the same condition existed yesterday. The composition was permitted to pass without vigorous comment at the hands of its hearers.

Possibly at some millennial time in the golden years to come all music will clarify itself. Obscurity will be rolled together as a scroll and the universal choir of music lovers will be heard chanting the words of Brunnhilde, "Alles wird mir nun frei." In that day there will be no one to say that Cesar Franck's soul dwelt in a region not accessible to common mortals. He will be as easy to comprehend as Franko.

PUBLIC LEDGER
ess Philadelphia
NOV [illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Plea for "More Generous Criticism" of a Great Orchestra.

To the Editor of the Public Ledger:

Sir—I have just finished reading your critic's faint praise of the superb concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of last evening. It seems unfortunate that the critical faculty so often cannot rise above petty considerations of personal jealousy and should seek to create a rivalry where none can exist.

We all admire the Philadelphia Orchestra as a painstaking body of men, who, under their present leader, have made and are making rapid strides, but, to compare them to an orchestra of picked men with an experience of 32 years, under trained leaders, is an impossibility—there can, as yet, be no rivalry. With the hope that in the future we may read a more generous criticism of a great orchestra, that should be always welcomed by those who care for the finest art, [illegible] me,

Philadelphia, Nov[illegible]

[52]

From WORLD
Address: New York City.
Date NOV 9 - 1913

Est

SYMPHONY MUSIC NOT HURT BY A RAINY DAY

Boston Orchestra Again Shows Its Great Skill at Afternoon Concert in Carnegie Hall.

Bad weather for both strings and wood-winds seemed to have little effect upon those choirs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at yesterday afternoon's concert in Carnegie Hall. The musicians played with remarkable spirit, thoroughly satisfying precision and a tone better than should have been expected in the circumstances.

Karl Muck's interpretation of the Glazounow first symphony resulted in a performance of this extremely colorful work little short of ideal. This symphonic music is very different from Beethoven's. In place of the calm classic qualities are the elements which characterize the foremost Russian composers. The scherzo and andante were notably well done, while the stirring allegro gave the Boston men full opportunity to display their snap and freedom of style.

Perhaps the finest achievement of the afternoon was the performance of Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride." Here the absolute technical unanimity and the effects in tonal shading left nothing to be desired.

Caesar Franck's symphonic poem "Eolides," most interesting because of its graceful instrumental treatment, and the Dvorak overture, "Hutsitska," completed the programme, which was appreciated by a large audience.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

Esta 884

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Rare Numbers by Master-Composers Played With Deepest Sympathy.

In regard to one agency of culture, at least, Brooklyn does herself proud. The great audiences which she turns out to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be a credit to any city in the world. The return of the orchestra, last night, to begin its new series, showed that every seat had been sold for the season, while there is a waiting list of 250 applicants, which means that the Institute could sell nearly 500 more seats for these concerts if the Academy had a third gallery, as originally planned and still may be constructed.

Dr. Muck has begun his new season in the spirit of peace on earth good will to men. The programme with which he opened his Carnegie Hall and his Brooklyn concerts had none of the striving or unrest of the modern school, and never for one bar did it raise the question, "What is music?" which rises in an angry glow from some of the combinations of Strauss and Debussy. It began with Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony," the centennial of whose first performance comes next month, and the most modern number on the programme, Brahms' "Tragic Overture," sounded the most like Beethoven. Indeed, if the programme offered any puzzle at all, it is why Dr. Muck chose to follow the symphony with this overture and rob both of those works of the effect of contrast. The harmonic material of both compositions and their general character are much alike, such contrast as there is coming from the inner spirit and being in that way difficult to grasp. If the two works are to be played in the same concert, it would seem the part of wisdom to separate them by a sharply contrasting number. That, at least, would be the psychologic plan of programme making, to which Theodore Thomas gave the weight of his long and successful experience.

But last night's audience of devoted music lovers was content to welcome back the superb orchestra on any terms which Dr. Muck chose to impose. The hearers basked eagerly in the sunshine of Beethoven's serene harmonies, which Wagner described as "the apotheosis of the dance," and they were hushed to intense attention by the pianissimos, especially in the second movement, in which the unrivaled delicacy and the unmatched beauty of tone of this orchestra reached their greatest perfection. It was a fine example of extreme virtuosity put to its proper use, the interpretation of beautiful music. And the orchestra well deserved the applause with which the audience showered upon it at the symphony's close.

The closely knit harmonies of Brahms' overture were followed with equal absorption, while the succession of the two compositions of the Beethoven style made very welcome and restful the smoothly flowing melodies of Liszt's "Les Preludes." That music was made familiar to Brooklyn twenty years ago, when it was a favorite on the programmes of Anton Seidl, but Seidl never had a brass choir of such golden tone as that which last night poured the very essence of virile beauty through those passages which the horns led. The [illegible] of contrast came from Wag- [illegible] to "The Flying Dutch- [illegible] tone came as a stimulating relief after an evening which, however great its beauty, had yet tended toward monotony. Nobody has to "fix his mind" on Wagner. Wagner takes care of that, and as a rousement for a departing audience his "Flying Dutchman" over ture is capital.

This, the finest of all orchestras, will be Brooklyn again on Friday, December 5, with Fritz Kreisler as soloist.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

Estab 884

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS UNASSISTED

Dr. Carl Muck Leads Programme of Classics in Crowded Opera House.

SEVENTH SYMPHONY PLAYED

Musicians Face Unique Situation for Season.

Boston's proudest artistic boast is in danger of being adopted by New York. Playing last night its first Brooklyn concert of the season, sandwiched in between its two initial appearances in Manhattan, the famous symphony orchestra endowed by Major Higginson faces a unique condition. All seats for the five concerts at the Academy of Music have been claimed by subscribers, and at Carnegie Hall a like situation prevails. Casual concert-goers in the greater city have no chance at all to hear the greatest orchestra in the world. The cry for more concerts in both boroughs next season is insistent, and the suggestion that Dr. Muck's band move down here bag and baggage is next in order.

Last night's Boston Symphony concert was one of pure classic delight. Beethoven, Brahms, Liszt and Wagner made up the programme. There was no assisting soloist, and no regrets were heard. Surely this remarkable orchestra is capable of playing an entire programme without help. Dr. Muck thought so, and has planned his opening concert in each city this year with a view to educating his public as to the capabilities of his musicians unassisted and alone. Furthermore, there were no sensations of any sort—no new selections, no revolutionary readings, nothing unexpected—merely music, nothing more.

At 8:20, with all seats filled, the slender, youthful figure of the German conductor stood back of the banking of flowers that centred in a prodigious cluster of chrysanthemums. There is very little fuss or mannerism about Dr. Muck. He is all for dignity and earnestness. His first and most pretentious number, the Seventh Symphony, said to be Beethoven's best, developed nothing new, depending for its appeal upon the charm of which everyone has always been aware. This symphony has caused many wise heads to wag in debate as to whether it is really the "apotheosis of the dance," as characterized by Wagner, or whether its meaning is something entirely different. As Dr. Muck gave it last evening it might have been dance music of the most genuine sort. The rhythm throughout was pronounced and unmistakable. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, so rich in individual worth as well as as in ensemble playing, offers wonderful facalities for doing justice to the numerous dialogues of the symphony. Snatches of melody were tossed about from oboe to flute, to clarinet, horns and strings, with marvelous smoothness.

A rising vote of appreciation of the audience's tribute of applause was recorded by the entire orchestra at the close. A corps of heavy brass specialists joined as reinforcements for the next number, the "tragic" overture of Brahms. This is a sombre, impressive selection. Following so closely upon the vari-colored symphony, it seemed somewhat obvious and commonplace. But the one mood which it did portray was pictured faithfully and effectively by the Bostonians. Tragedy as Brahms conceived it is a thing absolute and unrelieved.

From this the next step was a big jump, all the way to the melodious, ever-pleasing Liszt symphonic tone-poem, "Les Preludes." Here the providers of tones in brass fairly outdid themselves. The climax of the life-and-love story, with its solid foundation of two dozen horns in harmony, was as effective a passage as could be imagined. Again the applause was loud, and the orchestra hurried on to its finale. This was the old familiar "Flying Dutchman" overture of Wagner, smacking of the very sea. An excellent wind-up piece, it was polished off with vigor and dispatch, and the audience was homeward bound before 10:15.

Soloists are provided for the remaining concerts of the Academy season, Kreisler and Paderewski being foremost on the list. But at least this once the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that organization without a superior anywhere, was sufficient for an evening of rare profit—intellectual and classic, to be sure, but entertaining as well, and in every sense of the word worth while.

From TIMES
Address: New York
Date NOV 9 -

Establ 4

MR. LONGY'S CHAMBER

A New Society of Wind an Players Heard for the First

The cultivation of chamber for wind instruments has for been rather precarious in New George Barrère has succeeded lab ly in gathering a public for it; a season two new organizations ha dertaken to arouse further pub terest in this style. The first o made its appearance last evening in Aeolian Hall, being the "Longy New York Modern Chamber Music Society." Its attention is to be directed, however, to a special form of chamber music in which wind and stringed instruments, co-operate, and, as its name suggests, to "modern" music in this form. Georges Longy, the admirable oboist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is its director, and the other players are also members of that orchestra, except Miss Carolyn Beebe, a New York pianist.

Mr. Longy and his associates, of course, have long been playing this kind of music in Boston, and they bring with them to New York consummate skill and a perfection of ensemble attained through long experience and an intimate mutual understanding. Consequently, the new organization made an admirable impression, so far as its playing was concerned. But it may be hoped that the literature of modern chamber music for wind and strings has something more interesting to offer than the octet by Paul Juon, Op. 27, which was the principal number of this first programme.

Although Juon has composed a good deal of music, especially chamber music, he is better known in New York as the translator of Modeste Tschaikowsky's life of his brother Peter than as a composer. This octet is by no means a favorable specimen of his musical inspiration. It is singularly lacking in significant thematic invention, and is prolix in its development of ideas unimportant in themselves. The most interesting passages are furnished by themes of the Russian folk-song character in the first and last movements. Nor has the composer been fortunate in his instrumental coloring, in the combination of violin, viola, violoncello, oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon, and piano. There is more that is bizarre than beautiful or even interesting in the results he attains.

Mrs. Marie Sundelius, soprano, sang songs by Debussy, "Ballade"; Louis Aubert, "Le Rêve du petit chaperon rouge," from the opera "Le Forêt Blue," produced last season in Boston, and Henry Woollett, "Des Harpes dans le Soir," all of moderate interest and in the most advanced modern French idiom. She has obviously a strong sympathy with the style, and sang the songs with full conviction.

Last upon the programme was an Introduction and Allegro for harp by Maurice Ravel, played by Mr. A. Holy the Boston Orchestra, accompanied string quartet, flute, and clarinet.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

Establ 84

Unassisted Music.

Dr. Carl Muck, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, insists that his musicians be heard at their first Brooklyn appearance this season "without the sensation of a visiting artist." The announcement is coupled with the news that every seat for the series of concerts at the Academy of Music has already been snapped up by the subscribers. The women of the auxiliary board exclaim that there should be ten such events a year, not five.

"The sensation of a visiting artist"—in other words, the prima donna fever transferred from its operatic habitat to the realm of symphony; the feeling that there must be a name in red capitals to smite one between the eyes when passing the billboard, otherwise the concert is no event. But is there such an attitude among patrons of the symphony? At the concerts of the Boston orchestra usually one-third or one-fourth of the programme is monopolized by the assisting artist. So great is the hold of the devoted players under the baton of Dr. Muck upon their audiences that more frequently than otherwise regrets are heard that they do not play right through from start to finish.

Great is Kreisler; wonderful is the only Paderewski, but in the affections of music-lovers they surely hold no higher place than the incomparable organization of 101 specialists welded into a melodic and harmonic whole by the stick of Dr. Muck. Transporting coals to Scranton is no more incongruous than inviting even the greatest virtuoso to add lustre to the Boston Symphony.

Of course there are concertos calling for co-operation of soloist and orchestra. A demand for these exists and it must be supplied. But there is no reason why Dr. Muck should feel that his request concerning visiting sensations needs an elaborate defense. More of his orchestra's playing, [illegible]

From POST
Address: New York
Date NOV [illegible] 1913

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra always seems well-nigh, if not absolutely, perfect to its enthusiastic patrons (particularly in New York, where it always does its best to live up to its reputation); but the keen ears of a specialist like Dr. Karl Muck detect flaws which escape others. Consequently, he, just like his friend, Josef Stransky, of our Philharmonic (which has just been so cordially applauded and praised in Boston), has made some changes in his orchestra which doubtless helped to make last night's concert in Carnegie Hall a marvel of precision, color, and shading. Truly, orchestral virtuosity can go no farther. After two of the numbers—Beethoven's seventh symphony and Liszt's "Les Préludes"—the applause persisted until the conductor had made his players get on their feet to share it.

Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture also was loudly acclaimed, and if there was less applause after the "Tragic Overture," the fault was not that of Karl Muck, but of Johannes Brahms, who nodded dreadfully when he wrote this wearisome composition, which is neither tragic nor otherwise appealing. It cannot be named on the same day with his eloquent and stirring "Academic Overture," which was composed about the same time.

Dr. Muck's interpretation of the seventh symphony made its strongest appeal to music-lovers who do not believe in individual "readings," like those in which Wagner and most of his disciples—among them Richter, Seidl, Nikisch, Mottl, and Mahler—have indulged. But it was enjoyable as an exemplification of the classical spirit as usually understood. In the "Flying Dutchman" overture one listened in vain for Mahler's shrill piccolos whistling in the masts; yet the performance of this piece was quite stormy, and not, like Mr. Gericke's (as Mr. Henderson once noted), suggestive of Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage."

---

n MORNING TELEGRAPH
ress: New York 1913 sh 84

BOSTON SYMPHONY BACK ONCE MORE

Performs, Among Other Numbers, Caesar Franck's Symphonic Poem, "The Children of Aeolus."

DR. KARL MUCK THE COUDUCTOR

Fifth Symphony by Glazounoff, a Writer of the Russian School, Is Also Given.

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRENON.

Caesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Children of Aeolus," was performed yesterday at the Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall. The frequenters of these concerts are presented with a small and valua book rich in information, much of it more historical and literary than m sical. This contained many words, cluding a well-phrased translation fr the Odyssey, dealing with the mytholo of the children of the King of the Wind I did not secure my pamphlet yeste day afternoon, and I had, perforce, t content myself with a simple announcement on the house programmes, which ran: "'Les Aeolides,' a symphonic poem by Caesar Franck," and also with the music as played by Doctor Karl Muck and his assistants.

That music was masculine, forceful and original enough, but had we not been specifically told that it had reference to passages of Homer and Virgil how could we have divined its meaning and secondary intention?

One is inclined to say that in this matter of programme music, there is much fallacy. One programmatist calls one of his works, "Thus spoke Zarathustra." Can Zoroastian philosophy be enunciated by musical instruments, however eloquent? The domains of literature and poetry overlap; but they do not coincide.

To the symphony by Glazonnoff, a writer of the Russian school, also given yesterday, no literary description was offered, save that it was his fifth, and in the key of B flat. But after the first movement one thought that it might have been called the Fifth or "Rheingold" Symphony, so unblushing was the stealing and the marring in the stealing, of the musical ideas and effects of the prologue of the "Ring of the Nibelung." The other movements [illegible]

From WORLD
Address: New York City. NOV 9 - 1913
Date
Est

SYMPHONY MUSIC NOT HURT BY A RAINY DAY

Boston Orchestra Again Shows Its Great Skill at Afternoon Concert in Carnegie Hall.

Bad weather for both strings and wood-winds seemed to have little effect upon those choirs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at yesterday afternoon's concert in Carnegie Hall. The musicians played with remarkable spirit, thoroughly satisfying precision and a tone better than should have been expected in the circumstances.

Karl Muck's interpretation of the Glazounow first symphony resulted in a performance of this extremely colorful work little short of ideal. This symphonic music is very different from Beethoven's. In place of the calm classic qualities are the elements which characterize the foremost Russian composers. The scherzo and andante were notably well done, while the stirring allegro gave the Boston men full opportunity to display their snap and freedom of style.

Perhaps the finest achievement of the afternoon was the performance of Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride." Here the absolute technical unanimity and the effects in tonal shading left nothing to be desired.

Caesar Franck's symphonic poem "Eolides," most interesting because of its graceful instrumental treatment, and the Dvorak overture, "Hutsitska," completed the programme, which was appreciated by a large audience.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date
Esta 884

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Rare Numbers by Master-Composers Played With Deepest Sympathy.

In regard to one agency of culture, at least, Brooklyn does herself proud. The great audiences which she turns out to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be a credit to any city in the world. The return of the orchestra, last night, to begin its new series, showed that every seat had been sold for the season, while there is a waiting list of 250 applicants, which means that the Institute could sell nearly 500 more seats for these concerts if the Academy had a third gallery, as originally planned and still may be constructed.

Dr. Muck has begun his new season in the spirit of peace on earth good will to men. The programme with which he opened his Carnegie Hall and his Brooklyn concerts had none of the striving or unrest of the modern school, and never for one bar did it raise the question, "What is music?" which rises in an angry glow from some of the combinations of Strauss and Debussy. It began with Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony," the centennial of whose first performance comes next month, and the most modern number on the programme, Brahms' "Tragic Overture," sounded the most like Beethoven. Indeed, if the programme offered any puzzle at all, it is why Dr. Muck chose to follow the symphony with this overture and rob both of those works of the effect of contrast. The harmonic material of both compositions and their general character are much alike, such contrast as there is coming from the inner spirit and being in that way difficult to grasp. If the two works are to be played in the same concert, it would seem the part of wisdom to separate them by a sharply contrasting number. That, at least, would be the psychologic plan of programme making, to which Theodore Thomas gave the weight of his long and successful experience.

But last night's audience of devoted music lovers was content to welcome back the superb orchestra on any terms which Dr. Muck chose to impose. The hearers basked eagerly in the sunshine of Beethoven's serene harmonies, which Wagner described as "the apotheosis of the dance," and they were hushed to intense attention by the pianissimos, especially in the second movement, in which the unrivaled delicacy and the unmatched beauty of tone of this orchestra reached their greatest perfection. It was a fine example of extreme virtuosity put to its proper use, the interpretation of beautiful music. And the orchestra well deserved the applause with which the audience showered upon it at the symphony's close.

The closely knit harmonies of Brahms' overture were followed with equal absorption, while the succession of the two compositions of the Beethoven style made very welcome and restful the smoothly flowing melodies of Liszt's "Les Preludes." That music was made familiar to Brooklyn twenty years ago, when it was a favorite on the programmes of Anton Seidl, but Seidl never had a brass choir of such golden tone as that which last night poured the very essence of virile beauty through those passages which the horns led. The real sense of contrast came from Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutch- [illegible]

[illegible] tone came as a stimulating relief after an evening which, however great its beauty, had yet tended toward monotony. Nobody has to "fix his mind" on Wagner. Wagner takes care of that, and as a rousement for a departing audience his "Flying Dutchman" over ture is capital.

This, the finest of all orchestras, will be [illegible] Brooklyn again on Friday, December 5, with Fritz Kreisler as soloist.

From STANDARD UNION
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date
Estab 884

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS UNASSISTED

Dr. Carl Muck Leads Programme of Classics in Crowded Opera House.

SEVENTH SYMPHONY PLAYED

Musicians Face Unique Situation for Season.

Boston's proudest artistic boast is in danger of being adopted by New York. Playing last night its first Brooklyn concert of the season, sandwiched in between its two initial appearances in Manhattan, the famous symphony orchestra endowed by Major Higginson faces a unique condition. All seats for the five concerts at the Academy of Music have been claimed by subscribers, and at Carnegie Hall a like situation prevails. Casual concert-goers in the greater city have no chance at all to hear the greatest orchestra in the world. The cry for more concerts in both boroughs next season is insistent, and the suggestion that Dr. Muck's band move down here bag and baggage is next in order.

Last night's Boston Symphony concert was one of pure classic delight. Beethoven, Brahms, Liszt and Wagner made up the programme. There was no assisting soloist, and no regrets were heard. Surely this remarkable orchestra is capable of playing an entire programme without help. Dr. Muck thought so, and has planned his opening concert in each city this year with a view to educating his public as to the capabilities of his musicians unassisted and alone. Furthermore, there were no sensations of any sort—no new selections, no revolutionary readings, nothing unexpected—merely music, nothing more.

At 8:20, with all seats filled, the slender, youthful figure of the German conductor stood back of the banking of flowers that centred in a prodigious cluster of chrysanthemums. There is very little fuss or mannerism about Dr. Muck. He is all for dignity and earnestness. His first and most pretentious number, the Seventh Symphony, said to be Beethoven's best, developed nothing new, depending for its appeal upon the charm of which everyone has always been aware. This symphony has caused many wise heads to wag in debate as to whether it is really the "apotheosis of the dance," as characterized by Wagner, or whether its meaning is something entirely different. As Dr. Muck gave it last evening it might have been dance music of the most genuine sort. The rhythm throughout was pronounced and unmistakable. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, so rich in individual worth as well as as in ensemble playing, offers wonderful facalities for doing justice to the numerous dialogues of the symphony. Snatches of melody were tossed about from oboe to flute, to clarinet, horns and strings, with marvelous smoothness.

A rising vote of appreciation of the audience's tribute of applause was recorded by the entire orchestra at the close. A corps of heavy brass specialists joined as reinforcements for the next number, the "tragic" overture of Brahms. This is a sombre, impressive selection. Following so closely upon the vari-colored symphony, it seemed somewhat obvious and commonplace. But the one mood which it did portray was pictured faithfully and effectively by the Bostonians. Tragedy as Brahms conceived it is a thing absolute and unrelieved.

From this the next step was a big jump, all the way to the melodious, ever-pleasing Liszt symphonic tone-poem, "Les Preludes." Here the providers of tones in brass fairly outdid themselves. The climax of the life-and-love story, with its solid foundation of two dozen horns in harmony, was as effective a passage as could be imagined. Again the applause was loud, and the orchestra hurried on to its finale. This was the old familiar "Flying Dutchman" overture of Wagner, smacking of the very sea. An excellent wind-up piece, it was polished off with vigor and dispatch, and the audience was homeward bound before 10:15.

Soloists are provided for the remaining concerts of the Academy season, Kreisler and Paderewski being foremost on the list. But at least this once the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that organization without a superior anywhere, was sufficient for an evening of rare profit—intellectual and classic, to be sure, but entertaining as well, and in every sense of the word worth while.

From TIMES
Address: New York
Date NOV 9 - 1913
Establi 884

MR. LONGY'S CHAMBER MUSIC

A New Society of Wind and String Players Heard for the First Time.

The cultivation of chamber music for wind instruments has for years been rather precarious in New York. George Barrère has succeeded laboriously in gathering a public for it; and this season two new organizations have undertaken to arouse further public interest in this style. The first of these made its appearance last evening in Aeolian Hall, being the "Longy New York Modern Chamber Music Society." Its attention is to be directed, however, to a special form of chamber music in which wind and stringed instruments, co-operate, and, as its name suggests, to "modern" music in this form. Georges Longy, the admirable oboist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is its director, and the other players are also members of that orchestra, except Miss Carolyn Beebe, a New York pianist.

Mr. Longy and his associates, of course, have long been playing this kind of music in Boston, and they bring with them to New York consummate skill and a perfection of ensemble attained through long experience and an intimate mutual understanding. Consequently, the new organization made an admirable impression, so far as its playing was concerned. But it may be hoped that the literature of modern chamber music for wind and strings has something more interesting to offer than the octet by Paul Juon, Op. 27, which was the principal number of this first programme.

Although Juon has composed a good deal of music, especially chamber music, he is better known in New York as the translator of Modeste Tschaikowsky's life of his brother Peter than as a composer. This octet is by no means a favorable specimen of his musical inspiration. It is singularly lacking in significant thematic invention, and is prolix in its development of ideas unimportant in themselves. The most interesting passages are furnished by themes of the Russian folk-song character in the first and last movements. Nor has the composer been fortunate in his instrumental coloring, in the combination of violin, viola, violoncello, oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon, and piano. There is more that is bizarre than beautiful or even interesting in the results he attains.

Mrs. Marie Sundelius, soprano, sang songs by Debussy, "Ballade"; Louis Aubert, "Le Rêve du petit chaperon rouge," from the opera "La Forêt Blue," produced last season in Boston, and Henry Woollett, "Des Harpes dans le Soir," all of moderate interest and in the most advanced modern French idiom. She has obviously a strong sympathy with the style, and sang the songs with full conviction.

Last upon the programme was an Introduction and Allegro for harp by Maurice Ravel, played by Mr. A. Holy of the Boston Orchestra, accompanied by string quartet, flute, and clarinet.

From STANDARD UNIC
Address: Brooklyn
Date
Establ

Unassisted Music.

Dr. Carl Muck, director of Boston Symphony Orchestra, insists that his musicians be heard at their first Brooklyn appearance this season "without the sensation of a visiting artist." The announcement is coupled with the news that every seat for the series of concerts at the Academy of Music has already been snapped up by the subscribers. The women of the auxiliary board exclaim that there should be ten such events a year, not five.

"The sensation of a visiting artist"—in other words, the prima donna fever transferred from its operatic habitat to the realm of symphony; the feeling that there must be a name in red capitals to smite one between the eyes when passing the billboard, otherwise the concert is no event. But is there such an attitude among patrons of the symphony? At the concerts of the Boston orchestra usually one-third or one-fourth of the programme is monopolized by the assisting artist. So great is the hold of the devoted players under the baton of Dr. Muck upon their audiences that more frequently than otherwise regrets are heard that they do not play right through from start to finish.

Great is Kreisler; wonderful is the only Paderewski, but in the affections of music-lovers they surely hold no higher place than the incomparable organization of 101 specialists welded into a melodic and harmonic whole by the stick of Dr. Muck. Transporting coals to Scranton is no more incongruous than inviting even the greatest virtuoso to add lustre to the Boston Symphony.

Of course there are concertos calling for co-operation of soloist and orchestra. A demand for these exists and it must be supplied. But there is no reason why Dr. Muck should feel that his request concerning visiting sensations needs an elaborate defense. More of his orchestra's playing, [illegible]

53

NOV [illegible] 1913

[illegible] AND DRAMA

[illegible] Symphony Orchestra.

[illegible] Symphony Orchestra always [illegible] gh, if not absolutely, perfect [illegible] usiastic patrons (particularly in [illegible] where it always does its best to [illegible] its reputation); but the keen ears [illegible] specialist like Dr. Karl Muck detect flaws which escape others. Consequently, he, just like his friend, Josef Stransky, of our Philharmonic (which has just been so cordially applauded and praised in Boston), has made some changes in his orchestra which doubtless helped to make last night's concert in Carnegie Hall a marvel of precision, color, and shading. Truly, orchestral virtuosity can go no farther. After two of the numbers—Beethoven's seventh symphony and Liszt's "Les Préludes"—the applause persisted until the conductor had made his players get on their feet to share it.

Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture also was loudly acclaimed, and if there was less applause after the "Tragic Overture," the fault was not that of Karl Muck, but of Johannes Brahms, who nodded dreadfully when he wrote this wearisome composition, which is neither tragic nor otherwise appealing. It cannot be named on the same day with his eloquent and stirring "Academic Overture," which was composed about the same time.

Dr. Muck's interpretation of the seventh symphony made its strongest appeal to music-lovers who do not believe in individual "readings," like those in which Wagner and most of his disciples—among them Richter, Seidl, Nikisch, Mottl, and Mahler—have indulged. But it was enjoyable as an exemplification of the classical spirit as usually understood. In the "Flying Dutchman" overture one listened in vain for Mahler's shrill piccolos whistling in the masts; yet the performance of this piece was quite stormy, and not, like Mr. Gericke's (as Mr. Henderson once noted), suggestive of Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage."

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York
Date [illegible] 1913
Establish

BOSTON SYMPHONY BACK ONCE MORE

Performs, Among Other Numbers, Caesar Franck's Symphonic Poem, "The Children of Aeolus."

DR. KARL MUCK THE COUDUCTOR

Fifth Symphony by Glazouno[illegible] Writer of the Russian Scho[illegible] Is Also Given.

By ALGERNON ST. JOHN-BRE[illegible]

Caesar Franck's symphonic [illegible] "The Children of Aeolus," was [illegible] formed yesterday at the Boston [illegible] phony concert at Carnegie Hall. [illegible] frequenters of these concerts [illegible] presented with a small and valu[illegible] book rich in information, much [illegible] more historical and literary than [illegible] sical. This contained many words, [illegible] cluding a well-phrased translation fr[illegible] the Odyssey, dealing with the mythol[illegible] of the children of the King of the Win[illegible] I did not secure my pamphlet yeste[illegible] day afternoon, and I had, perforce, t[illegible] content myself with a simple announcement on the house programmes, which ran: "'Les Aeolides,' a symphonic poem by Caesar Franck," and also with the music as played by Doctor Karl Muck and his assistants.

That music was masculine, forceful and original enough, but had we not been specifically told that it had reference to passages of Homer and Virgil how could we have divined its meaning and secondary intention?

One is inclined to say that in this matter of programme music, there is much fallacy. One programmatist calls one of his works, "Thus spoke Zarathustra." Can Zoroastian philosophy be enunciated by musical instruments, however eloquent? The domains of literature and poetry overlap; but they do not coincide.

To the symphony by Glazonnoff, a writer of the Russian school, also given yesterday, no literary description was offered, save that it was his fifth, and in the key of B flat. But after the first movement one thought that it might have been called the Fifth or "Rheingold" Symphony, so unblushing was the stealing and the marring in the stealing, of the musical ideas and effects of the prologue of the "Ring of the Nibelungs." The other movements, [illegible] of any [illegible] their exterior, were [illegible] music of the higher grade of inspiration.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra appears in New York but twelve times a year, though to judge by the state of the houses that greet it, it would be welcomed triple that number of times. We are inclined humbly to request the judicious, accomplished and sincere conductor of the visiting musicians to play for us some of the music that local directors cannot or will not play.

The concert also included Smetana's slightly tawdry jeu d'esprit, the overture to "The Bartered Bride," and Dvorak's "Husitska" overture.

There was no soloist, and no one minded in the least.

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York
Date NOV 10 191

MR. LONGY SHOWS US A NEW CHAMBER MUSIC ORGANIZATION

The Longy New York Modern Chamber Music Society, something big—long, at least—in title, gave its first concert in Aeolian Hall on Saturday night. The founder and conductor is Georges Longy, the distinguished oboeist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his associates are members of that famous body of musicians. They were assisted on Saturday night by Carolyn Beebe, pianist; Marie Sundelius, soprano, and Alfred Holy, harpist. The programme included compositions by Paul Juon, Debussy, Louis Aubert, Hery Woollett and Maurice Ravel. The results were not altogether as satisfactory as might have been wished, nevertheless, there was much that was enjoyable in the entertainment and future concerts by Mr. Longy's organization may rival, perhaps, those of the Barrere ensemble, which is really our own, and has established itself.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS GLAZOUNOW'S FIFTH SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first afternoon concert of the season at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon to, as usual, a crowded house. The symphony was Glazounow's fifth and the other numbers were Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture, Cesar Franck's "Leo Eolides" symphonic

---

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV

RARE CONCERT AT THE ACADEMY

Boston Orchestra in Its Best Form.

SUPFRB PLAYING MARKS OPENING OF SERIES HERE

Dr. Muck Leads in Eloquent Interpretations of Works by Beethoven, Brahms, Liszt and Wagner—Audience Fills the Opera House.

Before an audience which occupied every seat in the opera house of the Academy of Music, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening opened its series of five Brooklyn concerts, playing so superbly that its appearances bid fair to be accepted as even more important than in the past. The orchestra was in excellent form, and the conductor, Dr. Muck, at his best. There was much enthusiasm throughout, and at the close of the symphony, Beethoven's Seventh, there was so much applause that Dr. Muck had the orchestra members stand to share it with him.

The orchestra's famous tone was as satisfying as ever, full, rich, warm, with a body and color that stirred admiration. The strings and woodwinds were exceptionally good, in fact, the harmony between the various choirs and the perfection of the ensemble were well nigh unsurpassable.

Some exquisite effects in pianissimo were achieved, while the climaxes were sonorous, virile, with no trace of the blatant or flamboyant. The phrasing, notably in the symphony and Brahms' "Tragic" overture, was most effective.

There were no strivings after novel effects in the reading of the symphony, rather an assured interpretation, authoritative, eloquent. There was a splendid dignity in the nobler passages, a delightful spirit of lightness in the dainty third movement. All in all, this one performance was worthy of a place in one's memory of fine things nobly done.

An inspired reading of the Brahms overture brought a storm of applause. It was admirably expressive throughout, with telling modulations in tempo and shading, and, withal, full of appeal to the emotions. The melancholy musing of the woodwinds were developed extraordinarily well.

That popular number, Liszt's "Les Preludes," with its deft use of the old Crusaders' song which of late years has come to life in "For He's a Jolly Good Fellow," was as well played as were its predecessors, the audience betokening its appreciation in no uncertain tones.

The programme was brought to a close with a striking performance of the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman." It [illegible]

From PRESS
Address: New York City.
Date NOV 9 - 1913

Estab 1884

LONGY AND ASSOCIATES IN CHAMBER CONCERT

New Boston Organization Delights at First Appearance Here.

What with the Kneisel, Flonzaley, Saslavsky, Max Jacobs, Kaufman and Zoellner quartets, the Adele Margulies Trio, the Barrere Ensemble, the Philharmonic Ensemble, which will soon make its first appearance in public, and sundry other instrumental fraternities, New York is not likely to suffer from a dearth of chamber music concerts this season.

It is doubtful, however, whether any of those organizations will play to a larger gathering than that which attended in Aeolian Hall last night, the first performance given in this city by an aggregation of musicians who bear the redoubtable name of "The Longy New York Modern Chamber Music Society."

Georges Lonzy, expert oboist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is the moving spirit in the association, and the nine other members, including J. Theodorowicz, formerly second violin of the Kneisel Quartet, are all fellow-players in that famous body of virtuosi.

There was good reason, therefore, why almost every seat last night should be occupied.

Last nigght's programme, which included an octet (opus 27), for violin, viola, 'cello, oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon and piano, by Paul Juon, and an "Introduction et Allegro" for harp solo, with string quartet, flute and clarinet, by the interesting Maurice Ravel, enlisted not only the services of the ten members of the Longy, etc., Society, but also of Miss Carolyn Beebe, pianist; of Alfred Holy, harp player, and of Marie Sundelius, a soprano.

Miss Sundelius's limpid voice was heard to advantage in songs by Debussy, Louis Aubert and Henry Woollett.

That the music itself and the way it was performed afforded a good deal of enjoyment to most of the listeners, including the distinguished founders and patronesses of the Longy enterprise, was perfectly evident throughout the evening.

From PRESS
Address: New York City.
Date

Estab 1884

FIRST MATINEE GIVEN BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Dr. Karl Muck and His Musicians Heard in Carnegie Hall.

Dr. Karl Muck might have chosen a more interesting programme for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first matinee of the season yesterday in Carnegie Hall. But the list of contributions, which embraced Glazounoff's Symphony in B flat major, No. 5, Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride," Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Aeolidae," and Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska," had the distinct advantage of brevity, enabling suburbanites to start for their trains shortly after 4 o'clock. Furthermore it enabled the conductor to exhibit the virtuosic proficiency of his disciples in the brighest light.

Except in the somewhat monotonous Andante of the Russian symphony and in Franck's "Les Eolides," the strength and endurance of the experts from the Hub were taxed to the utmost. Glazounoff's score, which surely would have employed a celesta, as well as a triangle, cymbals and little bells, had it been written in recent years instead of in 1895, does not spare any of the instruments in the orchestra, least of all the brass, and Smetana's fascinating overture, taken at terrific speed, is something of a gymnastic feat, particularly for the buzzing bass-viols.

A more brilliant performance than Dr. Muck and his men gave of the Glazounoff symphony, which had not been played in New York, it seems, since March, 1898, when the Philharmonic Society, under Anton Seidl, brought the work forward for the first time in the United States, it would be difficult to imagine. Despite its melodic exuberance, rhythmical forcefulness and splendid instrumental sonority, however, the composition hardly would bear frequent hearing, though the grimly graceful and humorous Scherzo has an irresistible charm. One need not attach too much significance to the occasional reminders of Wagner and other composers, to be sure. But after all the resplendent exterior of the musical picture, with its triumphant conclusion, is not filled to overflowing with vital thoughts and feelings.

Fascinating, too, was Dr. Muck's interpretation of the Smetana overture. If it lacked some of the delicacy and transparency of texture one recalls in Gustav Mahler's performances in the Metropolitan Opera House, that was due solely, no doubt, to the fact that the Boston conductor, unlike the other master of the baton, used the original instrumentation.

MAX SMITH.

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 4 - 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Geraldine Farrar as Soloist at Season's First Concert.

With Geraldine Farrar as the soloist the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its season at the Academy of Music last evening, the attraction being great enough to fill the auditorium, despite the fact that this initial concert was coincidental with the first night of the opera.

The symphony itself was Beethoven's work in A major, the Seventh Symphony, which was played with great subtlety under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck. The phrasing was wonderful, and unusual restraint marked the entire interpretation, a restraint which, by its very excellence, produced a feeling of wonderment on the part of the auditor and tended somewhat to detract from the mere sensuous enjoyment of the music by making the appreciation largely intellectual.

Nevertheless, this rendition of the Seventh Symphony is a thing to be remembered as a masterpiece of conducting exercised over a body of musicians whose work as an orchestra is well-nigh perfect.

There were no orchestral novelties on the program, although Haendel's concerto for two wind choirs is so seldom heard that it might almost be counted as one. The second movement of this Haendel number was particularly well appreciated by the audience.

Miss Farrar's contributions to the program consisted of three Wagnerian poems: "In Treibhaus," "Trauemc" and "Schmerzen" and a recitative and aria from Mozart's opera, "Cosi fan tutte."

Despite the fact that she appeared to be suffering from a cold, her voice was exquisitely clear and true, and her enunciation of both the Italian and the German texts was so perfect that every word was intelligible. The musical settings by Wagner were given as one number, at the close of which, as well as after the Mozart selection, she was recalled to the stage six or seven times to bow her thanks to the generous and enthusiastic applause.

Liszt's symphonic poem No. 3, "The Preludes," an orchestral work given frequently in this city, brought the concert to a brilliant finish, considerably later than the usual hour for Boston symphony concerts.

From EVG. TELEGRAPH
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

Establ 884

FARRAR SOLOIST WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

First Concert of Famous Organization a Triumph Despite Operatic Counter Attraction.

The musical capacity of Philadelphia was clearly shown yesterday evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was greeted at the Academy of Music by the usual crowded audience, although it was the opening night of opera.

Dr. Muck, the conductor, had chosen Beethoven's Seventh Symphony for the first number—perhaps the most beautiful of all Beethoven's works, certainly a revel of rhythmic melody. In the introduction is the gradual stirring of the pulse and unfolding of tune. There is (in the score a tense feeling as of implicit motion in the song of the woodwind. Slowly the forces gather in rising volume and at last break into united dance, as in a big, universal round. In the next movement is the recoil to solemn contemplation, almost to a dirge. It is the foil to the main rhythmic idea which breaks out anew in the scherzo, with a quivering hum as of the life of the forest; and in the final movement the joy is all unrestrained.

It must be said, with all deference to the excellence of the instrumental performance, that the interpretation of the symphony was thoroughly disappointing. The whole induction was heavily tranquil, and in the following rapid movements the rhythms were too strictly and regularly maintained, while for the most part the pace was quite too slow. Throughout the symphony the feeling was formal and magisterial. The big dance of the first movement was as stiff as a military parade. In contrast, to be sure, the nobility, the sombre beauty of the allegretto was given its full value, with a rich tint of the cellos in the upper melody and the awesome swell and retreat of the volume of sound.

But the scherzo, a presto movement, like lightest dance of will o' the wisps, seemed rather a measured minuet. At the height of the trio the trumpet blew a blatant note somewhat out of tune.

The Seventh Symphony, of all music, must not be academic. A very practical reason is that the primitive figures, oft repeated, grow wearisome, they lose meaning when taken in a strict, formal manner. Just before the end Dr. Muck did seem infected by the irresistible magic of the dance at its height.

Miss Geraldine Farrar, the soloist, made her first appearance in a recitative and aria from Mozart's "Cosi fan tutti," a number full of melody, but full, too, of difficulties and pitfalls. Miss Farrar seems to have gained in mellowness of quality, and she sang her roulades with a new case of mastery. Later, in the concert, in the beautiful three songs of Wagner (in which she changed the order of the program), she disclosed a lyric vein of expressive song that made one wonder how she would sing all of Isolde's role in "Tristan," and especially the "Liebestod." For two of the songs, "Im Treibhause" ("In the Greenhouse") and "Traume" ("Dreams"), were written as studies for "Tristan and Isolde."

It seemed as if the orchestra, leader and all had reserved themselves in the symphony for the Concerto by Haendel, for strings and two choirs of woodwind. Here all intonation and instrumental performance was exquisite, in the purling runs of the reeds, the fine incisive stroke of the strings in the fugue, or the rollicking jig of the horns; and the rhythms of Dr. Muck were quite perfect, each by itself, and in the blending of one into the other, or in the retarding. It was a revelation of the beauty of ancient orchestration, and it was played by Dr. Muck and his men as if to the manner born.

The last number was Liszt's "Preludes," in which the orchestra shone in all its brilliance. It is indeed a wonderful showpiece for orchestral effects.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date NOV 4 - 1913

Estab

FARRAR SOLOIST WITH BOSTON MEN

Symphony Orchestra, Under Dr. Muck Gives First Concert of 29th Season.

BEETHOVEN'S SEVENTH READ

THE PROGRAM.

Symphony No. 7, in A Major........Beethove
Air—"Come Scoglio," from "Cosi fan Tutte" ....
Concerto for two wind choirs........
Three songs—"Im Treibhaus," "Traume" and "Schmerzen"....................Wagne Symphonic poem—"Les Preludes"........Lisz
Conductor, Dr. Carl Muck; soloist, Geraldine Farrar.

With the Philadelphia Orchestra's tremendous season of 25 weeks, covering every possible field of music "in being," the visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first concert of its 29th season in Philadelphia taking place at the Academy of Music last evening, with the celebrated opera soprano Geraldine Farrar, soloist, have become more or less of the character of complementary concerts which supplement, as it were, the seasonal work of Philadelphia's own orchestral art institution.

Doctor Muck, the very scholarly but more or less resolute military conductor of the Boston Orchestra, has perhaps not quite fully realized that under present conditions the programs of the visiting orchestra are accessories after the fact, and perhaps it is too much to expect him to do so fully since human nature comes out very strongly, especially in temperamental conductors, and will show itself in every way. Moreover, he has already announced that he brought few musical novelties with him this year, in striking contrast to Stokowski's general gleanings, and he did not, therefore, last evening introduce anything to Philadelphia that has not won the stereotyped approval of conductors and concert-goers for nearly a century.

Of course, the lovely soloist—and she was lovely—was quite the feature of the evening, and this is absolutly true, despite the serenity of the rendering of the Seventh Symphony, the 18th century atmosphere which enveloped the Handel number, or the brilliancy of the concluding Liszt selection. The symphony, it must be remembered, too, has gained a new interest in these latter years, since it has quite passed out of the academic discussion of specialists as to whether or not it is the "apotheosis of the dance," which formerly set people by the ears, into an entirely new sphere of physical interest, also of acrid controversy, since it has become the leading medium of Isadore Duncan's revelation of her Terpsichorean temperament.

Hence, whether we like it or not, the Seventh must be associated in the minds of every one nowadays with the dance craze, which has swept the world literally and figuratively "off its feet." It is a pity Doctor Muck does not feel this, for in some ways his reading if serene seemed a trifle leaden-footed, especially in the concluding vivace of the first movement. Here one wanted a little more liveliness than was forthcoming. The slow movement, with the mellow cellos leading off, suggesting rich wine of rare vintage, was read more in character, while the quick scherzo, with its anticipations of elfin music and the jackass bray, hints not lost on Mendelssohn in his Midsummer Night's Dream music, was delightfully done, save for certain ear-splitting screams of the trumpets, and the boisterous finale came in for so vigorous an interpretation that the applause of the very large house was instant and generous.

As for Farrar, she was at her best as a singer and a personality. In the dramatic Mozart aria, written in the style of the better known non piu andrai of the Nozze di Figaro, the seldom heard recitative and violently ranging score of the air itself were superbly rendered in the matter of declamation, while the perfection of the Mozartean trills and runs threw a delightful grace over every phase and cadence. As a Mozart singer Farrar is a joy. But her true art, not only of vocalization but of insight and interpretation, was revealed in the three Wagner numbers, the famous three out of five songs well known to the intimacy of chamber music, and only to be handled by the elect. The "Im Treihbuas" (In the Conservatory) with its insistant note in the accompaniment suggesting a drop of water relentlessly falling, and "Traume" (Dreams) being studies for "Tristan and Isolde," have a depth of meaning that was beautifully set out; while Schmerzer (Griefs) come in for a reading that had pathos in every note. The singer was applauded and recalled after each appearance to distraction. Girlish as a child of sixteen, she seemed a picture from a Greek vase; apparently clad in a simple classic costume of white satin, as if dressed for a long-skirted ballet in "Orfeo," there was in the skirt with a scant train, and in the tunic with its fur border, picked out with pink rosettes, in the tails of the sash and in the low cut of the bodice all the elements of a real "creation," modern and yet suggesting the close clinging lines of the "Victory With the Sandal."

After her songs the concert was brought to a close by Liszt's sonorous and pompous "Les Preludes" pontifically proclaimed which somehow or other, though brilliant, had a cool reception.

… exterior, … music of the … gher grade or inspiration.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra appears in New York but twelve times a year, though to judge by the state of the houses that greet it, it would be welcomed triple that number of times. We are inclined humbly to request the judicious, accomplished and sincere conductor of the visiting musicians to play for us some of the music that local directors cannot or will not play.

The concert also included Smetana's slightly tawdry jeu d'esprit, the overture to "The Bartered Bride," and Dvorak's "Husitska" overture.

There was no soloist, and no one minded in the least.

From EVENING WORLD
Address: New York
NOV 10 1913

MR. LONGY SHOWS US A NEW CHAMBER MUSIC ORGANIZATION

The Longy New York Modern Chamber Music Society, something big—long, at least—in title, gave its first concert in Aeolian Hall on Saturday night. The founder and conductor is Georges Longy, the distinguished oboeist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his associates are members of that famous body of musicians. They were assisted on Saturday night by Carolyn Beebe, pianist; Marie Sundelius, soprano, and Alfred Holy, harpist. The programme included compositions by Paul Juon, Debussy, Louis Aubert, Hery Woollett and Maurice Ravel. The results were not altogether as satisfactory as might have been wished, nevertheless, there was much that was enjoyable in the entertainment and future concerts by Mr. Longy's organization may rival, perhaps, those of the Barrere ensemble, which is really our own, and has established itself.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS GLAZOUNOW'S FIFTH SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first afternoon concert of the season at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon to, as usual, a crowded house. The symphony was Glazounow's fifth and the other numbers were Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture, Cesar Franck's "Leo Eolides" symphonic poem and Dvorak's "Husitoka" overture. All were played with the unerring accuracy and brilliance for which this orchestra is famous, and Dr. Muck conducted like the master that he is.

Establi

AT THE ACADEMY

Boston Orchestra in Its Best Form.

SUPFRB PLAYING MARKS OPENING OF SERIES HERE

Dr. Muck Leads in Eloquent Interpretations of Works by Beethoven, Brahms, Liszt and Wagner—Audience Fills the Opera House.

Before an audience which occupied every seat in the opera house of the Academy of Music, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening opened its series of five Brooklyn concerts, playing so superbly that its appearances bid fair to be accepted as even more important than in the past. The orchestra was in excellent form, and the conductor, Dr. Muck, at his best. There was much enthusiasm throughout, and at the close of the symphony, Beethoven's Seventh, there was so much applause that Dr. Muck had the orchestra members stand to share it with him.

The orchestra's famous tone was as satisfying as ever, full, rich, warm, with a body and color that stirred admiration. The strings and woodwinds were exceptionally good, in fact, the harmony between the various choirs and the perfection of the ensemble were well nigh unsurpassable.

Some exquisite effects in pianissimo were achieved, while the climaxes were sonorous, virile, with no trace of the blatant or flamboyant. The phrasing, notably in the symphony and Brahms' "Tragic" overture, was most effective.

There were no strivings after novel effects in the reading of the symphony, rather an assured interpretation, authoritative, eloquent. There was a splendid dignity in the nobler passages, a delightful spirit of lightness in the dainty third movement. All in all, this one performance was worthy of a place in one's memory of fine things nobly done.

An inspired reading of the Brahms overture brought a storm of applause. It was admirably expressive throughout, with telling modulations in tempo and shading, and, withal, full of appeal to the emotions. The melancholy musing of the woodwinds were developed extraordinarly well.

That popular number, Liszt's "Les Preludes," with its deft use of the old Crusaders' song which of late years has come to life in "For He's a Jolly Good Fellow," was as well played as were its predecessors, the audience betokening its appreciation in no uncertain tones.

The programme was brought to a close with a striking performance of the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman." It was a triumph of clangor, not clamor, of [illegible]

From PRESS
Address: New York City
NOV 9 - 1913
Date
Estab … 84

LONGY AND ASSOCIATES IN CHAMBER CONCERT

New Boston Organization Delights at First Appearance Here.

What with the Kneisel, Flonzaley, Saslavsky, Max Jacobs, Kaufman and Zoellner quartets, the Adele Margulies Trio, the Barrere Ensemble, the Philharmonic Ensemble, which will soon make its first appearance in public, and sundry other instrumental fraternities, New York is not likely to suffer from a dearth of chamber music concerts this season.

It is doubtful, however, whether any of those organizations will play to a larger gathering than that which attended in Aeolian Hall last night, the first performance given in this city by an aggregation of musicians who bear the redoubtable name of "The Longy New York Modern Chamber Music Society."

Georges Lonzy, expert oboist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is the moving spirit in the association, and the nine other members, including J. Theodorowicz, formerly second violin of the Kneisel Quartet, are all fellow-players in that famous body of virtuosi.

There was good reason, therefore, why almost every seat last night should be occupied.

Last nigght's programme, which included an octet (opus 27), for violin, viola, 'cello, oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon and piano, by Paul Juon, and an "Introduction et Allegro" for harp solo, with string quartet, flute and clarinet, by the interesting Maurice Ravel, enlisted not only the services of the ten members of the Longy, etc., Society, but also of Miss Carolyn Beebe, pianist; of Alfred Holy, harp player, and of Marie Sundelius, a soprano.

Miss Sundelius's limpid voice was heard to advantage in songs by Debussy, Louis Aubert and Henry Woollett.

That the music itself and the way it was performed afforded a good deal of enjoyment to most of the listeners, including the distinguished founders and patronesses of the Longy enterprise, was perfectly evident throughout the evening.

PRESS
…s: New York City.
Da…
Estab … 884

FIRST MATINEE GIVEN BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Dr. Karl Muck and His Musicians Heard in Carnegie Hall.

Dr. Karl Muck might have chosen a more interesting programme for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first matinee of the season yesterday in Carnegie Hall. But the list of contributions, which embraced Glazounoff's Symphony in B flat major, No. 5, Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride," Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Aeolidae," and Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska," had the distinct advantage of brevity, enabling suburbanites to start for their trains shortly after 4 o'clock. Furthermore it enabled the conductor to exhibit the virtuosic proficiency of his disciples in the brighest light.

Except in the somewhat monotonous Andante of the Russian symphony and in Franck's "Les Eolides," the strength and endurance of the experts from the Hub were taxed to the utmost. Glazounoff's score, which surely would have employed a celesta, as well as a triangle, cymbals and little bells, had it been written in recent years instead of in 1895, does not spare any of the instruments in the orchestra, least of all the brass, and Smetana's fascinating overture, taken at terrific speed, is something of a gymnastic feat, particularly for the buzzing bass-viols.

A more brilliant performance than Dr. Muck and his men gave of the Glazounoff symphony, which had not been played in New York, it seems, since March, 1898, when the Philharmonic Society, under Anton Seidl, brought the work forward for the first time in the United States, it would be difficult to imagine. Despite its melodic exuberance, rhythmical forcefulness and splendid instrumental somority, however, the composition hardly would bear frequent hearing, though the grimly graceful and humorous Scherzo has an irresistible charm. One need not attach too much significance to the occasional reminders of Wagner and other composers, to be sure. But after all the resplendent exterior of the musical picture, with its triumphant conclusion, is not filled to overflowing with vital thoughts and feelings.

Fascinating, too, was Dr. Muck's interpretation of the Smetana overture. If it lacked some of the delicacy and transparency of texture one recalls in Gustav Mahler's performances in the Metropolitan Opera House, that was due solely, no doubt, to the fact that the Boston conductor, unlike the other master of the baton, used the original instrumentation.

MAX SMITH.

…n RECORD
…ress: Philadelphia, Pa.
…ish

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Geraldine Farrar as Soloist at Season's First Concert.

With Geraldine Farrar as the soloist the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its season at the Academy of Music last evening, the attraction being great enough to fill the auditorium, despite the fact that this initial concert was coincidental with the first night of the opera.

The symphony itself was Beethoven's work in A major, the Seventh Symphony, which was played with great subtlety under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck. The phrasing was wonderful, and unusual restraint marked the entire interpretation, a restraint which, by its very excellence, produced a feeling of wonderment on the part of the auditor and tended somewhat to detract from the mere sensuous enjoyment of the music by making the appreciation largely intellectual.

Nevertheless, this rendition of the Seventh Symphony is a thing to be remembered as a masterpiece of conducting exercised over a body of musicians whose work as an orchestra is well-nigh perfect.

There were no orchestral novelties on the program, although Haendel's concerto for two wind choirs is so seldom heard that it might almost be counted as one. The second movement of this Haendel number was particularly well appreciated by the audience.

Miss Farrar's contributions to the program consisted of three Wagnerian poems: "In Treibhaus," "Traueme" and "Schmerzen" and a recitative and aria from Mozart's opera, "Cosi fan tutte."

Despite the fact that she appeared to be suffering from a cold, her voice was exquisitely clear and true, and her enunciation of both the Italian and the German texts was so perfect that every word was intelligible. The musical settings by Wagner were given as one number, at the close of which, as well as after the Mozart selection, she was recalled to the stage six or seven times to bow her thanks to the generous and enthusiastic applause.

Liszt's symphonic poem No. 3, "The Preludes," an orchestral work given frequently in this city, brought the concert to a brilliant finish, considerably later than the usual hour for Boston symphony concerts.

…TELEGRAPH
…iladelphia, Pa.

…AR SOLOIST WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

…oncert of Famous Organization Triumph Despite Operatic Counter Attraction.

… musical capacity of Philadelphia …learly shown yesterday evening … the Boston Symphony Orchestra …reeted at the Academy of Music by the usual crowded audience, although it was the opening night of opera.

Dr. Muck, the conductor, had chosen Beethoven's Seventh Symphony for the first number—perhaps the most beautiful of all Beethoven's works, certainly a revel of rhythmic melody. In the introduction is the gradual stirring of the pulse and unfolding of tune. There is (in the score a tense feeling as of implicit motion in the song of the woodwind. Slowly the forces gather in rising volume and at last break into united dance, as in a big, universal round. In the next movement is the recoil to solemn contemplation, almost to a dirge. It is the foil to the main rhythmic idea which breaks out anew in the scherzo, with a quivering hum as of the life of the forest; and in the final movement the joy is all unrestrained.

It must be said, with all deference to the excellence of the instrumental performance, that the interpretation of the symphony was thoroughly disappointing. The whole induction was heavily tranquil, and in the following rapid movements the rhythms were too strictly and regularly maintained, while for the most part the pace was quite too slow. Throughout the symphony the feeling was formal and magisterial. The big dance of the first movement was as stiff as a military parade. In contrast, to be sure, the nobility, the sombre beauty of the allegretto was given its full value, with a rich tint of the cellos in the upper melody and the awesome swell and retreat of the volume of sound.

But the scherzo, a presto movement, like lightest dance of will o' the wisps, seemed rather a measured minuet. At the height of the trio the trumpet blew a blatant note somewhat out of tune.

The Seventh Symphony, of all music, must not be academic. A very practical reason is that the primitive figures, oft repeated, grow wearisome, they lose meaning when taken in a strict, formal manner. Just before the end Dr. Muck did seem infected by the irresistible magic of the dance at its height.

Miss Geraldine Farrar, the soloist, made her first appearance in a recitative and aria from Mozart's "Cosi fan tutti," a number full of melody, but full, too, of difficulties and pitfalls. Miss Farrar seems to have gained in mellowness of quality, and she sang her roulades with a new ease of mastery. Later, in the concert, in the beautiful three songs of Wagner (in which she changed the order of the program), she disclosed a lyric vein of expressive song that made one wonder how she would sing all of Isolde's role in "Tristan," and especially the "Liebestod." For two of the songs, "Im Treibhause" ("In the Greenhouse") and "Traume" ("Dreams"), were written as studies for "Tristan and Isolde."

It seemed as if the orchestra, leader and all had reserved themselves in the symphony for the Concerto by Haendel, for strings and two choirs of woodwind. Here all intonation and instrumental performance was exquisite, in the purling runs of the reeds, the fine incisive stroke of the strings in the fugue, or the rollicking jig of the horns; and the rhythms of Dr. Muck were quite perfect, each by itself, and in the blending of one into the other, or in the retarding. It was a revelation of the beauty of ancient orchestration, and it was played by Dr. Muck and his men as if to the manner born.

The last number was Liszt's "Preludes," in which the orchestra shone in all its brilliance. It is indeed a wonderful showpiece for orchestral effects.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date NOV 4 - 1913
Estab … 4

FARRAR SOLOIST WITH BOSTON MEN

Symphony Orchestra, Under Dr. Muck Gives First Concert of 29th Season.

BEETHOVEN'S SEVENTH READ

THE PROGRAM.

Symphony No. 7, in A Major.......Beethove
Air—"Come Scoglio," from "Cosi fan Tutte" .... Mozart
Concerto for two wind choirs.......Handel
Three songs—"Im Treibhaus," "Traume" and "Schmerzen".................Wagner
Symphonic poem—"Les Preludes"........Liszt
Conductor, Dr. Carl Muck; soloist, Geraldine Farrar.

With the Philadelphia Orchestra's tremendous season of 25 weeks, covering every possible field of music "in being," the visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first concert of its 29th season in Philadelphia taking place at the Academy of Music last evening, with the celebrated opera soprano Geraldine Farrar, soloist, have become more or less of the character of complementary concerts which supplement, as it were, the seasonal work of Philadelphia's own orchestral art institution.

Doctor Muck, the very scholarly but more or less resolute military conductor of the Boston Orchestra, has perhaps not quite fully realized that under present conditions the programs of the visiting orchestra are accessories after the fact, and perhaps it is too much to expect him to do so fully since human nature comes out very strongly, especially in temperamental conductors, and will show itself in every way. Moreover, he has already announced that he brought few musical novelties with him this year, in striking contrast to Stokowski's general gleanings, and he did not, therefore, last evening introduce anything to Philadelphia that has not won the stereotyped approval of conductors and concert-goers for nearly a century.

Of course, the lovely soloist—and she was lovely—was quite the feature of the evening, and this is absolutly true, despite the serenity of the rendering of the Seventh Symphony, the 18th century atmosphere which enveloped the Handel number, or the brilliancy of the concluding Liszt selection. The symphony, it must be remembered, too, has gained a new interest in these latter years, since it has quite passed out of the academic discussion of specialists as to whether or not it is the "apotheosis of the dance," which formerly set people by the ears, into an entirely new sphere of physical interest, also of acrid controversy, since it has become the leading medium of Isadore Duncan's revelation of her Terpsichorean temperament.

Hence, whether we like it or not, the Seventh must be associated in the minds of every one nowadays with the dance craze, which has swept the world literally and figuratively "off its feet." It is a pity Doctor Muck does not feel this, for in some ways his reading if serene seemed a trifle leaden-footed, especially in the concluding vivace of the first movement. Here one wanted a little more liveliness than was forthcoming. The slow movement, with the mellow cellos leading off, suggesting rich wine of rare vintage, was read more in character, while the quick scherzo, with its anticipations of elfin music and the jackass bray, hints not lost on Mendelssohn in his Midsummer Night's Dream music, was delightfully done, save for certain ear-splitting screams of the trumpets, and the boisterous finale came in for so vigorous an interpretation that the applause of the very large house was instant and generous.

As for Farrar, she was at her best as a singer and a personality. In the dramatic Mozart aria, written in the style of the better known non piu andrai of the Nozze di Figaro, the seldom heard recitative and violently ranging score of the air itself were superbly rendered in the matter of declamation, while the perfection of the Mozartean trills and runs threw a delightful grace over every phase and cadence. As a Mozart singer Farrar is a joy. But her true art, not only of vocalization but of insight and interpretation, was revealed in the three Wagner numbers, the famous three out of five songs well known to the intimacy of chamber music, and only to be handled by the elect. The "Im Treihbuas" (in the Conservatory) with its insistant note in the accompaniment suggesting a drop of water relentlessly falling, and "Traume" (Dreams) being studies for "Tristan and Isolde," have a depth of meaning that was beautifully set out; while Schmerzer (Griefs) come in for a reading that had pathos in every note. The singer was applauded and recalled after each appearance to distraction. Girlish as a child of sixteen, she seemed a picture from a Greek vase; apparently clad in a simple classic costume of white satin, as if dressed for a long-skirted ballet in "Orfeo," there was in the skirt with a scant train, and in the tunic with its fur border, picked out with pink rosettes, in the tails of the sash and in the low cut of the bodice all the elements of a real "creation," modern and yet suggesting the close clinging lines of the "Victory With the Sandal."

After her songs the concert was brought to a close by Liszt's sonorous and pompous "Les Preludes" pontifically proclaimed which somehow or other, though brilliant, had a cool reception.

[54]

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date NOV

MUSICAL COMPARISONS

Perhaps There Is Room for Two chestral Organizations.

To the Editor of the Public Ledger:

Sir—In this morning's PUBLIC LEDGER "Mr. X." finds fault with your musical crit for presuming to set up our own orchestra a worthy of comparison to the Boston organization.

Mr. X. says: "We all admire the Philadelphia Orchestra as a painstaking body of men who, under their present leader, have made and are making rapid strides, but to compare them to an orchestra of picked men with an experience of 32 years, under trained leaders, is an impossibility—there can, as yet, be no rivalry."

It seems as difficult to convince Philadelphians that anything first rate can come out of Philadelphia as it is to convince Bostonians that anything first rate can come from anywhere but Boston. While it is true that by reason of its Major Higginson, the Boston Orchestra is able to command the services of some higher priced artists than we can at present afford, yet I feel very sure that not one person out of twenty who frequent our concerts could, if blindfolded, tell which orchestra was which. As for saying that there is an immeasurable gulf fixed between the two, it is entirely without foundation.

The only point of Bostonian superiority noted by Mr. X. is that it is "an orchestra of picked men with 32 years' experience." If even one-half of the men had really been playing there for 32 years the Boston Orchestra would indeed present a sad spectacle of senile decrepitude. As a matter of fact, I doubt if the average period of engagement in Boston is longer than our own.

To speak of the artists who compose our orchestra as a "painstaking body of men" is an insult to them, individually and as a body, which every lover of music in Philadelphia should promptly resent.

Some of the self-satisfied Philadelphians who so often belittle our orchestra in comparison with others might first ask themselves, honestly, whether they could of their own knowledge tell the difference, and make it a rule never to say such things merely to show off an imaginary proficiency in the finer points of higher musical criticism. If such persons would all turn in and give their wholehearted support and enthusiasm to the Philadelphia Orchestra, it would not be 32 years, or 32 weeks, before our orchestra would be recognized here, as it is everywhere else, as occupying the position to which Richard Strauss assigned it when he led it in Boston some years ago—one of the first orchestras in the world.

But Richard Strauss, being but 39 years old at that time, had not then had "32 years' experience" as a "trained leader."

HENRY S. DRINKER, Jr.
Philadelphia, November 6, 1913.

More Low Finance

From the New York Telegram.

We gather from Mr. Sulzer's remarks that he came here without anything and is now $100,000 in debt.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date

FRIENDLY RIVALRY

A Concert-goer of Years Discusses the Orchestral Issue.

To the Editor of the Public Ledger:

Sir—Your correspondent, X, objects to some not ungentle and perfectly just criticism in your paper of Mr. Muck's interpretation of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, and then proceeds to a rather uncalled for arraignment, not of some particular performance, but of any present possibilities at all on the part of our own orchestra. We are coolly informed that there can be no possible rivalry between an orchestra that has been under competent leaders for 32 years and another that has been similarly placed for only 14 years. The latter can be, necessarily, only "a painstaking body of men who have made and are making rapid strides."

Now, of course, time is an element in perfecting an orchestra, but it is only one element. There are at least a hundred foreign orchestras older than the Boston and Philadelphia Orchestras that are vastly inferior to either. The talent available, the money that may be spent and numberless other things are also elements. The present writer has probably heard the Boston Orchestra oftener than any Philadelphian who will read his words. He was a constant subscriber to all the concerts it annually gave here until some years after the formation of our own orchestra, and he has been a frequent attendant at the concerts since he ceased to subscribe. He can truly say that he has heard the Philadelphia Orchestra play dozens of times very much better than the Boston Orchestra at many of its concerts.

We have, for one thing, always had temperamental (a much-abused word) leaders. They are not so lucky. A coldly perfect performance is always inferior to an appreciatively enthusiastic though technically imperfect one. Not that we are in any respect behindhand in the matter of technique; there are few music lovers or professional musicians who, if they heard the two orchestras behind a screen, the Boston led by Stokowski and ours led by Muck, could tell which was which. The truth is that, your correspondent notwithstanding, we are rivals, and serious ones, in a friendly way. We often outdo them, and, as we are both striving for perfection, they ought not to let us.

J. H. I.
Philadelphia, November 6, 1913.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa. NOV
Date

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening at 8.15, with Geraldine Farrar as soloist. The subscription sale for the coming season is one of the largest the Boston Symphony has ever had in this city, and the concerts are certain to be correspondingly successful. Miss Farrar's appearance will lend unusual brilliancy to the opening, for this charming singer is very seldom heard on the concert platform; in fact, only with the Boston Symphony.

Miss Farrar will sing as her first number the recitative, "Temerari," and the air, "Come Scoglio," from Mozart's opera, "Cosi fan tutte." Her second number will be three of the five poems by Mathilde Wesendonck set to music by Wagner at the time he was living in Zurich and making his studies of "Tristan and Isolde." These are "Im Treibhaus," "Traume" and "Schmerzen." The first two he called studies for "Tristan and Isolde," "Im Treibhaus" for the third act and "Traume" for the second.

The symphony will be Beethoven's Seventh in A major. The other numbers will be Handel's Concerto for Two Wind Choirs, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." The program in its proper order is as follows:—

Beethoven........Symphony No. 7 in A Major
Mozart, Air, "Come Scoglio," from "Cosi Fan Tuttes."
Handel........Concerto for Two Wind Choirs
Wagner, Three Poems, "Im Treibhaus," "Traume," "Schmerzen."
Liszt..........................."Les Preludes"

* * *

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York
Date

NEW SOCIETY HA

Organized by Georges Longy, It Is a Distinct Addition to City's Musical Forces.

OCTETTE, OP. NO. 27, IS GIVEN

The Longy New York Modern Chamber Music Society gave its inaugural concert last night at Aeolian Hall. This new musical society was founded by Mr. Georges Longy, well known to Metropolitan audiences as the first Oboe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Among the assistant artists are J. Theodorowicz, violin; A. Bak, violin; K. Rissland, viola; J. Keller, violoncella; A. de Voto, piano; A. Brooke, flute; G. Longy, oboe; G. Grisez, clarinet; F. Hain, horn, and P. Sadony, bassoon, all members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Modern Chamber Music Society is a distinct addition to the musical forces of the city. The musical skill of the Boston Orchestra in the aggregate is well known. One is happy, therefore, to greet so much of it in the individual. The programme last night had the merit of being short, original, and attractive.

The octette, op. No. 27, by Paul Juon, which formed the vertebral element of the programme, has not been heard, to the knowledge of the writer, before in New York. It was a well-knit, original and modern work, written from the heart of its composer. It struck the note of artistic seriousness which dominated the rest of the concert.

Mrs. Marie Sundepius sang three French songs. Her manifest understanding, her grace and poetry of interpretation, as well as the persuasive musicality of her well-trained voice and the evident French discipline to which it had been subjected, soon established her in the careful attention of her auditors. The songs she sang were Claude Debussy's "Ballade," Louis Aubert's "Le Reve du Petit Chaperon Rouge," and Henry Woolfett's "Harps at Eventide." These three were in latter-day French style, the only new mode of song writing established of late years.

Miss Carolyn Beebe, the pianist in the octette, deserves warm commendation for her sturdy and accurate execution.

Among the founders and patronesses of the Longy New York Modern Chamber Music Society are Mrs. Clarence E. Beebe, Charles E. Burden, Miss Mabel Choate, Mrs. Richard J. Hall, Mrs. Frederick Trevor Hill, Mrs. William Hinshaw, Mrs. H. R. Mallory, R. E. Schirmer, the Schumman Club of Brooklyn, Mrs. Charles Robinson Smith, Frederick Steinway, Mrs. Samuel Untermyer, V. Wierzbricki, Dr. and Mrs. L. D. Alexander, Jr. Mrs. W. H. H. Beebe, Mrs. Edward Lewis Cole, Miss Kate Chillendon, Mrs. George M. Creevey, Mrs. Charles B. Foote, Mrs. Gould, Mrs. Houghton, Mrs. J. F. D. Lanier, Wilbur Larrenmore, Mrs. C. T. Macy, Mrs. McIntyre, Mrs. E. T. Rice, Mrs. James Gambel Rogers and Mrs. Christian Brevoort Zabriskie.

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date 26

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music a week from tomorrow (Monday) evening, November 3rd, at 8.15. The soloist will be Miss Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York. Miss Farrar will sing two numbers. Her first will be a rather unfamiliar air from Mozart's opera, "Cosi fan tutte," and her second will be three songs by Richard Wagner, "I'm Treibhaus," "Traume," and "Schmerzen." The orchestra numbers will be the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, Handel's Concerto for two wind choirs with string accompaniment and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date CT 26 913

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music a week from tomorrow (Monday) evening, November 2, at 8:15. The soloist will be Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York. Miss Farrar will sing two numbers. Her first will be a rather unfamiliar air from Mozart's opera "Cosi fan tutte" and her second will be three songs of Richard Wagner, "Im Treibhaus," "Traume" and "Schmerzen." The orchestral numbers will be the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, Handel's concerto for two wind choirs, with string accompaniment, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

* * *

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa. CT
Date

Boston Symphony's Opening Progra

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening November 3. The soloist will be Miss Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York. Miss Farrar will sing two numbers, the first a rather unfamiliar air from Mozart's opera, "Cosi Fan Tutte," and her second three songs of Richard Wagner, "Im Treibhaus," "Traume" and "Schmerzen." The orchestral numbers will be the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, Handel's Concerto for two wind choirs with string accompaniment, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 26 1913

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music a week from tomorrow evening—November 3. The soloist will be Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York. Miss Farrar will sing an air from Mozart's opera, "Cosi fan tutte" and three songs of Richard Wagner—"Im Treibhaus," "Traume" and "Schmerzen." The orchestral numbers will be the seventh symphony of Beethoven, Haendel's concerto for two wind choirs with string accompaniment and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

* * *

From EVG. TELEGRAPH
Address: Philadelphia, Pa. NOV
Date

THE first appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is always an event of the season, and the concert on Monday evening next at the Academy will be attractive in many ways, with the brilliant program that Mr. Muck has chosen, and with Geraldine Farrar, the famous soprano, as soloist. If we were constrained to choose among all symphonies, Beethoven's Seventh might well be the likeliest favorite, with the pervading magic of its rhythm, and in the middle the wonderful beauty of the allegretto, which contrasts so strongly with the rest in the sombre pace of its accent. It is, by the way, one of the very few melodies, like Schubert's "Death and the Maiden," that are cast throughout in a clear Greek metre. The striking character of the symphony has provoked many different interpretations. Berlioz called it a rustic wedding; Wagner, with keen insight, discovered an apotheoris of the dance. If one cared to indulge in so dangerous a habit, one might find the general theme of earthly joy, with a vision of Death, the shadow of Life.

Miss Farrar will sing an aria from Mozart's "Cosi fan tutti," and three songs of Wagner. The two other numbers of the program are a concerto for two wind-choirs by Haendel and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV 2

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening at 8.15 with Geraldine Farrar as soloist. The subscription sale for the coming season is one of the largest the Boston Symphony has ever had in this city and the concerts are certain to be correspondingly successful. Miss Farrar's appearance will lend unusual brilliancy to the opening for this charming singer is very seldom heard on the concert platform.

Miss Farrar will sing as her first number the recitative, "Temerari" and the air, "Come Scoglio" from Mozart's opera "Cosi fan tutte." Her second number will be three of the five poems by Mathilde Wesendonck set to music by Wagner at the time he was living in Zurich and making his studies of "Tristan and Isolde." These are "Im Treibhaus," "Traume" and "Schmerzen." The first two be called studies for Tristan and Isolde, "Im Treibhaus" for the third act and "Traume" for the second.

The symphony will be Beethoven's Seventh in A Major. The other numbers will be Handel's Concerto for Two Wind Choirs, and Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Lee Preludes." The program in its proper order is as folows.

Beethoven........Symphony No. 7 in A Major
Mozart...........Airs "Come Scoglio," from "Cosi fan tutte."
Handel ....Concerto for Two Wind Choirs
Wagner.......................... Three Poems
"Im Treibhaur."
"Traume."
"Schmerzen."
Liszt ....

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

* * *

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening at 8.15, with Geraldine

GERALDINE FARRAR.

Farrar as soloist. The subscription sale for the season is one of the largest the Boston Symphony has ever had in this city. Miss Farrar's appearance will lend unusual brilliancy to the opening, for she is seldom heard on the concert platform. She will sing as her first number the recitative, "Temerari" and the air, "Come Scoglio," from Mozart's opera "Cosi fan tutte." Her second number will be three of the five poems by Mathilde Wesendonck, set to music by Wagner at the time he was living in Zurich and making his of "Tristan and Isolde." These "Treibhaus," "Traeume" and "zen." The first two he called for "Tristan and Isolde," "Im haus" for the third act and "Tra for the second.

The symphony will be Beeth Seventh in A Major. The other bers will be Haendel's Concert Two Wind Choirs, and Liszt's phonic Poem, "Les Preludes."

* * *

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date NOV

MUSICAL COMPARISONS

Perhaps There Is Room for Two chestral Organizations.

To the Editor of the Public Ledger:

Sir—In this morning's Public Ledger "Mr. X." finds fault with your musical critic for presuming to set up our own orchestra as worthy of comparison to the Boston organization.

Mr. X. says: "We all admire the Philadelphia Orchestra as a painstaking body of men who, under their present leader, have made and are making rapid strides, but to compare them to an orchestra of picked men with an experience of 32 years, under trained leaders, is an impossibility—there can, as yet, be no rivalry."

It seems as difficult to convince Philadelphians that anything first rate can come out of Philadelphia as it is to convince Bostonians that anything first rate can come from anywhere but Boston. While it is true that by reason of its Major Higginson, the Boston Orchestra is able to command the services of some higher priced artists than we can at present afford, yet I feel very sure that not one person out of twenty who frequent our concerts could, if blindfolded, tell which orchestra was which. As for saying that there is an immeasurable gulf fixed between the two, it is entirely without foundation.

The only point of Bostonian superiority noted by Mr. X. is that it is "an orchestra of picked men with 32 years' experience." If even one-half of the men had really been playing there for 32 years the Boston Orchestra would indeed present a sad spectacle of senile decrepitude. As a matter of fact, I doubt if the average period of engagement in Boston is longer than our own.

To speak of the artists who compose our orchestra as a "painstaking body of men" is an insult to them, individually and as a body, which every lover of music in Philadelphia should promptly resent.

Some of the self-satisfied Philadelphians who so often belittle our orchestra in comparison with others might first ask themselves, honestly, whether they could of their own knowledge tell the difference, and make it a rule never to say such things merely to show off an imaginary proficiency in the finer points of higher musical criticism. If such persons would all turn in and give their whole-hearted support and enthusiasm to the Philadelphia Orchestra, it would not be 32 years, or 32 weeks, before our orchestra would be recognized here, as it is everywhere else, as occupying the position to which Richard Strauss assigned it when he led it in Boston some years ago—one of the first orchestras in the world.

But Richard Strauss, being but 39 years old at that time, had not then had "32 years' experience" as a "trained leader."

HENRY S. DRINKER, Jr.
Philadelphia, November 6, 1913.

More Low Finance

From the New York Telegram.

We gather from Mr. Sulzer's remarks that he came here without anything and is now $100,000 in debt.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date

FRIENDLY RIVALRY

A Concert-goer of Years Discusses the Orchestral Issue.

To the Editor of the Public Ledger:

Sir—Your correspondent, X, objects to some not ungentle and perfectly just criticism in your paper of Mr. Muck's interpretation of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, and then proceeds to a rather uncalled for arraignment, not of some particular performance, but of any present possibilities at all on the part of our own orchestra. We are coolly informed that there can be no possible rivalry between an orchestra that has been under competent leaders for 32 years and another that has been similarly placed for only 14 years. The latter can be, necessarily, only "a painstaking body of men who have made and are making rapid strides."

Now, of course, time is an element in perfecting an orchestra, but it is only one element. There are at least a hundred foreign orchestras older than the Boston and Philadelphia Orchestras that are vastly inferior to either. The talent available, the money that may be spent and numberless other things are also elements. The present writer has probably heard the Boston Orchestra oftener than any Philadelphian who will read his words. He was a constant subscriber to all the concerts it annually gave here until some years after the formation of our own orchestra, and he has been a frequent attendant at the concerts since he ceased to subscribe. He can truly say that he has heard the Philadelphia Orchestra play dozens of times very much better than the Boston Orchestra at many of its concerts.

We have, for one thing, always had temperamental (a much-abused word) leaders. They are not so lucky. A coldly perfect performance is always inferior to an appreciatively enthusiastic though technically imperfect one. Not that we are in any respect behindhand in the matter of technique; there are few music lovers or professional musicians who, if they heard the two orchestras behind a screen, the Boston led by Stokowski and ours led by Muck, could tell which was which. The truth is that, your correspondent notwithstanding, we are rivals, and serious ones, in a friendly way. We often outdo them, and, as we are both striving for perfection, they ought not to let us.

J. H. I.
Philadelphia, November 6, 1913.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening at 8.15, with Geraldine Farrar as soloist. The subscription sale for the coming season is one of the largest the Boston Symphony has ever had in this city, and the concerts are certain to be correspondingly successful. Miss Farrar's appearance will lend unusual brilliancy to the opening, for this charming singer is very seldom heard on the concert platform; in fact, only with the Boston Symphony.

Miss Farrar will sing as her first number the recitative, "Temerari," and the air, "Come Scoglio," from Mozart's opera, "Cosi fan tutte." Her second number will be three of the five poems by Mathilde Wesendonck set to music by Wagner at the time he was living in Zurich and making his studies of "Tristan and Isolde." These are "Im Treibhaus," "Traume" and "Schmerzen." The first two he called studies for "Tristan and Isolde," "Im Treibhaus" for the third act and "Traume" for the second.

The symphony will be Beethoven's Seventh in A major. The other numbers will be Handel's Concerto for Two Wind Choirs, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." The program in its proper order is as follows:—

Beethoven........Symphony No. 7 in A Major Mozart.
Air, "Come Scoglio," from "Cosi Fan Tuttes."
Handel........Concerto for Two Wind Choirs
Wagner,
Three Poems, "Im Treibhaus," "Traume," "Schmerzen."
Liszt..........................."Les Preludes"

* * *

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
Address: New York
Date NOV

NEW SOCIETY HAS

Organized by Georges Longy, It Is a Distinct Addition to City's Musical Forces.

OCTETTE, OP. NO. 27, IS GIVEN

The Longy New York Modern Chamber Music Society gave its inaugural concert last night at Aeolian Hall. This new musical society was founded by Mr. Georges Longy, well known to Metropolitan audiences as the first Oboe of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Among the assistant artists are J. Theodorowicz, violin; A. Bak, violin; K. Rissland, viola; J. Keller, violoncella; A. de Voto, piano; A. Brooke, flute; G. Longy, oboe; G. Grisez, clarinet; F. Hain, horn, and P. Sadony, bassoon, all members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Modern Chamber Music Society is a distinct addition to the musical forces of the city. The musical skill of the Boston Orchestra in the aggregate is well known. One is happy, therefore, to greet so much of it in the individual. The programme last night had the merit of being short, original, and attractive.

The octette, op. No. 27, by Paul Juon, which formed the vertebral element of the programme, has not been heard, to the knowledge of the writer, before in New York. It was a well-knit, original and modern work, written from the heart of its composer. It struck the note of artistic seriousness which dominated the rest of the concert.

Mrs. Marie Sundepius sang three French songs. Her manifest understanding, her grace and poetry of interpretation, as well as the persuasive musicality of her well-trained voice and the evident French discipline to which it had been subjected, soon established her in the careful attention of her auditors. The songs she sang were Claude Debussy's "Ballade," Louis Aubert's "Le Reve du Petit Chaperon Rouge," and Henry Woolfett's "Harps at Eventide." These three were in latter-day French style, the only new mode of song writing established of late years.

Miss Carolyn Beebe, the pianist in the octette, deserves warm commendation for her sturdy and accurate execution.

Among the founders and patronesses of the Longy New York Modern Chamber Music Society are Mrs. Clarence E. Beebe, Charles E. Burden, Miss Mabel Choate, Mrs. Richard J. Hall, Mrs. Frederick Trevor Hill, Mrs. William Hinshaw, Mrs. H. R. Mallory, R. E. Schirmer, the Schumman Club of Brooklyn, Mrs. Charles Robinson Smith, Frederick Steinway, Mrs. Samuel Untermyer, V. Wierzbricki, Dr. and Mrs. L. D. Alexander, Jr. Mrs. W. H. H. Beebe, Mrs. Edward Lewis Cole, Miss Kate Chillendon, Mrs. George M. Creevey, Mrs. Charles B. Foote, Mrs. Gould, Mrs. Houghton, Mrs. J. F. D. Lanier, Wilbur Larrenmore, Mrs. C. T. Macy, Mrs. McIntyre, Mrs. E. T. Rice, Mrs. James Gambel Rogers and Mrs. Christian Brevoort Zabriskie.

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date 26 191

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music a week from tomorrow (Monday) evening, November 3rd, at 8.15. The soloist will be Miss Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York. Miss Farrar will sing two numbers. Her first will be a rather unfamiliar air from Mozart's opera, "Cosi fan tutte," and her second will be three songs by Richard Wagner, "I'm Treibhaus," "Traume," and "Schmerzen." The orchestra numbers will be the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, Handel's Concerto for two wind choirs with string accompaniment and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

1884

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date CT 26 1913

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music a week from tomorrow (Monday) evening, November 2, at 8:15. The soloist will be Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York. Miss Farrar will sing two numbers. Her first will be a rather unfamiliar air from Mozart's opera "Cosi fan tutte" and her second will be three songs of Richard Wagner, "Im Treibhaus," "Traume" and "Schmerzen." The orchestral numbers will be the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, Handel's concerto for two wind choirs, with string accompaniment, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

* * *

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date CT 1913

Boston Symphony's Opening Program

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 3. The soloist will be Miss Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York. Miss Farrar will sing two numbers, the first a rather unfamiliar air from Mozart's opera, "Cosi Fan Tutte," and her second three songs of Richard Wagner, "Im Treibhaus," "Traume" and "Schmerzen." The orchestral numbers will be the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, Handel's Concerto for two wind choirs with string accompaniment, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

1884

and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From RECORD
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 1913

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music a week from tomorrow evening—November 3. The soloist will be Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York. Miss Farrar will sing an air from Mozart's opera, "Cosi fan tutte" and three songs of Richard Wagner—"Im Treibhaus," "Traume" and "Schmerzen." The orchestral numbers will be the seventh symphony of Beethoven, Haendel's concerto for two wind choirs with string accompaniment and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

* * *

1884

From EVG. TELEGRAPH
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV

THE first appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is always an event of the season, and the concert on Monday evening next at the Academy will be attractive in many ways, with the brilliant program that Mr. Muck has chosen, and with Geraldine Farrar, the famous soprano, as soloist. If we were constrained to choose among all symphonies, Beethoven's Seventh might well be the likeliest favorite, with the pervading magic of its rhythm, and in the middle the wonderful beauty of the allegretto, which contrasts so strongly with the rest in the sombre pace of its accent. It is, by the way, one of the very few melodies, like Schubert's "Death and the Maiden," that are cast throughout in a clear Greek metre. The striking character of the symphony has provoked many different interpretations. Berlioz called it a rustic wedding; Wagner, with keen insight, discovered an apotheoris of the dance. If one cared to indulge in so dangerous a habit, one might find the general theme of earthly joy, with a vision of Death, the shadow of Life.

Miss Farrar will sing an aria from Mozart's "Cosi fan tutti," and three songs of Wagner. The two other numbers of the program are a concerto for two wind-choirs by Haendel and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 2

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening at 8.15 with Geraldine Farrar as soloist. The subscription sale for the coming season is one of the largest the Boston Symphony has ever had in this city and the concerts are certain to be correspondingly successful. Miss Farrar's appearance will lend unusual brilliancy to the opening for this charming singer is very seldom heard on the concert platform.

Miss Farrar will sing as her first number the recitative, "Temerari" and the air, "Come Scoglio" from Mozart's opera "Cosi fan tutte." Her second number will be three of the five poems by Mathilde Wesendonck set to music by Wagner at the time he was living in Zurich and making his studies of "Tristan and Isolde." These are "Im Treibhaus," "Traume" and "Schmerzen." The first two be called studies for Tristan and Isolde, "Im Treibhaus" for the third act and "Traume" for the second.

The symphony will be Beethoven's Seventh in A Major. The other numbers will be Handel's Concerto for Two Wind Choirs, and Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Lee Preludes." The program in its proper order is as folows.

Beethoven........Symphony No. 7 in A Major
Mozart...........Airs "Come Scoglio," from "Cosi fan tutte."
Handel ....Concerto for Two Wind Choirs
Wagner........................... Three Poems
"Im Treibhaur."
"Traume."
"Schmerzen."
Liszt ....

CORD
Philadelphia, Pa.

* * *

t concert of the season by n Symphony Orchestra will in the Academy of Music to- vening at 8.15, with Geraldine

GERALDINE FARRAR.

Farrar as soloist. The subscription sale for the season is one of the largest the Boston Symphony has ever had in this city. Miss Farrar's appearance will lend unusual brilliancy to the opening, for she is seldom heard on the concert platform. She will sing as her first number the recitative, "Temerari" and the air, "Come Scoglio," from Mozart's opera "Cosi fan tutte." Her second number will be three of the five poems by Mathilde Wesendonck, set to music by Wagner at the time he was living in Zurich and making his studies of "Tristan and Isolde." These are "Im Treibhaus," "Traeume" and "Schmerzen." The first two he called studies for "Tristan and Isolde," "Im Treibhaus" for the third act and "Traeume" for the second.

The symphony will be Beethoven's Seventh in A Major. The other numbers will be Haendel's Concerto for Two Wind Choirs, and Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes."

* * *

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV

©MISHKIN

SOLOIST AT ACADEMY

Geraldine Farrar made her first appearance here this season at last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

FARRAR APPEARS WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Big Audience Greets Opening Program at the Academy

FINE ARTISTRY SHOWN

The combined first appearance here this season of Geraldine Farrar and the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew a capacity audience to the Academy of Music last evening. It is clear that not even the opera can divert the attention of a class of music patrons from the superb musical organization from the New England metropolis.

The Boston orchestra is an authentic "standard" attraction. The eloquent artistry of its individual performers, the magnificent ensemble effects achieved and the brilliant direction of Dr. Karl Muck need no extended new indorsement now. The list of the world's greatest orchestras is not long. The Gewandhaus, of Leipsic; the Colonne, of Paris; the Philharmonic, of Berlin; the Philadelphia and the Boston very nearly occupy the entire top field.

Miss Farrar has been heard here rather infrequently in concert. It is a domain for which this exceedingly comely American soprano is admirably equipped. Not often in an artist are physical beauty and loveliness of voice so charmingly combined.

Her contributions to last night's program were discerningly chosen. To exhibit her skill in pure vocalization she offered first the aria "Come Scoglio" from Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte"—an opera long popular in Vienna and Munich, but entirely out of the American repertory. As a contrast, she was heard in three songs by Richard Wagner—"Im Treibhaus," "Traueme" and "Schmerzen." The second is derived from motives in the incomparable second act of "Tristan and Isolde." These leider permit of more dramatic interpretation than the Mozart selection, and Miss Farrar availed herself of their opportunities in finely effective style.

The symphony which was put forward by Doctor Muck as the opening number of the program was Beethoven's seventh a work which shares honors with the fifth and ninth among the masterworks of its composer. Wagner found it the most marvelous of all, calling the seventh symphony "the apotheosis of the dance," and Isadora Duncan took him at his word by interpreting it with her unrivaled terpsichorean art. The solemn second movement was read last evening with impressive beauty.

The other numbers were a Haendel concerto for two wind choirs and Liszt's inspiring symphonic poem "Les Preludes," the familiar composition suggested by some reflections of the p[illegible] Lambertine.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV

BOSTON SYMPHONY FIRST CONCERT

Miss Geraldine Farrar, the Soloist, Is Heard in Four Selections.

PROGRAM.

Beethoven..Symphony in A major. No. 7. Op. 92.
Mozart. Recitative and Aira. from "Cosi fan tutte."
Handel....Concerto for two wind choirs.
Wagner..Three poems. a. Im Treibhaus. b. Traume. c. Schmerzen.
Liszt..Symphonic poem. No. 3. "The Preludes" (after Lamartine).
Conductor.........Dr. Karl Muck
Soloist. Miss Geraldine Farrar.

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra attracted an unusually large and brilliant audience to the Academy of Music last evening, in spite of its being the first opera night. Very rarely if ever before have the two greatest American sopranos Geraldine Farrar and Mary Garden, appeared in Philadelphia upon the same evening. The opportunities in recent years of hearing Miss Farrar have been very few which must account for the very large audience under the circumstances.

When Conductor Karl Muck made his first appearance he was given a cordial reception. and the same enthusiasm was shown when Concertmeister Witek took his position. And when Miss Farrar, with an unusually unaffected manner, and gowned in a white satin dress of simple construction, tripped to the front of the stage, she was greeted with rounds of applause and the adjusting of hundreds of opera glasses. It is such a novelty to see Miss Farrar in concert that undoubtedly few were aware of how girlish and pretty she really is.

Beethoven Faultlessly Read.

Dr. Muck played the symphony as his first number. It was Beethoven's No. 7 in A major. Few of even the most ardent admirers of the immortal Beethoven but are willing to admit that there are portions of this work that are not inspiring, and it is by no means the most popular of the series. It is the long drawn out first movement that has no doubt compelled this opinion, The short, hymnlike second movement, and the presto movement, with its introduced Austrian hymn, are more inspiring and make the entire work satisfying at its conclusion.

The reading of this symphony by Dr. Muck was faultless and flawless. The Orchestra is in prime condition, and played with its usual marvelous uniformity. The present conductor's reading of this symphony is familiar, and last evening he missed no opportunity to give to the work that carefulness of attention which has made such a recognized master of Beethoven. But it was in the Handel numbers that the orchestra was heard with the most delight, probably due to the newness, and undoubtedly to the fine work of the wood-wind, and especially the oboe.

This number is a Concerto in F Major, which is arranged in five movements, about half of the original composition. While it is in the recognized style of Handel, it is brighter and more spirited than the major portion of his writings. The concert was closed with Liszt's Symphonic "The Preludes."

Miss Farrar's Brilliant Singing.

The first number given by Miss Farrar was a recitative and aria from the first act of "Cosi fan tutte," an opera by Mozart. This number is more or less familiar to the concert stage, as it is a brilliant show piece; not in just the same sense as are the famous Mad Scenes, or the brilliant Verdi arias, but it suits Miss Farrar's voice admirably, and she gave a fine exhibition of vocal display in the wide range required by the composition, always with strong, clear, sweet tones, but not of the very best that is possible, for the singer seemed to be laboring under a slight hoarseness, but not sufficiently so to mar her work.

She was liberally applauded.

At Miss Farrar's second appearance she sang three Wagner songs, "Im Treibhaus," "Traume" and "Schmerzen." They are most interesting songs and were admirably rendered, but were not of the character that the audience would have selected, for they do not give the singer the opportunity to display her voice that they would have desired, and the best effect was the sincere spirit with which they were given, ending with a most effective pose at the long postlude which follows each composition.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 5 1912

MANY ATTEND CONCERT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Glazounoff, Smetana, Dvorak, and Franck Drawn Upon for Program Given at New National.

MUCK'S CONDUCTING PRAISED

The first of the Boston Symphony season of five orchestral concerts was given at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon. The audience—and the house was crowded—banqueted on modern romantic music. If yesterday's program is a forecast of the programs to follow, the Boston Symphony season promises to be disappointing to those musicians who have been brought up on the riches of the old classics.

Two Bohemians, a Russian and a Frenchman, were drawn upon for the program. The chief piece was a symphony—the fifth—of Glazounoff, but not Glazounoff's chief symphony. Smetana's Overture to "The Bartered Bride," Dvorak's Overture to "Husitska," and the symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," of Caesar Franck, completed the program. A glance at this array suggests at once national picturesque realism.

That he writes Russian music is Glazounoff's pride; Smetana writes Bohemian music in "defiance of accusations of Wagnerism;" Dvorak is the most Slavic of Slavs; and Caesar Franck's fleeting, remote, shadowy, evanescent, passionless ingenuities are thoroughly aerial, delicate, fairy, one ever heard or saw; nymphs, sylphs, elves, gossamere webs, floating vapor, fantasies, dreams.

The subject of Dvorak's Overture deals with a Slavic Bohemian national theme, the legend of John Huss. The theme is barbaric.

The Glazounoff Symphony is a work of a great deal of originality and beauty. The first movement is of clear outline, and there is the usual development of themes, though the whole is not specially rich in material. The scherzo is a delicious sparkling bit, to which the andante makes a delightful contrast. This latter contains one of the most beautiful of melodies. The whole composition gives the impression of a good deal of breadth and power.

Smetana's Overture to the "Bartered Bride," although of great interest, for a certain vital rhythmic novelty, needs no comment; it is now some time since that work won an established place in American orchestral repertoires, and is deservedly popular.

The music that was given yesterday is—the most of it—novelty, "dessert." A little of it for contrast at each performance would be welcome. A conductor has the opportunity of familiarizing the people with great and noble works. To devote an entire program to less than great is waste of opportunity.

Dr. Muck has had a year with his orchestra since he resumed his post here, and he has established a perfect understanding with his men. It is a pleasure to study his conducting. This is never a performance. No conductor could efface himself more than he does. Yet there is not a motion of the hand or a glance of the eye but guides, controls, stimulates his musicians.

There is the vital round tone, the steady balance of the choirs, the subtle rise and fall of dynamics, the conscientious discipline in nice detail, the beautiful singing of the solo and fugal voices; in a word the fidelity to its traditional perfection that every one feels so sure of finding in this orchestra, under the hand of a great conductor.

[illegible]
depart in its hundreds of limousines
The tmanager's smile was that of th cat that swallowed the canary—or th whole aviary, rather—for had he no
Farrar, Kreisler and Paderewski on tou this season? W. H. Brennan sped his chief to a midnight train. Paderewsk was playing in Boston to-day, after giv ing a birthday dinner at the Hub las night, and Mr. Ellis went to look afte his star, leaving the orchestra to play its three concerts out. It will return wit Kreisler in December.

WITH every seat in the Academy of Music subscribed for the entire series of the Boston Orchestra there, the opportunity to hear this organization by those who do not hold season tickets in either borough is limited to admission as "standees." Last night's Manhattan programme is repeated in Brooklyn to-night.

To-morrow's Carnegie Hall matinee presents Glazunoff's Fifth symphony, Smetana's overture to "Bartered Bride," Franck's "Les Eolides" and Dvorak's "Husitska."

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 5

The New National Theater was filled with a smart audience yesterday afternoon for the first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck.

In the Presidential box was Miss Helen Woodrow Bones, Mrs. Franklin K. Lane, Mrs. David Houston, Mrs. Parion P. Maus, and Miss Isabella L. Hagner.

With the German Ambassador and the Countess von Bernstorff, in the adjoining box, was Mr. and Mrs. George Howard, Miss Perin, and Baron von Lersner.

With Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, in her box, was Mrs. Mandeville Carlisle and Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe.

Mr. and Mrs. Preston Gibson occupied Mrs. McMillan's box, and with Mrs. Hitt in Mrs. Crozier's box was a party including Mrs. Boardman and Miss Mabel T. Boardman.

Mrs. I. T. Mann had a party of guests in her box, as did Mrs. Lisner.

Others in the audience were Mr. and Mrs. Charles Campbell, Mrs. Joseph Thropp, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. John Hay, Mrs. George Eustis, Mrs. Tuckerman, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Mrs. Hennen Jennings, Miss Macomb, Miss Mary Sheridan, the Misses de Pena, Mrs. Walter Wells, Mr. and Mrs. Hemmick, Mrs. Henry Kirk Porter, Miss Hageman, Miss Portner, Mr. and Mrs. William F. Dennis, Mrs. Buckner Randolph, Mrs. Charles B. Howry, Mrs. James C. Pilling, Mrs. Henry G. Sharpe, and Mrs. Harold P. Morton.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 1912

ORCHESTRA CONCERT TUESDAY AFTERNOON

Boston Organization Has the Largest Subscription in Its History For Engagements.

With the largest subscription in its history, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, gives the first of its five Washington concerts in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30. All accounts have it that the orchestra is playing more brilliantly than ever.

Dr. Muck left it last spring at the highest point of discipline and technical efficiency it had ever reached, and this fall when he resumed his work in Boston the orchestra began where it had left off in May. There are a few changes in the personnel owing to the retirement of some of the old members.

The concert will be purely orchestral, no soloist taking part in the program. It comprises the brilliant and tuneful Symphony in B flat major by the Russian, Glazounoff; Smetana's fascinating little overture, "Die verkaufte Braut;" Cesar Franck's fantastic "Les Eolides," and Dvorak's overture, "Husitska."

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York
Date NOV 7 1912

BEFORE the finest audience of the young season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra began its twenty-eighth year of infrequent visits to New York last evening in Carnegie Hall. The "B. S. O." as it's called for short, might have been nicknamed the "S. R. O." for a "standing room only" sign was hung out at Rudolf Heck's office when the house opened. There hadn't been a vacant chair in 2,500 on sale in the last two years.

Only Mayor Higginson's pair of seats, reserved for the orchestra's famous patron, were vacant down the centre aisle. So was one box, held for the wife of the conductor. Dr. Karl Muck, spare and debonnair, with his odd combination of ascetic and courtier, took the stand at 8:20 precisely to conduct the dancing Beethoven Seventh symphony. Late arrivals waited uncomplainingly. The music's mad pace would have wrecked an ordinary band, and the racing players deserved their standing recalls they crossed the line neck and neck the finish.

If the rich brocade of Beethoven worn a bit threadbare by constant the brass shone out like pure gold in enduring "Tragic Overture" of Bral Muck turned his hundred men l in the flooding harmony of Liszt's "ludes" for another rising salute by hands. A new harpist, Alfred H was seen in Heinrich Schuecker's p there. The concert ended at 10:10 Wagner's booming horns of "The ing Dutchman" overture.

Philip Hale's programme notes how the "Dutchman" was compose Wagner in a flight from Riga to London by the North Sea. "His wife went across the border disguised as a lumberman's wife, Wagner himself hid in an empty sentry's box, and composer, wife and dog met at Pillau, where they embarked in a sailing

---

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date OCT 26 1912

The sale of season tickets for the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has more than exceeded expectations. Very few seats are left, and it is likely that these will be taken up before the box office sale for the first concert begins. The concerts will be given at 4:30 p. m., on Tuesday afternoons, November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17, and March 17. There will be no soloists for the first concert. In December the soloist will be Fritz Kriesler; in January Teresa Carreno; in February, Mme. van Endert, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and in March, Paderewski.

From TELEGRAPH
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date 25

THE following week the full flood breaks loose, with five performances of the Philadelphia-Chicago Opera Company and the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy, besides our own Orchestra concerts. It will be a difficult choice on Monday evening between "La Tosca," with Mary Garden, and the debut of Martinelli, the tenor, and Marcoux, the baritone—and the Boston Orchestra with Miss Farrar. Dr. Muck has chosen an ideal symphony—the ideal symphony, one may say—in Beethoven's Seventh

---

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 2 1912

Boston Symphony November 4.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, will give the first of its five Washington concerts in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. There are a few changes in the personnel owing to the retirement of some of the old members.

The concert will be purely orchestral, no soloist taking part in the program, which comprises the "Symphony in B Flat Major," by the Russian, Glazounoff; Smetana's overture, "Die Verkaufte Braut"; Cesar Franck's fantastic, "Les Eolides," and Dvorak's overture, "Husit-

[56]

From NORTH AMERICAN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV

SOLOIST AT ACADEMY

Geraldine Farrar made her first appearance here this season at last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

FARRAR APPEARS WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Big Audience Greets Opening Program at the Academy

FINE ARTISTRY SHOWN

The combined first appearance here this season of Geraldine Farrar and the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew a capacity audience to the Academy of Music last evening. It is clear that not even the opera can divert the attention of a class of music patrons from the superb musical organization from the New England metropolis.

The Boston orchestra is an authentic "standard" attraction. The eloquent artistry of its individual performers, the magnificent ensemble effects achieved and the brilliant direction of Dr. Karl Muck need no extended new indorsement now. The list of the world's greatest orchestras is not long. The Gewandhaus, of Leipsic; the Colonne, of Paris; the Philharmonic, of Berlin; the Philadelphia and the Boston very nearly occupy the entire top field.

Miss Farrar has been heard here rather infrequently in concert. It is a domain for which this exceedingly comely American soprano is admirably equipped. Not often in an artist are physical beauty and loveliness of voice so charmingly combined.

Her contributions to last night's program were discerningly chosen. To exhibit her skill in pure vocalization she offered first the aria "Come Scoglio" from Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte"—an opera long popular in Vienna and Munich, but entirely out of the American repertory. As a contrast, she was heard in three songs by Richard Wagner—"Im Treibhaus," "Traueme" and "Schmerzen." The second is derived from motives in the incomparable second act of "Tristan and Isolde." These leider permit of more dramatic interpretation than the Mozart selection, and Miss Farrar availed herself of their opportunities in finely effective style.

The symphony which was put forward by Doctor Muck as the opening number of the program was Beethoven's seventh, a work which shares honors with the fifth and ninth among the masterworks of its composer. Wagner found it the most marvelous of all, calling the seventh symphony "the apotheosis of the dance," and Isadora Duncan took him at his word by interpreting it with her unrivaled terpsichorean art. The solemn second movement was read last evening with impressive beauty.

The other numbers were a Haendel concerto for two wind choirs and Liszt's inspiring symphonic poem "Les Preludes," the familiar composition suggested by some reflections of the poet Lambertine.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date OCT 28 1913

The sale of season tickets for the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has more than exceeded expectations. Very few seats are left, and it is likely that these will be taken up before the box office sale for the first concert begins. The concerts will be given at 4:30 p. m., on Tuesday afternoons, November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17, and March 17. There will be no soloists for the first concert. In December the soloist will be Fritz Kriesler; in January Teresa Carreno; in February, Mme. van Endert, of the Royal Opera, Berlin, and in March, Paderewski.

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV

BOSTON SYMPHONY FIRST CONCERT

Miss Geraldine Farrar, the Soloist, Is Heard in Four Selections.

PROGRAM.
Beethoven..Symphony in A major. No. 7. Op. 92.
Mozart. Recitative and Aira, from "Cosi fan tutte."
Handel....Concerto for two wind choirs.
Wagner..Three poems. a. Im Treibhaus. b. Traume. c. Schmerzen.
Liszt..Symphonic poem. No. 3. "The Preludes" (after Lamartine).
Conductor.........Dr. Karl Muck
Soloist. Miss Geraldine Farrar.

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra attracted an unusually large and brilliant audience to the Academy of Music last evening, in spite of its being the first opera night. Very rarely if ever before have the two greatest American sopranos Geraldine Farrar and Mary Garden, appeared in Philadelphia upon the same evening. The opportunities in recent years of hearing Miss Farrar have been very few which must account for the very large audience under the circumstances.

When Conductor Karl Muck made his first appearance he was given a cordial reception, and the same enthusiasm was shown when Concertmeister Witek took his position. And when Miss Farrar, with an unusually unaffected manner, and gowned in a white satin dress of simple construction, tripped to the front of the stage, she was greeted with rounds of applause and the adjusting of hundreds of opera glasses. It is such a novelty to see Miss Farrar in concert that undoubtedly few were aware of how girlish and pretty she really is.

Beethoven Faultlessly Read.

Dr. Muck played the symphony as his first number. It was Beethoven's No. 7 in A major. Few of even the most ardent admirers of the immortal Beethoven but are willing to admit that there are portions of this work that are not inspiring, and it is by no means the most popular of the series. It is the long drawn out first movement that has no doubt compelled this opinion, The short, hymnlike second movement, and the presto movement, with its introduced Austrian hymn, are more inspiring and make the entire work satisfying at its conclusion.

The reading of this symphony by Dr. Muck was faultless and flawless. The Orchestra is in prime condition, and played with its usual marvelous uniformity. The present conductor's reading of this symphony is familiar, and last evening he missed no opportunity to give to the work that carefulness of attention which has made such a recognized master of Beethoven. But it was in the Handel numbers that the orchestra was heard with the most delight, probably due to the newness, and undoubtedly to the fine work of the wood-wind, and especially the oboe.

This number is a Concerto in F Major, which is arranged in five movements, about half of the original composition. While it is in the recognized style of Handel, it is brighter and more spirited than the major portion of his writings. The concert was closed with Liszt's Symphonic "The Preludes."

Miss Farrar's Brilliant Singing.

The first number given by Miss Farrar was a recitative and aria from the first act of "Cosi fan tutte," an opera by Mozart. This number is more or less familiar to the concert stage, as it is a brilliant show piece; not in just the same sense as are the famous Mad Scenes, or the brilliant Verdi arias, but it suits Miss Farrar's voice admirably, and she gave a fine exhibition of vocal display in the wide range required by the composition, always with strong, clear, sweet tones, but not of the very best that is possible, for the singer seemed to be laboring under a slight hoarseness, but not sufficiently so to mar her work.

She was liberally applauded.

At Miss Farrar's second appearance she sang three Wagner songs, "Im Treibhaus," "Traume" and "Schmerzen." They are most interesting songs and were admirably rendered, but were not the character that the audience would have selected, for they do not give the singer the opportunity to display her voice that they would have [illegible], and the best effect was the spirit with which they were [illegible] with a most effective pose [illegible] postlude which follows each

---

TELEGRAPH
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date 25

THE following week the full flood breaks loose, with five performances of the Philadelphia-Chicago Opera Company and the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy, besides our own Orchestra concerts. It will be a difficult choice on Monday evening between "La Tosca," with Mary Garden, and the debut of Martinelli, the tenor, and Marcoux, the baritone—and the Boston Orchestra with Miss Farrar. Dr. Muck has chosen an ideal symphony—the ideal symphony, one may say—in Beethoven's Seventh

---

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 5 1913

MANY ATTEND CONCERT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Glazounoff, Smetana, Dvorak, and Franck Drawn Upon for Program Given at New National.

MUCK'S CONDUCTING PRAISED

The first of the Boston Symphony season of five orchestral concerts was given at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon. The audience—and the house was crowded—banqueted on modern romantic music. If yesterday's program is a forecast of the programs to follow, the Boston Symphony season promises to be disappointing to those musicians who have been brought up on the riches of the old classics.

Two Bohemians, a Russian and a Frenchman, were drawn upon for the program. The chief piece was a symphony—the fifth—of Glazounoff, but not Glazounoff's chief symphony. Smetana's Overture to "The Bartered Bride," Dvorak's Overture to "Husitska," and the symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," of Caesar Franck, completed the program. A glance at this array suggests at once national picturesque realism.

That he writes Russian music is Glazounoff's pride; Smetana writes Bohemian music in "defiance of accusations of Wagnerism;" Dvorak is the most Slavic of Slavs; and Caesar Franck's fleeting, remote, shadowy, evanescent, passionless ingenuities are thoroughly aerial, delicate, fairy, one ever heard or saw; nymphs, sylphs, elves, gossamere webs, floating vapor, fantasies, dreams.

The subject of Dvorak's Overture deals with a Slavic Bohemian national theme, the legend of John Huss. The theme is barbaric.

The Glazounoff Symphony is a work of a great deal of originality and beauty. The first movement is of clear outline, and there is the usual development of themes, though the whole is not specially rich in material. The scherzo is a delicious sparkling bit, to which the andante makes a delightful contrast. This latter contains one of the most beautiful of melodies. The whole composition gives the impression of a good deal of breadth and power.

Smetana's Overture to the "Bartered Bride," although of great interest, for a certain vital rhythmic novelty, needs no comment; it is now some time since that work won an established place in American orchestral repertoires, and is deservedly popular.

The music that was given yesterday is —the most of it—novelty, "dessert." A little of it for contrast at each performance would be welcome. A conductor has the opportunity of familiarizing the people with great and noble works. To devote an entire program to less than great is waste of opportunity.

Dr. Muck has had a year with his orchestra since he resumed his post here, and he has established a perfect understanding with his men. It is a pleasure to study his conducting. This is never a performance. No conductor could efface himself more than he does. Yet there is not a motion of the hand or a glance of the eye but guides, controls, stimulates his musicians.

There is the vital round tone, the steady balance of the choirs, the subtle rise and fall of dynamics, the conscientious discipline in nice detail, the beautiful singing of the solo and fugal voices; in a word the fidelity to its traditional perfection that every one feels so sure of finding in this orchestra, under the hand of a great conductor.

From EVENING SUN
Address: New York
Date NOV 7 191

BEFORE the finest audience of the young season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra began its twenty-eighth year of infrequent visits to New York last evening in Carnegie Hall. The "B. S. O.," as it's called for short, might have been nicknamed the "S. R. O.," for a "standing room only" sign was hung out at Rudolf Heck's office when the house opened. There hadn't been a vacant chair in 2,500 on sale in the last two years.

Only Mayor Higginson's pair of seats, reserved for the orchestra's famous patron, were vacant down the centre aisle. So was one box, held for the wife of the conductor. Dr. Karl Muck, spare and debonnair, with his odd combination of ascetic and courtier, took the stand at 8:20 precisely to conduct the dancing Beethoven Seventh symphony. Late arrivals waited uncomplainingly. The music's mad pace would have wrecked an ordinary band, and the racing players deserved their standing recalls as they crossed the line neck and neck at the finish.

If the rich brocade of Beethoven is worn a bit threadbare by constant use, the brass shone out like pure gold in the enduring "Tragic Overture" of Brahms. Muck turned his hundred men loose in the flooding harmony of Lizst's "Preludes" for another rising salute by all hands. A new harpist, Alfred Holy, was seen in Heinrich Schuecker's place here. The concert ended at 10:10 with Wagner's booming horns of "The Flying Dutchman" overture.

Philip Hale's programme notes told how the "Dutchman" was composed by Wagner in a flight from Riga to London by the North Sea. "His wife went across the border disguised as a lumberman's wife, Wagner himself hid in an empty sentry's box, and composer, wife and dog met at Pillau, where they embarked in a sailing [illegible] watched last night's crowd depart in its hundreds of limousines. The tmanager's smile was that of the cat that swallowed the canary—or the whole aviary, rather—for had he not Farrar, Kreisler and Paderewski on tour this season? W. H. Brennan sped his chief to a midnight train. Paderewski was playing in Boston to-day, after giving a birthday dinner at the Hub last night, and Mr. Ellis went to look after his star, leaving the orchestra to play its three concerts out. It will return with Kreisler in December.

---

WITH every seat in the Academy of Music subscribed for the entire series of the Boston Orchestra there the opportunity to hear this organization by those who do not hold season tickets in either borough is limited to admission as "standees." Last night's Manhattan programme is repeated in Brooklyn to-night.

To-morrow's Carnegie Hall matinee presents Glazounoff's Fifth symphony, Smetana's overture to "Bartered Bride," Franck's "Les Eolides" and Dvorak's "Husitska."

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 5 191

The New National Theater was filled with a smart audience yesterday afternoon for the first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck.

In the Presidential box was Miss Helen Woodrow Bones, Mrs. Franklin K. Lane, Mrs. David Houston, Mrs. Parion P. Maus, and Miss Isabella L. Hagner.

With the German Ambassador and the Countess von Bernstorff, in the adjoining box, was Mr. and Mrs. George Howard, Miss Perin, and Baron von Lersner.

With Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, in her box, was Mrs. Mandeville Carlisle and Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe.

Mr. and Mrs. Preston Gibson occupied Mrs. McMillan's box, and with Mrs. Hitt in Mrs. Crozier's box was a party including Mrs. Boardman and Miss Mabel T. Boardman.

Mrs. I. T. Mann had a party of guests in her box, as did Mrs. Lisner.

Others in the audience were Mr. and Mrs. Charles Campbell, Mrs. Joseph Thropp, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. John Hay, Mrs. George Eustis, Mrs. Tuckerman, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Mrs. Hennen Jennings, Miss Macomb, Miss Mary Sheridan, the Misses de Pena, Mrs. Walter Wells, Mr. and Mrs. Hemmick, Mrs. Henry Kirk Porter, Miss Hageman, Miss Portner, Mr. and Mrs. William F. Dennis, Mrs. Buckner Randolph, Mrs. Charles B. Howry, Mrs. James C. Pilling, Mrs. Henry G. Sharpe, and Mrs. Harold P. Morton.

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 2 1913

ORCHESTRA CONCERT TUESDAY AFTERNOON

Boston Organization Has the Largest Subscription in Its History For Engagements.

With the largest subscription in its history, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, gives the first of its five Washington concerts in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30. All accounts have it that the orchestra is playing more brilliantly than ever.

Dr. Muck left it last spring at the highest point of discipline and technical efficiency it had ever reached, and this fall when he resumed his work in Boston the orchestra began where it had left off in May. There are a few changes in the personnel owing to the retirement of some of the old members.

The concert will be purely orchestral, no soloist taking part in the program. It comprises the brilliant and tuneful Symphony in B flat major by the Russian, Glazounoff; Smetana's fascinating little overture, "Die verkaufte Braut;" Cesar Franck's fantastic "Les Eolides," and Dvorak's overture, "Husitska."

EVENING STAR
ss: Washington, D. C.
NOV 2 1913

Boston Symphony November 4.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Karl Muck, will give the first of its Washington concerts in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 [illegible]ck. There are a few changes in personnel owing to the retirement some of the old members.

The concert will be purely orchestral, no soloist taking part in the program, which comprises the "Symphony in B Flat Major," by the Russian, Glazounoff; Smetana's overture, "Die Verkaufte Braut"; Cesar Franck's fantastic, "Les Eolides," and Dvorak's overture, "Husit-

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date 4

The Boston Orchestra

Geraldine Farrar Appears as Soloist at Season's First Concert

The appearance of Geraldine Farrar as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew to the Academy of Music last night an audience that filled every seat and overflowed into the musicians' pit in front of the stage, in spite of the fact that the orchestra's first concert fell coincidentally with the opening of the [illegible] season. The program was as follows:

Beethoven..Symphony in A major, No. 7, Op. 92
I. Poco Sostenuto; Vivace.
II. Allegretto.
III. Presto: Presto meno assai.
IV. Allegro con brio.
Mozart, Recitative, "Temerari," and Aria, "Come scoglio," from "Cosi fan tutte," Act I., No. 14
Handel..........Concerto for Two Wind Choirs
Wagner .... Three Poems
a. Im Treibhaus. b. Traume. c. Schmerzen.
Liszt. Symphonic Poem, No. 3, "The Preludes" (after Lamartine).

The symphony, which has been classed with the Fifth and the Ninth as one of Beethoven's master works, though its appeal is to the intellect rather than to the emotions, was played with the precision and delicacy that have come to be characteristic of the Boston players, although Dr. Muck's restraint made it difficult at times, notably in the Vivace of the first movement, to square the music with Wagner's praise of it as the "apotheosis of the dance." This very repression, however, enhanced the beauty of the allegretto, read with fine poetic insight, and was relaxed in the final allegro which was sent dashing along to a brilliant and delightful close. The splendor of the orchestra's wood winds was shown in the Handel number, which is so seldom heard here that it might almost be considered a novelty. Its suave second movement, wrought of delicately interlaced phrases and dainty contrasts of woods and strings, was close to perfection.

Miss Farrar, whose winsome beauty combines admirably with the loveliness of her voice to make her an ideal concert singer, chose her numbers with discrimination. The purity of her vocalization was shown in the Mozart recitative and aria which she sang with grace and charm. The three Wagner songs, richer and warmer in sentiment, displayed by contrast her ability to interpret poetical thoughts and it is difficult to say in which manifesation her versatile talent showed to better advantage. Her singing of "Traume," a sketch in which Wagner jotted down some of his ideas for "Tristan and Isolde," was an exquisite bit of dramatic vocalization and seemed to be most appreciated by the audience.

The Liszt Poem, with which the concert closed, was read in broad and vigorous style and displayed the amazing power of the orchestra

---

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date NOV [illegible] 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Its Local Season Opened at the Academy of Music Last Evening

What promises to be an exceptionally brilliant and successful season was opened by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck. It made a most auspicious start. Despite the counter-attraction presented at the Metropolitan Opera House, where also the curtain was rung up for the first time, a very large and especially enthusiastic audience was present, and with an extremely attractive program admirably rendered, the occasion was one of much distinction and enjoyment.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony was the central feature of the scheme. This is a noble work which, if it is to be properly impressive, if all its significance is to be exhibited and all its beauty revealed, needs to be nobly done, with power, with dignity, with elan, with fervor, and at the same time with a certain reserve, with a certain sense of self-restraint, exclusive of any merely meretricious exaggerations. It is a composition which readily lends itself to, which somewhat seductively invites, an excessive and enervating sentimentalization, and performances of it have been heard at the Academy of comparatively recent memory in which its heroic proportions were reduced within the scope of a miniature and its lofty emotion degraded to the level of a saccharine and sickly emotionality.

Such, it need hardly be said, was not the case last night. Dr. Muck is rather inclined to be over austere than to be unduly demonstrative, and while it did not lack for eloquence and feeling, his interpretation of the Seventh was predominantly marked by virility and vigor. His reading of it, to employ a hackneyed phrase, was eminently safe, sane and sound, and it was also much more than that. Exquisitely finished in every detail and evincing a subtle and discriminative sense of proportion in the adjustment and co-ordination of its parts, it was in a notable degree intellectual and illuminative and the impression which it produced upon an audience very well able to appreciate its value was quite profound. Handel's Concerto for Two Wind Choirs furnished a good test, triumphantly sustained, of the virtuosities which it engaged, and the concert was brought to a conclusion by a superbly poetic and sonorous presentation of Liszt's "Preludes."

Miss Geraldine Farrar was the assisting artist of the evening, and while it could not truthfully be stated that Miss [illegible] as satisfying and noteworthy [illegible] the concert room as she is upon the [illegible] where her fine dramatic abilities [illegible] brought into play with her agreeable [illegible]

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date NOV 2 1913

* * *

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, at 8:15, with Geraldine Farrar as soloist. The subscription sale for the coming season is one of the largest the Boston Symphony has ever had in this city, and the concerts are certain to be correspondingly successful. Miss Farrar's appearance will lend unusual brilliancy to the opening, for this charming singer is very seldom heard on the concert platform.

Miss Farrar will sing as her first number the recitative "Temerari," and the air "Come Scoglio," from Mozart's opera "Cosi fan tutte." Her second number will be three of the five poems by Mathilde Wesendonck, set to music by Wagner at the time he was living in Zurich and making his studies of "Tristan and Isolde." These are "Im Treibhaus," "Traume" and "Schmerzen." The first two he called studies for Tristan and Isolde, "Im Treibhaus" for the third act and "Traume" for the second.

The symphony will be Beethoven's Seventh in A major. The other numbers will be Handel's Concerto for two wind choirs and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes. The program in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony No. 7 in A major, Beethoven; air "Come Scoglio," from "Cosi fan tutte," Mozart; concerto for two wind choirs, Handel; three poems, "Im Treibhaus," "Traume" and "Schmerzen," Wagner; "Les Preludes," Liszt.

* * *

Est 1884

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT [illegible] 1913

* * *

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music a week from to-morrow (Monday) evening, November 3, at 8.15. The soloist will be Miss Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York. Miss Farrar will sing two numbers. Her first will be a rather unfamiliar air from Mozart's opera "Cosi fan tutte" and her second will be three songs of Richard Wagner, "Im Treibhaus," "Traume" and "Schmerzen." The orchestral numbers will be the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, Handel's Concerto for two wind choirs with string accompaniment and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes."

* * *

rk, 1884

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

With the largest subscription in its history, the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck, gives the first of its five Washington concerts in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. All accounts have it that the orchestra is playing more brilliantly than ever. Dr. Muck left it last spring at the highest point of discipline and technical efficiency it had ever reached, and this fall when he resumed his work in Boston the orchestra began where it had left off in May. There are a few changes in the personnel, owing to the retirement of some of the old members.

The concert will be purely orchestral, no soloist taking part in the program. It comprises the bewildering brilliant and tuneful symphony in B flat major by the Russian Glazounoff, Smetana's ever welcome and fascinating little overture, "Die Verkaufte Braut;" Cessar Franck's fantastic "Les Eolides," and Dvorak's overture, "Husitska." The program in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony in B flat major, No. 5 (Glazounoff); overture, "The Sold Bride" (Smetana); symphonic poem, "Les Eolides" (Franck); dramatic overture, "Husitska" (Dvorak).

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 5 1913

Fashion at Symphony Concert.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts of the season attracted a large and fashionable audience to the National Theater yesterday afternoon. The German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff occupied a box and had as guests the Spanish Minister, Mrs. George Howard, Miss Margaret Perin, and Baron Kurt von Lersner, of the embassy staff. Mrs. Franklin K. Lane, Mrs. David Houston, Miss Helen Woodrow Bones, Mrs. Marion P. Maus, and Miss Hagner were guests in one of the stage boxes. Mrs. Cuno Rudolph was among the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Abram Lisner in their box. Mrs. Calderon Carlisle had among the guests in her box, Mrs. Mandeville Carlisle and Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Campbell entertained a box party, and Mrs. William J. Boardman and Miss Mabel Boardman were among the occupants of another box. Among others in the audience were Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mr. Ten Eyck Wendell and Ten Eyck Wendell, jr., Mrs. Buckner Randolph, Mr. and Mrs. Adolph Miller, Mrs. Charles B. Howry, Mrs. Henry G. Sharpe, Mrs. James C. Pilling, Mrs. Harold P. Morton, Mrs. Edward Mitchell, Mrs. Hunt Slater, Miss Laura Harlan, Mrs. Christian Hemmick, Miss Gwynn, Mrs. Frank B. Noyes, and Mr. Baumann, of the Swiss legation.

Es 1884

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 5 1913

MUSICAL SEASON OPENED.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert a Brilliant Success.

The musical season had a brilliant opening at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck entire orchestral concert without to an enthusiastic and capacity

The general vein of the progra happy one, although the symph in B flat major, of Glazounoff w richness and profound depth written with distinctive leit m the allegro is gracious, elegan delightful swing in three-four ti scherzo opened with a sparkle a ness, given by the flutes, ob clarinet, that stamped the entir ment, whose essential characteri that of daintiness, sustained, how some rich string work. The anda a romance, a soaring love song ominous, threatening interlude typical of the dark spirit of music; then back again to the t love, full of grace, with harp accompan ment. The allegro maestoso was mo national, with a strong Eastern tinge. was full of moods and emotions, a wa then abandon to the dance, working u to a brilliant finale.

With the forward that the overture "The Sold Bride," by Smetana, might well serve as prelude to a comedy of Shakespeare, we have the keynote to that episodic composition which came out of Bohemia. After big, introductory chords it goes into a descriptive bit that is like fairyland. The overture might tell of a rural fair. It is gypsy-like at happy, playful, and altogether brea spirit of joyousness.

But "The Aeolidae," the sym poem by Cesar Franck, as given b Muck, was a thing apart. The spir oneness of the orchestra were truly fect, and Dr. Muck was the genius wafted these "breezes," these zephyrs, over the domain of pagan land where nymphs frolicked and th mortals laughed. This exquisite finds absolute interpretation in the of Franck which belongs to the m French school, with its creating a mosphere and its elusive charm.

One was loath to come back to realism of Dvorak's dramatic ove "Husitka." It really canonizes the hemian patriot Johann Huss, op with his religious hymn, following in martial strain, through his battles, and resolving itself in a song of vigor and faith and hope.

J. McB.

Est 1884

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D
Date NOV

CONCERT RECEIV WITH ENTHU

Boston Symphony O Under Direction of Carl Muck, Has Big Audience.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, under the direction of Dr. Carl Muck, and from the size and enthusiasm of the audience, musical Washington bids fair to patroize all the symphonies. Dr. Muck has his own following in this city, which is saying a great deal, since he has only been in charge of the orchestra for one year.

Aside from the interpretive genius of Dr. Muck and a fine appreciation of the intention of the composer, this director has been particularly happy in the choice of numbers for his programs. Without any doubt he rprsnts a younger school, does not cling to the older classics, and is continally introducing new fields of composition to music lovers. Although the numbers yesterday had been heard before in America, they belong to a closs few conductors care to attempt.

The first number was Glazounoff's Symphony in B flat major, which he composed in St. Petersburg in 1896. It was performed for the first time in March of that year, and was given in America in 1898. Written with a distinctly happy motif, this work was a fitting prelude to the following numbers. The fantastic and imaginative music of Glazounoff received a happy interpretation at the hands of Dr. Muck.

The second number, the overture to the opera, "The Sold Bride," by Friedrich Smetna, is of the Bohemian school, and is an earlier work than the symphony, having been completed by the composer in 1866. Unusual genius is shown in the development of theme in this number.

The last number was the "Aeolidae," a symphonic poem by Cesar Franck, a thing of exceptional beauty. The piece has its chief theme in a short chromatic phrase from which other melodic phrases of a similar character are derived. Its technical perfection keeping with its tonal beauty.

Est

From EVENING STAR
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 5 1913

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Dr. Karl Muck, opened its season in this city with a matinee at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, to the usual large and fashionable audience. The program was modern throughout, beginning with Glazounoff's symphony in B flat major, No. 5, op. 55, and closing with Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska," op. 67, with Caesar Franck's symphonic poem "Les Eolides" and Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride" intervening. The audience manifested its pleasure in ripples of applause from time to time, singing out the second movement of the symphony, the symphonic poems of Franck and the Dvorak number for special favor.

Es 1884

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date 5 1913

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater a week from Wednesday evening, November 5, at 8:15. The soloist will be Miss Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York. Miss Farrar will sing two numbers. Her first will be a rather unfamiliar air from Mozart's opera, Cosi fan Tutte, and her second will be three songs of Richard Wagner, Im Treibhaus, Traume, and Schmerzen. The orchestral numbers will be the Fifth Symphony of Glazounoff, Handel's Concerto, and Liszt's symphonic poem, Les Preludes.

Est 1884

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

Established

ILLNESS OF FARRAR PREVENTS SINGING

Prima Donna Is Unable To Appear With Boston Symphony.

Taken suddenly ill in New York today, Miss Geraldine Farrar, the grand opera prima donna, will be unable to sing as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric tonight. At a late hour this afternoon an effort was being made to secure another soloist and it was announced that her illness would not interfere with the concert.

The message from New York, which told of Miss Farrar's indisposition, said that she was not seriously ill, but that her physician, Dr. Curtis, had refused to allow her to come to Baltimore to fill the engagement.

The occasion was to have marked Miss Farrar's local debut as a concert singer.

The Symphony first-night promises to be an unusually brilliant one, the house being practically sold out. The performance will be the initial musical event of the year to attract society people, and a number of box parties will be held.

Dr. Muck's program is a distinguished one, the orchestral numbers comprising Litzt's exquisite symphonic poem "Les Preludes," and 5, 1913.

Handel's Concerto for strings and two wind choirs. The symphony will be the Glazounow No. 5 in B flat major.

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date [illegible] 4

The Boston Orchestra

Geraldine Farrar Appears as Soloist at Season's First Concert

The appearance of Geraldine Farrar as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew to the Academy of Music last night an audience that filled every seat and overflowed into the musicians' pit in front of the stage, in spite of the fact that the orchestra's first concert fell coincidentally with the opening of the opera season. The program was as follows:

Beethoven..Symphony in A major, No. 7, Op. 92
I. Poco Sostenuto; Vivace.
II. Allegretto.
III. Presto: Presto meno assai.
IV. Allegro con brio.
Mozart, Recitative, "Temerari," and Aria, "Come scoglio," from "Cosi fan tutte," Act I., No. 14
Handel..........Concerto for Two Wind Choirs
Wagner .... Three Poems
a. Im Treibhaus. b. Traume. c. Schmerzen.
Liszt, Symphonic Poem, No. 3, "The Preludes" (after Lamartine).

The symphony, which has been classed with the Fifth and the Ninth as one of Beethoven's master works, though its appeal is to the intellect rather than to the emotions, was played with the precision and delicacy that have come to be characteristic of the Boston players, although Dr. Muck's restraint made it difficult at times, notably in the Vivace of the first movement, to square the music with Wagner's praise of it as the "apotheosis of the dance." This very repression, however, enhanced the beauty of the allegretto, read with fine poetic insight, and was relaxed in the final allegro which was sent dashing along to a brilliant and delightful close. The splendor of the orchestra's wood winds was shown in the Handel number, which is so seldom heard here that it might almost be considered a novelty. Its suave second movement, wrought of delicately interlaced phrases and dainty contrasts of woods and strings, was close to perfection.

Miss Farrar, whose winsome beauty combines admirably with the loveliness of her voice to make her an ideal concert singer, chose her numbers with discrimination. The purity of her vocalization was shown in the Mozart recitative and aria which she sang with grace and charm. The three Wagner songs, richer and warmer in sentiment, displayed by contrast her ability to interpret poetical thoughts and it is difficult to say in which manifesation her versatile talent showed to better advantage. Her singing of "Traume," a sketch in which Wagner jotted down some of his ideas for "Tristan and Isolde," was an exquisite bit of dramatic vocalization and seemed to be most appreciated by the audience.

The Liszt Poem, with which the concert closed, was read in broad and vigorous style and displayed the amazing power of the orchestra

---

From ENQUIRER
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Its Local Season Opened at the Academy of Music Last Evening

What promises to be an exceptionally brilliant and successful season was opened by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck. It made a most auspicious start. Despite the counter-attraction presented at the Metropolitan Opera House, where also the curtain was rung up for the first time, a very large and especially enthusiastic audience was present, and with an extremely attractive program admirably rendered, the occasion was one of much distinction and enjoyment.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony was the central feature of the scheme. This is a noble work which, if it is to be properly impressive, if all its significance is to be exhibited and all its beauty revealed, needs to be nobly done, with power, with dignity, with elan, with fervor, and at the same time with a certain reserve, with a certain sense of self-restraint, exclusive of any merely meretricious exaggerations. It is a composition which readily lends itself to, which somewhat seductively invites, an excessive and enervating sentimentalization, and performances of it have been heard at the Academy of comparatively recent memory in which its heroic proportions were reduced within the scope of a miniature and its lofty emotion degraded to the level of a saccharine and sickly emotionality.

Such, it need hardly be said, was not the case last night. Dr. Muck is rather inclined to be over austere than to be unduly demonstrative, and while it did not lack for eloquence and feeling, his interpretation of the Seventh was predominantly marked by virility and vigor. His reading of it, to employ a hackneyed phrase, was eminently safe, sane and sound, and it was also much more than that. Exquisitely finished in every detail and evincing a subtle and discriminating sense of proportion in the adjustment and co-ordination of its parts, it was in a notable degree intellectual and illuminative and the impression which it produced upon an audience very well able to appreciate its value was quite profound. Handel's Concerto for Two Wind Choirs furnished a good test, triumphantly sustained, of the virtuosities which it engaged, and the concert was brought to a conclusion by a superbly poetic and sonorous presentation of Liszt's "Preludes."

Miss Geraldine Farrar was the assisting artist of the evening, and while it could not truthfully be stated that Miss Farrar is as satisfying and noteworthy in the concert room as she is upon the stage, where her fine dramatic abilities are brought into play, with her agreeable voice and her ingratiating presence

---

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia
Date NOV 2 1913

* * *

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, at 8:15, with Geraldine Farrar as soloist. The subscription sale for the coming season is one of the largest the Boston Symphony has ever had in this city, and the concerts are certain to be correspondingly successful. Miss Farrar's appearance will lend unusual brilliancy to the opening, for this charming singer is very seldom heard on the concert platform.

Miss Farrar will sing as her first number the recitative "Temerari," and the air "Come Scoglio," from Mozart's opera "Cosi fan tutte." Her second number will be three of the five poems by Mathilde Wesendonck, set to music by Wagner at the time he was living in Zurich and making his studies of "Tristan and Isolde." These are "Im Treibhaus," "Traume" and "Schmerzen." The first two he called studies for Tristan and Isolde, "Im Treibhaus" for the third act and "Traume" for the second.

The symphony will be Beethoven's Seventh in A major. The other numbers will be Handel's Concerto for two wind choirs and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes. The program in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony No. 7 in A major, Beethoven; air "Come Scoglio," from "Cosi fan tutte," Mozart; concerto for two wind choirs, Handel; three poems, "Im Treibhaus," "Traume" and "Schmerzen," Wagner; "Les Preludes," Liszt.

* * *

From PRESS
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date OCT 2? 1913

* * *

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music a week from to-morrow (Monday) evening, November 3, at 8.15. The soloist will be Miss Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York. Miss Farrar will sing two numbers. Her first will be a rather unfamiliar air from Mozart's opera "Cosi fan tutte" and her second will be three songs of Richard Wagner, "Im Treibhaus," "Traume" and "Schmerzen." The orchestral numbers will be the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, Handel's Concerto for two wind choirs with string accompaniment and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes."

* * *

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

With the largest subscription in its history, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, gives the first of its five Washington concerts in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. All accounts have it that the orchestra is playing more brilliantly than ever. Dr. Muck left it last spring at the highest point of discipline and technical efficiency it had ever reached, and this fall when he resumed his work in Boston the orchestra began where it had left off in May. There are a few changes in the personnel, owing to the retirement of some of the old members.

The concert will be purely orchestral, no soloist taking part in the program. It comprises the bewildering brilliant and tuneful symphony in B flat major by the Russian Glazounoff, Smetana's ever welcome and fascinating little overture, "Die Verkaufte Braut;" Cessar Franck's fantastic "Les Eolides," and Dvorak's overture, "Husitska." The program in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony in B flat major, No. 5 (Glazounoff); overture, "The Sold Bride" (Smetana); symphonic poem "Les Eolides" (Franck); dramatic overture, "Husitska" (Dvorak).

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 5 1913

Fashion at Symphony Concert.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts of the season attracted a large and fashionable audience to the National Theater yesterday afternoon. The German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff occupied a box and had as guests the Spanish Minister, Mrs. George Howard, Miss Margaret Perin, and Baron Kurt von Lersner, of the embassy staff. Mrs. Franklin K. Lane, Mrs. David Houston, Miss Helen Woodrow Bones, Mrs. Marion P. Maus, and Miss Hagner were guests in one of the stage boxes. Mrs. Cuno Rudolph was among the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Abram Lisner in their box. Mrs. Calderon Carlisle had among the guests in her box, Mrs. Mandeville Carlisle and Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Campbell entertained a box party, and Mrs. William J. Boardman and Miss Mabel Boardman were among the occupants of another box. Among others in the audience were Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mr. Ten Eyck Wendell and Ten Eyck Wendell, jr., Mrs. Buckner Randolph, Mr. and Mrs. Adolph Miller, Mrs. Charles B. Howry, Mrs. Henry G. Sharpe, Mrs. James C. Pilling, Mrs. Harold P. Morton, Mrs. Edward Mitchell, Mrs. Hunt Slater, Miss Laura Harlan, Mrs. Christian Hemmick, Miss Gwynn, Mrs. Frank B. Noyes, and Mr. Baumann, of the Swiss legation.

From POST
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date NOV 5 1913

MUSICAL SEASON OPENED.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert a Brilliant Success.

The musical season had a brilliant opening at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, gave an entire orchestral concert without a soloist to an enthusiastic and capacity audience.

The general vein of the program was a happy one, although the symphony, that in B flat major, of Glazounoff was full of richness and profound depths. It is written with distinctive leit motive, and the allegro is gracious, elegant, with a delightful swing in three-four time. The scherzo opened with a sparkle and lightness, given by the flutes, oboe, and clarinet, that stamped the entire movement, whose essential characteristic was that of daintiness, sustained, however, by some rich string work. The andante was a romance, a soaring love song with an ominous, threatening interlude, more typical of the dark spirit of Russian music; then back again to the theme of love, full of grace, with harp accompaniment. The allegro maestoso was more national, with a strong Eastern tinge. It was full of moods and emotions, a wail, then abandon to the dance, working up to a brilliant finale.

With the forward that the overture of "The Sold Bride," by Smetana, might well serve as prelude to a comedy of Shakespeare, we have the keynote to that episodic composition which came out of Bohemia. After big, introductory chords it goes into a descriptive bit that is like fairyland. The overture might tell of a rural fair. It is gypsy-like at times, happy, playful, and altogether breathes a spirit of joyousness.

But "The Aeolidae," the symphonic poem by Cesar Franck, as given by Dr. Muck, was a thing apart. The spirit and oneness of the orchestra were truly perfect, and Dr. Muck was the genius who wafted these "breezes," these gentle zephyrs, over the domain of pagan fableland where nymphs frolicked and the immortals laughed. This exquisite poem finds absolute interpretation in the music of Franck which belongs to the modern French school, with its creating of atmosphere and its elusive charm.

One was loath to come back to the realism of Dvorak's dramatic overture "Husitka." It really canonizes the Bohemian patriot Johann Huss, opening with his religious hymn, following in martial strain, through his battles, and resolving itself in a song of vigor and faith and hope.

J. McB.

TIMES
shington, D. C.
NOV 5

NCERT RECEIVED WITH ENTHUSIASM

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Under Direction of Carl Muck, Has Big Audience.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, under the direction of Dr. Carl Muck, and from the size and enthusiasm of the audience, musical Washington bids fair to patroize all the symphonies. Dr. Muck has his own following in this city, which is saying a great deal, since he has only been in charge of the orchestra for one year.

Aside from the interpretive genius of Dr. Muck and a fine appreciation of the intention of the composer, this director has been particularly happy in the choice of numbers for his programs. Without any doubt he rprsnts a younger school, does not cling to the older classics, and is continally introducing new fields of composition to music lovers. Although the numbers yesterday had been heard before in America, they belong to a closs few conductors care to attempt.

The first number was Glazounoff's Symphony in B flat major, which he composed in St. Petersburg in 1896. It was performed for the first time in March of that year, and was given in America in 1898. Written with a distinctly happy motif, this work was a fitting prelude to the following numbers. The fantastic and imaginative music of Glazounoff received a happy interpretation at the hands of Dr. Muck.

The second number, the overture to the opera, "The Sold Bride," by Friedrich Smetna, is of the Bohemian school, and is an earlier work than the symphony, having been completed by the composer in 1866. Unusual genius is shown in the development of theme in this number.

The last number was the "Aeolidae," a symphonic poem by Cesar Franck, a thing of exceptional beauty. The piece has its chief theme in a short chromatic phrase from which other medolic phrases of a similar character are derived. Its technical perfection is in keeping with its tonal beauty. J. M.

NG STAR
shington, D. C.
NOV 5 1913

ymphony Orchestra.

Symphony Orchestra, un of Dr. Karl Muck, opened n this city with a matinee at nal Theater yesterday after he usual large and fashionable The program was modern ut, beginning with Glazounoff's ny in B flat major, No. 5, op. 55 losing, with Dvorak's dramatic re, "Husitska," op. 67, with Caesar ck's symphonic poem "Les Eolides" Smetana's overture to "The Sold ide" intervening. The audience manisted its pleasure in ripples of applause rom time to time, singing out the second movement of the symphony, the symphonic poems of Franck and the Dvorak number for special favor.

RICAN
Baltimore, Md.
1913 ton Symphony Orchestra.

first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Theater a week from Wednesday g, November 5, at 8:15. The soloist will be Miss Geraldine Farrar, of the politan Opera Company, New York. Farrar will sing two numbers. Her will be a rather unfamiliar air from rt's opera, Cosi fan Tutte, and her nd will be three songs of Richard gner, Im Treibhaus, Traume, and Schmerzen. The orchestral numbers will be the Fifth Symphony of Glazounoff, Handel's Concerto, and Liszt's symphonic poem, Les Preludes.

NEWS
1.

OF FARRA ENTS SINGI

Prima Donna Is Unable T Appear With Boston Symphony.

Taken suddenly ill in New York to day, Miss Geraldine Farrar, the gran opera prima donna, will be unabl sing as soloist with the Boston S phony Orchestra at the Lyric toni At a late hour this afternoon an ef was being made to secure anot soloist and it was announced that illness would not interfere with concert.

The message from New York, wh told of Miss Farrar's indispositio said that she was not seriously ill, bu that her physician, Dr. Curtis, ha refused to allow her to come to Ba timore to fill the engagement.

The occasion was to have marke Miss Farrar's local debut as a cor cert singer.

The Symphony first-night promise to be an unusually brilliant one, th house being practically sold out. Th performance will be the initial musi cal event of the year to attract so ciety people, and a number of box parties will be held.

Dr. Muck's program is a distinguished one, the orchestral numbers comprising Litzt's exquisite symphonic poem "Les Preludes," and 5, 1913.

---

Handel's Concerto for strings and two wind choirs. The symphony will be the Glazounow No. 5 in B flat major.

[57]

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 6 - 1913
Established:

SYMPHONY CONCER PLEASES AUDIENCE

But It Is Disappointed By Farrar's Inability To Appear.

A great disappointment greeted the huge crowd that filled the Lyric last night on the occasion of the first Boston Symphony concert, when it was announced that Miss Geraldine Farrar was, through illness, unable to fulfill her engagement. Brahms' "Tragic Overture" and the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" were inserted at the last moment to take the place of her numbers on the program.

It so happened that the result as a whole was perhaps the best balanced and most attractive program with which Dr. Muck has hitherto favored us. It may be fairly said that, while Dr. Muck lacks the peculiar magnetism of Nikisch, he attains a higher general level of interpretation than any conductor of the preser ay, showing himself in his readings thoroughly in sympathy with the best compositions of all the various schools, though as a program maker he has so far seemed to be little in touch with his public.

The concert opened with Glazounoff's symphony in B flat, a work which, while truly Russian in feeling, shows more poise and intellectual control than is usual with composers of his nationality. It is unfortunately weakened, in spite of many very beautiful moments, by the absence of any really striking thematic material. This is especially noticeable in the first movement. Nothing could have afforded a stronger contrast than th stern, somber beauty of the Brahm overture, by which it was followed.

The Handel concerto proved a ver agreeable surprise, inasmuch as he of all the great composers of the pa the one least in touch with moder musical thought, recalling as he fr quently does the prosaic atmosphe of the Georgian period in English hi tory. Every movement of the co certo was interesting, and the aud ence was treated to an exhibition some remarkably fine oboe playing.

The concert closed with Liszt Symphonic Poem No. 3, "The Pr ludes," certainly one of the most ha pily conceived of any of his compositions, and showing vantage the resources of t orchestra.

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltim
Date V 6
Establi

BOSTON SYMPHO HEARTILY WELCO

Miss Farrar Absent Because of Severe Cold—Fine Program Presented.

Though manifestly disappointed by the announcement that Miss Geraldine Farrar would be unable to appear, the audience which filled every seat in the Lyric last night was not long in realizing that the program provided for its entertainment by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Karl Muck, was of a nature that made it impossible to cavil because of the absence of the popular prima donna who had been announced as the soloist.

In a message to Manager Kinsey, of the Lyric, it was explained that Miss Farrar was suffering from a severe cold which threatened to develop into laryngitis and that her physician forbade her to leave New York. The absence of Miss Farrar necessitated two changes in the program. Owing to the lateness of the hour at which the communication from New York was received it was impossible to obtain the services of another soloist, so the new numbers were exclusively instrumental. For two selections from Mozart's Cosi fan tutte the Tragic Overture of Brahms was substituted, and instead of three song poems by Wagner the overture of this composer's Flying Dutchman was given a place on the program. The selections were fortunate, for they offered excellent contrasts to the spirit of the other numbers, and brought into stronger relief the wonderful resources of the famous orchestra.

The symphony selected for the first appearance of the Boston Orchestra in Baltimore this season was Glazounoff's Symphony in B flat major, No. 5, Op. 55. This is in four movements and is generally regarded as revealing its composer at his best. At times stately, at others blithesome, the wonderful symphony seems always haunted by a gipsy spirit, which now and then gives expression to a sense of wild restlessness and freedom. In the rendition of the symphony the wood, wind and brasses are dominant. The scherzo was especially pleasing and the allegro maestoso was wonderfully impressive.

To many in the audience Brahms' Tragic Overture seemed a little cold and unappealing at first, but as it proceeded the rendering of the theme became more sure and convincing. When it was finished it was accorded one of the heartiest expressions of approval heard during the evening.

Despite the excellence of the symphony, there was reason to believe that the superb rendering of Handel's Concert in F major for strings and two wind orchestras—this being the edition of Gustav F. Kogel—made an appeal that caused it to be regarded by many persons as the most pleasing feature of the program. A duo for oboes in the third movement was received with a demonstration of great enthusiasm, which was equaled only by that which followed a singing violin effect in the largo. The overture of The Flying Dutchman was splendidly done.

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date
Established

ORCHESTRA DELIGHTS BRILLIANT AUDIENCE

Director Karl Muck Gets Splendid Personal Reception At Lyric.

GERALDINE FARRAR WIRES HER REGRETS

Boston Organization Substitutes Two Orchestral Numbers For Noted Diva's Songs.

Seldom has a more brilliant audience been seen at the Lyric than that which crowded the house to the doors last night at the opening concert of the year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The announcement in The News late in the afternoon that Geraldine Farrar, who was to have been the soloist, would not sing, had prepared many of the patrons for a change in the program, and this announcement was supplemented by big signs at the Lyric entrance telling of the diva's illness and her inability to appear.

W. H. Brennan, assistant manager, who has been coming to Baltimore with the Orchestra for many years, received a telegram from Miss Farrar's physician about 2 o'clock telling him that she was suffering with a severe attack of laryngitis. The soprano herself telegraphed to express her deep regret at having to disappoint the Baltimore people.

Despite the chagrin that many felt over Miss Farrar's canceled engagement, no "kicks" were made, and if any exercised the privilege of having their money returned it made no appreciable difference in the size of the house. Instead of the three songs by Wagner which Miss Farrar was to have sung two additional orchestral numbers were given. These were both familiar—Brahms' "Tragic" overture and the "Fliegende Hollander" overture.

Dr. Karl Muck, the director, was given a splendid personal reception and every number was vigorously applauded, the Handel Concerto having made a particularly good impression.

Among those in the audience were Mr. and Mrs. Gustave Strube. Mr. Strube is the new professor of harmony at the Peabody Conservatory of Music, having succeeded the late O. B. Boise. He was formerly assistant director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and last night was the first time he had ever attended one of its concerts as a spectator, despite the fact that he had been associated with

---

The
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From GLOBE
Address: New York
Date NOV 10 1913
E k, 1884

Music.

The Boston Orchestra Again—Other Concerts.

Dr. Muck perpetrated one of his weird programmes on the great audience that filled to capacity Carnegie Hall for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon. Is it a sense of humor, or what is it that makes the slim, Mephistophelian leader do these things? All sorts of mud has been slung at practical jokers, so no more is going to be slung here just now, but sometimes it does seem that Dr. Muck is not taking his own talents or his orchestra so seriously as we New Yorkers do.

The programme Saturday consisted of Glazounoff's fifth symphony, Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture, César Franck's symphonic poem "Les Eolides," and Dvorak's "Husitska" overture. It really isn't worth the Boston Symphony's while to come all the way to New York to waste its sweetness on Glazounoff's decorative, "popular" symphony, and the Dvorak overture in question isn't worth anybody's while anywhere, unless a brass band's in the street.

But thanks unto Dr. Muck for bringing up "Les Eolides"! César Franck is still neglected in this town, in spite of numerous performances of his symphony in the last few years. It is still an event for a New Yorker to hear a work by the great Belgian, so overridden are our concerts by German and Russian music. "Les Eolides" is not comparable as an example of Franck's genius to the symphony, the string quartet, the piano quintet, or the violin sonata, but it is a work of individual charm and should be played here often enough to become familiar. All honor for his share to Dr. Muck!

In the Smetana overture the Boston men held carnival of virtuosity. The tempo was terrific; Mahler's famous whirlwind reading of the work seemed in retrospection a jog trot. The Boston men whizzed through it without missing a note or turning a hair. That's what an orchestra can do when it knows how to play!

Saturday evening a new organization gave an initial concert at Aeolian Hall. It bears the clumsy name of the Longy New York Modern Chamber Music Society. The founder and director thereof is Georges Longy, the famous oboist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His regular associates are also from that band of virtuosi, though on this occasion they included Miss Carolyn Beebe, pianist, and Mrs. Marie Sundelius, soprano. The new organization proposes to play here chamber compositions calling for various and unusual combinations of instruments, and is, therefore, a welcome arrival in a field we cultivate too little. The instrumental numbers for the first concert were an octet by Paul Juon for violin, viola, 'cello, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, horn, and piano, and an introduction and allegro by Ravel for harp solo, with string quartet, flute, and clarinet. The Ravel piece is a work of rare beauty. Both were played well. A large audience was present, indicating that the new organization is likely to have the success it deserves.

The concerts yesterday brought a repetition of the Symphony Society's Schumann concert, with Josef Hofmann as soloist, at Aeolian Hall, and the first People's Symphony Concert of the season at Carnegie Hall, in the afternoon, and the farewell concert (for the present) of Sousa's Band, at the Hippodrome, the customary popular concert at the Century Opera House, and Mme Meiler-Narodny's song recital, at Aeolian Hall, in the evening. The lady last named is a Lieder singer from Finland, the country of Sibelius and Jaernefelt, both of whose names figured in her programme. That programme was made up chiefly of Russian and Finnish songs, but it ended with a group of songs in English. Mme Mieler-Narodny has a voice of considerable natural beauty, her production of which is not blameless. However, her songs and manner of singing are calculated to interest many audiences, as they did that which heard her last night.

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERTS

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening at 8:15 with Geraldine Farrar as soloist. The subscription sale for the coming season is one of the largest the Boston Symphony has ever had in this city and the concerts are certain to be correspondingly successful.

The Symphony will be Beethoven's Seventh in A Major. The other numbers will be Handel's Concerto for Two Wind Choirs and Liszt's Symphonic Poem. Les Preludes. The program in its proper order is as follows:

Beethoven—
  Symphony No. 7 in A Major.
Mozart—
  Air, Come scoglio, from Cosi fan-tutte.
Handel—
  Concerto for Two Wind Choirs.
Wagner—
  Three Poems:
    Im Treibhaus.
    Traume.
    Schmerzen.
Liszt—
  Les Preludes.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date
Establ

THIS week sees a lull in th programme announced f dence this fall. After the opening of the Symphony se weeks ago and the opening of t cert series in scarcely less brillian more tiring style last Tuesday this week seems particularly without any big musical event interest. No other week so d musical happening will pass u on into December. Beginning n Tuesday, every Tuesday evening pied by some important concert u 16, and doubtless announcements be forthcoming to occupy the m time of those musically inclined o evenings of the week as well. The second Steinert concert comes on the night of Nov. 11 and the third and fourth will follow on Nov. 25 and Dec. 9. The second Symphony concert takes place on Nov. 18 and on Dec. 8 comes the first Arion Club concert of the year.

Rehearsals of the latter event are already under way. The club is this season considerably augmented by new voices. Its first work is to be Verdi's "Manzoni Requiem." The selection of this work is especially appropriate, as this year is the centenary of Verdi's birth. The work is one of the finest requiem masses ever written and contains some of Verdi's best and most inspiring music.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date OCT 2
Establ

First Concert by Symphony Orchestra.

The first of the series of concerts here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Infantry Hall last night, attracted a very large and brilliant audience. In the gathering were President Faunce of Brown University, Mr. Harry Parsons Cross, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Metcalf, Miss Helen P. Metcalf, Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Metcalf, Mr. Theodore Francis Green, Mr. and Mrs. Frank L. Hinckley, former Gov. D. Russell Brown, Miss Brown, Mrs. Charles H. Merriman, Mr. and Mrs. G. Richmond Parsons, Mrs. I. Harris Metcalf, Miss Margarethe Dwight, Mr. Charles Morris Smith, Miss Harriett M. Smith, Prof. and Mrs. William Carey Poland, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Edwards, the Misses Edwards, Mr. and Mrs. Edward G. Buxton, Mrs. Charles G. King, Mr. Lacey Baker, Miss Cecelia Lacey Baker, Mrs. Anne Gilbreth Cross, Mrs. George Hail, Mr. and Mrs. Prescott O. Clarke, Mr. and Mrs. F. D. Carr, Mr. and Mrs. William C. Dart, Mr. and Mrs. Irving H. Irons, Miss Harriet E. Barrows, Miss Frances Alexander, Mrs. W. B. M. Miller, Dr. Seth K. Gifford, Miss Gifford, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Freeman, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Prof. and Mrs. Charles W. Brown, Miss Edith Nichols, Dr. and Mrs. Charbonnell, Mrs. William O. Todd, Miss Helen B. Pettis, Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert C. Carpenter, Miss Elizabeth Carpenter, Mr. and Mrs. Edgar J. Lowenstein, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur M. Allen, Mrs. F. W. Matteson, Mrs. Gilbert A. Phillips, Mr. and Mrs. George M. Thornton, the Misses Thornton, Miss Harriett J. Miller, Mr. and Mrs. Henry S. Sprague, Mr. Charles W. North, Miss North, Mrs. Robert B. Treat, Miss Hazel Treat, Mr. and Mrs. T. F. Dwyer, the Misses Vaughn, Miss Emily B. Aldrich, Mrs. John P. Campbell, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore W. Foster, Mrs. J. Fred Gibson, Mrs. Henry R. Evans, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sisson.

(clarinette), the quail (oboe), and the

From EVENING NEWS
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 6 - 1913
Established:

1884

SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASES AUDIENCE

But It Is Disappointed By Farrar's Inability To Appear.

A great disappointment greeted the huge crowd that filled the Lyric last night on the occasion of the first Boston Symphony concert, when it was announced that Miss Geraldine Farrar was, through illness, unable to fulfill her engagement. Brahms' "Tragic Overture" and the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" were inserted at the last moment to take the place of her numbers on the program.

It so happened that the result as a whole was perhaps the best balanced and most attractive program with which Dr. Muck has hitherto favored us. It may be fairly said that, while Dr. Muck lacks the peculiar magnetism of Nikisch, he attains a higher general level of interpretation than any conductor of the preser a, showing himself in his readings thoroughly in sympathy with the best compositions of all the various schools, though as a program maker he has so far seemed to be little in touch with his public.

The concert opened with Glazounoff's symphony in B flat, a work which, while truly Russian in feeling, shows more poise and intellectual control than is usual with composers of his nationality. It is unfortunately weakened, in spite of many very beautiful moments, by the absence of any really striking thematic material. This is especially noticeable in the first movement. Nothing could have afforded a stronger contrast than th stern, somber beauty of the Brahm overture, by which it was followed.

The Handel concerto proved a ver agreeable surprise, inasmuch as he of all the great composers of the pa the one least in touch with moder musical thought, recalling as he fr quently does the prosaic atmosphe of the Georgian period to English hi tory. Every movement of the co certo was interesting, and the aud ence was treated to an exhibition some remarkably fine oboe playing.

The concert closed with Liszt Symphonic Poem No. 3, "The Pr ludes," certainly one of the most ha pily conceived of any of his orchestral compositions, and showing to full advantage the resources of this unique orchestra.

D. D. P.

NOV 6 1913

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARTILY WELCOMED

Miss Farrar Absent Because of Severe Cold—Fine Program Presented.

Though manifestly disappointed by the announcement that Miss Geraldine Farrar would be unable to appear, the audience which filled every seat in the Lyric last night was not long in realizing that the program provided for its entertainment by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Karl Muck, was of a nature that made it impossible to cavil because of the absence of the popular prima donna who had been announced as the soloist.

In a message to Manager Kinsey, of the Lyric, it was explained that Miss Farrar was suffering from a severe cold which threatened to develop into laryngitis and that her physician forbade her to leave New York. The absence of Miss Farrar necessitated two changes in the program. Owing to the lateness of the hour at which the communication from New York was received it was impossible to obtain the services of another soloist, so the new numbers were exclusively instrumental. For two selections from Mozart's Cosi fan tutte the Tragic Overture of Brahms was substituted, and instead of three song poems by Wagner the overture of this composer's Flying Dutchman was given a place on the program. The selections were fortunate, for they offered excellent contrasts to the spirit of the other numbers and brought into stronger relief the wonderful resources of the famous orchestra.

The symphony selected for the first appearance of the Boston Orchestra in Baltimore this season was Glazounoff's Symphony in B flat major, No. 5, Op. 55. This is in four movements and is generally regarded as revealing its composer at his best. At times stately, at others blithesome, the wonderful symphony seems always haunted by a gipsy spirit, which now and then gives expression to a sense of wild restlessness and freedom. In the rendition of the symphony the wood, wind and brasses are dominant. The scherzo was especially pleasing and the allegro maestoso was wonderfully impressive.

To many in the audience Brahms' Tragic Overture seemed a little cold and unappealing at first, but as it proceeded the rendering of the theme became more sure and convincing. When it was finished it was accorded one of the heartiest expressions of approval heard during the evening.

Despite the excellence of the symphony, there was reason to believe that the superb rendering of Handel's Concert in F major for strings and two wind orchestras—this being the edition of Gustav F. Kogel—made an appeal that caused it to be regarded by many persons as the most pleasing feature of the program. A duo for oboes in the third movement was received with a demonstration of great enthusiasm, which was equaled only by that which followed a singing violin effect in the largo. The overture of The Flying Dutchman was splendidly done.

RA DELIGHTS IANT AUDIENCE

Director Karl Muck Gets Splendid Personal Reception At Lyric.

GERALDINE FARRAR WIRES HER REGRETS

Boston Organization Substitutes Two Orchestral Numbers For Noted Diva's Songs.

Seldom has a more brilliant audience been seen at the Lyric than that which crowded the house to the doors last night at the opening concert of the year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The announcement in The News late in the afternoon that Geraldine Farrar, who was to have been the soloist, would not sing, had prepared many of the patrons for a change in the program, and this announcement was supplemented by big signs at the Lyric entrance telling of the diva's illness and her inability to appear.

W. H. Brennan, assistant manager, who has been coming to Baltimore with the Orchestra for many years, received a telegram from Miss Farrar's physician about 2 o'clock telling him that she was suffering with a severe attack of laryngitis. The soprano herself telegraphed to express her deep regret at having to disappoint the Baltimore people.

Despite the chagrin that many felt over Miss Farrar's canceled engagement, no "kicks" were made, and if any exercised the privilege of having their money returned it made no appreciable difference in the size of the house. Instead of the three songs by Wagner which Miss Farrar was to have sung two additional orchestral numbers were given. These were both familiar—Brahms' "Tragic" overture and the "Fliegende Hollander" overture.

Dr. Karl Muck, the director, was given a splendid personal reception and every number was vigorously applauded, the Handel Concerto having made a particularly good impression.

Among those in the audience were Mr. and Mrs. Gustave Strube. Mr. Strube is the new professor of harmony at the Peabody Conservatory of Music, having succeeded the late O. B. Boise. He was formerly assistant director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and last night was the first time he had ever attended one of its concerts as a spectator, despite the fact that he had been associated with it

---

The Fi[illegible] Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From GLOBE
Address: New York
Date NOV 10 1913

Music.

The Boston Orchestra Again—Other Concerts.

Dr. Muck perpetrated one of his weird programmes on the great audience that filled to capacity Carnegie Hall for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon. Is it a sense of humor, or what is it that makes the slim, Mephistophelian leader do these things? All sorts of mud has been slung at practical jokers, so no more is going to be slung here just now, but sometimes it does seem that Dr. Muck is not taking his own talents or his orchestra so seriously as we New Yorkers do.

The programme Saturday consisted of Glazounoff's fifth symphony, Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture, César Franck's symphonic poem "Les Eolides," and Dvorak's "Husitska" overture. It really isn't worth the Boston Symphony's while to come all the way to New York to waste its sweetness on Glazounoff's decorative, "popular" symphony, and the Dvorak overture in question isn't worth anybody's while anywhere, unless a brass band's in the street.

But thanks unto Dr. Muck for bringing up "Les Eolides"! César Franck is still neglected in this town, in spite of numerous performances of his symphony in the last few years. It is still an event for a New Yorker to hear a work by the great Belgian, so overridden are our concerts by German and Russian music. "Les Eolides" is not comparable as an example of Franck's genius to the symphony, the string quartet, the piano quintet, or the violin sonata, but it is a work of individual charm and should be played here often enough to become familiar. All honor for his share to Dr. Muck!

In the Smetana overture the Boston men held carnival of virtuosity. The tempo was terrific; Mahler's famous whirlwind reading of the work seemed in retrospection a jog trot. The Boston men whizzed through it without missing a note or turning a hair. That's what an orchestra can do when it knows how to play!

Saturday evening a new organization gave an initial concert at Aeolian Hall. It bears the clumsy name of the Longy New York Modern Chamber Music Society. The founder and director thereof is Georges Longy, the famous oboist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His regular associates are also from that band of virtuosi, though on this occasion they included Miss Carolyn Beebe, pianist, and Mrs. Marie Sundelius, soprano. The new organization proposes to play here chamber compositions calling for various and unusual combinations of instruments, and is, therefore, a welcome arrival in a field we cultivate too little. The instrumental numbers for the first concert were an octet by Paul Juon for violin, viola, 'cello, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, horn, and piano, and an introduction and allegro by Ravel for harp solo, with string quartet, flute, and clarinet. The Ravel piece is a work of rare beauty. Both were played well. A large audience was present, indicating that the new organization is likely to have the success it deserves.

The concerts yesterday brought a repetition of the Symphony Society's Schumann concert, with Josef Hofmann as soloist, at Aeolian Hall, and the first People's Symphony Concert of the season at Carnegie Hall, in the afternoon, and the farewell concert (for the present) of Sousa's Band, at the Hippodrome, the customary popular concert at the Century Opera House, and Mme Meiler-Narodny's song recital, at Aeolian Hall, in the evening. The lady last named is a Lieder singer from Finland, the country of Sibelius and Jaernefelt, both of whose names figured in her programme. That programme was made up chiefly of Russian and Finnish songs, but it ended with a group of songs in English. Mme Mieler-Narodny has a voice of considerable natural beauty, her production of which is not blameless. However, her songs and manner of singing are calculated to interest many audiences, as they did that which heard her last night.

From EVG. STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERTS

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening at 8:15 with Geraldine Farrar as soloist. The subscription sale for the coming season is one of the largest the Boston Symphony has ever had in this city and the concerts are certain to be correspondingly successful.

The Symphony will be Beethoven's Seventh in A Major. The other numbers will be Handel's Concerto for Two Wind Choirs and Liszt's Symphonic Poem. Les Preludes. The program in its proper order is as follows:

Beethoven—
  Symphony No. 7 in A Major.
Mozart—
  Air, Come scoglio, from Cosi fan tutte.
Handel—
  Concerto for Two Wind Choirs.
Wagner—
  Three Poems:
    Im Treibhaus.
    Traume.
    Schmerzen.
Liszt—
  Les Preludes.

TRIBUNE
'rovidence, R. I.

S week sees a lull in the musical rogramme announced for Providence this fall. After the brilliant of the Symphony series two ago and the opening of the Steinries in scarcely less brilliant, though tiring style last Tuesday evening, week seems particularly barren out any big musical event of local rest. No other week so devvoid of sical happening will pass until well on into December. Beginning next week Tuesday, every Tuesday evening is occupied by some important concert until Dec. 16, and doubtless announcements will soon be forthcoming to occupy the minds and time of those musically inclined on other evenings of the week as well. The second Steinert concert comes on the night of Nov. 11 and the third and fourth will follow on Nov. 25 and Dec. 9. The second Symphony concert takes place on Nov. 18 and on Dec. 8 comes the first Arion Club concert of the year.

Rehearsals of the latter event are already under way. The club is this season considerably augmented by new voices. Its first work is to be Verdi's "Manzoni Requiem." The selection of this work is especially appropriate, as this year is the centenary of Verdi's birth. The work is one of the finest requiem masses ever written and contains some of Verdi's best and most inspiring music.

---

nce, R. I.

OCT 23 1913

rt by Symphony Orchestra.

